swered, with straightforward kindliness. "And it has been such a pleasure to us to have you! And I don't think you will be any the worse for it."

David turned away for a moment to regain his voice. George laid his hand kindly on his shoulder. "Come in and see us as often as you can," he said. "I think I shall like to talk over old times with you. I can't do that with many new acquaintances, and I can't make friends without it."

And David was only able to grasp their hands, and rush out into the night. He had said in his heart that morning, "God, though Thou slay me, yet will I trust in Thee." And this was God's slaying.

When he regained Blenheim House, he found somebody waiting for him.

"Mr. Laurie's been sitting here a long while," Phoebe said. "I told him I did not think you'd be very late, and so he said he'd stay. No, Master David, he's not in the surgery. He went toward the dining-room, and I thought he might as well, so I stuck a bit of fire in the grate, and giv him the newspaper to amuse himself with."

Fergus was seated in the easy-chair, with his feet on the fender. It might be but the effect of the great dingy room, or the big black chair, but somehow he looked particularly small and delicate. He jumped up, and responded rather heartily to David's shake of the hand. It was not a habit of his, and David thought the extra warmth was a special sign of friendly sympathy. This young man was David's nearest friend, and David's heart felt so warm and open that he could lay candid claim on his fellow-feeling.

"I suppose you've seen the Mercury to-day, Fergus," he said. It was a relic and proof of their old boyish intimacy that they always called each other by their Christian names.

"Yes; no. I never read the Mercury—it is not worth the trouble. Oh, I know what you mean, though. I did not see it. But Robina told me. It won't matter, David. Don't let it hurt you, and then it won't."

It was all true; and now that far other treatment had warmed and opened David's heart, he could accept its truth, and feel the better for it, just as the carefully nursed convalescent grows strong enough to bear and benefit in a strong sea-breeze.

It braced him to say frankly, "But I think it will make it hard for me to be a doctor. I must try something else."

"Well," said Fergus, almost impatiently. "You've only got yourself to take care of, and I don't pity any man who can't do that."

"No," David answered, and passing from his own difficulties, went on; "and so you are going to set up for yourself, Fergus. Miss Harvey let me into the secret, because she thought I would be sure to know it. She told me to tell you this."

"She has told me all about it herself," said Fergus. "I called upon her this evening, before I came here."

And he had been there yesterday, too, David knew. Two consecutive evenings—well, well!

"Yes," Fergus observed, "I am determined to make a plunge for myself. I can't go on any more in the old humdrum, stupid way. I've been out of my element for a long time. I had no scope, and I must have some."

"I don't doubt you'll get it, Fergus," said David. "I think you will do admirably. You're so clever and persevering."

"If I only had the start!" Fergus ejaculated, almost bitterly, "but it is awfully hard to be kept down in slavery for want of a little paltry money. You see I've nothing of my own to turn over, David. I've never been able to save anything. I might, if I had not had duties to perform toward others."

David kept silence, almost wishing for the first time that his father had left him some small legacy, which he might put into Fergus's hands, the loan to be regarded as a small recognition of the profit and pleasure he had derived from Fergus's friendship.

"I could do a great deal with so little," Fergus proceeded, "for the business is one where most of the profits are so quick that one may safely take credit for everything but a very small outlay."

"You think you could get credit if you fairly stated your case?" said David. "I suppose the dealers are kindly inclined to give a young beginner a start."

"Kindly!" echoed Fergus, with scorn. "They know it's the best thing they can do. It is for their own interest. They secure a customer who perhaps would not come to them if he had his money in his hand at the time. It is everybody's interest to serve a beginner, because it is the only chance of binding him to themselves. By and by his goodwill is not to be bought at any price. But, of course, it is, as you say, very kind of them."

"Have you made any arrangements with anybody yet?" David asked, being sincerely interested.

"I can't ask those who have dealings with the old firm," Fergus answered. "It would be no use, they would not do it."

"Why not?" David inquired.

"Because they would think I was planning an opposition. Of course, it is not. I shall do good to myself without harming the old firm. I believe in competition. I have a right to sell a little cheaper than them, if I choose to work harder for smaller profits."

"I suppose so—yes," David assented, with a voice more dubious than his words.

"Still, as I say, there might be an adverse feeling in that quarter," Fergus went on, "and therefore I would rather begin on a new field altogether. Who do you think I have been talking it over with to-day, David?"

David would not attempt to guess.

"With Webber, the stationer, Millicent Harvey's brother-in-law," Fergus stated with a suppressed sense of triumph. "You see some of his dealers deal also in the class of paper which I require—paper for decorative purposes—it is that branch of our business that I shall keep to chiefly—at any rate, at first. I went to him and explained what I thought of doing, and how I was situated, and asked if he would mind speaking for me to the dealers. I put it in this way: I asked him if he would mind trusting me a little himself, and he said no. Then I said would he just mention me to the dealers, and say as much for me to them. And he said that was a small thing to do to serve an industrious young man, and he was only sorry that he could not be sure it would have more influence. But I know Webber has weight. He is not a large customer, but he pays as he goes. He might make a splendid thing even of that little business of his if he had more spirit, and launched out a little. But Webber has settled down in a rut, and just jogs on. Yet he's a good fellow in his way. He quite took to me. I dare say he felt I might bring a little new blood into his own commercial transactions. He asked me to dine with them. So I did."

"Then you saw Mrs. Webber?" David asked.

Fergus gave one of his expressive sounds of dislike. He had a whole vocabulary of these.

"There's a narrow, commonplace woman for you," he said. "I don't believe she thinks of anything but her needlework and cookery. And she's so afraid of losing the penny she has, that I don't believe she'd open her hand to grasp a diamond that was held toward her. I know she was worrying herself in wonder over what business was passing between Webber and me. That's the kind of woman to keep a man down, David."

"If she is what you describe her, she must be very different to her sister," said David, who had never met Hatty Webber.

"So she is—indeed, not a pleasant woman to have in one's family at all, in my opinion. I don't think she likes me. I fancy Webber does. Well, if he serves me, perhaps he'll find the benefit does not end there."

There was a pause. Then David observed, "So, I understand Miss Millicent is engaged to work for you."

"Yes. It will be better for her. They don't treat her in the right spirit, and she can't find it pleasant to work for them. In fact, she has powers above the work which they have for her. You know, David, I have a great ideal of business life, and it has been growing upon me very much lately. I think a firm and all its assistants should work together harmoniously—each for each other—as well as for himself. Does it not only seem right, David, that each man in a concern, down to the porter, should be so respected for his share in it, that he should be drawn up from feeling that his sole interest therein is how much wages he can get for how little work?"

"Certainly, that is most desirable," said David, "that is the teaching of the Gospel itself—the abolition of mere eye service, the working as 'unto God and not unto man.'"

"But how is it to be done?" Fergus went on. "While we are dealing with 'human nature,' we must appeal to ordinary human instincts, not to extraordinary spiritual aspirations. To give an instance: I happened to hint to Miss Millicent, that I should like her to do her very best, because so much would depend upon the beauty and originality of the first designs issued by a new house. And under that stimulant, doubtless, she really has excelled herself! That is what I mean. I think every one should have an actuality set before him, beyond his mere cash receipt."

"But every man has that already," said David. "Because it is his duty to God and man to do his best."

Fergus gave an impatient gesture.

"Granted," he answered; "but may not duty be taught by making it interest as well? If a man cannot climb a hill by his unaided strength, is it a sin to give him a stick to help him up? That is what I purpose to do. To make the interest of all whom I employ identical with my own, so that my workers will not be getting their ordinary wages the week before I am bankrupt, and getting no more than their ordinary wages when I become a millionaire. To give each an interest in our prosperity and adversity proportionate to his position therein, and to recognize other duties between us than the hard, coarse tie of so much work done so much money paid."

"It is a grand idea," said David. "It is something like Robert Owen's theories. And yet they did not work well."

"I have read his works," Fergus answered; "and I think I can account for his failures. He carried them outside the beaten track, and put them in practice in ways that can only be exceptional. My scheme would be to keep them in the beaten track, and apply them to necessary conditions of life. Not to found communities, sure to attract the dreaming and unsettled. But to start a practical business, in no outward respect to differ from its neighbors on either hand."

"It struck me," said David, "that Mr. Owen had tried to get Christianity without Christ."

"Well," said Fergus, unheeding this remark, "to this dream I devote my life. Not to money-making though if its fulfilment brings money, well and good. I think I know how to use it. Do you know, David, it is far harder to be kept from this dream of mine for want of a little money, than it would be if it was purely an ambition for myself!"

"I can believe it, Fergus," said David, quite tenderly, with his hand on his friend's shoulder. We can often sympathize with feelings presented to us by another, though they would never have entered our own hearts, whether because above or below them. David himself would have trusted God to find capital for His own work; nay, would have doubted his own call to it, till God gave a leading by clearing the way. Certainly, any undue longing of his own, David would have checked as the sign of a self-seeking, at variance with God's will. But in Fergus, it looked like nothing but the ardent zeal of impatient benevolence.

"There will be a way found for you, Fergus," he said, gently, with a reverend reticence.

"Yes, I don't doubt it; as fast as one is disappointed in one chance, another rises, if one keeps one's eyes open," said Fergus. He had almost thought that David himself, in the dismemberment of his home, might have a little money at his own disposal. But it seemed not so. For Fergus felt sure David would have volunteered it if he had. "Why should he not?" Fergus would have argued.

"It would be sure to be a good investment, and, besides, people should risk something for friendship."

So Fergus went home, to think out new schemes. And David went to bed. And that night prayer with him meant thanksgiving for God's goodness to himself and petition for help for "his dear friend struggling with difficulties."

CHAPTER IX.

A NEW FIRM.

THE next day, the dead surgeon's next kinsman came to Blenheim House.

He sat closeted in the surgery with David for more than two hours, while Phoebe went about her kitchen, dumbly agitated, hoping that nothing was happening to "worrit" her darling further.

This country cousin, a Maxwell, only comes into this history at this point. But his character colors it, as any character may color whole histories that it touches but once.

He was a just man, who sought to give everybody full measure, and then a little over, in case there was any mistake in the pressing down. He kept a mill and a great corn-chandler's shop, and most of the poor people in his native town dealt with him, because he served them more liberally than anybody else. But he never gave any alms.

He had not seen Mr. Maxwell more than once or twice, and had as little regard as respect for him. He was not a rich man, though well-to-do, and most of his property was of that business-like kind which would be sure to suffer in transmission to his family of five daughters. It was a pleasant prospect to contemplate funded property worth already nearly three hundred a year, and which could be set wholly aside to accumulate for his girls. It was none the less pleasant for being a great surprise, for though he was fully aware of the unhappy circumstances of Mr. Maxwell's household, he had always concluded that there would be a will to bestow the rights which the law withheld. Had there been any such will, he would not have looked too closely into it, nor raised any point that the lawyers could pass over. But as there was none, as his uncle had not thought fit to take the trouble of protecting those whom he might have felt their kindred were likely to regard as natural enemies, this kinsman felt quite ready to have his rights, and determined to be sure that he had them all. He would himself see the certificate of the surgeon's tardy marriage, and being forced to accept it, did so with a grunt, and felt as if Mrs

Maxwell had wronged himself, and the woman that had gone before her, and that woman's child. Very likely his note to David had been kinder for that feeling. We are the friends of those who have a common enemy.

"Your father must have known that he had put that woman in a position to benefit by his property," he said, "and therefore it becomes doubly shameful that he made no provision for you."

"It does not signify," David answered, quietly; "I am now in no worse position than many lawfully-born children whose parents have no money to leave them."

"No, I know you are not," said the other, "but it seems so hard that you should be outside the law, and she within it, though she has no more moral right. More moral right! A thousand times less! I must speak plainly to you, young man. There is no help for it. And you must set the pain at the door of those who do the deeds, not at theirs who have to name them afterward. You must know yourself that it was very bitter for all our people when your mother went astray with the surgeon. But there was a different feeling about her and this other woman. She was a poor young thing, five years younger than he was. And her friends, though they were poor, were honest people, and were just as angry and pained as we were, and were ready to move Heaven and earth to get her to leave such a man and such a way of life. And then she soon died—dwindled away, as we heard. And at the very last she got a man to take her in his cart twenty miles across country to some of her own people. We heard that she could not speak when she got there—but I dare say you know all the story well."

"No, I do not," David answered, sadly. "I have never heard a word about my mother."

"Is it really so? Well, we heard about her in the different ways that people do hear. That was all we heard; but her going back, and dying as it were on the very threshold of decent folk that she knew would have nought to do with her unless she was repentant, made us have gentler thoughts of her, don't you see—the blame dropped in two, as it were, and half of it turned to pity. But this other woman was of quite another sort. She was older than the surgeon to begin with—three years older. And she knew all about his family and the property he had. And she went into her bad ways, in a business fashion, with her eyes wide open. And they visited her, and came back to our town, taking airs about the fine place their sister lived in! I suppose you've seen them here, sir?"

"Yes," David said, not adding that he had never seen much of them, having always been hustled off into the kitchen whenever they came, during his childhood; and having voluntarily betaken himself to the surgery on such occasions in later times.

"I can assure you all this was exceedingly bitter to our family," the kinsman went on. "I know that your father's own mother, and his sister, too—my poor dead mother—urged on the ceremony of marriage. The surgeon's way of life gave them great grief and anxiety, and they felt it was no use hoping for any improvement while he continued living in a course of direct sin. But they never contemplated such an issue as the present. We always supposed that a man in your father's circumstances would be sure to make a very explicit will. It seems awfully unjust, that by a mere legal superiority, that woman gets her full rights, while you have nothing!"

"I have a right to nothing," said David; "therefore, I am not the loser by her gain."

The miller shook his head. All his speech was but the preamble to a thought that had been in his mind all the way up to London. It had kept him awake two or three nights, and had made him deny his wife when she had suggested the purchase of two or three mild luxuries as a fitting mark of their accession to property. It was a thought which he had not welcomed. He had only not thrust it away or silenced it. He was a man who had never denied himself to landlord or tax gatherer, however inconvenient their visits might be, and so he had learned to confront any idea that presented itself as a duty. If it was a duty, he would meet it and do its behests, not gently and kindly and cheerfully, as we drop our Sabbath offerings in the Holy House, but fully and painfully, as we pay a bill, even when we think it overcharged. This thought at last framed itself reluctantly into words.

"I must do something for you myself, David Maxwell," he said.

And then he went on, more briskly, putting out his ideas just as they lay in his mind, with that strange lack of connection common to people not given to utter thought, especially thought made half of feeling: "I've said so to myself ever since I found that though I can take your share, I can't touch that woman's. I'm sure you'll be a credit to us to what you might have been, my lad. You've got your Grandmother Maxwell's face, and she was as much a saint as any woman can be. I don't know who your father took after, but not after her. You're the most of grandson she has left behind her, for mine are all girls. And I'm not a rich man. I only rub along. But as we never expected any of this money at all, we can do without it for another year, and give you over the three hundred pounds. It will give you a fair start. I'd only five hundred when I began life myself, for though my mother had share and share alike with your father, my father got through nearly all of it. It's a kind of way in the world. Some people can't spend money fast enough, and others find it terribly hard to get. I've often worried over my poor girls. But that's all right now; and they won't be poorer for giving you a help."

"It is so very good of you," David answered, warmly. "But, ought I to take it? Let me think."

"Of course you ought to take it," said the miller, and having stontly made the offer, began to feel lurking wishes that David would resolutely put it aside.

David would have done so directly, but that it seemed to him that this might be a Godsend, given by his hand to Fergus Laurie. Once this idea flashed into his mind, practical arguments came trooping up to support it. He had certainly not been chargeable to his father for years—never since he first took the teacher's place in the Hackney Academy. And of late, since he had been in the surgery, he had positively saved his father much expense, and consequently increased, so far, his property. Then, again, it had certainly been his father's bonnden duty to give him some such start in life as this gift would render possible. As for taking it, David was clear-minded enough to perceive that he would have to stand indebted to somebody, and to whom more fairly than to this blood relation, who was at least a greater gainer by the poor, disreputable dead surgeon than anybody else could be? Then, again, David reflected that, if he prospered in life, he could amply repay this gift in many ways, without even seeming to turn restive under the burden of gratitude. And if he did not prosper, this did not defraud any of what was really his own—a comfort that could scarcely attach to help from any other quarter.

"I will take it, sir," David said at last, looking straight in the miller's troubled, watching face. "And I cannot thank you enough in words."

"It's all right," said the miller; "of course, I know you thank me. And I suppose, from what I hear, you'll be made into a doctor."

"I think not," David answered. "Something has come to light which will go much against me in that character. I will show you what it is." And he went to his own room, brought down the Hackney Mercury, and put it into the miller's hands.

The miller read it, and would have liked to put his thoughts into some bitter words, but refrained, and only asked, pointing to the paragraph: "Is it true?"

"Yes," David answered. "I myself could bring forward proofs, though I never knew what they proved till I read that."

"Was it infatuation for the study that led the surgeon into such mean dastardliness—surely he could have afforded to prosecute it in far different ways?" groaned the miller.

"He never prosecuted it at all," David answered, sadly. "At least, never since my time. He always said he meant to do so, but did not. I think he must have done this for that purpose at first, and then went on, as a kind of habit."

"That a habit," said the miller, "and for no purpose! Habit indeed! Rather madness!"

David made no answer. He had not lived where he had for six-and-twenty years without learning that wickedness is either an idiocy or a lunacy of soul.

"I shall go into some business where my knowledge of chemistry will be useful," said David, forcing a cheery tone of voice, as people do when they step out of a charnel-house into the sunshine.

"Well, I hope you'll get on. Anyhow, I believe you'll be no discredit to our name, as you well might have been, all things considered."

The miller stayed in Blenheim House for some days, winding up affairs; but this conversation, with its result, was the only point where he touches our story. Most readers will not regret that he stayed in it such a short time, but will be almost as glad to get rid of him as of Mrs. Maxwell. And yet this single recorded action is a good one. But his is a character which never gets its share of the toleration and charity which goes about the world, begging to be allowed to enfold all shades of profligates and prodigals. There is patience for weakness, but no patience for hardness. Folks make excuses for the man who slips into the slough of his worst nature, but cannot endure him who struggles out of it so hardly that he cannot sit gracefully on its edge! In the world's eyes, it is better to have no line of duty at all, than to have one with no beauty curves about it! There is no joyous welcome about an iron stove, though it may give out twice the heat of the dancing wood-fire. But it is better to have virtues hidden within one's fleshly temperament, than virtues which will drop off with it, as will much that passes as good feeling and generosity. There are some people who have cause to thank God for nothing so much as "that He is greater than their heart, and knoweth all things."

David's first proceeding was to consult Fergus. He told him all the history, adding that Fergus could have the whole use of the three hundred pounds, at least until such time as he required a portion of it. Or he might not need any, if he got a situation, and Fergus stood for any security that might be required.

"Why shouldn't you join me?" Fergus asked, abruptly. "Your knowledge of chemistry is just what is wanted in our trade. Put your money and your skill along with my business faculty and connection. You will always have an eye on your capital, and a full share of whatever prosperity comes to us. I will guarantee you something of a salary if you like; but I can't be particularly tempting in that way, at first, David. You might get more of a certainty elsewhere, but scarcely such a prospect! If you come, you must regard your time as well as your money, as an investment, safe indeed, but a little slow at first!"

"I would do it instantly; I should only be too glad to do anything to serve you; I know it would be serving myself, too," David answered, eagerly; "only I should like to be sure of enough to keep Phoebe, or I have no right to hinder her getting another place. If it was only myself, there would be no risk—I would pull through, at a pinch, on thirty pounds for a year. But I couldn't with Phoebe, though she's as cheap a person as there can be. If she knew there was any difficulty, she'd want to go out working for herself, and waiting on me besides."

"I don't see why she shouldn't," said Fergus, "she's always been used to that sort of thing!"

"If she must, of course she must," David replied; "but I will not make any arrangements that will bring on the necessity. I know you wouldn't if it were you, Fergus."

"Ah, well, perhaps not. Anyhow, you are right. You say you could pull through at a pinch on thirty pounds. Surely, Phoebe could do the same," Fergus answered, half carelessly.

"Of course she could. But that would make sixty," said David.

"Well, I should hope you don't think you are likely to get less than that the first year you work with me?" Fergus observed, almost angrily. "Double that, three times that, I should trust and believe."

"Then I shall be only too glad to accept your offer," said David. "The barest living secured, especially for Phoebe, and I can cheerfully trust all the rest."

"I hope you will," Fergus answered gravely. "For if we are to work well together, you will have to trust me a good deal, David. Business tactics are peculiar, and I understand them, and you do not, and you may often fancy that I am doing queer things. I should not like to work with anybody who did not feel the greatest confidence in me."

"I don't think I've ever given you reason to fear I should be mistrustful and suspicious. You must trust me to trust you, Fergus," said David; and so the compact was sealed.

After that Fergus worked with a will. He secured suitable trade premises—parting at once with a large slice of David's capital to pay rent in advance. Many departments of work which old, long-established firms did at home, he was compelled to arrange for with other houses, from the utter impossibility of procuring heavy, expensive plant. About all this he was very candid with David, explaining that it must seriously reduce their profits, but was better than incurring large burden of debt, which candor and caution led David to the erroneous conclusion that all that was there was paid for—a mistake he easily fell into from his ignorance of the prices of machinery and office furniture. This candor on Fergus's part prevented David feeling any delicacy in making a few inquiries, and with a sense of his ignorance, and a simple-minded desire to remove it, he asked two or three questions as to prices, etc. To these he always received the fullest and most satisfactory answers, but given in a tone and manner that led his sensitive kindness to fear that Fergus writhed under the idea that his honest wish for information was only disguised criticism and doubt. So David said to himself that he was quite sure Fergus was willing to tell him everything, but that it would be kindlier to let pass any accidental omission of information, even at inconvenience to his own future usefulness. David had not a legal mind, and did not in the least understand that the most voluminous affidavit may crumble beneath a monosyllable of cross-examination. He innocently thought that perhaps it was as natural for Fergus to be a little reserved on some points as for himself to keep secret that he had been to a lawyer, and made a will, bequeathing to Jemima, Sarah, Emma, Kate and Anne Maxwell, daughters of John Maxwell, miller, of Yarmouth, any property that he, David, might leave, not exceeding four hundred pounds in value; anything exceeding that sum to go to Phoebe Winter.

Robina Laurie paid a great many visits during those weeks of preparation. She called on Mrs. George Harvey. She called on Mrs. Webber. She connected herself with the Dorcas society, and called at the vicarage. She called over and over again on Mrs. Harvey and Millicent. Fergus instigated all these calls, but he found she obeyed him more readily, and he commended her for it. Robina Laurie was a woman whose courage and sociability lay in her garments, and Fergus had given her ten pounds of David's money to thoroughly replenish her wardrobe, which, with Robina, meant to purchase two dresses, a cloak and a bonnet with a feather. Robina knew nothing about her brother's affairs, except the fact—which ought to have had a significance even to her—that he had certainly no means of his own. Other people knew that he was poor, but nobody except his mother and sister—not even David—knew that he had nothing, in the literal meaning of the word. But Robina felt that she was gaining the highest aim of her life when she was buying her finery, and this eagerness made it easy for her to persuade herself that of course his superior talents could command plenty of cash on every side, and that she need ask no question whence came the particular check to decorate herself. She was very condescendingly affable to David Maxwell, remarking to Milly that her brother's ability to receive him into business at this particular juncture "had happened like a good providence for him."

All preliminaries were adjusted at last, and one fine Monday morning a smart errand boy opened the shutters of a newly-painted house, and disclosed a blind which announced to the world the new firm of "Fergus O. Laurie & Company."

LET every one test his own strength and fleetness in the race of life; and though it is well to remember, and calculate on, the possibility of failure, and profit by the experience of others, one is apt to get disheartened, or use his strength in meeting imaginary dangers, if he is continually reminded that he "must not be too sanguine; for it is quite likely he will not succeed, when other people, possessed of far greater ability and more abundant resources, have been known to fail."

Good definitions are rare, as all who consult Webster's Unabridged well know. The editor of this ponderous volume ought to be grateful to the little boy who, when asked by his sister what capital punishment was, replied that it was being locked up in the cupboard with the jam and other nice things.

IN A HURRY.

BY MISS MARY E. COMSTOCK.

HURRY is the bane of American households. Home-makers fail in their vocation because this element of hurry so pervades their lives. Little children and the boys and girls springing into manhood and womanhood do not dare to unburden themselves freely to the fathers and mothers that are always in a hurry. The ruffled spirit which the pressure of haste gives cannot afford that sympathy and cheer wherein young lives can blossom healthfully. The atmosphere of home should have among its prime components rest and leisure. Duties thoroughly performed in due season give these.

The mother is the natural home-maker. From her, love and sympathy and helpfulness should radiate. Instead of a true home-maker, however, the mother is too often simply the worried, impatient housekeeper. Happy the household having such a presiding genius if it have a baby in it. Baby then becomes the centre; receiving from and giving to hungry hearts very life elixir. Bestowing smiles as boons and sincerest sympathy from wells of feeling undefiled, baby makes the "home!" Sometimes some attached family servant furnishes far more of the real home element than does pater or mater familias. Personal wishes are consulted. A helping hand and loving heart are always at this person's bestowal, to give benison. Sometimes it is a helpless invalid around whom all circle; simple hospitality of heart making the home atmosphere.

The mother who lets the moth and rust of perpetual hurry corrode the finest part of her woman's nature, taking away the brightness of her shining, abdicates her royalty, and too often reaps legitimate reward of seeing her family estranged from her, giving their confidence elsewhere, leaving her social nature to shrivel amid domestic cares. Her daughters are very likely to grow up like herself.

Estelle Riverton was a charming girl. So strangers universally said. Beautiful, possessing easy grace of manner, the overflow of buoyant health and youth finding expression in apparent gay good will, to all she was most attractive. She also possessed powers of mind of no common order. It seemed strange that she had not more heart friends. When her engagement to the revered professor was announced every one rather commiserated than congratulated him upon winning the beautiful young girl to be his wife. The mystery of this frame of mind could have been explained on rational principles.

Estelle Riverton had been in a hurry all her life. She was always behind time in all her arrangements and preparations. The cause may not seem adequate to the result. But there was neither rest nor security in her orbit. In the worry and makeshifts and disappointments of which she had always been the centre, her friends had grown to lose sight of her loveliness. In a hurry for an article she should have procured long before, she was constantly obliged to levy upon a friend "in such desperate haste, you know." When in too much of a hurry to write and ask a remittance from papa she was always sure you would be glad to oblige her. Friends lost time in waiting for her to fulfil her appointments. They lost time in puzzling over the illegible letters written "in such a hurry to catch the mail." Confusion and disappointment seemed to exhale from her very presence, though to a stranger meeting her for the first time this was not apparent.

Estelle's engagement lasted two years while she waited for the professor to come home from his foreign appointment. Friends laid the flattering unction to their souls that she would be all "ready" on her wedding-day. When the guests were come and the appointed time for the ceremony had arrived, one of the bridesmaids had to sit down and hem the bride's veil, while another with quick wit, which was needed, cleverly improvised a substitute for an article that had been mislaid "in the confusion, you know." Estelle had wished to have the clergyman read the marriage service from the identical Prayer Book that had been used at her mother's marriage. Estelle had made a point of this. There was a prodigious great hurry to find that Prayer Book at the last minute. It refused to be found. Estelle was married without its aid. She "had to keep every one waiting at the last," she said, she "had been in such a hurry to get her trunks packed in season." Even her ruby lips and sweet voice did not give the excuse a pleasant sound to her friends on her wedding-day! Every one had done so much for her, too, and she had just hurried and hindered. What a bright, orderly, peaceful home she will be apt to make for the honored professor. Poor Estelle! Poor professor!

This frightful phantom of hurry needs to be exorcised from our homes by the magic spells of system and moderation. The head of the house is apt to give a restricted, unsympathetic tone to the entire household in his hurry to regain financial footing lost in doing as his neighbors do. The mother spends time and strength in miserable makeshifts to imitate those who have more means. Let us be independent and simple and genuine. Let us bethink ourselves, like the poor jaded beast in the highway, to at length turn aside, from the blindly hurrying chariot that seems to be pursuing us, into the green, wayside places. Let us take time to live rationally, if to do so we have to wear simple calico; walk instead of ride; depend on the circulating libraries for our reading; use the cheapest stationery, and put plain hems for trimming on the children's clothes. Let us take time to walk; time to read; time to communicate by letter with absent friends; time to get acquainted with the children and enter through sympathy into their lives. Let us take time to love each other and to show that we do.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

No. VI.

WOMEN nearly always sharpen the bread-knife on the stove or the stove-pipe. The best way I ever found is to sharpen on an old barrel-stave or piece of a box in which lime has been mixed, and then put on the smooth edge by finishing on a bit of pine.

The wooden door-step, into which sand and dirt has worked, makes a good place to sharpen a knife.

One of the best housewives in Kentucky always uses lime-water in mixing up her bread. She says it is wholesome. If I set yeast at night, and it is likely to have a sour taste, I often use lime-water in wetting up.

Jumbles are nice for tea these summer evenings if made after Granny Greenstreet's recipe. Take a half pound of butter, three-fourths of a pound of flour, and a half pound of white sugar, powdered, putting by a little of the sugar to roll them in. Beat two eggs well and add a little nutmeg. Make this into a soft dough. Do not roll on the paste-board, but break off bits the size of a walnut, roll them in the fine sugar, make into rings, and lay them on tins to bake an inch or two apart, as they will rise and spread. Bake in a moderate oven.

For fear your dried fruit may become wormy, put it in your long pans and heat as hot as you can in the oven, without scorching. While it is hot pack it away in strong new paper sacks, and hang in a dry place.

At this season of the year the most careful housekeeper is troubled with cockroaches. The nasty things! who could eat the crust of his bread if he knew a frisky roach had darted across it, or bear to touch a cranberry tart if he knew the pestiferous insect had jabbed his bill down into it, and tested its merits first?

We can make a feed for them that will rid us of their presence.

Take equal parts of Indian meal and red lead, and make them into a thick batter with molasses, and set it in your cupboards and under them. Or, mix a teaspoonful of powdered arsenic with the same of mashed potatoes, and crumble it up for them; or, give them phosphorus mixed in a paste. Be careful about it, and burn or bury anything in which you have mixed poison—don't throw it out doors.

Two of the members in Deacon Potts's family like brown bread. I wish we all liked it, for I know it must be wholesome, although I cannot like the taste of it. Something about it reminds me of the smell of the old barn, when I used to climb and creep about hunting eggs—the smell of mouldy boards, and rails, and decaying straw, and damp corners where the sun never shone.

For those who like brown bread without yeast, we give our recipe.

Of unbolted corn-meal and unbolted rye-meal, take three pints of the former and two of the latter, sift through a coarse sieve separately. Upon the corn-meal pour half a pint of molasses, and scald it thoroughly, cool with sour milk, or buttermilk, and add the rye-meal, salt to taste; in a little water dissolve soda enough to neutralize the acid of the buttermilk. Have it soft or it will be dry when baked. Bake in a deep pan three hours. Or, if for old people with poor teeth, put it in a pudding-pan with a tight cover and boil four hours, pouring in boiling water as it wastes, and keeping it at the boiling point all the time. If mixed up with yeast powders it must be baked immediately.

I called at Sister Bodkin's the last time I was in Pottsville. The girls wanted I should get her jacket pattern. While I was there one of the student girls, Rosetta Butler, came to ask the doctor what would cure her sore mouth. Sister Bodkin said, never mind what the doctor would say, but use the same that is good for babies' sore mouths. "Take a fresh egg," said she, "and empty the contents from the small end, leaving the shell as whole as possible, then put in a spoonful or two of strained honey, and a few green or dried leaves of sage, set the shell in the warm ashes, and let it cook till the strength of the sage is extracted, then add a very little burnt alum. Apply with a soft swab of old ravelled linen. If the sore inclines to be cankerous sore mouth, wet the end of your finger, dip it in powdered sulphur and touch the sore with it. This will prevent canker from eating any deeper.

The inner bark of common sumach soaked in cold water, and sweetened with loaf sugar is recommended as good for sore mouth.

Strange what queer things will happen! How true is that passage of Scripture, "we know not what a day may bring forth."

Little did I think when I was writing last week, that when I resumed my pen again, I would write from an invalid's easy-chair. It is a long story, but I will make it brief.

Father had been talking all this spring about going down into the neighborhood of Goose Creek Church to buy some Chester white pigs. I think there is nothing better for a tired woman than to get away from home occasionally, and see how other folks live, so I fixed up and went with him. I wore a gingham dress, large black bombazine apron, my summer calash, made of gray lawn, and a pair of soft woollen gloves. I carried my reticule and my Bay State shawl. There has been something like the tetter on my hands for a good while, and while I am doctoring them they have to be kept warm. I carried some sweet cakes along in my reticule.

Father wore his Leghorn hat, newly renovated, and let his camlet cloak lie back unfastened on his shoulders.

We stopped at Brother Loomis's, the Chester pigman. They fed Humbug, and gave us our dinners, real hospitable Baptist fashion. The state of religion in that neighborhood is fair to average.

Elder Nutt preaches to them one-third of his time. The elder is a widower, about forty-five years of age, and boards at Brother Hartman's. Brother Loomis said if the elder were a married man, they could afford to hire him for half his time, because then they could pay him a part of his salary in meal, pork, potatoes, hay and oats, and such like. As it is, they have to pay him in money.

"You're a lone woman, Miss Potts," said Brother Loomis; "maybe you and the elder could agree on the one p'int—mattermony? Who knows?"

"Better marry a preacher than a deacon," said his wife, and she laughed as though she had spoken a very witty thing.

I smiled.

Father traded for three little white fat pigs. We put them in a stout sack, and laid it in the back part of the buggy. The poor things squealed nearly all the time.

We were riding over a causeway—I think it is called—a low, swampy place, with logs and rails laid close together, to make a good road, when an old sow, hearing the squealing of the pigs, suddenly jumped out of a clump of bushes at the roadside and scared Humbug, and she started and ran off.

Father pulled at the lines with all his might, but she only ran the harder. The jolting was intolerable; the buggy leaped "like a wounded hart or roe," as the poet says; the little Chesters squealed their hardest and shrillest, and the sow, with maternal instinct, followed closely after.

A man, riding on a snow-white steed, was coming down a lane into the road, and seeing the peril, he spurred his charger and hurried on to render us his assistance. He soon reached us, and tried to head Humbug, so as to bring her to a halt.

For at least half a mile it was nip and tuck between the horses. Now, Humbug never would let any other beast pass her on a run; she was too plucky for that.

Oh, such a ride! Whenever I think of it I grow faint, and want to smell the camphor. I can see it all! Elder Nutt, actuated by the milk of humanity, riding as never man rode before; Humbug, with her ears laid back, her mane—what was left of it—and her tail sailing like banners of glory; and dear father leaning back and pulling on the lines with all the strength of his infirm years. His Leghorn hat was chucked down on the back of his head; his mouth was open; his three teeth and his tongue visible; his eyes sticking out, and his camlet cloak streaming from the back of the vehicle. Sometimes I was on the seat, and again I was down in the bottom of the buggy, jolting along with the sack of dear little Chester whites. Some of the time they were in my lap, and again, I would be sitting on them. The sow still followed, squealing along after us.

The elder's horse did not gain an inch on the infuriated Humbug.

We tried to tell him that it only angered our beast, but the jolting prevented us from saying a word that came out whole. Even a one-syllable word would break into fragments that could not be put together.

I remember nothing after the buggy ran off the side of the causeway, and I was thrown out. The seat fell across my ankle, and the sprain was so painful that I fainted.

We were near to Brother Hartman's when it happened. The elder took me up in his strong arms and carried me into the house on his bosom.

He had read medicine when he was a young man, before he was ordained to preach the Gospel, and he examined my ankle to see if any of the bones were broken. He expressed great concern, and showed a deep interest in my welfare. I was taken home in the evening in a carriage. Granny and the girls were thankful that the injury was not of a serious character. Father escaped without being hurt at all, but two of the dear little Chester whites were dead when the sack was first untied.

Elder Nutt called over the next morning to see how I felt. I was propped up in the arm-chair, and sat and conversed a good while with him.

He reminds me of King David. He is a holy man; he is not very well educated, but his heart is full of the fervor of a religion that knows not the limits of education. He is not what would be called a handsome man, neither is he homely. He has a heavy beard, and a very high forehead; indeed, I may say, it extends to the back of his neck—it retreats shockingly, but then, what it lacks, is made up in quantity.

Brother Nutt had been unfortunate in the first year of his ministry. One dark night, while riding home from a country school-house, where he had been preaching the Gospel, his horse went too close to a fence, and a jagged end of a stake struck the elder in one eye and tore open the under lid.

It must have been a horrible gash! Even now it looks like an open red mouth. That is all I see about my benefactor that is objectionable. I call him my benefactor—my preserver; I feel as if he had saved my life, gathering me up in his arms and bearing me out of a scene of danger. It was a beautifully-romantic episode to happen in the quiet life of the serene Sister Potts, of the village of Pottsville.

A few days after the accident Sister Hartman came over to see me, and Brother Nutt sent me a bouquet of peonies by her. It was very large—large enough to cover the flaring top of a gallon crock. I may be fastidious about bouquets; I like almost half the bouquet to be green leaves; this one, culled and arranged by his careful fingers, had not a leaf of green in it. It was beautifully and artistically arranged, however.

I used to be troubled about making icing for cakes long ago, when the girls were small and had picnics with their little friends. I do wish I had known this then.

Take of the best white sugar one pound, and pour over it just enough cold water to dissolve the lumps; then take the whites of three eggs and beat them a little, but not to a stiff froth; add these to the sugar and water, put it in a deep bowl, place the bowl in a vessel of boiling water and beat the mixture. It will become thin and clear at first, and afterward begin to thicken. When it becomes quite thick, remove it from the fire, and continue beating it until cold, then spread it on with a knife. It is perfectly white, glistens beautifully, and is so hard and smooth, when dry, that you can write very well upon it with a pencil.

Cousin Barbara Stump took tea with us last night. Bab is such a practical woman that I like to come under the influence of her magnetism. She is raising four calves this spring. She gives them skimmed milk to drink instead of new milk fresh from the cow. Father told her he didn't believe in dish-water calves, but she laughed and said if ours were fed on new milk she would like to compare them with her dish-water calves and see which were the prettiest.

She warms the milk and makes a little well-cooked corn-meal gruel, and puts into it. Sometimes she makes it of flour. Every evening each calf gets a raw egg, well beaten up in warm water, and put into the milk. Barbara has the knack of doing everything well that she undertakes.

She says she never makes bread and milk poultice, but makes it of hot mashed potatoes instead. It is a clean kind of a poultice, easily warmed, and there is no disagreeable leak to it as there is to one made of bread and milk.

For her plants she uses a good pinch of bone flour in the water with which she wets them.

Let me see—what else did she tell me. Oh! she makes a delicious preserve of green grapes, and she always puts away a half gallon of green grape juice for her mince pies in the winter.

All the old bones that will readily break up finely she breaks for her hens, they eat them voraciously.

She don't sell her butter at the stores in Potteville, to be gobbled up by everybody, or tumbled into an old barrel with all sorts of greasy, lardy, streaked stuff, but sends it to the state of New Jersey, receiving forty cents a pound for it, with a hearty call for more.

There is nothing better for a sprain than the good old British oil. After a great deal of trouble we have obtained the correct recipe.

Take half a pint of linseed oil, half a pint of turpentine, half a pint of oil of amber—of mineral tar and oil of juniper each one gill. Shake well together, and keep corked tightly.

When our St. Cecelia, the school ma'am was here the last time, she was carrying home with her a volume of poems that she had loaned to a careless neighbor. There were two spots of grease on the beautiful new book; they annoyed her exceedingly, but Brother Jenkins happened to call while she was here, and he said it was the easiest thing in the world to take grease out of paper, that he'd seen his wife do it frequently. She brushed the spots over lightly with spirits of turpentine, waited till it was dry, and then wet the place with alcohol, and the page was clean as before.

I do believe I can tell you, girls, on paper, how it is done. I shall be so happy if I can make you understand; a pretty new way of wearing hair. It is the prettiest style I ever saw, and the beauty is, in its being an honest way, with no unsightly stuffing, or foundation that is cunningly kept out of sight. It is the best for long, coarse hair, that is bright underneath.

First divide the hair into four equal parts. Commence by lifting up one of the slips behind, holding it out straight, and combing it smooth, and wide, and flat, perpendicularly. Now begin up next the head, to lift some of the hair over, across, in a way to lap some of it quite around a portion of it that you hold out straight in your hand. Then wind it in a close twist from the head down to the end of the hair. When twisted, tuck it down between the girl's shoulders and the chair back, so it may not unwind. After all four are twisted, tie a narrow black ribbon or band around the head, under the hair; let it come far down behind and be put back well on the head in front. Now take up one of the twists of hair about as low down at the back of the neck as where the hair comes. Make it puff up as loosely as possible, stick a pin in at the top of it, under, out of sight, and fasten it into the ribbon at the top of the head. If the lower end of the puff don't stay in place, straight down the back of the head, fasten it to the ribbon. Now carry the twist round the head, following the band, tuck the end in and proceed the same way with the others. The twisted hair carried round the head makes it seem like a coronal.

I know I have told this awkwardly, and maybe it will be hard to understand. I'm not gifted in such ways and tricks, and don't know just the words to use.

You will like this style if you can work from the plan I have endeavored to sketch. After the hair is put up, take some narrow blue, or pink, or bright green ribbon, make a small bow like we call a double-bow-knot, make a loop stitch on the under side, run a hairpin through it, and stick two of these little bows on one side of your head, one a little back of your left temple, and the other a little above, and back of your ear.

Now I call that pretty—especially if your face is round, or not too thin. This is a light, airy way of wearing hair, and it can't slip down and at any time it will not look odd or unfashionable.

This is the way Lily wears her hair. For a thin face I like the way Ida used to wear hers, long and light and as soft as silk. She combed it all back smoothly, put in a long comb and pushed it back until the ends came behind her ears, the whole comb at the back of her head. Then she divided the hair in two parts and crossed it at the back of her head and wound it loosely around the circle that the comb made.

The prettiest part of a girl's face, save perhaps the curve of cheek and chin, is the temple where the blue tracery of veins show so delicately, and where the silken hair fades away into a hint of paly gold.

I like to see the temples bared, and the hair smoothed off them by a damp brush.

Little-bows of bright ribbon show off this style of dressing hair to advantage, they seem so like gay summer butterflies just alighted.

I can think of nothing better to recommend to your special consideration and attention, than family, or neighborhood, or select party picnics, during this month. They are the most enjoyable occasions I know of.

Don't forget them, industrious boys and girls; June is a delightful month from which to select two or three long days to be spent among wild hills and rocky steeps and cool ravines. The October days are finest in which to visit historical spots and lakes, and to take long rides among hills and valleys, and in new places.

Go prepared—take your iron tea-kettle, with all the conveniences needed, from a hatchet down to matches and kindlings. Make hot coffee and tea, have cream and sugar, and a good loaf of bread, a bowl of hard, yellow butter covered with cool leaves, cake, jam or jelly, pickles, roast chicken, tarts and turnovers.

You'll soon learn what is needed, and what troublesome thing to leave out, and not to carry too great a variety.

Take a garden-trowel to lift plants and mosses. Wear good shoes, and dresses that will bear patching and washing, and go determined to have a good time, and you will be surprised at the fun you will have and the elastic spirits you will bring home with you.

We Pottses have had all kinds of adventures, except breaking our necks or getting hurt. We have hung our tea-kettle in inaccessible places, and our camping fire has sent up a graceful curl of smoke in the wild wood where never a foot trod except the red man's. We have dined in the cool shadow of a wall of rocks perpendicular two hundred feet high, with the rippling river lying at our feet. We have looped back the dewy vines and spread our table-cloth on mosses more exquisitely beautiful than any carpet wrought by man's cunning and ingenuity.

In these palaces of awful grandeur we have heard the voice of the man of God go up in words of gratitude and thanks when before only the songs of the birds had broken the solitude.

Two years ago, after we had spent a very pleasant day among the rocks and cascades at Hemlock Falls, and were just getting ready to put our moss-laden baskets in the big wagon, our span of young horses broke loose and ran away, tipped over and broke the wagon and left it lying among the trees.

It was the maddest sight I ever saw. It was late in the afternoon, and we eleven girls were left alone in that wild place six miles from home. Just then, as if to add to our discomfort, a dreary, drizzling rain began to fall and the whole sky grew leaden and gloomy.

Bub always laughs at runaways, and fires, and fights, and drunk men, and everything he ought not to. He doubled over and ha-ha'd. I shook him and said: "Young man, wisdom is good on all occasions; think of eleven poor, lone, lorn, miserable critters, far from home and all under your care and protection; some of them invalids, some nervous, some don't know how to walk a mile, some are subject to fits of the blues—this is no time for merriment." Would you believe it! he only laughed the harder.

He said: "Oh, Annie and Julia did kick up their heels so joyfully, and they made the straps and splinters fly so gloriously that if they had dashed down the precipice I could not have helped laughing! Just keep cool, girls;" and he kept on laughing, till really we began to feel the magnetism of his untimely laugh, and joined him.

After he started off to look for the colts we conferred together and concluded, if he did find them, we couldn't ride home, and then we started homeward on foot.

We wore quilts, and army blankets, and comforts, and water-proofs, and towels, and fixed ourselves up just as ugly and funny and comfortable as we pleased.

We were all excited and a little reckless and didn't care how grotesque we appeared.

We walked on through the mud and rain, laughing and telling stories and joking each other, for nearly two miles.

We stopped at the house of a man who had caught one of our horses, and who proposed lending Bub his new wagon and all necessary harness.

We accepted the offer and all tumbled into the big wagon, while the lively colts were full of fire, prancing and starting at every motion the girls made. It was a jolly ride home. The rain increased, but our spirits rose with it. When we reached home every girl was as wet as she could be, but not one of us took cold or was sick from the exposure. Even dear little brown eyed Lottie L., a confirmed invalid, was invigorated by the day's adventure.

I do most cordially commend family and neighborhood and select picnics to the attention of farmer's families.

Not that starchy kind, where you go in couples and wear all your flimsy finery, and have no enjoyment at all. If you have no pretty places to go to, ride off then a dozen miles to the pine woods, or some kind of waterfalls, or even to a large sugar grove or piece of open woods. Farmers' families do not take recreation enough, they work too hard, and after awhile work becomes a drudgery, and they grow unhappy and feel as if their lives were cheats and failures; as if this world held nothing good or beautiful in store for them.

I know the truth of the poet's words:

"When the heart has been fretted by worldly stings,
It is well to the rich wild woods to go."

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

IN a tasteful little book called "Bits of Talk about Home Matters," written by H. H., and printed by Roberts Brothers of Boston, we find two or three excellent articles under the general head of "The Inhumanities of Parents." The first of these treats of "Corporal Punishment," and is most excellently written. We wish every parent would read the whole series. We have not room to quote much from the volume in question, but give a few paragraphs:

"If it were possible in any way to get a statistical summing-up and a tangible presentation of the amount of physical pain inflicted by parents on children under twelve years of age, the most callous-hearted would be surprised and shocked. If it were possible to add to this estimate an accurate and scientific demonstration of the extent to which such pain, by weakening the nervous system and exhausting its capacity to resist disease, diminishes children's chances for life, the world would stand aghast.

"Too little has been said upon this point. The opponents of corporal punishment usually approach the subject either from the sentimental or the moral standpoint. The argument on either of these grounds can be made strong enough, one would suppose, to paralyze every hand lifted to strike a child. But the question of the direct and lasting physical effect of blows—even of one blow on the delicate tissues of a child's body, on the frail and trembling nerves, on the sensitive organization which is trying, under a thousand unfavorable conditions, to adjust itself to the hard work of both living and growing—has yet to be properly considered.

"Every one knows the sudden sense of insupportable pain sometimes producing even dizziness and nausea, which follows the accidental hitting of the ankle or elbow against a hard substance. It does not need that the blow be very hard to bring involuntary tears to adult eyes. But what is such pain as this, in comparison with the pain of a dozen or more quick, tingling blows from a heavy hand on flesh which is, which must be as much more sensitive than ours, as are the souls which dwell in it purer than ours. Add to this physical pain the overwhelming terror which only utter helplessness can feel, and which is the most recognizable quality in the cry of a very young child under whipping; add the instinctive sense of disgrace, of outrage, which often keeps the older child stubborn and still throughout—and you have an amount and an intensity of suffering from which even tried nerves might shrink. Again, who does not know—at least, what woman does not know—that violent weeping, for even a very short time, is quite enough to cause a feeling of languor and depression, of nervous exhaustion for a whole day? Yet it does not seem to occur to mothers that little children must feel this, in proportion to the length of time and violence of their crying, far more than grown people. Who has not often seen a poor child receive, within an hour or two of the first whipping, a second one, for some small ebullition of nervous irritability, which was simply inevitable from its spent and worn condition?

"It is safe to say that in families where whipping is regularly recognized as a punishment, few children under ten years of age, and of average behavior, have less than one whipping a week. Sometimes they have more, sometimes the whipping is very severe. Thus you have in one short year sixty or seventy occasions on which, for a greater or less time, say from one to three hours, the child's nervous system is subjected to a tremendous strain from the effect of terror and physical pain combined with long crying. Will any physician tell us that this fact is not an element in that child's physical condition at the end of that year? Will any physician dare to say that there may not be, in that child's life, crises when the issue of life and death will be so equally balanced that the tenth part of the nervous force lost in such fits of crying, and in the endurance of such pain, could turn the scale?

"Nature's retributions, like her rewards, are cumulative. Because her sentences against evil works are not executed speedily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil. But the sentence always is executed, sooner or later, and that inexorably. Your son, oh, unthinking mother, may fall by the way in the full prime of his manhood, for lack of that strength which his infancy spent in enduring your hasty and severe punishments."

HOME SUNSHINE.—Many a child goes astray, not because there is want of prayer or virtue at home, but simply because home lacks sunshine. A child needs smiles as much as flowers need sunbeams. Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing pleases, they are apt to see it; if it displeases, they are prone to avoid it. If home is the place where faces are sour and words harsh, the fault-finding is ever in the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible elsewhere.

UP AND DOWN MOUNT WASHINGTON.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

MORE than one person to whom I have tried to relate it, has urged me to write the history of that wonderful day and night. But I always found myself shrinking from the performance. It is true, the picture had already been "composed," as an artist would say, for me. But where was I to find words which should hold that depth of divine azure, that splendor of color, those soaring heights and black-throated depths, the clear, wide grayness of air and cloud, and all those tender, delicate touches of wavering shadows and bright greens of leaves and grasses and silver mountain-streams which fill and crowd the great canvas in my memory.

There are, however, scenes and events in one's life which have their own rights; they have so enlarged and enriched our souls, that henceforward we are their debtors so far as we have any gift of word or song or brush. That day and night up and down Mount Washington is my creditor, as few others in my life have been. So I sit down now to discharge the debt as best I may.

It was in the delicious days of early September that I went, with a party of friends, through the gateway of the White Mountains, and stopped at the Crawford House. I had no ambition to ascend the Monarch of the Hills. It was bliss enough to roam down the green, wide throat of the Notch, to watch the cascades toss their silver draperies over the stones, to dream through the hours and drink the golden ether of the mountains, and wonder if we could really be sweeping through space with that same old world that we had left, in the grind and struggle and the fool's-chase of pomp and vanities far below.

In the soft twilights it was pleasant to gather on the piazzas of the Crawford House, and watch for the horses as they poured riderless out of the small bridle paths in the woods opposite, and rushed to their stables, it being the habit of the tourists to dismount among the trees a short distance from the hotel.

The sight used to impress me strangely. The tired, patient beasts, with their drooping heads, had been far up in those strange, mysterious latitudes, where no flower ever blossomed, and no bird's song broke the eternal stillness. It was almost as strange and fascinating to me as though they had made a journey to the mountains of the moon, or the rings of Saturn.

Distance, of course, lends enchantment to the view, and now, that the face of Mount Washington has been wrinkled with a railroad, and you can sit in a car comfortably as in your own drawing-room, and slip softly from horizon to horizon, from one latitude of vegetation to another, much of the fascination and mystery of the ascent has disappeared; but, six or seven years ago it was a work of hours and toil, and required some nerve to mount a mule, and wind slowly over miles of ascending bridle-paths, over Adams and Jefferson, and all the stately ante-rooms of the hills, until you entered at last into the great, solitary grandeur of the presence-chamber among the clouds.

I have a hankering after those horses—I longed to get near them, pull their ears and stroke their noses, and they were more attractive to me, thinking where they had been and what they had seen, than the most splendid equine specimens could have been, though truth compels me to confess that some of these veterans forcibly suggested, in shape and gait, that immortal animal on which Petruchio rode when he went to his stormy bridal with Kate.

One morning I made a visit to the stables with the proprietor of the Crawford, and, on a sudden impulse, proposed to him that I should mount one of the animals, when they were led up to the piazza before starting on the ascent.

"It would be the very next thing to going up Mount Washington."

Of course, all this was very absurd; but, if it had not been for that ridiculous fancy of mine, I should have missed one of the great experiences of my life. Of course, too, the proprietor blandly assented, with a little lurking smile, at the unaccountableness of feminine tangents—and there the matter rested.

It might never have occurred to anybody again, only, one morning, after a severe rain, which had delayed the ascent for some hours, the horses were led up under our windows, and I could not forego the temptation thus set before me. I went out, mounted the animal, who stood meek and quiet as any bronze horse in one of our parks, with George Washington or General Grant astride him, and tried to imagine I was tranquilly making the ascent of Mount Washington.

Meanwhile, I little suspected the conspiracy going on inside, of which I was the subject. The serenity with which I sat my quadruped, first suggested to my friends the feasibility of my making the ascent, which, for various reasons, had hitherto been deemed impracticable. It was all settled before I dismounted and joined my friends, where I was at once assailed and transfixed with astonishment on being assured that I was to ascend Mount Washington on the instant.

As soon as I found voice, I protested, argued, entreated. I pleaded my recent illness and my equestrian inexperience. Nothing would avail. It seemed that everybody's heart had been turned to stone, while I had been enjoying my fancies in unsuspecting tranquility outside.

One of the ladies of our party offered to accompany me. She had the quiet nerve and resource which would make her mistress of the situation; and, regardless of my expostulations, they set about hunting up the relics of an old Mount Washington suit, which had done duty on so many occasions, that it was just ready to drop into the dishonored grave of the rag-bag!

But time did not allow us to be fastidious. I was unconditionally seized and invested in this decaying motley, the main point being to get me on the back of some animal, whose meek head and tangled mane should be duly pointed for Mount Washington.

Meanwhile I was being rapidly reduced to a state of absolute submission by successive layers of shawls, sacques, and skirts of all conceivable shapes, styles and shades, which were being piled upon me. I was buried in a mausoleum of dry goods, all in an advanced stage of decay. It was evident that a tribute had been levied on all the feminine apparel, which had been ignobly doomed to the closets and corners of the Crawford from time immemorial. It was hunted up, and dragged out and piled upon us, while my prayers and protestations grew fainter under the parti-colored mountain, until at last, with tender adieux and all kinds of good wishes for our adventure, which, under the circumstances seemed to have a very fine edge of irony. I was led out unresisting, and mounted on Lady Bell, a horse, which I was informed, had been especially detailed for my service.

"But I shall smother under this mass of wrappings. Do remove some of them," I piped, pathetic and helpless.

"Oh, you will need them all and more before you reach the summit," shouted a chorus of voices; and I subsided into the grim calm of desperation.

I found myself the victim of still further machinations, and began to suspect that each of my friends had been suddenly transformed by evil genii into another Machiavelli, when I discovered myself actually at the head of our small party, as we rode out from the Crawford, into the small bridle-path which commences the ascent. This had all been arranged between our party and the guide, a small, dark, wiry Canadian Frenchman, with a square, coarse, Celtic physiognomy.

I remember turning for a last lingering look, and seeing the gay crowd of people on the piazzas, in their bright dresses, who had assembled to witness our exit. How I envied them as they stood there in their happy indolence in the pleasant morning sunshine! Would I ever see them again I wondered, and I suspected a little of what the sailors of Columbus must have felt when they drew up anchor in the small Spanish harbor, and bore away with their commander in the bright autumn sunshine for the shores of the new world. In a moment, however, the woods shut all that gay crowd from view, and we, too, had started for a new world among the clouds, while I honestly confess I had strong doubts whether I should ever return to the one I was leaving behind me.

We struck the corduroy road in a few moments. This ascends gradually for a mile or two, through successive strata of vegetation. We were obliged to move with considerable caution, as the logs of which the road was built were slippery with the recent rains. The air grew chillier, the white birches and pines dwindled more and more as we advanced into higher latitudes. Our guide trotted on foot, before or behind us, now tightening a girth or arranging a saddle, familiar, of course, with every rod of a path which he traversed daily through the summer, and feeling an infinite contempt for our ignorance and inexperience which he soon evinced by short, snappish answers to our questions. But he was autocrat here, and we were obliged to submit to his snubbing.

It must have been past noon when we rode out at last from the damp, dreary, dwindling birches and cedars, which have a singularly withered and dismal effect, with the moss clinging to their peeling bark, as they approach the last latitudes of their growth, and their life closes in scant, ghostly, silent desolation. Here we rested for awhile, lunched without dismounting, and I had an instinct that the "tug of war" had commenced for us, when I saw the care with which our guide was examining the animals, and the various precautionary measures he was taking before we should set out again.

At last we were ready. The great stormy winds boomed through the mighty mountain passes; the clouds spread out their gray, gloomy sails overhead as we started again, with six or seven miles of ascent before us.

"Lady Bell," I soon discovered, shared the contempt of the guide for the inexperience of her rider, and took matters into her own management, with a quiet pertinacity which would have done honor to a human biped.

It was a rule that the animals should not be fed from the time they were led out from their stables until they returned to them, so my horse supplemented her breakfast by sticking her obstinate old head into every tuft of grass, every scant twig and bunch of leaves which fringed the steep mountain-paths. In vain I shouted and pulled at my bridle. She nibbled on with sublime unconcern, her long neck stretched forward, while I hung quaking on the edge of great cliffs, where a single false step would have plunged me far below, among the tops of the forest-trees. In vain I tugged frantically at the bridle, and shouted alternately to the horse and the guide. The latter was often in the rear, or far ahead, and the creature was always submissive to his voice or presence, but invariably resumed her old practices on his disappearance.

Despite the spasms of terror which she caused me, I, however, hold Lady Bell in grateful remembrance, for it was her back and her legs which transported me up Mount Washington; and I remember when the perils thickened, she did not fail me. When we reached the steepest points she would draw her feet together, and jump carefully over the stones while I held on her neck or bridle in quaking bewilderment, and the guide roared "Lean back! "Bend forward!" and I was certain to do precisely the opposite of what he ordered; and at last his disgust culminated in an angry, "Don't you know which is 'back' and which is 'forward'."

"Oh, yes, perfectly," I rejoined, with saintly mildness. "When I am in the world below, but not on these heights."

An explanation which probably did not elevate me in his estimation.

We kept on and on, higher and higher. If I could picture to you the soaring heights, the dreadful glooms, the mystery, the grandeur, the beauty! Every now and then one of the small party—we numbered five in all, and three of us had never exchanged a word until that day—would shout: "Look at this view!" "Don't lose that!" And I would throw one shuddering glance over the distance, over the yawning abysses, over the hills with soft, gray tissues of mist clinging to their sides, over wide black belts of wildernesses, over pleasant villages that clustered with church spires and farm-houses among the green valleys, and with a gasp returned to my horse again, who, no longer beguiled by stolen morsels scattered along that mountain highway, now bent her whole energies to the task before her.

The winds blew. It seemed to me they had marshalled all their legions, and clamored like packs of wild beasts through the wide passes which we had no business to enter.

Confronted with that wild, powerful, solemn nature, I had a feeling that we were intruders. We had entered unbidden into the presence of the king, and his wrath was terrible. Others have since told me they experienced the same feeling on entering into these majestic solitudes.

The hours, too, seemed interminable. We would ride for long periods, and on inquiring of our guide I would learn we had only advanced half a mile. We passed hill after hill, and still they rose and swelled before us. And still the winds tore and belled among the passes. Did the day reign in silent, eternal gloom among these mountains? Could it be that very morning I had turned my back on that gay, fluttering crowd in the piazza of the Crawford?

The cold—a chill, indescribable cold—grew and grew, penetrating through the successive strata of my wrappings as we advanced higher, until it reached and seared to chill the very marrow. Then I confessed the wisdom which had engulfed me in that ocean of old woollens, and began to long for another blanket; indeed, the guide at last suggested that I should invest myself in a shawl which had been placed on Lady Bell to meet a last contingency. I demurred several times, but finally benumbed limbs and chilling marrow triumphed, and I allowed the man to wrap the folds about me.

The next problem was how to keep that shawl on. Having but two hands, these found ample occupation in keeping myself on and guiding Lady Bell. Pins were not attainable. Every few minutes some fresh blast of wind would seize and drag my shawl off, and the guide would come to the rescue. On one of these occasions he coolly removed the shawl and disappeared. I philosophically accepted the situation, wondering how long it would take to freeze solid. This was a slower and more disagreeable process than I had anticipated, and I accordingly shouted to some of the party, who at last succeeded in bringing the guide once more to my help—the difficulty being to make him hear when not close at hand, sound not being easily conveyed at those elevations.

"How could you take away my shawl?" I panted, reproachfully, as the man presented himself at my horse's head.

"Cos I thought you said you wanted me to," was the reply, in a tone which left no doubt of the speaker's sincerity.

Grown wiser by experience, I managed this time the problem of shawl and bridle, and kept my seat while we toiled on over the sharp stones and the dismal heights, through the angry cannonade of the winds.

It ended at last. It seemed ages since I left the green, smiling world below; and it was almost sunset when we reached the enclosure at which travelers dismount, and I dropped from my horse's back, after six hours' ride, totally incapable of standing on the stones.

The crowning silence and desolation were now around us. The Tip-Top House, just hidden from sight, was only a few rods distant. We started for this as soon as renewed circulation permitted.

What curious pictures we must have presented as we toiled over the stones, the winds having their own way with our garments, which certainly had not improved in their long scrambling over rocks and through briars. Once or twice I gave up in mortal despair, and calmly made up my mind, in sheer exhaustion of nerve and muscle, to perish; but some one of my companions was sure to come to my service at the last moment, and finally the Tip-Top House came in sight, and the goal of our wanderings was reached.

But it was with no "to triumph," we entered the long, low parlor of that home among the clouds. Breathless, dishevelled, exhausted, we staggered inside and dropped into our chairs around the great black stove, which, like some good genius, soon began to infuse its delicious warmth through our chilled limbs.

So the darkness gathered, and the winds clamored, and there we sat, among the clouds, and the world lay far below, with its great noisy, hurrying life, its gladness and griefs, which we seemed to have left behind forever. Indeed, when I recall the feelings of that time, I always find myself wondering whether they did not resemble those of spirits who have slipped off this mortal coil and find themselves in the great unknown.

With something, it seems to me, of the yearning, pathetic wonder of that hour, might the newly dead look back on the world they had left behind them, on the hot strifes, the petty ambitions, the rivalries and vanities.

Would we ever go down there again and take up the old burdens? How strange it all seemed! Scenes and faces came up out of that old world we had left behind us in the morning—could it be only the morning?—as they might have come if we had been suddenly transported to some dreary crater of the moon, and set there to dream for ages.

We walked up and down the long, low room; we looked out with a shudder into the blackness through which roared the throats of those awful winds.

We did not know then, as we learned afterward, from those who were eagerly watching Mount Washington that night, that the clouds only swathed the summit, that, if we could have gripped our way down a short distance, and then looked up, we should have seen the stars shining with their own serene beauty out of the azure.

We looked over the columns of the hotel register, and what a keen delight it was to come upon dear familiar names of those who had preceded us here only a day or two. It took away so much of that feeling of remoteness and solitude, which we experienced as we sat around the stove that night—five in all—the rest of the tourists had vanished long before our arrival.

Late in the evening, however, we were reinforced by a party of three who made the ascent by the carriage-road, and who, bustling in out of the stormy darkness, seemed to re-establish our communications with the world.

Like ourselves, they entered panting, breathless, exhausted with their drive, and under these circumstances all ordinary ceremonies of introduction were coolly tabooed. We soon fell to comparing experiences and catastrophes, as though we had known each other all our lives.

Everything which happened that evening was so novel, and is so fresh and vivid in my memory that I am constantly tempted to crowd my canvas with new groupings and scenes.

But bed-time came at last, and we went up-stairs to our small berths which were about the size of a Sound steamer's state rooms; and as I mounted the narrow flight I thought of the thousands of feet, which, during the summer, had gone over those stairs, gay, young, twinkling feet, and slower tread of old ones, all pilgrims at the shrine of this awful Mountain Monarch.

There was not much sleep for us that night. The wrathful winds kept up their roar, and it seemed as though I could hear the spirits who inhabited these solitudes clamoring for vengeance on our heads, and I lay there quaking, lest the house should come tumbling about our ears.

Mount Washington does not take you with the tender, mother-heart of nature to its bosom. Its solitudes are stern, silent, remorseless as Fate. No sunlight, it seems to me, can ever brighten the awful gloom and stillness in which, like Plutarch, he holds his court. It falls on that bare, stony forehead, but it does not warm or soften; and I had, all the time, the feeling of a culprit who had invoked the king's wrath, by invading his privacy.

I had just fallen asleep when a most unearthly sound awoke me. "It is the horn," said my friend, "which awakes travellers to see the sunrise on Mount Washington," and she was out of her bunk in an instant.

I lay still for awhile debating whether a nap would not pay better than any possible effects of sky, sun and mountain. Then I remembered that this sunrise was something which I had been anticipating for years. It was very likely that here was the solitary chance which my life would afford for such a scene. I should feel ignoble for the rest of my days if I let cold, or wind, or darkness, or the dreadful fatigue conquer me.

I sprang from my berth at that thought, rushed on my wrappings, and joined the party at the door of the Tip-Top House.

Here the wind met us in great swooping battalions. One of the gentlemen undertook to convey me to a favorable point for this view; but the wind drove us back; and I was obliged to take shelter at the side of the house, seizing hold of the stones with which the lower story is built, and thus braced against the winds, I awaited the sunrise.

That was the grand crisis, the glory, the poem of my journey up Mount Washington. Before that splendor, that transfiguration, everything else grows dim. How shall I describe it?

On the Glen-side, in that vast chasm, rolled and heaved a glittering ocean of cloud, white with the shining whiteness of sea-caps after a storm. Armies of silver banners, plumes of mighty legions, how they swelled and tossed in that awful abyss.

And beyond was the vast landscape of rolling hills, and black wildernesses, and green valleys, and white clusters of villages.

And in the east, the sun was coming up in all that rosy splendor of clouds. I drew my breath and waited in a hush of suspense. The glory grew wilder and brighter. I thought of Semele when she awaited the coming of Jove, and clutching the stones I watched breathlessly the great miracle of dazzling color and motion.

In a moment it came, the golden sun sweeping in its slow pomp above those eastern hills, and standing there in the rosy magnificence of those morning clouds.

If I could only paint it for you as I saw it then, but no glory of words, no splendors of color could do that. And it was only a sunrise. Just such as had been going on since the dawn of Creation.

But this could not last forever. The breakfast-bell inexorably summoned us to sublunary things, and we made our way to the long, low, dining-room, and comforted our souls and bodies over coffee and breakfast. We were among the clouds; it is true, but this phase of the journey forcibly reminded me of boarding-school, and the groping down in the gray, cold dawns to the early breakfasts. Afterward listening to the talk among themselves of the drivers and hostlers, grim old veterans scarred and weather-beaten by many a battle with wind and frost, I discovered that we had been exceptionally fortunate in this morning view. There had hardly been such a sunrise, such a clear, perfect atmosphere that summer.

They waxed enthusiastic as they mounted their glasses and identified remote places. They could see Portland and the steamers riding at anchor there. Think of that, from the top of Mount Washington!

But the clouds gathered in a little while, the winds kept up their bellowing, and with infinite difficulty we managed to grope among the stones for trophies of gray moss and locks of blanched grass, to sit amid the silence and desolation and have our pictures taken; and, at last, on returning to the house, the party who had joined us the evening before, and given so much fresh life and color to the time, concluded to return by the carriage-road. Our trio of tourists joined them, and after all kinds of cordial farewells and good-wishes, my friend and I found ourselves alone at the hotel awaiting the return of our guide, who had descended the night before, and was to come up with the horses during the day.

It was dreary enough awaiting his advent. The hotel-keeper prophesied snow; and, as we were in September, it was liable to descend at any moment, and hold us prisoners for a day or two on the top of Mount Washington.

The remote possibility was too terrible even to contemplate. We were nervously walking up and down its deserted room and counting the hours before our guide would present himself, and wondering whether they would ever end, when there was a stir at the door, and looking up, we saw the broad, dark Celtic face standing at the threshold. Never has a face of man looked so beautiful to me! I sprang toward this one with outstretched hands and a cry of joy, that brought a look of amazement into his stolid visage.

"Have you really come?" I cried. "Oh, I am so glad to see you!"

The effusiveness of my manner must have surprised him the more; it was in such marked contrast with our parting the night before, when I felt that I had various good grounds of offence against him—such as surly and inadequate replies to my questions, inattentions at critical moments—which might have ended in catastrophes, a very evident contempt for my ignorance of horse-flesh, and my terrors of mountain precipices. I had, accordingly, parted from the man with as much freezing dignity as I could command under difficulties of benumbed limbs and beating winds. My beaming manner at our meeting must have been quite unaccountable to him. I never inquired, but suspect he set this down also to one of the caprices of the sex.

In a little while we were remounted, and commenced our descent. Contrary to the experience of most riders, I found it much easier, and suffered much less with fright, than on the ascent. Perhaps his was partially owing to the fact that I had gone through almost every stage of terror, and my nerves were less susceptible than on the preceding day.

Then, too, Lady Bell had been supplanted by General Scott—the dear, old, patient, plodding white veteran, who was the oldest quadruped, and a little the wisest in the Crawford stables.

My heart warms when I think of him! How carefully he carried me along the sheer edge of the beetling precipices; with what unerring instincts he always chose the safest paths; with what marvellous sagacity he would avoid every dangerous place, and how I loved the dear, old creature, when I found him tentatively planting one foot on some slippery point before trusting himself and his burden on it. He would walk or trot, as I desired; he never, like Lady Bell, sought any stolen pastures, and no tempting morsel of grass fluttering seductively in his way allured that old white nose of his from its duty.

It is true, however, that he had not the prospect of so long a fast before him as his pertinacious predecessor.

How unspeakably delightful it seemed when we entered the soft warmth of the lower latitudes, and the air was filled once more with the quivering of leaves, the wavering of shadows, the sound of water, the humming of bees and the singing of birds. It was like coming from death into life, and I thought, with a shudder, of the dumb solitudes that lay in their eternal strength and gloom far up and behind me.

It was still early in the afternoon when we drew rein at the Crawford House. We had been gone hardly more than twenty-eight hours; and yet, what had we not lived in that time! Lived to come back, too! I had scarcely expected to do that when we set out.

After the warm welcomes came the wonderful experiences to tell. The old world had been going on just the same in our absence, and now we had come back to take our part in it.

I parted from old General Scott with a real pang, which I have no grounds to suspect was the case with the guide, when we separated. I have never seen the General since that time; and yet how often I have wished I was on the honest old creature's back, with the soft winds and the green country solitudes all about us.

In my subsequent visits among the mountains, I have always inquired eagerly about him, always hearing that he was doing his work faithfully and bravely—transporting timid mortals from the world's din and hurry into the vast solitudes and pleasures of Mount Washington, and back again!

Dear old faithful quadruped! How many human bipeds there are in the world not doing their work half so faithfully as you!

In all evils which admit a remedy, impatience should be avoided, because it wastes that time and attention in complaints which, if properly applied, would remove the cause.

AT LAST.

FROM a charming story by Miss Alcott, published in the Independent, entitled "The Romance of a Summer Day," we take the following episode, which is as touching as it is beautiful:

After tea, as Rose wanted to wait till moonrise, Uncle Ben went in to chat with the invalid, while Milly insisted on wiping the cups for the old lady; and Rose sat on the doorstep, listening to their chat, and watching twilight steal softly up the valley. Presently her attention was fixed by something the old lady said in answer to Milly's praise of the quaint kitchen.

"Yes, dear, I've lived here all my days. Was born in that bedroom; and don't ask no better than to die there when my time comes."

"Most people are not fortunate enough to keep their old home when they marry. It must be very dear to you, having spent both your maiden and married life here," said Milly, interested in her hostess.

"Wal, you see my maiden life lasted sixty year, and my married life ain't but just begun," answered the old lady, with a laugh as gay as a girl's.

Seeing curiosity in the quick glance Rose involuntarily gave her, the chatty old soul went on as if gossip was dear to her heart, and her late-coming happiness still so new that she loved to tell it.

"I s'pose that sounds sing'lar to you young things; but, you see, though me and Enos was engaged at twenty or so, we warn't married till two year ago. Things was dreadful contrary, and we kep' a waitin' and a waitin', till, I declare for't, I really did think I should die an old maid." And she laughed again, as if her escape was the best joke in the world.

"And you waited forty years?" cried Rose, with her great eyes full of wonder.

"Yes, dear. I had other chances; but somehow they didn't none of them suit, and the more unfortunate Enos was the more I kinder held on to him. He was one of them that's allers tryin' new things, and didn't never seem to make a fortin out of any on 'em. He kept a tryin' because he had nothin', and wouldn't marry till he was wall off. My mother was dead, and left a family to be took care on. I was the oldest gal, and so I nat'rally kept house for father till he died, and the children grew up, and married off. So I warn't idle all them years, and got on first rate, allers hopin' Enos's luck would turn. But it didn't (them cups goes in the right-hand corner, dear); and so I waited and waited, and hoped and hoped."

"Oh! how could you?" sighed Rose, from the soft gleam of the doorway.

"Pears to me strength is give us most wonderful to bear trials, if we take 'em meek. I used to think I couldn't bear it no way when I was left here alone, while Enos was in California; and I didn't know for seven year whether he was dead or alive. His folks gave him up; but I never did, and kept on hopin' and prayin' for him till he come back."

"How happy you were then!" cried Rose, as if she could sympathize heartily with that joy.

"No, I warn't, dear. That was the hardest part on't; for Enos was married to a poor, shiftless thing, that was a burden to him for ten year."

"That was hard;" and Rose gave a groan, as if a new trouble had suddenly come upon her.

"I done my best for 'em, in their ups and downs, till they went West. Then I settled down to end my days here alone. My folks was all dead or fur away, and it was uncommon lonesome. But I kinder clung to the old place, and had it borne in upon me strong that Enos would turn up agin in time. I wanted him to find me here, ready to give him a helpin' hand whenever and however he come."

"And he did at last?" asked Rose, with a sympathetic quiver in her voice that went to the old woman's heart.

"Yes, my deary; he did come at last," she said, in a voice full of a satisfaction that was almost solemn in its intensity. "Rather mor'n two years ago he knocked at that door, a poor, broken-down old man, without wife, or child, or money, or home—nothin' in the wide world but me. He didn't think I'd take him in, he was so mis'able. But, Lord love him, what else had I been a waitin' for them forty year? It warn't the Enos that I loved fust; but that didn't matter one mite. And when he sat sobbin' in that chair, and sayin' he had no friend but me, why I just answered back: 'My home is your'n, Enos; and I give it just as hearty as I did when you fust supposed, under the laylock bushes in the back garden'. Rest here, my poor dear, and let Becky take care on you till she dies.'"

"So he stayed?" said Milly, with tears in her voice, for Rose's head was down on her knees, so eloquent had been the pathos of that old voice telling its little tale of faithful love.

"Certain. And we was married; so no one need make no talk. Folks said it was a dreadful poor match, and took on about my doin' on't; for I'm wol off, and Enos hadn't a cent. But we was satisfied, and I ain't never repented of that day's work; for he took to his bed soon after, and won't quit it, the doctor says, till he's took to his grave."

"You dear soul, I must kiss you for that lovely deed of yours, and thank you from my heart for this lesson in fidelity." And, obeying an irresistible impulse, Rose threw her arms round the old lady's neck, kissing the wrinkled cheek with real reverence and tenderness.

"Bakes alive! Wal, I never did see such a soft-hearted little cretex. Why, child, what I done warn't nothin' but a pleasure. We women are such queer things, we don't care how long we wait, ef we only see our way at last."

As she spoke, the old woman hugged the blooming girl with a motherly warmth, most sweet and comfortable to see; yet the longing look, the lingering touch, betrayed how much the tender old heart would have loved to pillow there a child of its own.

WOMEN AND THEIR CLOTHES VARIOUSLY CONSIDERED.

WE do not know the author of the following article which we find in the New York Metropolitan. It is very good, in its way:

The charms of "blue blood," as enthusiastically discussed by silly idlers, are very like the gushes of admiration which pour forth from empty headed people who pretend to admire all the old paintings of the still older galleries in Europe. I confess that I have found it impossible to adore an ancient picture representing a distorted woman standing on the tips of her toes, merely because it was named after a saint by its perpetrator. Neither can I fall upon my knees metaphorically or otherwise, before men or women who happen to be nobody in particular, but who are constantly endeavoring to raise the ghosts of respectable ancestors in order to strengthen their social positions.

Not long ago I met an attenuated woman with a sharp face, small chin, receding forehead, pale-blue watery eyes, thin flaxen hair, and long white characterless hands, who owned nothing on earth except an ancestry—and a husband who had married her for her position.

When he asked for her helpless little bony fingers he had money and energy, but he did not possess sufficient patience to wait until he could earn a position for himself. As everybody is wanting in something, he lacked that something, and married this woman with an ancestry. In the first place she impressed him with the belief that she was stepping down from an exalted height, and that it would take a lifetime of self-sacrifice on his part to compensate her. She began at once to adorn her position in the most splendid manner in order to enforce upon her blue-blooded friends the idea that she had sold herself at a high figure; and the result was that her liege lord began after a few years to look as blue as she did. He could not keep up with her demands upon his gratitude, and he soon began to discover the uselessness of the thing that was eating his life out. Having spent some time in arriving at my initiatory idea, I now hasten to say that it is this sort of female on one side of the pathway of life, and the newly rich, coarse and vulgar one on the other side, who frown upon usefulness in woman's career.

It is said that a clever detective can tell any man's occupation by observing him as he walks the street. Being myself a professional "observationalist," I find that I can recognize the idlers; among women in all the various classes of life. It is an easy matter to distinguish the gorgeously dressed, red-faced, overplump creature who finds it impossible to work because of indulgence in the luxuries of the table, from the blue-blooded female who thinks it her inherent right to loaf the world through. In fact any one can discern the latter by unmistakable signs of physical inferiority, and generally by a shabby gentility which emphasizes the shabbiness while it fails to enhance the gentility.

Either of these two classes would consider a gentlewoman disgraced who became in any manner serviceable to herself or family. When such women are not miserly they are almost certain eventually to come to poverty. If this misfortune befalls the family, the she-portions turn their pointed noses toward Heaven the moment there is any suggestion made to them regarding the usefulness of feminine digits. Indeed, they appear to imagine that hands are intended as mere ornamental appendages, and to entirely overlook the fact that they are ingenious constructions for mechanical purposes.

These kinds of people prefer to wear antiquated finery rather than to adopt any of the modern ideas regarding the reconstruction of old garments. I once met a blue-blooded creature who bitterly lamented her lack of means to purchase a new gown, while she exulted in the possession of closets full of sumptuous but old-fashioned apparel.

"Why don't you remake the handsome costumes," I said.

"I have no money to pay the costumer," she replied, in a manner which expressed as distinctly as words, "If you are generous enough to offer me the money, I am willing to honor you by accepting it."

I did not tender any currency, but like many other generous people, I gave her advice. I told her how she could do it for herself, and you should have seen her lofty airs, though the blue-blood did not mount to her forehead, because it was too weak to get up there. She informed me that she was not the kind of lady who would be likely to know about such plebeian resources, since her life had not been spent in performing menial services either for herself or any one else.

"Certainly God did not make such a mistake as to intend you only for an ornament to His earth," my saucy tongue blurted out almost involuntarily. "If you choose to represent blue-blood in strabby attire, I have not the least objection; I told you where you could find suggestions, which coupled with a little industry would make you somewhat resemble a lady instead of a burlesque on one of Mrs. Jarley's wax-works." To my surprise a color not altogether blue came to her face, as I turned my back upon the hopeless idiot.

This is one of the women who furnish material for cynical men to write anenting epigrams upon our sex.

The other sort, the vulgar, ostentatious specimens of ignorance, also afford such critics amusement, but thank Heaven! between these two varieties walk the grandly good, the useful, the gracious women who are tender and true in their households, loyal to their friends and to their convictions, and whom all men honor.

The millennium of woman will be when she is able and willing to do anything which her duties or her necessities demand, with as unswerving a fidelity to her conscience and regard for the rights of others, as should be her faith in God or her love for her children.

There are women professing peculiar forms of religion and certain views on the subject of morality, who dress themselves in fixed and formal costumes, and thus focus a portion of public attention upon their sentiments as expressed by individual fashions. Some of these women make oppressive, and perhaps aggressive efforts to be conspicuous, but they are not the class I wish to speak of at present, though their varieties are almost limitless. There are persons who never for one moment forget the fashion of their apparel, nor cease to provide in a mental way for ornamental novelties, and for the effectiveness of their future gowns and things. The young unmarried woman of this species also considers the means of captivating and securing admirers, while thoughts of ribbons and draperies wander through all her dreams, and possibly through all her prayers. She may be recognized upon the street and in public places by the alertness of her looks, and the comprehensive sweep of her vision over prettily-costumed ladies. If she has a rival, there is a glare of innocent rage in her eyes if that rival happens to be possessed of a fresh and becoming costume. This young woman is ingenuitous, and not above the uses of her needle. She becomes an originator of charming costumes, and in that capacity is not only an artist, but a benefactor, for "blessed is she who makes for us visions of beauty."

The older woman, whose realm is clothes, does not possess so acceptable a reason as the one just described, for her frantic efforts to lead in personal display. It is pride, envy and petty ambition which force this style of woman to overdress herself, and to spend her best mental energies in evoking ideal costumes, and her time in constructing real ones. Of course, such women are intensely stupid, while, as a general thing, they are exceedingly pretty to look at. I meet several of this species constantly. As a general rule, a specimen of this kind floats about in the sea of society, an unmelting thing externally, but with a heart of fire, longing, perhaps, for a youth that is dead, and for the admiration that is given to that unsatisfying, but subtle something known to the world as style. She knows that she gets but a surface drift of admiration; but to her it is better than nothing.

If we only possessed supernatural perceptions, doubtless we should discern beautiful new garments trailing their gorgeousness through the feminine hearts of mazy kneeling congregations. Costumes that they cannot possess rankle in the white bosoms of such women, and produce more sorrow than does the conviction that they are beautiful sinners.

A lady, who used to lead in New York fashions many years ago, when there was but one style for bonnets in an entire season, confessed to me that the ideal bonnet of her future always appeared to her mental view when she was quietly sitting in church.

Poor thing! She don't have many pleasant visions now of any future in this life. She is the woman who grows old only to grow silly. To her there is nothing left but age. She gets grim-visaged and disagreeable, and she it is who has given to us such a reputation for wickedness when we are wrinkled. Never is there an especially malicious piece of mischief performed on a person or a community, but it is attributed to some "old woman." It is the traditional and conventional thing, and it is the empty-headed vain woman who has won this bit of reputation for us. The loss of customary social triumphs is inevitable, when a woman has wasted her brain in being either idle or extravagant during the best years of her life. To depend upon personal decorations and to hold admiration by the silken cable of a long-drawn smile, is all very well in early life, but there must come a time when it will require a reputation for having been useful, for culture, for well-spent moneys and for womanly deeds; when the dignity of labor carefully performed leaves a grandeur upon the face which is better than beauty, and warmer than a name for that which was once beautiful, but is gone forever. There are antique, painted, useless, bedizened grandmothers, who promenade our streets with little toppy steps, which they vainly think deceive observers into the belief that they are still young; they look so restless and discontented that one ought not to wonder at the reputation of the legendary "old woman."

The old lady who is all wrinkles, and yet all smiles, is she whose hands have been busy, whose heart has been warm, whose conscience has not been deadened, who has considered personal adornment a pleasurable duty, and not a pursuit or a sole profession; whose hands were not too fine for usefulness, and whose husband was not compelled to be the bearer of all burdens of bread-winning; her face is like the fulfilment of a precious promise, as she floats into the unseen, through days that are filled with a satisfactory atmosphere of calm. Her blood had not been too blue for healthy uses, nor yet so fiercely red as to render her viciously idle or absurdly arrogant; and so, while here, she walks on the very edges of Heaven, a saint who has won her right to the love of her children, and to the respect and admiration of all who enjoy the light of her presence.

PRIZE, like gold and diamonds, owes its value only to its scarcity. It becomes cheap as it becomes vulgar, and will no longer raise expectation, or animate enterprise. It is therefore not only necessary that wickedness, even when it is not safe to censure it, be denied applause, but that goodness be commended only in proportion to its degree; and that the garlands due to the great benefactors of mankind, be not suffered to fade upon the brow of him who can boast only of petty services and easy virtues.

"THE GOD OF ALL COMFORT."

A CHILD first knows its mother as the supplier of its needs. When it is hungry or cold or in pain, it turns to her, and she gives it food, warmth, comfort. That is the way the child comes to love its mother. As for her, her delight is in supplying the child's necessities. That is her great joy. The tie that binds them together is the babe's need of its mother, and her supplying that need.

So, all through life, our loves and friendships get their highest consecration through the occasions that want and sorrow bring. Love in the sunshine is sweet, but it takes the storm to show all that it really is. We never know the worth of a friendship till it has borne that test. The hand that grasped ours when we were sinking, the breast that pillowed our head when we were in sorrow, these are love's interpreters.

It is just so that God interprets himself to us—through our needs. And the way we are to understand him is just as the baby understands its mother—as the resource in every want or trouble. When we are perplexed, when we are disappointed, when hope seems gone out, it is just then that we are to feel that there is in God all that we want.

The happiness of God lies just in this, in supplying the need of his creatures. Is it sweet to a mother to give the baby the comfort it cries for? Does it make a father happy to give his children what pleases them? Is it joy to a wife to fill and satisfy all the wants of her husband's nature? How much more, then, shall our Heavenly Father take delight in meeting us just where we need help the most!

To shut away any hunger of the heart from God, to feel that anything is too great to ask him, is to wrong ourselves. It is to doubt his love. We cannot prescribe the exact way in which he will help us. Why should we? Can the baby tell its mother what to do for it, or the pupil instruct his teacher, or the sick man direct his physician how to treat him? If we could directly control God's acts by our prayers, we should lose all the benefit of his wisdom. But this is certain; the soul cannot utter a cry that he does not hear; that his heart does not respond to it swifter than a mother's that all the power and wisdom of the Infinite One are not employed to answer it.

We think that we love our friends, that we have the disposition to help them; and so in a little measure we do. But what is our love compared to God's? What is our helpfulness compared to his? As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his thoughts higher than our thoughts, so are his compassion and tenderness beyond ours!

The powerlessness of human love is the saddest thing in life. We would sometimes gladly die if we could save others from harm, and it seems as if we could not do a thing for them. We agonize in prayer for those who are sinning, and they seem to keep straight on in the evil way. We see our friends broken down by heavy burdens; or, when they are gone from earth, we find out what darkness encompassed them; and we feel as if we could give up anything or suffer anything if so they might be set free. And yet, so far as our consciousness extends, we can do almost nothing.

Now, as the Lord's love is greater than ours, so his power is greater. What we only long to do, that he can do and will do. There is no yearning in our hearts, no swift impulse of affection, that is not a reflection or an infinitely deeper affection in God. And with him there is no weakness, no disappointment, no failure. Throughout eternity, with all the resources of omnipotence, he is working out his sovereign will. And that will is love. It is mother's love, and more than that. It is father's love, and more than that. What friend feels for friend? What wife feels for husband, whatever is generous and tender and sweet in the whole range of human experience, is a hint of what God feels for all his creatures.

In many a heart have echoed sadly the words,

—“But what am I?
An infant crying in the night,
An infant crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry!”

But that tells only a part of it. Above us, infants in the night that we are, bends a heart that hears our cry, that catches the feeling which cannot shape itself into a cry—hears, and answers with outswelling love, and will one day so answer that sorrow shall be lost in joy, and sighing be forgotten in unspeakable fulness of satisfaction.

There is no want that is not to be brought to God with perfect confidence. There is no man beset with discouragements, no mourner out of whose life the sunlight seems gone, no person crushed by his own incapacity to live rightly, or by another's persistence in sin, no one whose trouble seems especially hopeless, but they should bring each his own burden and rest it on One who loves and saves without limit. It is just the things that are to take to him. Ours is the God of all comfort, the God who “is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think.” When we have neither strength nor hope in ourselves, then it is that we are simply to rest upon his breast, and know that all is well.—Ch. Union.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

“DON'T SCOLD ME.”

“DON'T, Tommy—don't do that. You know it makes mother's head ache.”

“Does it make your head ache, mother?” asked the child, curiously, and with a pitying tone in his voice, as he came creeping up to his mother's side, and looking at her as if in doubt whether he would be repulsed or not.

“Sometimes it does, my son,” replied Mrs. Lyon, kindly; “and it is always unpleasant. Won't you try to play without making so much noise?”

“Yes, mother, I'll try,” answered the little fellow, cheerfully. “But I forget sometimes.”

He looked earnestly at his mother, as if something more was in his thoughts.

“Well, dear, what else?” said she, encouragingly.

“When I forget, you'll tell me, won't you?”

“Yes, love.”

“And then I'll stop. But don't scold me, mother, for then I can't stop.”

Mrs. Lyon's heart was touched. She caught her breath, and bent her head down, to conceal its expression, until it rested on the silken hair of the child.

“Be a good boy, Tommy, and mother will never scold you any more,” she murmured gently in his ears.

His arms stole upward, and as they were twined closely about her neck, he pressed his lips tightly against her cheek,—thus sealing his part of the contract with a kiss.

How sweet to a mother's taste were these first fruits of self-control! In this effort to govern herself, what a power had she acquired.

Only first fruits were these. In all her after days did that mother strive with herself, ere she entered into a contest with the inherited evils of her children; and just so far as she was able to overcome evil in herself, was she able to overcome evil in them. Often, very often, did she fall back into the old states; and often, very often was self-resistance only a slight effort; but the feeble influence for good that flowed from her words or actions whenever this was so, warned her of error, and prompted a more vigorous self-control. Need it be said, that she had an abundant reward?

A WORD TO MOTHERS.

CONSIDER it your religious duty to take out-door exercises without fail each day. Sweeping and trotting around the house will not take its place; the exhilaration of the open air and change of scene are absolutely necessary. Oh, I know all about Lucy's gown that is not finished, and Tommy's jacket, and even his coat—his buttonless coat thrown into your lap, as if to add the last ounce to the camel's back; still, I say, up and out. Is it not more important that your children, in their tender years, should not be left motherless, and that they should not be born to that feeble constitution of body which will blight every blessing? Let buttons and strings go. You will take hold of them with more vigor and patience when you return, bright and refreshed; and if every stitch is not finished at such a moment—and it is discouraging not to be able to sympathize in your best effort—still remember that “she who hath done what she could” is entitled to no mean praise. Your husband is undoubtedly the best of men, though there are malicious people who might answer that that was not saying much for him. Still, he would never, to the end of time, dream of what you are doing of. So accept my advice, and take the matter in hand yourself.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

THE LIFE OF A BUTTERFLY.

WHERE do the butterflies come from? On a hot day in summer one cannot cross a field without seeing them flutter up everywhere out of the grass. Where were they all a month ago? When the weather became warm were they made at once beautiful bright little creatures with four tiny wings that are never still for a minute together? Or if they were not made butterflies at once, how were they made? We know that every tree, every flower, and even every blade of grass, grew up from a seed; we know, too, that birds come out of those speckled eggs that mischievous boys are so fond of looking for in the woods. But where do the butterflies come from? Here we are back again where we began.

Well, butterflies, those little things that fly about like birds, like birds, too, come out of eggs; but the very smallest bird's egg you have ever seen is fifty times as great change, too, that I do not think you would recognize him after it. His nibbling at the leaves has ended, and indeed he has destroyed quite enough of them. As far as any one can see, he is dead; he is only a little shapeless lump hanging to the plant. More unlike a butterfly still, you say. Yes, indeed, but if the caterpillar did not bring himself to this, the chrysalis state, he would never get a chance of having wings and flying.

But he is not to be so very long, unless he has had the misfortune to take to the chrysalis state in the autumn, for if that is the case he will not be released until next spring. Let us suppose that it is in the great heat of summer; then, after about a week, the little prisoner breaks through the chrysalis and creeps out into the sunlight. He has come to his last state, and is very soon to be perfect. He is no caterpillar now, but the smallest butterfly you could imagine; and as he feels the air for large as the egg of a butterfly. Yet, when they are seen through a good magnifying glass or microscope, they look much prettier than birds' eggs, for they are of many different shapes; some ribbed, others covered with a sort of raised pattern, and others again that seem to be all wicker-work.

The butterfly lays her eggs on the leaf of some plant, which she knows her little ones will be able to eat. Then she leaves them, and flies away. If the weather is warm, the eggs have been on the leaf but a few days, when the insect comes out. But not a butterfly—oh! no—a slender worm, so small that one can scarcely see him. He is not to be small always. That is clear when he begins to nibble at the leaf; for he has such a surprising appetite, that he grows and grows daily, until at last he is a great caterpillar, stretching out, and twisting and turning, and drawing himself along.

This surely is not like a butterfly! Wait awhile; you will not see him this way always. For he is a wonderful fellow, this caterpillar, and he is not content with crawling about and eating. He wants a change, and such a the first time on his little wings, they begin to grow larger and larger, and the rich colors appear, until at last, after an hour or more, he is a full-grown butterfly. Then he gives those painted wings a shake or two; and seeing some other butterflies passing by, he flies up, and whirls away through the air as gay and as beautiful as any of them. Off they go together to suck honey out of the flowers, and to beware all their lives long of those little folks who run about the fields hat in hand making war on the poor winged creatures.

The silkworms which your brothers make pets of never become butterflies, only a quiet kind of moth, supposed to have been brought, "once on a time," from China, where the people found out how to make silk from its threads long before any one else thought of such a thing. The Chinese say that their empress, Si-hing-chi, was the first who collected these insects, feeding them with her own hands; and that it was to her that their nation owe the discovery of the beautiful material which is made from the soft yellow stuff in which this particular caterpillar envelopes itself.

PLAYING GRANDMA.

BY AUNT SUE.

"CHATTERBOX!" "Flyaway!"
 Anything you please to say;
 Happy as a bird am I,
 Singing gaily in the sky,
 And I'd fly away if he Only lent his wings to me.

"Grandma's sleeping, and I'll run
 Up and have a little fun—
 Get her parasol and cap,
 While she takes her little nap.

Folds her parasol away;

"Dearly, 'twasn't meant for play,"
 Saying with a gentle grace,
 And love's sweetness on her face.

I COULDN'T.

"MOTHER," said a little boy, "Willie played truant to-day, and wished me to go, but I couldn't."

"Couldn't, my son! Why not?"

"Because," he said, winding an arm about her neck, "I thought it would make you so sorry. That's why I couldn't."
 It would be a world of happy mothers if all boys and girls were as careful not to make their mothers sorry.

Oh, how sorry it makes a mother's heart when a way-

Scold me! Not a bit afraid.
 Grandma scold her little maid!
 Grandma loves her far too well.
 If you'd like to, you can tell.
 Hush! she's coming. Wait and see What a merry time there'll be!"

"Little mischief!" grandma cries.
 "Dearly, you will hurt your eyes!"
 And she smiles a pleasant smile,
 Taking off her cap the while
 From the little jaunty head,
 With the wavy hair o'erspread;
 And her glasses from the eyes,
 Where such tender beauty lies;

ward boy goes into paths of sin! How it grieves her soul to note in his breath the scent of the deadly cup; to see the loose card drop from his pocket; to feel that evil companions are fast drawing him away from "mother, home and Heaven." Ah! how many hearts there are which can take up the sad lament:

"We see them go out each night
 Through a blinding mist of tears,
 And we cannot sleep, but life and weep
 In a torturing maze of fears.
 Oh! the dread rum-shop luring,
 Calling our dear boys in;
 The souls that were white as morning light
 It blackens with vice and sin."

Boys, if you love your mothers, shun the first glass.
 Close heart and ear and eye to the tempter, however lovely the garb it may wear.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

KIND THOUGHTS.

LET us cherish a memory for pleasant things,
 And let all the others go;
 It is never by giving "tit for tat"
 That we touch the heart of a foe.
 It is not by dwelling on fancied wrongs.
 That we feel their sting grow less;
 And malice once entering the heart is sure
 To crush out all tenderness.

Forgive, forget, though the wrong be great,
 And your heart be stricken sore;
 For thinking of trouble makes it worse,
 And its pain is all the more.
 Do kindly things to your neighbors, e'en
 Though they do not so to you;
 Though they be wrong, unjust, unkind,
 Keep your own heart ever true.
 The heart is a garden; our thoughts the flowers
 That spring into fruitful life;
 Have care that in sowing there fall no seed
 From the weed of cruel strife.
 Oh! loving words are not hard to say,
 If the heart be loving too;
 And the kinder the thoughts you give to others,
 The kinder their thoughts of you.

REST.

BY LIZZIE E. WEIST.

ONE one! why so sad and weary,
 Longing, seeking after rest?
 Turning this way, then another,
 Why not seek that which is best?
 Why from day to day thus wand'ring
 With a sorrow-burdened soul,
 While there's One who heals the wounded,
 And the broken heart makes whole?
 Why thus seeking after pleasures,
 Which but cause your soul to mourn,
 Finding that in every blossom
 Dwells a sharp and piercing thorn?
 There is rest beyond the river—
 There is rest on this side, too;
 There is rest for all the weary—
 Lone one, there is rest for you!
 Turn from every fleeting pleasure—
 Seek that only which is best;
 Hear the gracious invitation,
 "Come and I will give you rest!"
 Come ye weary, heavy laden—
 Hark! and hear the whispers sweet;
 Cast on Him your every burden,
 Kneeling at the Saviour's feet.
 He will give you rest unmeasured—
 Satisfy your aching heart—
 If you turn away from evil,
 And from sin and self depart.
 Joy untold you'll find in Jesus,
 Peace which as a river flows,
 Oh! so deep I cannot tell you,
 Only he who feels it knows.

And this rest is all abiding,
 While you keep your Saviour's hand,
 For you need not ever leave Him,
 He will give you grace to stand.
 Only trust Him, lone one, trust Him!
 And your heart shall be at rest;
 All through life you'll find true riches,
 And in death you shall be blest.

Eastern Express.

MARY.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLINGHAM.

SWEETEST name that ever crowned a woman,
 Mingling with it the divine and human—
 Name with light enhaloed since it won a Sanctifying grace from the Madonna!

All we know of love's ecstatic sweetness,
 All we deem of womanhood's completeness,
 Pities, hopes, and helpful tendernesses,
 To my heart that simple name expresses.

And to me 'tis linked with inward beauty,
 Faith in Right and loyalty to Duty,
 Gracious household ways and faithful loving,
 That rebuke our waywardness and roving.

So, for these, I shrine the name of Mary
 In my heart as in a sanctuary—
 Shrine it there with every pure emotion
 Born of love, of sorrow, or devotion.

Dear for these—but infinitely dearer
 For a memory sweeter, sadder, nearer—
 All my days with tender twilight shading,
 Yet with brightness all my soul pervading.

One to whom that holy name was given
 Smiles upon me from her home in Heaven;
 In my hours of quiet and of dreaming,
 Smiles upon me with an angel seeming.

Oh, the treasures of which death bereft us!
 Oh, the precious memories God has left us!
 Oh, the sorrow in our hearts that dwelleth!
 Oh, the joyful faith that there upwalleth!
 Through our sobs shall break forth glad thanksgiving
 That all life seems holier for her living—
 And the grave itself the shining portal
 Through which passed she to the life immortal.

Home seems hallowed, since her evanescence,
 By the sacred memory of her presence,
 Shedding evermore the light of beauty
 O'er the dark and rugged paths of duty.

For her life was like a glad evangel
 With its bright revelations of the angel;
 And her death, with solemnizing sweetness,
 Gave that life its beautiful completeness.

Thanks to God! His tender benediction
 Calms the tumult of our great affliction,
 And our eyes, albeit in tearful blindness,
 Read the record of His loving kindness—
 Pierce, at length, through all the tangled tissues
 Of our doubts, to life's sublimer issues,
 Till we learn how all things blend benignly
 In His plan whose work is wrought divinely.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

WHICH IS THE WISER?

I HAVE two friends whose names are, or might be, Smith and Brown. Their habits of life and the results these habits produce are worthy of being recorded; they may serve as mirrors in which some other folks may see themselves as others see them. They are both somewhat over thirty years of age, are both married and have several children, and are comfortably well off for this world's goods. Smith is a good, sensible fellow, of more than average culture, whose opinion or advice on most matters I would as soon ask as I would that of any man I know. His wife is a right clever, good-natured, hard-working woman—somewhat given to the fripperies of fashion, but always conscientiously doing, as she believes, everything she can to promote the well-being of her husband and family. Neither Smith, who has been a great reader, nor his wife, who has not, had ever paid the least attention to hygienic matters. They both “came up” in families where the largest liberty to do as they pleased was given to the children, and they have continued the same course with their own, trusting in Providence, as they said, to carry them safely through. They have had five children, two of them are already in their graves, and some one of the others, or one of the parents, is needing the doctor's care continually—their door being one of the regular stands at which his patients go to look for his gig. No one who knows their habits of life needs to have studied the great problem—how to secure good health—any great length of time, not to know that there are good reasons, which ought to be patent to these parents, why sickness and death and the long train of anxieties and heart-rendings which they bring with them have invaded their house.

Let us see, then, if we can find a sufficient cause. These parents are fond of what they call good-living. In the selection of food for their table, the gratification of the appetite is the only point consulted, and their table is always bountifully supplied with the richest and most appetizing food—if such rubbish may be called food. Their children are allowed to come to the table at which their parents eat as soon as they can sit up alone in a chair, are always asked what they would like to eat, and their every wish in this particular is gratified. I dined there one day when two of the children were at the table—one three and the other five years old, perhaps—and I saw that they ate heartily of roast pork with plenty of gravy, and finished with mince pie, and this at six o'clock in the afternoon! At another time I saw the mother come in, a few minutes before dinner, with a paper of candies, eating of them herself, and dealing them out liberally to her children!

These instances only serve to show the ordinary habits of eating in the family, and are in no wise unusual for them. Another matter. In the winter these children are kept housed almost the whole time—sometimes not going out of the house from one week's end to another, for fear the poor little things would take cold; and of course they had colds nearly the whole time. The natural consequences of such management of children, as any one who has paid any attention to the study of health knows very well, is certain sickness and probable early death. A death, which is the result of the ignorance or indifference of the parents to hygienic laws, is but very little short of homicide; and the time will come, we predict, when it will be generally so regarded. In a family where such habits of living prevail, it is no wonder the doctor reaps a rich harvest; no wonder the husband's yearly balance-sheet makes so poor a showing; no wonder that the father and mother suffer from care and anxiety—their hearts lacerated with grief; and no wonder that they are always bewailing their misfortunes, and that they experience so much of that side of life which they call dark. It is a wonder, however, that any clergyman can be found so profoundly ignorant as to slander his Maker by exclaiming, as one did in the course of his remarks at the funeral of one of these children, “God has called this little one away.” I asked to “speak in meeting,” and tell the reverend gentleman that God had done no such thing; that it was not His will that any child should die thus early, and that it was only in consequence of disobeying His laws that death had come to the poor little creature before him. This child who had, as I had already learned, been ailing for several days, had been allowed to come to the table at dinner late in the day and eat heartily of lobster-salad and drink freely of milk, because she asked for these things, and her mother's only thought was to gratify the child's every wish. The consequence was, as might be expected, that about midnight the child had a violent attack of cholera morbus, and within twenty-four hours was a corpse! In what sense could it be said, then, pray, that “God called the poor little thing away?” It was a cheap platitude for the clergyman to utter, and perhaps a solace to the wounded hearts of its parents; but it was a slander on Divine Wisdom, nevertheless.

Brown and his wife and Smith and his wife were married about the same time. Brown, intellectually, was far below Smith. His reading had been confined more to the practical side of life, and somehow it happened that, while yet a youth, the importance of the subject of health had attracted his attention, and he studied it thoroughly, and had so far indoctrinated his wife before her marriage with the subject, that they were already fully agreed that good health for themselves and offspring, if they should have any, was to be the foundation-stone of their domestic happiness. They provided themselves with the best books on the Management of Infancy, on Hygiene and on Physiology; studied them and profited by what they learned. They found out how best to care for their offspring before birth, and how to treat them after. They knew what was the proper food for them, and this they provided and saw that it was good and properly cooked. The children understood that their parents knew what was the proper food to give them to eat, as well as the proper quantity, and they also knew that they were certain to be helped to it at the proper time, and they were never asked what they would like to eat. They came to the table with their parents, ate what was given them and always seemed contented and happy. These children were encouraged also to take robust exercise out of doors, always when the weather was fair, and very often when it was not; cold and wet had little fear for them. When the weather was bad they dressed warmer, I have often seen them of a cold winter's day come into the house, after a brisk play out of doors, with complexions which, beauty and healthful appearance, would attract the attention of the most indifferent observer, and I very rarely heard of their having colds.

Well, Brown's children are all alive and well to-day; all hearty and robust. Aside from the bills which have been rendered to him for obstetrical services, ten dollars will pay all his family's doctor's bills for thirteen years. The saving in money, however, is trifling compared with the exemption from the anxiety and grief which the Smiths suffer.

There is not a reader of this journal, probably, who cannot put his finger upon a dozen families within the range of his acquaintance who are living like Smith's, but I very much fear he will not know one like Brown's. These sketches are from life, however, and their truthfulness will be readily recognized by the parties themselves and their friends. The moral to be drawn is manifest and need not be put in words.

Now, young man—you, I mean, whose name I saw mentioned in the papers this morning, as about to marry the wealthy Miss —, of Thirty-fourth Street, whose trousseau was said to have been ordered from Paris at a cost of ten thousand dollars—let me whisper in your ear, that ten dollars judiciously invested in good books which will teach you and your wife how to live, so as to enjoy good health yourselves, and to secure the same for your children, will yield you and your little wife infinitely more happiness—provided you are willing to profit by the teaching—than any amount of money spent on the wedding trousseau. Hold up before you, then, these two pictures of Smith and Brown and decide for yourself. WHICH IS THE WISER?—Hall's Journal of Health.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

AMMONIA.

NO housekeeper should be without a bottle of ammonia; for, besides its medicinal value, it is invaluable for household purposes. It is nearly as useful as soap, and its cheapness brings it within reach of all.

For cleansing paint, it is very useful. Put a teaspoonful of ammonia to a quart of warm soapsuds, dip in a flannel cloth, and wipe off the dust and fly-specks, grime and smoke, and see for yourselves how much labor it will save. No scrubbing will be needful. It will cleanse and brighten silver wonderfully; to a pint of hot suds mix a teaspoonful of the spirits, dip in your silver spoons, forks, etc., rub with a brush, and then polish on chamois skin. For washing mirrors and windows, it is also very desirable; put a few drops of ammonia upon a piece of newspaper, and you will readily take off every spot or finger-mark on the glass. It will take out grease-spots from any fabric; put on the ammonia nearly clear, lay blotting-paper over the place, and press a hot flat-iron on it for a few moments. A few drops in water will clean laces and whiten them as well; also muslins.

Then it is a most refreshing agent at the toilet-table; a few drops in a basin of water will make a better bath than pure water, and if the skin is oily, it will remove all glossiness, and also disagreeable odors. Added to a foot-bath, it entirely absorbs all noxious smell, so often arising from the feet in warm weather, and nothing is better for cleansing the hair from dandruff and dust. For cleaning hair and nail-brushes it is equally good. Put a teaspoonful of ammonia into one pint of warm or cold water, and shake the brushes through the water; when the bristles look white, rinse them in cold water, and put in the sunshine or in a warm place to dry. The dirtiest brushes will come out of this bath white and clean.

For medicinal purposes ammonia is almost unrivalled. For the headache it is a desirable stimulant, and frequent inhaling of its pungent odors will often entirely remove catarrhal cold. There is no better remedy for heartburn and dyspepsia, and the aromatic spirit of ammonia is especially prepared for these troubles. Ten drops of it in a wineglass of water are often a great relief. The spirits of ammonia can be taken in the same way; but is not as palatable.

In addition to all these uses, the effects of ammonia on vegetation are beneficial. If you desire your roses, geraniums, fuchsias, etc., to become more flourishing, you can try it upon them, by adding five or six drops of it to every pint of water that you give them; but don't repeat the dose oftener than once in every five or six days, lest you stimulate them too highly. Rain-water is impregnated with ammonia, and thus it refreshes and vivifies vegetable life. So, be sure and keep a large bottle of it in the house, and have a glass stopper for it, as it is very evanescent, and also injurious to corks, eating them away.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT CUSTARD-PIE.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us as follows: "Pipsey's letters are always read with much interest. I was so glad when I found she was going to write for the magazine again.

"I was much amused when reading the November number, where she speaks about putting a piece of custard-pie in her pocket. I thought if she could put custard-pie in her pocket, it must have been like the one I have heard my mother tell about.

"When I was quite a small child mother was very sick, and the cares of the household fell on my older sister. The daughter of some friend of mother's came to stay a few days with my sister, when her parents were to come after her. Of course some extra cooking and baking must be done for the occasion. This girl was quite officious, and would insist on helping, which rather disgusted sister, who felt that just then her room was preferable to her company. When sister began to make a custard-pie, that girl said, 'Oh, let me make that pie. I can just as well as not. I always do it at home.' Well, make the pie she would, and make it she did.

"The consequence was that when they were setting the table, sister brought out the custard-pie, and found it had a very hard, thin look. Sister remarked that she was sorry the pie was so thin and dry, whereupon the girl said, 'Oh, never mind; ma knows you are poor.' It rather provoked sister at the time; but since she has had many a hearty laugh over it.

"So I thought if Pipsey has the recipe for the custard-pie that she carries in her pocket, I would like to have her put it in the magazine, so that we might try it, for I think it would remind us of the days when we 'were poor.'

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

MR. CAREFUL having been told by his physician that he must take gentle exercise, replied, that he had for some time back practised cutting his toe nails twice a week.

So necessary is fun to the mind, that a late philosopher says if you should build schools without playgrounds, nobody would get beyond short division in a life time.

"How do you keep out of quarrels?" asked one friend of another. "Oh, easily enough," was replied. "If a man gets angry with me, I let him have all the quarrel to himself."

THE other day a certain tailor sent his bill to a magazine editor. He was startled a few hours afterward by its being returned with a note appended saying, "Your manuscript is respectfully declined."

AN Irishman being in a church where the collection apparatus resembled election boxes, on its being handed to him, whispered in the carrier's ear that he was not naturalized and could not vote.

"Do you think," asked Mrs. Pepper, "that a little temper is a bad thing in a woman?" "Certainly not," responded a gallant philosopher; "it is a good thing, and she ought never to lose it."

"SAM," said one little urchin to another, "Sam, does your schoolmaster ever give you any rewards of merit?" "I s'pose he does," was the rejoinder; "he gives me a thrashing every day, and says I merit two!"

A GENTLEMAN of Boston, who takes a business view of most things, when recently asked respecting a person of quite a poetic temperament, replied—"Oh, he is one of those men who have soarings after the infinite and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pay cash."

A LITTLE girl returning from church, where a strange minister had officiated, said: "Mother, I wish Mr. W— hadn't preached to-day; he ain't a good preacher, like Mr. B—." "Why not?" asked her mother. "Because he talked so loud. I couldn't go to sleep. Mr. B— lets me sleep all the time."

A WELL-KNOWN doctor, somewhat of a wit, worked so zealously at his profession that at length he fell ill himself. Absolute rest was ordered. "Well, old fellow," said a friend to him one day, "you that were once so active, how do you pass the time now?" "In my library, in the middle of my books," was the reply. "Still concerned in all that relates to medicine, I suppose?" "Yes," answered the physician, smiling, "but now I only kill time."

A COUSIN is told of Mr. Swain, the former proprietor of the Philadelphia Daily Ledger. By his course on some public question, on which different persons had different opinions, Mr. Swain offended a number of readers, one of whom met him on Chestnut Street and thus accosted him: "Mr. Swain, I've stopped the Ledger." "What is that you say, sir?" "I've stopped the Ledger," was the stern reply. "Is it possible?" said Mr. Swain. "My dear sir, what do you mean? Come with me to my office." And, taking the man with him, he entered the office at Third and Chestnut Streets. There they found the clerks busy at their desks; then they ascended to the editorial rooms and composing rooms, where they found everything was going on as usual; finally they descended to the press rooms, where the engines were at work. "I thought you told me that you had stopped the Ledger," said Mr. Swain. "So I have," said the offended subscriber. "Well, I don't see the stoppage. The Ledger seems to be going on." "Oh, I mean to say—that is, that I—ah—had stopped taking it." "Is that all?" exclaimed Mr. Swain. "Why, my dear sir, you don't know how you alarmed me."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Bits of Talk about Home Matters. By H. H., author of "Verses," and "Bits of Travel." Boston: Roberts Brothers. We have often thought that amid the general demand for "rights," somebody ought to espouse the cause of children's rights, and speak for them as they are not allowed to speak for themselves. The author of this book has done it, and done it exceedingly well. Her opening essays on "Corporeal Punishment," "Needless," "Denials," "Rudeness," "Breaking the Will," and several others on like subjects, should be read and pondered over by every parent without exception. They place the relations of parents and children in a new, but as we believe a correct light. It is a beautiful book, and should have the widest circulation.

Hints to Young Painters, and the Process of Portrait Painting. As Practised by the late Thomas Sully. Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddart & Co. This little volume was prepared by Sully, one of the most famous of American portrait painters, more than twenty years ago when he was still in the vigor of manhood and practice of his profession. Aside from gratifying curiosity as to the mode and means employed by so distinguished a painter in obtaining satisfactory results on canvas, it is really of practical use in imparting information regarding pigments, vehicles, varnishes, etc. The book is not intended for beginners strictly, but for those who have already made sufficient progress in their art to be in need of and to understand his directions. The famous "Sully palette" is given in colors. Also a scale of measurements used in portrait painting.

Galama; or, The Beggars. (The Founders of the Dutch Republic.) By J. B. De Liefde. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. This is the second volume of a Library of Choice Fiction, to be issued by these publishers. It is a romantic story of love and adventure. Though, perhaps, not strictly speaking, a historical novel, the author is indebted to fact for some of the most effective portions of his plot. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Washburn & Co.'s Amateur Cultivator's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden. for 1873. Boston: Washburn & Co. This is an exceedingly full and handsomely illustrated catalogue of flower and garden seeds, with brief directions for their growth. The catalogue will be found of great use to both the practical and the amateur gardener. Price, 25 cents.

Descriptive Catalogue of Garden, Flower and Field Seeds and Grains. 1873. New York: R. H. Allen & Co. Messrs Allen & Co. have an extensive warehouse of agricultural implements, seeds of every description, roots, plants, and small fruits. This catalogue will tell the gardener just what he wants, what quantities required, how to use, and what price he must pay. Aside from its original intent as a catalogue it will be found valuable as a book of reference.

They Rise. Suggestive Inquiries Concerning the Resurrection of the Dead, as taught in the New Testament. By Rev. D. A. Dryden. Cincinnati: Hitchcock & Walden, 1872.

Light on the Last Things. By Rev. W. B. Hayden. J. B. Lippincott & Co.: Philadelphia, 1872. The first named work opens with an able discussion of the doctrine of the intermediate state. The Hades of the New Testament is taken to signify "the place of the dead in general, next after they leave this world." It is the place where men are judged, and from which they pass either to Heaven or hell. The author holds that the resurrection takes place immediately after death, and that it consists in the separation of the soul, the real man, from the natural body, and in its rising and living on in the spiritual world. He rejects entirely the idea of a physical resurrection. That a work inculcating these advanced views should be written by a Methodist minister—a member of the California Conference, be introduced to the reader by one of the ablest men in that body, viz: Rev. M. C. Briggs, and be published by a Methodist Publishing House, may be regarded as one of the many signs that a more liberal spirit is pervading the theology of the day.

"Light on the Last Things" is a new and tastefully executed edition of one of Mr. Hayden's most valuable works. It is an able and interesting discussion of questions relating to death, the resurrection, the judgment, the economy of the spiritual world, the second coming of the Lord, and the indestructibility of the earth. We are taught here that the spiritual world "is not located in any physically remote region of the universe. It is near by and close around us. Internally, and as to our minds or spirits we are in constant association with it, and our spiritual associations are according to our affinities." The judgment is regarded as a process now going on in Hades; the second coming of the Lord is not visible and personal, but spiritual, and is now taking place; the earth is to abide forever as a seminary of the human race.

Both these works are thoughtful productions, and will amply repay a perusal.

Rose Thorpe's Ambition. By Mrs. M. O. Rockwell, author of "Tom Miller; or, After Many Days." Philadelphia: J. C. Garrigues & Co. Mrs. Rockwell has brought her close observation, fine culture, and skill in reading character to her work in the production of this fine story of American life. "Rose Thorpe" is a pure and healthy book, and no one can read it without feeling the inspiration of high and noble purposes. As a contribution to Sunday-school literature, it is far above the mass of weak and trashy stuff with which the library shelves are crowded.

What Women Should Know. A Woman's Book about Women. By Mrs. E. B. Duffey. Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddart & Co. The animus of this book is pure. The author is a woman of great earnestness of character, directness of purpose, and plainness of speech, and has written for her sex with the simple and direct end of benefiting them. We know her well, and know, that in the production of this book she was moved to write from a high sense of duty to her sister-wives and mothers.

The Philadelphia Bulletin, in a notice of the volume, says: "This is a work containing plain, homely truths on delicate subjects, it is true, but nevertheless so important that every one affected by them should know them. There is no charlatanism about Mrs. Duffey's writings. She gives plain, practical advice, such as an experienced woman should give her less experienced sister, and the fact that it is printed in a book instead of being given by word of mouth, does not lessen its value. Every young wife should have the book and study it."

And The True Woman, published at Baltimore, gives this testimony: "This book is all that its title purports. It is full of information valuable to all women, though especially important to wives and mothers; a hand-book for them, whose instructions, if well followed, will greatly influence their well being, and have an important and beneficial bearing on both present and future generations. The mechanical execution of the book is excellent."

"What a Woman Should Know" is a subscription book, and sells for $2.00.

Siam, The Land of the White Elephant, as it Was and Is. Compiled and arranged by George B. Bacon. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. An interesting book describing a country about which we have hitherto had little accurate information. It is like the opening of a new world to read of a race of people with manners and customs, arts and sciences, histories and traditions differing so entirely from our own. The volume is profusely illustrated. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

IN Dr. Tyng's letter to Gov. Dix, asking for the commutation of Foster's sentence, it is urged as a mitigating circumstance that the murderer was drunk. Taking this as a text, Scribner's Monthly offers, in a late number, some strong and telling comments on the question as to who is responsible for the drunkenness that makes ruffianism and murder so rife. We give an extract from the article:

"There is no reasonable doubt that every murderer now confined in the Tombs committed his crime under the direct or indirect influence of alcoholic drinks. Either under the immediate spur of the maddening poison, or through the brutality engendered by its habitual use, the murderous impulse was born. It is reasonably doubtful whether one of these criminals would have become a criminal if whisky had been beyond his reach. Does any one doubt this? Let him go to the cells and inquire. If the answer he gets is different from what we suggest, then the cases he finds will be strangely exceptional.

"Now, who is to blame for establishing and maintaining all the conditions of danger to human life through murder? Why, the very community that complains of the danger, and calls for the execution of the murderers. So long as rum is sold at every street corner, with the license of the popular vote, men will drink themselves into brutality, and a percentage of those thus debasing themselves will commit murder. The sun is not more certain to rise in the morning than this event is to take place under these conditions. Fatal appetites are bred under this license. Diseased stomachs and brains are produced under it by the thousand. Wills are broken down, and become useless for all purposes of self-restraint. And all this is done, let it be remembered, with the consent of the community, for a certain price in money, which the community appropriates as a revenue. Then, when this license produces its legitimate results—results that always attend such license, and could have been distinctly foreseen in the light of experience—the community lifts its hands in holy horror, and clamors for the blood of the murderer in order to secure its own safety. It never thinks of drying up the fountain. It is easier to hang a man than shut up a grog-shop. It is easier to dry up a life than a revenue. It is easier to choke a prisoner than a politician.

"And, now, what will the community do about it? Nothing. The wine-bibbers among our first families will sip at the delicious beverage among themselves, feed it to their young men, and nurse them into murderers and debauchees, and vote for the license of a traffic on which they depend for their choicest luxuries. Goodish men will partake of it for their stomach's sake and for their often infirmities. The Frenchman will destroy his bottle of Bordeaux every day; the German will guzzle the lager that will swell him into a tight-skinned, disgusting barrel; and the whiskey-drinker, under the license that all these men claim for themselves, will poison himself, body and soul, and descend into a grave that kindly covers his shame, or into crime and pauperism that endanger the property and life of the city, or sap its prosperity. In the meantime the ruffian or the murderer, acting under the influence of his maddening draughts, will maim and kill, and the very men who helped him to the conditions sure to develop the devil in him will clamor for his life."

THE FIRST SEWING-MACHINE.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following account of the first sewing-machine invented and constructed in this country. The "ingenious mechanic" was, we believe, Elias Howe, afterward so famous. The account, she tells us, is out from a newspaper printed about twenty-five years ago. It is certainly wonderful to think what a revolution has been accomplished by the aid of this machine, improved and perfected, since that day. The article is headed "Tailoring Machine," and it is an extract from the Boston correspondent of the Worcester Spy:

VOL. XL.—20.

"I have been examining a new machine for sewing, which has recently been invented and constructed by an ingenious mechanic of Cambridge. So far as I am informed on the subject, this is the first attempt to construct a machine of the kind, and it appears to me to be an eminently successful one. The machine is very correct, and does not occupy a space of more than about six inches each way. It runs with so much ease that I should suppose one person might easily operate twenty or thirty of them, and the work is done in a most thorough and perfect manner. Both sides of a seam look alike, appearing to be beautifully stitched, and the seam is closer and more uniform than when sewed by the hand. It will sew straight or curved seams with equal facility, and so rapidly, that it takes but two minutes to sew the whole length of the outside seam of a pair of men's pantaloons. It sets four hundred stitches a minute. The thread is less worn by this process than by hand-sewing, and, consequently, retains more of its strength. The simplicity of this machine, and the accuracy, rapidity, and perfection of its operation, will place it in the same rank with the card-machine, the straw-braider, the pin-machine, and the coach-lace loom, machines which never fail to command the admiration of every intelligent beholder."

AT THE SEASIDE.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

(See Engraving.)

ALL through the listless summer days
I sit upon the bordering land;
With earnest, fascinated gaze
I watch the white waves wash the sand.

I see them come, I see them go;
They come with steady, stealthy creep,
As if with sure, resistless flow
To bury all beneath their sweep.

But at my feet the waves are stayed;
Ah, stealthy, mighty, treacherous sea,
The greater Power who all hath made
Hath set a limit e'en to thee!

The phantom ships with spreading wings,
Flit past betwixt the sea and sky,
They seem like living, conscious things,
With a mysterious destiny.

Ah, surging sea with restless roll,
There's a responsive chord in me;
As beat thy waves, so beats my soul
In longings for infinity.

Of phantom thoughts with spreading wings
Flit o'er the surface of my mind;
They come, they go, like conscious things,
And leave a lasting wake behind.

Oh, restless, tossing, troubled sea!
Oh, troubled, struggling, human soul!
How mighty, yet how weak ye be!
How chafe ye, how ye spurn control!

The waves leap up against the sky,
To fall in baffled anger back;
My spirit strives, with piteous cry,
To gain a higher, nobler track.

Oh, sighing soul! oh, surging deep!
Look up! Take heart of faith! For even Above our heads the white clouds sweep!
So shall ascend the soul to Heaven!

THE BOOK-BUYER.

WE take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to a very valuable little periodical, now in its sixth year, which is issued monthly by Messrs. Scribner, Armstrong & Co., and Scribner, Welford & Armstrong, of New York, at the extremely low price of twenty-five cents per annum. To those who are in any way interested in public libraries, or are anxious to keep their own collections of books up to the times, it is almost a necessity, for it is the only periodical in America that gives a list of the most recent English publications, which in any degree approaches completeness. To those whose desire is merely to keep themselves posted in the general literature of the day, Mr. Welford's letters from London, one of which is published in each number, will be found full of useful and curious information.

PROFITABLE GARDENING.

REV. E. P. ROE, author of "Barriers Burned Away," who has made gardening for recreation and profit as great a success as story-writing, has embodied his experience in a volume, about to be published by Dodd & Mead. The author received $2,000 in one season from the sale of fruit and vegetables raised in his garden of two and a quarter acres, and in addition an abundant home supply, besides the health and recreation secured in its culture. His book is entitled "Play and Profit in My Garden."

PERFORMANCE OF "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP."

IT will be seen by an advertisement in the Magazine, that Charles H. Morton, Esq., who dramatized "Three Years in a Man-Trap," and brought it out in this city last winter, when it drew crowded houses every night for six weeks, has organized a company, and is now playing it in the various inland towns and cities of this and other States. The influence of the play in this city was very marked, and it cannot fail to do good service in the Temperance cause whenever performed.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"L. L." wishes our advice as to which of the following professions he would find the best and easiest to enter, "law, medicine, reporter, clerk, or bookkeeper of any kind." Which would be best for "L. L." personally, he alone can decide, while none of them are easy. Unless he feels a special calling toward some one of them, he had better let them all alone. But, before deciding in the matter, he should prepare himself by a thorough course of study and reading. Begin with the common branches, and pay especial attention to spelling. Education is never out of place in any condition of life, and it is the first stepping-stone to a "profession."

LULU.—Calico dresses are made very much as they have been for a number of years past—that is to say, the easiest, plainest way. The skirt is made of four lengths of the cloth, one used straight for the back, one gored on each side for the front, and the other two cut gored down the centre, making each two gored side-breadths. Waist made plain or full. Sleeves gathered into a band, or left slightly flowing. Broad or narrow ruffles can be introduced to suit the taste of the wearer, and her skill in fringing. If the calico is a light summer one, it can be made and trimmed more elaborately, as with an overskirt, for instance. Ladies who would be fashionable, comb the hair straight up to the top of the head, and there fasten it in a knot, around which false braids are coiled. Others wear their hair as they please, and no one thinks the worse of them.

A SUBSCRIBER writes: "The copies of the HOME, together with 'Christian Graces,' came in due time. The picture is elegant as regards the 'new departure.' I had not thought it possible to so much improve the Magazine."

ANTI-LICENSE.—There can be no question as to where the responsibility rests. The man who commits murder when he is drunk, as well as the man who sells him the liquor that makes him drunk, and the legislators that grant the drunkard-making license, are all responsible. But the chief responsibility lies with the legislators that give the drunkard-making licenses. They are guilty, as accessories before the fact, of every crime and murder that find their inspiration in the dram-shops they create.

AMIE.—Don't try it. You can hardly escape a life of wretchedness, if you do so.

A. T.——We cannot undertake to "read carefully and criticize" your MS. volume, and then find you a publisher. Editors have no time to give to work like this.

ADVERTISERS' DEPARTMENT.

BUTTERICK'S BULLETIN OF FASHIONS for June will be found in this number of the HOME MAGAZINE. It is a very attractive, and marked by good taste in all the illustrations of ladies' and misses' garments. It will be seen that the number of yards required for each dress is given, as well as the sizes and prices of patterns. The styles are all new, and drawn from actual garments, not copied from French or German fashion-plates, representing a style three or six months old. With these patterns any woman of good taste can be her own dressmaker, if she will.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.—To ladies and others interested in the Boys' and Children's Department, we would respectfully say that those departments of our vast concern have been filled to overflowing with an entirely fresh supply of suits and garments for the little folk. Such a beautiful collection of choice spring wear for children was never arranged on the counters of any establishment in America. We have a large force of salesmen in these departments, who have made it their study for years to suit and fit the "Rising Generation," and who will take great pleasure in displaying the various new designs and novel ideas gotten up especially for the season, and found in no other establishment. WAMMAKER & BROWN, Oak Hall Buildings, occupying the entire block on Sixth Street, from Market to Minor Street, Philadelphia.

THERE ARE MANY TESTS OF FAITH The Wheeler & Wilson Company has expended not less than $200,000, through a series of years, in producing a superior leather and heavy manufacturing machine. They could not foster a crude conception, nor come before the public with a doubtful experiment. They had a reputation at stake, was by faithful public service and involving a vast expenditure of money. They could not jeopardize a business of five hundred or six hundred machines a day, and so they wrought slowly but faithfully, rejecting this crudity and that partial success. They were not exploring an unknown field; but knew what had been done, and that to succeed they must do that something much better. The result of this labor, and expense, and genius is the now known "Wheeler & Wilson New No. 6 Sewing Machine, for leather work and heavy tailoring, carriage trimming, etc.," which is acknowledged by those experienced in the business to be the best Machine for the purpose ever placed on the market.

"THE PHILADELPHIA LAWN MOWER." is the most complete, easily handled, easily managed, and efficient implement for use on the lawn ever brought to our notice. There are five sizes for hand, from the beautiful little ten-inch machine, suitable for a lad or young miss, to the twenty-inch machine, designed for one and two men. We choose for our own use a medium size or sixteen-inch machine, and it is a jewel. With this, the cutting of our lawn grass becomes a pleasing and healthful recreation, and never before did we so fully appreciate the real beauty of a grass-plot kept as it should be—the grass short, and yet not too short, and as even as a floor all over—and all at so little outlay of money, time and labor.

We feel that we are doing such of our readers as have a grass-plot or lawn to keep in order a good service by bringing to their notice this perfection of Hand Mowers, and would say to them, go to the makers, Messrs. Graham, Emelen & Passmore, 631 Market Street, and select a size to suit you.

MOTHERS! LOOK!!—Boughton's Improved Nursery, Gate and Window-Bar is just the thing you want to prevent children falling out of windows, getting out of doors while open, and climbing up and falling down stairs, being cheap, efficient and durable, as well as neat in appearance; will fit any door, window or stairway, and is needed in every house where there are children. Send for descriptive circular, for this; also, for one of Adjustable Mosquito and Fly-Screens, a very useful and cheap article, as we well know, having had them in use last year. For sale by J. W. Boughton, Sole Proprietor and Manufacturer, 1200 Chestnut Street.

A STORY OF A STRONG-MINDED WOMAN.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

HOW is it we are taught to believe that, theoretically speaking, the husband is an oak, and the wife a weak vine clinging to the lordly tree, and looking to it for support and strength, when in actual life we find the case so often reversed? In truth, is not the reverse the rule rather than the exception? Men are physically stronger than women; nevertheless they succumb to pain and suffering much the more readily. In times, too, of trial and trouble, it is the woman who oftenest stands firm and steadfast and sustains the shrinking faith and drooping courage of her husband. Too many a woman finds her husband at such times a broken reed, and in her strength alone must they both stand, or else they fall together. In the hour of temptation, as well, the man who can gain moral strength from his wife, is the more certain to pass through the fire unscathed, than he who has no such wondrous help.

John Marius was a man of average intelligence, average moral principles and with quite the average business talents. He was a fair sample of the average gentleman, gentlemanly in manners, appearance and treeding. Contrary to the rule laid down for guidance in such matters, he had not selected for a wife a woman so far beneath him in mental attributes, that she should be continually impelled to do him reverence. He may have read Tupper (though I doubt if he read any poetry unless it were that of Bret Harte and John Hayea,) but he certainly did not heed the advice which, in regard to the selection of a wife, says:

"Hath she wisdom? It is well;
But be sure that thou excel."

John Marius looked up to his wife. He knew that she excelled him in many ways, and he had not only the generosity but the good sense to acknowledge it. He took a certain pride in acknowledging it. Though people sometimes, out of honor to their prejudices, made a show of laughing at him behind his back, they really, after all, liked and respected him the better for it.

If there is a man in the world who deserves and who receives more contempt than another, it is the one who is notoriously henpecked, yet who continually makes his boast abroad that "he is master in his own house."

When the world first learned that John Marius was going to marry Elizabeth Arkwright, it said that the love was all on his side, while on hers the match was entirely a mercenary one. The world found out its mistake, however, before the wedding-day was reached, and then it didn't know what to say. She married him in spite of prophesy, when his fortune was at its lowest ebb, and then went to work in her own way—a somewhat peculiar way; but, then, Elizabeth Arkwright never did anything exactly after the pattern of ordinary women—to help him build his fortune up.

She was an artist of no mean ability, "considering she was a woman;" so she stayed at home and painted, while he was busy in his counting-room. By the sale of her pictures, when they had at last adjusted themselves into their new places, and reduced their expenses to the minimum, she managed to supply the household needs, and thus leave his business untrammelled by any calls upon it for domestic purposes.

You who have a slight opinion of feminine artistic abilities, sneer at this and set my story down as fiction at once. But I am telling the truth. It is not every woman who daubs a little with paints and brushes that can count her annual earnings by hundreds of dollars, but Elizabeth Marius did. She did not paint two or three wonderful pictures which, upon being exhibited, attracted the attention of some benevolent connoisseur, who bought them at fabulous prices, and regarded them forever after as the gems of his studio; such things only happen in novels. Mrs. Marius worked early and late, and painted not few but many pictures, which she sold for what they would bring—trifling, insignificant sums, regarded from the romantic or heroic point of view, but amounting in the aggregate to more than she could have earned by the needle, or in any other feminine employment, and sufficient to keep the pot boiling. Let me tell you a secret. She painted for auction sales. And there is a hint, and a pregnant one, for those ambitious women (and men, too, only men regard the painting of auction pictures as derogatory to their dignity, and only engage in it sub rosa), who would succeed in painting, but see no ladder by which to ascend to the higher realms of art; women who cannot afford to spare years of apprenticeship in their chosen profession without some pecuniary return.

Then there was another secret. Mrs. Marius always did her best without regard to the pay she was to receive. She was recompensed in two ways—three ways, I might say. Her pictures, consequently, always sold readily, being always worth to the purchaser all or more than she asked for them. She was constantly improving, which was, after all, of the greater importance to her. Thirdly, which I came near overlooking, her pictures finally attracted the attention of artists and connoisseurs, who discovered a painstaking and truthfulness about them so frequently wanting in feminine art productions; a lack of pettiness, of narrowness of breadth and scope, of superficiality, of a conventionality of an exceedingly inferior type, of a—what shall I call it, which are usually the characteristics of the same productions. She was aided and encouraged by artists as well as dealers, and that was of more worth than all to her.

In reducing domestic expenses, she found it necessary to transfer their abode from the city to the country. By this means their outgo was materially lessened directly and indirectly. There was no such need of large and expensive wardrobes; there were not so many temptations for disposing of money, innocently perhaps, but still unnecessarily. I say she transferred their abode advisedly. It was she who instigated most of their important moves. But whatever she did was done with such wisdom and tact, that if her husband did not really believe himself prime mover, as he sometimes did, he bowed graciously and gracefully to her decisions.

After a certain event, art was somewhat neglected. Despite her strong-mindedness, perhaps I should say because of it, Elizabeth had peculiar ideas about motherly duties. Her friend and neighbor, Mrs. Draper, had a nurse to relieve her of the care of her infants, so that she might unmolestedly devote a large amount of her time to society, to philanthropy and to the church. Mrs. Draper's babies did not always thrive, it is true. But Mrs. Draper, as soon as she became convinced that a nurse-girl neglected the little ones intrusted to her care, promptly discharged her and engaged another. When her infants died, as some two or three of them did, she laid their deaths to a chastising Providence rather than to the cordials and carminatives which she concurred with the nurses in thinking indispensable to the comfort and well-being of such fretful babes.

Mrs. Marius constituted herself head-nurse to her own baby, and took personally all the care of her which was consistent with her own health and as a necessary sequence with that of the babe. Her nearest neighbor and dearest friend, Mrs. Cameron, gave her some good advice in this particular. Mrs. Cameron was not a great deal older, but had had more experience in domestic matters, having been longer married.

"Do not shut yourself up," said the latter lady. "It is your duty more than ever to keep your health perfect, and you can only do so by means of plenty of fresh air, and occasional change of scene and occupation. Make up your mind to leave that wonderful child occasionally for a few hours, and you will come back with added strength and vigor and nervous force to impart to her."

Elizabeth took advice—something wonderful for her—and consequently did not look like a young mother at all: pale and worn and weak and nervous. She lost none of her roses, and baby Lizzie thrived wonderfully.

John—that is, Mr. Marius—was consoled with by some of his friends because the baby hadn't been a boy. But he himself felt no dissatisfaction. He had before his marriage maintained a kind of placid, negative contempt for women, considering them as very good in their place, but naturally inferior to men, you know; just the opinion that most unmarried men of average abilities and average morals have of the sex. But that wonderful woman Elizabeth had latterly so elevated the whole sex in his estimation, that he was more than content, and worshipped baby Lizzie as an infant goddess. She was not only his child, but she was Elizabeth's child, too, and she could not fail to be something remarkable. How he looked with commiserating pity on the pride of all other young fathers who had not Elizabeth or her match to boast of in the mothers of their infants. Of course it was natural that they should possess fatherly affection; but he was always in fear they might perceive the difference between their infants and his own, and thus become envious and dissatisfied. No doubt women often feel this way, but men, I think, seldom.

With regard to Elizabeth, I think perhaps John was more than half right; but, as to the baby—well, I judge all young babies are, more or less, equally uninteresting—except, perhaps, my own.

This is a long retrospect. I fear my introduction will lead you to expect too much from my story, while it is only intended as an illustration of the few sage remarks I made at the commencement.

Business—I really know little about business, being a woman, and may consequently make a bungle of my narrative in this particular—business was dull. Money was scarce. John Marius was not making money as fast as he felt he ought, with a young princess in the family—and such a princess! Times became worse. Financial ruin was again threatened. He had suffered it once, and felt as though he could not endure the blow a second time. He struggled hard, but instead of making headway, he felt that he was really losing ground. He put out new energies. He was worried and perplexed in business hours, and he carried his perplexities home with him in sober face and disturbed manner, though he made no complaint to his wife. He wanted her to live above business cares. She sought his confidence, but he answered her evasively, so she could only know that something was going wrong, without being able to discover in what manner. Oh, the characteristic wisdom of the "wiser" sex who think they save their wives trouble and care by such a course! As though anything could be worse than apprehension and uncertainty!

She would not have hesitated—this strong-minded heroine of mine—to make a raid upon his counting-room, overhaul his books and accounts, and find by personal examination the exact condition of things, if she had so minded. And she would have done it, too, in such a manner as would not have given her husband one chance for blame, but would have left him more stricken with admiration of her than ever; only she was not so minded. She was by no means perfect; and she took offence at her husband's want of confidence. If the confidence was not spontaneous, she would have none of it. So she held her peace, and worried more than ever in private, while that stolid John, like any other ostrich, thought because he kept the face of his trouble concealed, that it was entirely invisible, notwithstanding its body loomed up black and forbidding, and was casting its shadow over their hearthstone. Men are curious creatures. They would be well worth studying if one had the time. Elizabeth seemed to have the time just then, and studied one man in particular closely and correctly, though he never perceived it.

For some time she found the symptoms very plain, and the diagnosis exceedingly simple. He was a man harassed in business. But after awhile there came a complexity of symptoms which puzzled her. He became feverish and excited in his manner; then again, as the reaction came on, despondent. He was away from home oftener and longer than usual. He had frequent business appointments. Sometimes he stayed in town over night. At other times men came at unusual hours to see him at his residence—all of which Elizabeth did not like the looks of at all. Why did he not tell her all about it? Sometimes she thought he was tempted to do so, but when she tried to open the way, his courage failed. The woman was worried nearly out of her life, and knew not how to help herself. So was the man, for that matter; but not knowing whether he could help himself or not, she did not know whether to pity him.

There came a diversion. Baby fell sick. The wife was almost glad that the mother was called upon to suffer, for father and mother could sympathize, and they seemed brought together again. Even "business," which had held John in such tight bonds, was forced to relax its hold temporarily.

The little princess had a serious time of it, and then began slowly to mend. During the danger John shared the care, the anxiety and the vigils with Elizabeth. But when the doctor spoke and looked more hopefully, manlike he rushed off, never thinking of the long days of weariness still in store for his wife, which must become all the more tedious because her mind was no longer propped up by the strain and excitement of fear.

John began to come and go again with nervous haste and anxiety, as if making up for lost time. Again came unexpected and ill-timed visits, all the more trying, because in an attempted show of the hospitality, which she did not feel, Elizabeth was frequently obliged to absent herself from her sick babe.

At last, one night Mrs. Marins beat down the barriers of her pride, and ventured to question her husband.

"John," said she, "what is all this about?"

He did not answer immediately, and she wondered if he had heard her question. As she was mentally debating whether she should repeat it, he replied with a tone of ill-feigned indifference, "All what, Elizabeth?"

"Why, this coming and going; this worry and excitement—this extra 'business' that interferes with your hours of leisure, and the remembrance of which disturbs your rest?"

"Why, nothing, Lizzie. At least, nothing of any moment. Business has its ups and downs, of course, and you women should never bother about them because you cannot understand them."

"Understand?" She felt it an insult to her womanhood to be told she could not understand. As though she did not know her mind to be clearer and keener—capable of grasping greater things and of comprehending subtler ones than John's, man though he was. John knew it, too, but his masculine instincts were still so strong that, practically, it was yet hard to associate the ideas of femininity and wisdom.

There was silence between them after that.

That evening there came the usual delegation—not unexpected, probably, as John seemed ill at ease before their coming—two gentlemen, with ready tongues and suave manners, dressed in the finest of broadcloth, the snowiest of linen, the glossiest of hats, and with just a suspicion of flashiness in their diamond pins and heavy gold chains and seals. Elizabeth studied their faces and manners as she had never done before. She scanned their expressions, she weighed their tones of voice, she even took note of their gestures; and then, calling in her womanly intuitions, decided she did not like them.

She went back sadly to her chamber, and the crib of her sick babe, feeling, as she left her husband with the strangers, as though he were a helpless fly which they had already entangled in their web, and which they were fast binding in its meshes.

She sat and brooded long. If she was only certain that there really was danger, and what that danger was, she would know how to act. But her suspicions might be all unfounded, and any action on her part might not only be ill-advised, but really unjust, or, still worse, ridiculous.

At last, summing up her thoughts in one sentence, she said unconsciously, aloud, "A wife has a right to know of her husband's affairs."

Casting one glance at the sleeping babe, she went out of the room, leaving the door ajar behind her that she might hear any sound within the chamber. Stealthily descending the stairs, she came to the closed door beyond which her husband and his guests were in conference. She stood a moment in thought. Should she go in? No; for if she did, she would only be received as she had been several times before, when accidentally she had broken in upon their conversation. There would be a sudden hush, followed presently by some irrelevant remark addressed to herself. The strangers would be courteous—almost too courteous to her, but her husband would show signs of impatience. As she thought of this, she mentally exclaimed, "If everything was as it should be, there would be no need of concealment from me."

While she still stood hesitating whether to enter or turn back to her chamber, her husband's voice distinguished itself above the murmur that had met her ears, pronouncing the words "my wife." In what connection he was using those words she could not hear. Bending her head in a tremor of excitement, she listened intently for the reply. She heard it clear and distinct:

"There is no necessity, as I have told you from the first, for her to know anything about it, except in a general way. Women do not and cannot understand affairs like this; and no man should ever feel under obligations to enter into particulars with them."

Oh, that suave, soft, hated voice, counselling a husband to separate his interests from those of his wife!

Still she listened, and again she was rewarded. Her husband responded: "I believe you are right. But then my wife is so peculiar in some ways. She is perhaps what you would call squeamish—"

"Yes, most women are. That is their nature, for which we must make allowances, while at the same time we must not permit ourselves to be governed by them. It would never do in the business world."

Elizabeth was pale with indignation. Acting on the impulse of the moment, she opened the door and walked into their midst. For an instant the trio of questioning faces bewildered her, though at the same instant she was impressed with the necessity for caution and discretion in action and speech. Her ready woman's wit came to her aid, and she turned to her husband with the exclamation, "John, I am afraid our babe is in danger!"

Her pale face and gasping articulation seemed to add their testimony to her words. With a hurried apology her husband followed her out of the room. He sprang past her up the staircase, and was, in a moment, by the bedside of the still quietly sleeping babe, uttering a faltering "Poor little princess!"

But hardly had the exclamation died on his tongue, when he turned bewildered to his wife.

"Why, Elizabeth, what is the matter with the child? She is sleeping quietly enough!"

"It is true, John; at least, I fear it is true. She is in danger, and you alone can save her. Tell me, John," she exclaimed, eagerly, clasping his arm in nervous excitement, "what this mystery is that you dare not trust to me? You cannot, you shall not put me off! I will know! I have a right to know, if my baby's father is about to dishonor himself!"

"Dishonor! Don't be ridiculous, Lizzie!" said John, uneasily. "I cannot tell you just now; but if you insist upon knowing about it, I will explain to you when my visitors are gone," and he made an effort as if to disengage himself from her clasp. But she clung the closer.

"No, John, I will know now, before either you or I cross the threshold of this chamber. Here, over the bed of our sick child, you shall tell me;" and out of her eyes there shone a strength of will and purpose, the existence of which John had only suspected, never known before. He was cowed. Man though he was, as the weaker he acknowledged the stronger. He made no reply; so she questioned him.

"What are those men persuading you to do?"

"To take shares in a joint-stock company."

"How much do they propose you shall invest—not enough to cripple your business, I hope?"

He hesitated a moment, and then replied: "If I must tell you, I may as well make a clean breast of it. They want me to dispose of my present business and invest the proceeds in buying up a Mexican claim to land in California. They tell me it is sure to be a grand success, and I will get my money back five hundred per cent."

"To invest all your means? That is, you are to furnish the funds for the entire company?"

"Well, not quite that. Biddle has given his name, and will furnish nearly as much as I. You know that these companies can't be started without money. But there is money in them, too."

"How is that?"

"Why, when the company is fairly afloat, and the stock is pushed into the market, it is sure to go up, and then is the time to sell and realize your profits. What was comparatively a trifling investment may yield a fortune in return."

"Where is the land which this company owns, or contemplates owning?"

"Some of the best grazing and fruit-growing land in California, within forty miles of San Francisco."

"You know this to be true?"

"I am told so," he replied, somewhat uneasily. "Of course I haven't been able to go out there and look into the matter myself. But I have the word of reliable men. This land," he added, "has been already brought into a high state of cultivation by squatters who have no legal title to it whatever, and who of course will be obliged to leave it when we establish our claim."

"And your company proposes to rob these men, that you can put money in your own pockets?"

"Why no, I don't think that is just the light in which to put it."

"How can you put it in any other light?" said Elizabeth, relentlessly.

"Anyhow, that part of the business will not come on my conscience. My intention is to take advantage of the first rise in the market, without being implicated in the probable litigation or possible failure."

"John!"

Elizabeth had said that word once before in her life with a very different emphasis, and he remembered the occasion very well.

"So," she added, in a tone of bitterness, after a moment's silence, "you propose to make your fortune out of a scheme which, if it succeeds, must ruin the prospects of many bona fide settlers of California—men who have expended their labor and their means in making homes for themselves and their families; or, if it fails, drags down to equal ruin the dupes whom you inveigle into taking your stock off your hands. Two beautiful horns to a dilemma! It looks amazingly like swindling whichever way you take it!"

"You use too hard a word, Elizabeth. It is only speculation."

"Then, John, as you value my love or my respect, never turn speculator! Though we become so poor that we labor with our hands for our daily bread, let us eat the bread of honesty with clear consciences."

John sank into a chair, and bowed his head upon the table. At last he spoke.

"I do not know what to do, Elizabeth. I have all but pledged my word—I have quite pledged my honor—to go on with this matter. I do not see any way to withdraw."

"Do you really wish to withdraw?"

"I do, Elizabeth, since I have found how you feel about it. In fact, they did not present it in just the light you have to me, but I believe you are right."

"Then go down and dismiss those men, and give yourself till to-morrow to think about it."

"But I was to give them a final answer to-night. I suppose in ten minutes more the whole thing would have been settled if you had not interrupted."

"Then give them your final answer like a man," said his wife, with a little tinge of contempt in her voice—a contempt which was perhaps somewhat cruel, but she could not help it.

He half rose, then sank back into his seat, and again folded his arms on the table and bowed his head upon them. "I cannot!" he faltered.

There was a deeper flash of contempt and scorn in the wife's eyes, which happily the husband did not see, and she passed resolutely out of the room, while her husband remained brooding in his seat, only half conscious of her absence.

With an irresistible impulse she descended to the parlor, where the gentlemen were impatiently awaiting their host's return. Once within the room, she schooled her voice and manner, and said with what calmness she could command: "Gentlemen, I am sorry my husband cannot see you again to-night. But anxiety for our child prevents him from giving any further thought to the matter you were discussing. As there seems to be no immediate prospect of improvement, he is sorry to say that he will have to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the subject. I hope this postponement will not seriously interfere with your plans; but as women are not capable of understanding business affairs, of course I cannot know."

She would have been more or less than a woman if she had withheld this parting shot. Instead of that she was a very woman, strong-mindedness and all.

The gentlemen took their leave with bland words of condolence and regret, which were changed to sneers and imprecations against their hostess when they were fairly beyond her doors.

Marius heard the noise of their departure, and aroused to a full sense of the situation, he sprang to his feet as if to go down, but did not execute his purpose.

"It is no worse, perhaps, that way than any other. On the whole, I believe it is better, for I could never face them again. I wonder how she gets me out of the fix?"

"What a reputation I shall get for being hen-pecked," he added after awhile, with a half smile. "I don't mind it. I would rather be ruled by Elizabeth" (how he dwelt on her name) "than be the veriest lord over a woman of the ordinary pattern. She's something of a tyrant, but her tyranny is always on the right side."

Elizabeth had her soliloquy, too, after seeing the strangers depart. It began:

"John is a weak fool!" But she had had her way, and could afford to be forgiving; so it ended with the thought: "Perhaps if he were stronger in character, when he was once set in a wrong course it would not be so easy to turn him from it."

She kissed her husband silently as she entered the chamber. He took it as a kiss of affection. She meant it as a kiss of forgiveness, and of apology for having even momentarily wished him otherwise than he was.

Bending over the little crib of the still sleeping child, she remarked significantly: "I am glad to see little princess is better."

A few months afterward, John silently laid a newspaper before his wife, folded so as to give prominence to a certain article. The article was headed: "A Great Swindling Enterprise." It detailed the operations of the company in which John had so nearly embarked his means, and told the result to have been financial ruin to all concerned except two or three men who had been foremost in organizing the company, and these men were John's business visitors.

"I thanked God to-day, if I never did before," said John, generously, "that I have a strong-minded woman for a wife."

"And I will thank God now, if I never did before, that if He has not given me a husband always capable of ruling, He has at least given me one who is not afraid of sometimes being ruled for his own good."

And she gave him a kiss which that stupid John again took for one of affection, but which was really not this time bestowing but asking forgiveness.

OUR HOME.

BY L. S. H.

"EYE hath not seen" those "mansions,"
Our Father's house above;
"EAR hath not heard" those harmonies
Of peace, and joy, and love.

In those bright halls of glory
No lengthening shadow falls;
'Tis ever, ever morning
Within those Jasper walls.

The soul, that straying pilgrim,
Puts on her robes of joy,
And bathes her drooping pinions
In bliss without alloy.

For He, the Prince and Saviour,
Did this dear home prepare,
That all His faithful children
Might dwell forever there.

Forever and forever!
What rapture in the word!
Forever in His presence—"Forever with the Lord!"

ONWARD.

BY AUBER FORESTIER.

DESPAIR is written on thy brow;
Ah, lonely woman, mourn not now!
The dead are better off than we,
They rest from sorrow peacefully;
Therefore thy treasure,
For thine own pleasure,
Cease to wish back.

Hold up thy head, be wise and brave,
Life hath its duties, stern and grave;
Within the void of thy dull soul,
Time will, ere long, new scenes unroll,
Amid which striving,
Conflicts surviving,
Thou wilt grow strong.

Gaze on the accumulated woe
Shrouding poor mortal here below,
And thine own sorrow will seem small Compared with what on others fall.
Whilst thou art moaning,
Sad earth is groaning
'Neath thousand wrongs.

One whom thou lov'st hath found relief
From bitter care and stinging grief;
Rouse then to action; why sit idly there
Indulging in thy selfish, weak despair?
Brave deeds achieving,
Lost hours retrieving,
Thou'lt reach the goal.

HUGH MILLER'S FIRST DAY IN THE QUARRY.

THE name of Hugh Miller is well-known. He devoted himself early to a life of hard labor as a quarryman and a mason, and by the steady exercise of the powers which God had given him, rose to a position of much usefulness and honor. His story has been often told, to show what can be done by the wise use of common means. He has himself, in one of his books, "The Old Red Sandstone," described the feelings with which he began work, and the happiness he found in it.

"It is twenty years," he says, "since I set out a little before sunrise to make my first acquaintance with a life of labor and restraint, and I have rarely had a heavier heart than on that morning. I was but a slim, loose-jointed boy at the time—fond of dreaming when broad awake; and, woful change! I was now going to work in a quarry. Bating the passing uneasiness occasioned by a few gloomy anticipations, the portion of my life which had already gone by had been happy beyond the common lot. I had been a wanderer among rocks and woods—a reader of curious books, when I could get them—a gleaner of old traditional stories; and now I was going to exchange all my day-dreams, and all my amusements, for the kind of life in which men toil every day that they may be enabled to eat, and eat every day that they may be enabled to toil.

"The quarry in which I wrought lay on the southern shore of a noble inland bay, or frith rather, with a little clear stream on the one side, and a thick fir-wood on the other. It had been opened in the Old Red Sandstone of the district, and was overtopped by a huge bank of diluvial clay, which rose over it in some places to the height of nearly thirty feet, and which at this time was rent and shivered, wherever it presented an open front to the weather, by a recent frost. A heap of loose fragments, which had fallen from above, blocked up the face of the quarry, and my first employment was to clear them away.

"The friction of the shovel soon blistered my hands, but the pain was by no means very severe, and I wrought hard and willingly, that I might see how the huge strata below, which presented so firm and unbroken a frontage, were to be torn up and removed. Picks and wedges and levers were applied by my brother-workmen; and simple and rude as I had been accustomed to regard these implements, I found I had much to learn in the way of using them. They all proved inefficient, however, and the workmen had to bore into one of the inferior strata, and employ gunpowder.

"The process was new to me, and I deemed it a highly amusing one; it had the merit, too, of being attended with some such degree of danger as a boat-ing or rock excursion, and had thus an interest independent of its novelty. We had a few capital shots—the fragments flew in every direction; and an immense mass of the diluvium came toppling down, bearing with it two dead birds, that in a recent storm had crept into one of the deeper fissures, to die in the shelter. I felt a new interest in examining them. The one was a pretty cock goldfinch, with its hood of vermillion, and its wings inlaid with the gold, to which it owes its name, as unsoiled and smooth as if it had been preserved for a museum. The other, a somewhat rarer bird, of the woodpecker tribe, was variegated with light-blue and a grayish-yellow. I was engaged in admiring the poor little things, more disposed to be sentimental, perhaps, than if I had been ten years older, and thinking of the contrast between the warmth and jollity of their green summer haunts, and the cold and darkness of their last retreat, when I heard our employer bidding the workmen lay by their tools. I looked up and saw the sun sinking behind the thick fir-wood beside us, and the long, dark shadows of the trees stretching downward toward the shore.

"This was no very formidable beginning of the course of life I had so much dreaded. To be sure, my hands were a little sore, and I felt nearly as much fatigued as if I had been climbing among the rocks; but I had wrought and been useful, and had yet enjoyed the day fully as much as usual. It was no small matter, too, that the evening, converted by a rare transmutation into the delicious 'blink of rest,' was all my own. I was as light of heart next morning as any of my brother-workmen. All the workmen rested at midday, and I went to enjoy my half-hour alone on a mossy knoll in the neighboring wood, which commands through the trees a wide prospect of the bay and the opposite shore."

After describing the scene, he says: "I returned to the quarry, convinced that a very exquisite pleasure may be a very cheap one, and that the busiest employments may afford leisure enough to enjoy it."

Various wonders soon disclosed themselves in the rocks; marks of furrows, as of an ebbing tide, fretted in the solid stone, fossil shells, and fish, and leaves of plants. Almost every day opened new discoveries to his curious eye, and awakened deeper interest. And thus began that course of observation and study which made him famous as a geologist, and enabled him to render valuable help in the progress of science.

His first year of labor came to a close, and he found that "the amount of his happiness had not been less than in the last of his boyhood. The additional experience of twenty years," he adds, "has not shown me that there is any necessary connection between a life of toil and a life of wretchedness."

"My advice," said Hugh Miller, recalling these facts, "to young workingmen desirous of bettering their circumstances, and adding to the amount of their enjoyment, is a very simple one. Do not seek happiness in what is misnamed pleasure; seek it rather in what is termed study. Keep your consciences clear, your curiosity free, and embrace every opportunity of cultivating your minds. Learn to make a right use of your eyes; the commonest things are worth looking at—even stones and weeds, and the most familiar animals. Read good books, not forgetting the Bible of all; there is more true philosophy in the Bible than in every work of every skeptic that ever wrote; and we should be all miserable creatures without it, and none more miserable than you."

He that is noble-minded has the same concern for his own fortune, that every wise man ought to have, and the same regard for his friend that every good man really has; his easy, graceful manner of obliging, carries as many charms as the obligation itself; his favors are not extorted from him by importunity, are not the late rewards of long attendance and expectation; but flow from a free hand and open heart.

THERE are questions so indiscreet that they deserve neither truth nor falsehood in reply.

OUR INSECT FRIENDS.

BY JOHN B. DUFFEY.

WE of the country have little difficulty in finding out our insect enemies. Their name is legion, and their goings-forth are to destruction. They attack us from all sides, with a vigor and pertinacity that not rarely almost drive us to despair of being able in the end to withstand their assault. Not unlikely, we might finally be forced to withdraw vanquished from the field, were it not that nature sends to our aid a host of insect friends, whose ever-restless activity, alertness and keen zest for their appointed work, are of infinite service in

As some slight incentive to, and assistance in forming the acquaintance of these "insect friends," we have gathered together a few entomological notes, which, it is hoped, may prove not only instructive, but at the same time entertaining. For many facts in regard to native species we are indebted to the report of the Entomological Society of Ontario, for 1872, prepared by the Rev. C. J. S. Bethune, president of the society, and editor of the Canadian Entomologist.

Powerfully armed, both for offence and defence, and endowed with a strength only equalled by their ferocity, the carabids, or carnivorous ground beetles, keeping down the numbers of our foes. Indeed, if we all of us knew that we had such auxiliaries, thoroughly understood them, recognised them and protected them, we would, it is fair to presume, be saved much labor, much vexation, much loss, no little profanity and vast quantities of those villainously-smelling compounds, now deemed indispensable in waging war against the insect despoilers of our fields, orchards and gardens. Unfortunately, however, in our ignorance, in our blind exasperation, we doom to destruction friends and foes alike; and so long as we do this, the contest we wage will continue to be a doubtful one, successes in one portion of the field being counterbalanced by defeats in another.

the lions of the insect tribes, as they have been termed, deserve especial mention among those insects directly beneficial to the agriculturist. Under this name are included a large number of different genera and species, closely resembling each other, however, in their habits and general appearance. They are of incalculable service to the farmer and fruit-grower. A sort of rural police, guarding our fields by night and day, they ask no reward but the bodies of the depredators they catch. Our trees, our fruits, our vegetables, they never disturb. Unfortunately, they are such handsome fellows that our children destroy them for their brilliant wing-cases, ignorant that they are killing some of our best friends. In France they are protected by law, and many people keep them in their gardens.

Of the Carabi, from which the general name of the group is derived, the golden carabus, an European species, presents a fair type. It is of a brilliant golden green, with beautifully carved wing-covers. In France it is called "the gardener," and treated with a great deal of consideration. It ranges the fields, and even the public roads, destroying a vast number of caterpillars, slugs and other insects injurious to vegetation. It will even attack the cockchafer, one of the largest and most destructive of European beetles. It is a very common sight in the spring to see a carabus catch a chafer, cut him open and devour him. When first seized, the chafer, in his struggles to escape, generally drags his lighter-built captor along with him. But the carabus hangs on till, wearied out, his wretched victim turns on his back and gives up the fight.

The larvae or young of the carabus, like those of the rest of the family, and of the tiger-beetles, of which we shall presently speak, are fully as ferocious as the perfect insect, though, of course, less active. During the day they lie hidden under stones and clods, but at night are mighty hunters, and do a great deal of good work for the gardener. The serrated carabus, found with us, is black bordered with brilliant purple.

Of the carabidæ family, however, the largest and handsomest members are found among the calosomas, or caterpillar hunters. As a type of the species, we give an illustration of the Calosoma sycophanta, of Europe. The beetle, itself, is represented in the act of climbing a tree, toward a nest of processionary caterpillars. In the middle of the nest will be noticed a grub some six or seven times larger than the rest of the inmates. This is the larvæ of the calosoma. Réaumur asserts that he never opened a processionary caterpillar's nest in which he did not find one or more of these grubs. Though the beetle—in color a lovely blue-green—is so handsome as to have received the name of calosoma—beautiful-bodied—its larvæ is a black, unsightly creature. It is a deadly foe to all caterpillars, and seems to pursue the processionaries with especial fury. As one of them will devour several large caterpillars in a day, it is easy to imagine what havoc they create. The caterpillars have no means of escape or defence. They can neither abandon their nest nor expel the intruder. All that they can do is to go out and eat, and come back and be eaten.

A common species with us is the Calosoma scrutator—"The beautiful-bodied searcher." This magnificent beetle is very destructive to that greatest of orchard pests, the canker-worm. It is of the same general shape as the calosoma figured in our engraving. Its hues, however, are much more brilliant and varied. The head and breast are dark purplish black, the latter with a greenish coppery margin. Beneath it is of a deep, shining green, with coppery markings. The wing-covers, of a bright, lustrous green, have a broad margin of a coppery red, and are marked lengthwise with fine lines, and little scattered points. The legs are blackish-brown with purple reflections.

Another very common caterpillar-hunter, found in fields, where it lies in little holes in the sod, or under logs and stones where the ground is moist, is the hot or glowing calosoma (C. Calidum). Its general color is shining black, relieved on the wing-covers by six rows of bright copper hued impressed spots, thus bearing a fanciful resemblance to a vessel of glowing coals with a perforated cover. Hence its specific name. "It devours caterpillars with great avidity," says Bethune, "in both its larval and perfect states, and is a capital hand at reducing the numbers of those horrid pests, the cut-worms. We usually transport a number of these big beetles into our garden every spring to keep down these cutters off of our young cabbage plants."

Next to the Carabidæ the elegantly-formed and brilliantly-tinted Cicindela, or tiger beetles, seem to be most serviceable to the agriculturist, and deserve marked mention among our insect friends. As a type of the family, we introduce to the reader the Cicindela campestris, or field cicindela, of Europe. Its scientific name—Cicindela, literally "glow-worm"—is due to the wonderful and sparkling brilliancy of its metallic tints. The common name of tiger-beetle was given to it on account of its eminently predaceous habits. It is a marvellously agile creature, loving the sunlight and warm sandy banks.

Flying about with restless energy and incredible activity, its movements dazzle the eye. The prevailing tint is a beautiful sea-green, with coppery hues on the head and edges of the wing-covers, which, in the sun, look like gleams of fire.

The larvæ of the tiger beetle present peculiarities of structure and habits which are not to be found elsewhere. Both larvæ and perfect insects are met with in the same spots. The full-grown beetles possess in themselves all the advantages incident to a predaceous animal. Powerfully armed, they apprehend no resistance from the insects doomed to be their prey. Closely mailed, they fear no wounds. Gifted with a wonderful agility, they easily escape from an enemy too powerful to be resisted. In their larval condition, the cicindelæ have all the voracity of their parents. With a thin skin, easily lacerated, in a chimney, with its head and mandibles closing the entrance to its hole, it awaits with inflexible patience until an ant or some other small insect passes over it. At the very first touch the larvæ precipitates itself to the bottom of the tunnel, whilst the ground gives way under the feet of the ant, which, sliding downward, is seized and devoured. Having finished its repast, the larvæ again ascends to its post, to play over again his part of a living trap. When about to become a nymph, the insect closes the opening of its tunnel, and there awaits tranquilly the great change in its life.

More than a hundred different species of tiger-beetles are known to inhabit North America. Their general habits and appearance, as well as those of their larvæ, may be gathered from the description already given of their European representative. The and a long, heavy body on short legs, rendering rapid flight impossible, these imperfect creatures nevertheless find no difficulty in obtaining food without exposing themselves to serious peril. Their claws are short, broad and spiny, thus enabling them to dig readily into the earth. With these, and its hard, shovel-like head, the insect excavates a perpendicular tunnel, which, turning at a certain depth, finally forms a horizontal gallery. The hole thus formed is a foot or more deep. On the eighth segment of the insect's body, which is there swelled out to an unusual size, are two fleshy protuberances, provided with hooks curving toward the head. Ascending to the upper part of its tunnel, the larvæ, by a contracting movement, props the swollen part of its body against the wall, and there fixes itself firmly with the help of its hooks. Squatted like a sweep common cicindela of this country is a little more than half an inch in length, about half as broad, of a dull-purplish color above, and a bright brassy-green beneath. Each wing-cover is marked by three irregular transverse whitish lines. It is frequently met with during summer on sunny roads and sandy banks. Another common species is the hairy-necked tiger-beetle, which, though smaller than the preceding, bears a strong general resemblance to it. Its neck, however, is covered, as is indicated by the name, with whitish hairs.

The purple tiger-beetle, so called from its bright metallic purple hue, is nearly the same size as the common cicindela, and is often found with it. It is one of the first to appear in the spring. Another beautiful species, sometimes found in open gardens, but more usually in partially shaded places, where it selects some projecting stone or log as a post of observation, is the six spotted tiger-beetle. It is of brilliant metallic green, with six tiny white spots on its wing covers.

Though their food consists mainly of insects, like themselves, inhabiting the water, and feeding upon water-plants of no great value, the water beetle, to which we next call attention, nevertheless merits to some little extent at least, the honor of being ranked among our insect friends.

breaks, the dysticus has, by its activity, and voracious habits, gained for itself the title of "the shark of the insect world."

The full-grown beetle and the wingless larvæ alike feed upon animal food, incessantly pursuing other water insects, small shell-fish, tadpoles, and young fish. Even frogs have fallen a prey to the perfect beetle. This is to be understood of the European species. Packard, our American authority, claims no more for our native species than that the GREAT EUROPEAN DIVING-BEETLE (Dytiscus marginalis) AND LARVÆ.

The water-beetles are divided into two principal families—the "diving beetle" (Dytiscidae), and the "whirligigs" (Gyrinidae).

As a type of the diving-beetles, we may instance the great diving-beetle (Dytiscus marginalis) of Europe. It, with its larvæ, is very correctly figured in our engraving, a study of which will enable any one to recognize our native species, of which at least two are common in all our ponds. Living in stagnant marshes, ditches, and the still parts of rivers and larvæ, with their scissor-like jaws, "snip off the tails of young tadpoles," and are "even known to attack young fishes, sucking their blood."

These insects make very amusing pets for the aquarium, where they frequently live for two or three years. They can be tamed so as to come readily to be fed with small earth-worms, house-flies, bits of raw meat, and the like. Care must be taken to cover the top of the aquarium with gauze, to prevent the perfect insect from flying away.

When full-grown, the great diving-beetle is of a deep greenish-brown above, with the under parts of a rather bright rust color. Each ring or segment of the abdomen is bordered with black, and the wing-covers are edged with yellow. Its egg shaped body, with sharp sides, permits it to cut through the water very easily, the hind legs serving as oars. Its wings are large, and it flies readily from one pond to another. little air-chamber, sufficient to last the beetle for some time.

The female lay their eggs in the water. From these are presently hatched the larvæ, ill-favored, hairy creatures, ravenous feeders, and growing rapidly. Their color is yellowish-gray, varied with brown. The head is large, rounded, with six eyes on each side, and furnished with sharp, sickle-shaped another. It has to come to the surface of the water to breathe. The breathing-holes are on the back of the abdomen, under the wing covers, and so protected that no water can enter them. When the insect wants fresh air, it rises to the surface, lifts up its wing covers, and then, lowering them suddenly, a quantity of air is gathered under them, as if in a jaws, fitted for both cutting and sucking. Two leaf-like appendages, used as oars, form a sort of tail. Near these are the breathing holes of the insect, which, when it wishes to inhale fresh air, hangs with its head downward and its tail on the top of the water. When about to enter the pupa state, the larvæ leave the water, and form cells in the mud or sand, where they fold themselves up like babes in swaddling clothes. In two or three weeks, if in summer, but not till the next spring, if in autumn, the pupa skin is thrown off, and the perfect insect emerges from the cell. By reference to the engraving, a pupa, folded up in its cell, will be seen in the lower left-hand corner, while on the right hand are two larvæ, one in the act of devouring another water insect. In the middle foreground is a perfect insect swimming, while above it is another taking its flight to some new feeding-place. Few persons have not noticed, especially on the surface of still and stagnant waters, flocks of little black beetles whirling and circling about with great rapidity in every direction. These are the whirligig beetles. When occupied in their insect dance, their motions, says Westwood, are so quick that the eye is perplexed in which it is generally observed, to see objects above it in the air, and below it in the water.

Besides the diving-beetles and whirligigs, there is yet another great family of beetles, termed "water-lovers" (Hydrophilidae). The members of this family live either in the water or on the damp margins and shores of streams and ponds. In the perfect state they feed upon decaying vegetable matter, but are carnivorous as larvæ. Many of these "water-lovers" are found with us. Some species attain a very large size, while others are quite small.

The brown water-lover (Hydrophilus piceus), represented in our illustration, is a common European species, met with in fresh waters. Though larger than most of our native water-lovers, it is similar to them in its general appearance and habits. It usually attains an inch in length, and is found on the leaves following them, and dazzled by the brilliancy of their wing-cases, which glitter like bits of polished silver. When disturbed, they dive beneath the surface, carrying with them, attached to the hinder portion of their bodies, a little bubble of air, which shines like a globule of quicksilver. Sometimes they may be taken flying, their large wings enabling them to change their abode without difficulty, when compelled to do so by the drying up of their native pool. Their food consists for the most part of small dead insects. When touched, they discharge from the pores of the body a milky fluid, of a very disagreeable odor. Unlike those of most insects, their eyes consist of two distinct pairs, one on the upper and the other on the lower surface of the head, thus enabling the insect, in the peculiar situation in of aquatic plants. In seizing it, care must be taken, as its breast is provided with a strong point, which pierces the skin. It draws in air by thrusting its feelers out of the water, and placing them against its body, the bubbles of air, caught in a sort of furrow, slip under the body and fasten upon the hairs in such a manner that the insect seems to be clad in pearls. It is thus the air reaches the breathing-holes. The female is sometimes seen clinging to aquatic plants, head downward, spinning her cocoon. This cocoon is terminated by a long pedicle, and in it she places her eggs, by means of two bristles at the extremity of the abdomen. Having dragged the cocoon after her for some time, she finally leaves it to itself in a still place. A fortnight later, there emerge from it little brown larvæ, which display great activity, climbing the stems of the water-plants. These live on plants, and on small molluscs, whose shells they break by pressing them against their backs. When attacked, they emit a black liquid, which clouds the water, and enables them to escape. At the end of two months the larvæ forsakes the water, and burrowing into the ground, enters the pupal stage of its existence, becoming a perfect insect a month later. By this time summer has ended, and our water-lover presently goes to sleep for the winter at the bottom of his native pond.

The carnivorous habits of the larvæ of the Lampyridæ, or fire-flies, entitle them to a place among our insect friends—snails, earth-worms, and even the larvæ of the plum curculio, and of certain wood-boring insects, are devoured by the young of some one or another member of the family.

In tropical countries, the fire-flies belong to two very different families of beetles—the Elateridæ and the Lampyridæ. Luminous examples of the former are rare with us, though we have myriads of the latter.

Of our native fire-flies, it seems unnecessary to give any description. Few of our readers, we imagine, have not watched their fitful flashings in the early summer nights. Both sexes of our fire-flies are winged, and both appear to be equally luminous. Their European representatives have the females destitute of wings. These latter are long, flat, soft wormlike creatures, exhibiting a pale steady glow of light, whence the trivial name of glow-worm. The winged males give but a faint light. In the Luciola, of Italy, however, the two sexes are winged, and equally brilliant. The larvæ of the glow-worm feed on small snails, hiding in the shell after they have devoured its owner.

The light of the glow-worm, as well as that of our fire-flies, is probably produced by the slow combustion of a peculiar secretion. It has been stated, says Figuiet, that it is evolved quickly when the insect contracts its muscles, either spontaneously or under the influence of artificial excitement. Chemical experiments have been made to ascertain the nature or composition of the peculiar secretion by which this strange effect is produced; but, as yet, it has only been discovered that the luminous action is more powerful in oxygen, and ceases in gases incapable of supporting combustion.

THE peculiarities of great men are like a suit of clothes, which hang not well on any but the man who was measured for them, not to say that the misfortune of imitators often lies in this: that, in copying the lisp, the bur, the shrug, the broad accent, the ungainly and ungraceful attitude, they forget that their idol is not great by these, but in spite of them.

THERE are words which are worth as much as the best actions, for they contain the germ of them all.

THE ARGONAUTA.

BY C.

THIS interesting and elegant shell is generally known by the name of Nautilus, but some authors have suggested the propriety of calling it the Argonauta. This was known and described with considerable accuracy by Aristotle, Pliny and other early writers on natural history, and that this name should be preserved, for the reason, that it was given with a classical allusion to the celebrated expedition of Jason in the ship Argo, to recover the golden fleece; in which all those who accompanied him were called Argonauts, and to whom the art of navigation is poetically described as having been pointed out, in the skilful management exhibited by the instinctive little sailor, inhabiting the Argonauta, while steering its frail bark through ocean's trackless paths. What peculiar organization enables it to rise to the surface, or sink into the depths of the ocean, cannot yet be satisfactorily explained, and Jason did not wish that knowledge, but the art of sailing.

"For thus to man the voice of Nature spake, Go, from the creature thy instruction take,
Learn from the little Nautilus to sail,
Spread the thin oar, and catch the driving gale."—Pope.

When the Nautilus has reached the surface of the water, it gradually assumes its sailing position, extending three appendages, which serve as so many oars, while in the centre of these, two spoon-shaped membranes are elevated, acting as sails, to catch the passing breeze; and thus this pretty boat is propelled and guided on its way through the azure main. On the approach of any sudden danger, or of tempestuous weather, the little mariner lowers its sails, and draws in its oars, retires into the hull of its vessel, again sinking to the bottom of the ocean, undimmed by the perils of the deep, a circumstance elegantly alluded to by Byron, when describing the dangerous vicissitudes of a sailor's life:

"The tender Nautilus, who steers his prow,
The sea-born sailor of this shell canoe;
The ocean Mab, the fairy of the sea,
Seems far less fragile, and, alas! more free!
He, when the lightning-wing'd tornadoes sweep
The surf, is safe, his post is in the deep,
And triumphs o'er the armadas of mankind,
Which shake the world, yet crumble in the wind."

This interesting little animal has perhaps furnished more matter of dispute, a greater diversity of opinion, and, in some instances, more ill-will among naturalists, than any other subject in the whole range of animated nature; and during a period of more than two thousand years, the question was not decided whether the animal invariably found in the Argonauta is the architect of that shell, or merely a pirate. The shell is divided into several cavities, by partitions.

DUNELLEN, NEW JERSEY.

THE past should be as a granary from which we are to take seeds to plant for new harvests.

THE THREE GREAT MONUMENTS OF PISA.

PISA has three remarkable buildings; they are all grouped together as if on exhibition, and moreover they are most favorably situated. Upon a grassy plateau on the north-western angle of Cathedral front, he might have included within the limits of his picture the whole of the Baptistery, instead of giving but a portion.

Although the most venerable and in some respects the most beautiful of the cities of Northern Italy, Pisa is a dull, uninteresting place. Neither its poputhe city boundary are to be found these three remarkable and superb examples of the earliest style of ecclesiastical structure; the Duomo or Cathedral, the Baptistery and the far famed Leaning Tower. So contiguous are these structures one to another that had our artist sacrificed his excellent aspect of the relation of fifty thousand nor its eighty or ninety churches incite it to the least activity.

But for these three remarkable monuments a sense of dulness would overtake the tourist. To see them is to be repaid for all the shortcomings of the city. They satisfy the most exacting sense, and few notable monuments so fill the measure of expectation as the Leaning Tower, which, until the eye is accustomed to the anomaly, always startles the beholder.

The first of these buildings was erected at a very early date in celebration of the victory won by the Pisans, who, assisted by the Normans, drove the Saracens out of Sicily, the issue being a naval engagement in the harbor of Palermo, which took place in the year 1063. Five years afterward the work of building this splendid edifice commenced, its final completion dating 1118.

The Duomo is built in the form of a Latin cross, with a nave, four aisles, transept and choir; its dimensions are large, the nave being three hundred and ten feet, the transept two hundred and thirty-seven feet long, the western front of the building measuring one hundred and sixteen feet across. To the summit of the dome it is one hundred and twelve feet, and this part of the structure is supported by no less than eighty-eight columns. From the roof of the nave is suspended by a long cord a massive bronze lamp, which the guides point out as the lamp whose swinging arrested the attention of the distinguished native of the city, Galileo, and suggested to him the theory of the pendulum. Further observations and experiments made upon the adjoining Leaning Tower developed the principles of gravitation, afterward given to the world by this great philosopher, the announcement of which brought upon him the persecution of the church.

In style, the Cathedral, although called by the Italians Gotico-Moresco, is not Byzantine, as is frequently supposed from the amount of color diffused on its exterior; color was, at that early period, often used as a substitute for sculptured decoration and colored marbles, or encaustic tiles and frescoes were freely used. The Duomo is much more beautiful externally than internally. Fastidious criticism has censured the introduction of such a meaningless abundance of columns and arches especially in the five orders of the façade, but the lightness, delicacy and beauty of their effect is indisputable, relieved by the bands of color on the walls behind them.

It is embellished with twelve altars ascribed to the hand of Michael Angelo, but this is mere conjecture. The roof of the nave and the building otherwise was seriously injured by fire in the sixteenth century, which also destroyed the famed brazen doors, one only being saved, which remains in the southern transept; judging from this one they must have been of the rudest and most primitive workmanship. Their places have been nobly substituted by the work of Giovanni di Bologna and others, and the bronze doors of these Italian artists are marvels of design and skilful execution; they were placed there in 1602.

Close by the Cathedral is its beautiful neighbor, the Baptistery, a magnificent building both externally and internally. It is a curious structure, completely circular, exactly one hundred feet in diameter, and towering to an altitude of one hundred and seventy-nine feet, surmounted by a compound dome of exquisite proportion, capped by a curious but appropriate statue of St. John. This Baptistery, also called the church of St. John, is attributed to one Diotisalvi, in the year 1162; it encloses an octagonal font of large proportions, and it also contains a celebrated work of that prince of carvers, Nicola Pisano, an exquisitely designed pulpit, a work of great interest and beauty, being universally considered a masterpiece.

Passing from the Baptistery and traversing the smooth platform upon which the Duomo stands, we approach the famous Leaning Tower, built as the attendant campanile or belfry of the Cathedral. It is the work of a celebrated and ingenious German architect, Wilhelm of Innsbruck, as early as 1150. It is built of the purest white marble in two concentric, thin, circular walls, between which winds the staircase; it rises in eight stories of very beautiful proportions, and is one hundred and eighty feet high.

Looking from its upper gallery extensive views of lovely landscapes stretch out before the eyes. A plumb-line dropped from the edge of its summit falls fifteen feet from the base; the perspective assists the delusion that the structure is on the point of falling. An evident change of design is observable above the third story, at which point the tower is fifty-two feet in diameter, whereas the succeeding stories diminish until the eighth is but forty feet; this was not added till the middle of the fourteenth century. This offers the strongest argument in support of the theory that a subsidence in the foundations took place after the completion of the third story, and the accident was converted into a graceful conceit by so building the tower that it would preserve its stability. The excessive inclination of the tower is no paradox, for it stands in obedience to the law of physics, by which any body of matter will maintain that position so long as a perpendicular line drawn through its centre of gravity shall fall within its base.

Other campaniles in Italy lean, especially a famous one in Bologna, but the true story of the Leaning Tower of Pisa has yet to be discovered.

Recent investigation opposes the supposition that its original design was to be an inclining structure, for all that portion of the Duomo contiguous to it has settled in every direction, showing how treacherous has been the foundation. Also, as before said, no peculiarity of its proportions is observable until above the third story, when, unlike other campaniles, the upper structure is much lighter and smaller, and the masonry is built in a spiral manner, as if to accommodate the weight on the side opposite to its inclination.

The world probably owes to its existence the discovery of the relation of the movement of the earth to the sun, afterward elaborated by Newton, for there is no doubt that the strange appearance of this tower impressed Galileo with those reflections which led to such grand deductions.

Still another remarkable curiosity stands within a few yards of the walls of the Duomo, the famous Campo Santo or burial-ground, the earth for which was transported by the Crusaders from the Holy Land, and of which for ages miraculous virtues were attributed to the saintly soil. It is but a small walled-in cemetery, but it is full of interest, and around its walls have been ranged a perfect museum of antiquities, Egyptian sarcophagi, tombs, frescoes, monuments and other antiquities. Within its walls the school of Giotto studied.

DO YOUR WORK WELL.

"ARE you going to let that pass?" said one workman to another, a shade of surprise in his voice.

"Why not?" was the answer. "It will never be seen."

"Would you buy the article, if you knew just how it was made?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because it might give out in a year, instead of lasting five years."

"And are you going to let the job pass, when you know that whoever buys it will be cheated?" said the fellow-workman.

"Oh, you're more nice than wise," returned the other, with a toss of his head. "You draw things too fine."

"Suppose Mr. Gray, down at the store, were to sell you stuff for pants that he knew would drop to pieces in less than six months! Wouldn't you call him a swindler?"

"Perhaps I would."

"Is there really any difference in the cases? Whoever buys this article that you are making, will be cheated out of his money. You'll not deny that. As much cheated as you would be if Gray sold you rotten cloth."

The journeyman shrugged his shoulders and arched his eyebrows.

"We must draw things fine," resumed the other, "if we would be fair and honest. Morality has no special bearing, but applies to all men's dealings with their fellow-men. To wrong another for gain to ourselves, is dishonest. Is not that so?"

"Yes, I suppose it is."

"You slight this job, that you may get it done in a shorter time than would be possible if you made it strong in every part. Thus, in order to get a dollar or two more than honest work will give, you let an article leave your hands that will prove a cheat to any man who buys it. I tell you, it isn't right! We must do as we would be done by in our work, as in everything else. There are not two codes of honesty—one for shopkeepers and one for workmen. Whoever wrongs his neighbor out of his money, cheats him."

The other journeyman turned away from his monitor, looked half offended and bent over his workbench. At first, he went on finishing his job; but after awhile, his fellow-workman saw him take out a defective piece of wood, and then remove another which had not been properly squared and jointed. Observing him still, he saw him detach a piece which had simply been driven into place, and which gave no real strength, and after selecting another, three or four inches longer, set it by mortice and tenon firmly into the article he was making.

All this was done at an expenditure of time not exceeding an hour and a half.

"There," said he, in a tone of satisfaction, speaking to his fellow-workman. "If that doesn't last forever, it will be no fault of mine."

"A good, honest job," remarked the other.

"As ever was made."

"And you feel better about it than you would have done had it left your hands to cheat the purchaser out of his money?"

"Yes, I do." The answer came frankly.

"How much more time has it cost you to do this work well?" was asked.

"Oh, not over an hour or two."

"And the thing is worth ten dollars more to the buyer. In other words, is a well-made article, as it should be, and will cheat nobody. Now you have done as you would be done by; have kept your conscience clear; have acted as a Christian man should."

"Oh, as to that, I don't profess to be a Christian," said the other. "I'm no hypocrite."

"A Christian profession is one thing, and a Christian life another," answered the fellow-workman. "All professors are not Christians. Religion is a thing of daily life, and unless it comes down into a man's work and business, isn't worth a copper. No amount of church-going, or praying, or singing, will save a man, if he isn't honest in his dealings. He must do as he would be done by—must begin just as you have begun, by refusing to wrong his neighbor, though tempted to do so that he may get an advantage for himself.

"A new kind of religion that," remarked the journeyman.

"As old as Christianity," said the other, "and the only kind that will save men. 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets.' He who said this, knew all about it. And I am very sure that if we begin to be just to our neighbor, to try in all things to do as we would be done by, our feet will have entered the way that leads heavenward—and though we may be a long way from that happy country, if we keep walking on we shall surely get there in the end."

IRREGULAR desires, and unreasonable undertakings, must expect to meet with disappointments. There is a proper time for all things, and nothing succeeds well but what is done in season. For there is no forcing Nature against her bias, or inverting the methods of Providence.

THE KING AND THE FRIAR.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"I AM afraid of death; but there are things worse than death; and if I die, I die."

Those were Luther's words. In them, it seems to me, you have the key-note of the man's whole life; for, when one can say such words, as he said them, not boastfully nor heedlessly, but with a calm, steadfast resolve to live them, he has said the whole. Nothing in life can very much disturb or appall the man who feels what Luther said; he may still fear death, but he can look that in the face and fear doing "a wrong thing" more.

Nobody has learned how to live bravely and honestly until he has reached that height. It is a serene one, whatever clouds and storms may gather below.

Luther's speeches had not shaken the world at this time. I am not sure but these are the first really great words of his—and he said many in the course of his life—which history records.

Indeed, there was in the world hardly a more insignificant individual than the young Friar of Erfurt when he made that speech. He was simply the son of the poor miner of Eisleben. Going about the streets in his cowl and brown frock, only noticeable among his lazy, good-natured companions for a grim life-and-death earnestness in all he said and did, which seemed to the jolly, easy-going monks quite unnecessary, to say the least, and which doubtless afforded them a good deal of amusement, and served as a favorite whetstone for their wits, when these were a little fuddled with beer and wassail.

Yet the germs of the Reformation, so far as Luther had to do with it, were in that speech of his, the circumstances giving the words their moral majesty. The plague had entered Erfurt; the rosy-faced, gossiping friars took to their heels; there was a general swarming of the fear-stricken inhabitants; they rushed to the country, to the hills—anywhere out of the infected region. Somebody urged Luther to take flight with the rest. Then the real nature of the silent, rugged young monk shone out all the brighter, for the death-cloud which had darkened around Erfurt; and he spoke those immortal words, and—stayed.

I love to dwell on them, finding so much of the true quality of the man there. He never seems grander to me than he did when he made that answer to those who urged him to flee from danger, though he was afterward the principal figure in some of the grandest historic dramas of which the world has been the stage, and he has had the centuries for his audience.

Whenever I see the tall, commanding figure, with the broad, rugged, large-boned, German face, I seem to hear still, ringing like a clarion from peak to peak of the ages, that answer of the young Friar of Erfurt: "I am afraid of death; but there are things worse than death; and if I die, I die."

Never were human words more tried in the fire. Luther had to live them; not only when the plague was at Erfurt, but all his life from the moment when he stepped forth from his professor's chair at Wittenberg, and, without any intention on his part, became the foremost man of his age—that age so crowded with illustrious names and figures of sovereigns and warriors, and he—"a beggarly monk, the son of the Saxon peasant at Eisleben!"

Every human life has, I suppose, pivotal days or moments—days that try our quality, when doing, or failing to do something we are better or worse thereafter. They are not, perhaps, the days which would strike the imagination most vividly, or those which a biographer would be likely to dwell on. Yet they are times over which the very angels may bend with breathless intentness, knowing they will not leave us as they found us.

In the life of Luther there are two days which stand out, great landmarks in his history. They are like mountains which lift themselves up from the plains of the years. We can never think of him without thinking of these two days, several years apart; the first, quiet and unruffled as any commonplace day, and yet, with an underlying significance, which gives it an almost awful solemnity to those who turn back and look at it; the other, full of splendid dramatic power, with its crowned sovereign and princes, and starred warriors and mailed knights, and the tall, solitary figure of that brown-frocked monk in the midst—the newly-crowned young Emperor of Germany, not so much the object of all men's gaze.

You know what these two days were—one was when Luther nailed his "Propositions" to the door of the parish church at Wittenberg; the other, when he stood before the Diet of the Empire, in the town-hall at Worms, and in the presence of the monarch and his ministers, refused to retract. Yet, I cannot help thinking both these days had been impossible without that other, long ago, when the people were flying from the plague-stricken town, and the young monk made his quiet answer, while they were urging him to leave.

If that had been the end, history would never have taken any notice of it; yet all that followed in the life of the great Reformer was in that speech.

And now let us go back a moment to one of these days—not the most vivid and picturesque; not the one which strikes most powerfully the historic imagination, yet the last grew naturally enough out of the first.

It is morning, the thirty-first of October, fifteen hundred and seventeen. One likes to turn back a moment and see what kind of world it is in which the sun has risen on this day, lying away back in the crowded centuries more than three hundred and fifty years ago.

What are they doing and thinking in this young century which is hardly out of its childhood yet, but which has some instinct at its heart of great things to come, and whose eyes look off with a new light and hope to the future—that future so full of seething and storm, and pulling down and breaking up of all creeds and traditions and forms of thought?

There it stands, the young century, with the first rays of the new dawn upon its forehead. Behind it lie the old centuries in their crypts. Feudalism and chivalry have had their day. A new world is coming. Yet the old order of things in church and state and human affairs seems to stand solid and massive still. There is no hint of change or shaking to the great ones of the earth—kings and princes and their counsellors. Yet in this peaceful October morning the tempest is gathering which is to shake the world.

It is now almost seventy years since Constantinople fell before the legions of Mahomet. Every school-boy knows how that event opened Greek letters to Southern Europe, and that the Middle Ages were over on the day that the Crescent mounted where the Cross had shone so long over the ancient city.

Great names there were on the thrones of Europe this last sunrise of October fifteen hundred and seventeen.

Only the year before the greatest of them all had been stricken from the list, for the crafty, ambitious, greedy Ferdinand had gone to his Spanish tomb.

A quarter of a century before, Columbus had given the monarch a new world, and for his reward been brought home in chains, and sent at last, broken-hearted, by coldness, suspicion and neglect, to his grave.

Ferdinand's young grandson, Charles the Fifth, whose years just measured the century's, had carried his German tastes and habits to his Spanish throne—the cold, silent, brooding boy, educated by William Croy in the Low Countries. Nobody suspected yet the strong, masterful nature, the passionate ambitions, which the hard lines and the heavy Burgundian jaw covered; the Spanish craftiness and cruelty and superstition at bottom, too. Yet that crowned boy was soon to be Emperor of Germany, Sovereign of the Low Countries, of Naples and the Indies.

His life-long rival, the handsome, chivalric, splendid Francis the First, had ascended the French throne less than three years before. He was Charles's senior by half a dozen years.

The magnificent young monarch was now at the height of his splendor and glory. A little later there were to be the dreadful reverses—the battle-field of Pavia and the gloomy prison-walls of Madrid.

Across the straits of Dover was another young king, too, about midway in his twenties—Henry the Eighth—in the flush of his pride and power discussing the classics with Erasmus, or philosophy with Thomas More, or affairs of state with his favorite and privy counsellor, Wolsey, whom his courtiers loved privately to sneer at as "that son of a butcher;"

bluff, and hearty, and debonnaire, fond of all rough English sports and ways, "loving the green woods, the hounds and the huntsman's horn;" but under all the blithe, hearty ways, the hard, dominant, merciless Tudor nature that time was to bring to light.

His young daughter, Mary, was a baby in her cradle, with her sad-faced, Spanish mother bending tenderly over it. To think of that little baby face at Greenwich and the crackling of the Smithfield fires thirty years later, and the same peaceful English skies over both!

Far away at Rome, this October day, the "Rome of Michael Angelo, of Raphael, of Perugino," Leo the Tenth wears the tiara. True son of the Medici, he inherits all their best qualities, their love of art, their exquisite tastes, their graces of manner, their charms of conversation. The great artists and scholars of the world form his court. Michael Angelo has just furnished the Pope with the design of St. Peter's. Leo is contriving ways and means to achieve that masterpiece of art.

This is the story of the great ones of the world on that morning we are looking at—of October thirty-first, fifteen hundred and seventeen.

For on that very morning the German monk, in his cowl and brown frock, goes up through the pleasant fields and wood-paths to the old parish church at Wittenberg. Look at the tall, broad-chested figure, at the resolute, grandly-moulded face. It is one of the foremost figures in the grouping of the first half of the fifteenth century. Standing in its own simple majesty among sovereigns, and warriors, and statesmen, that rugged, brown-froked monk, greater than them all.

A quiet gladness looks out of the brave, kindly eyes this morning. The man has made up his mind, done his duty, and left the rest to God. It never once enters his mind that he is going to do a grand deed, he only knows that he has, in the folds of his friar's gown, "ninety-five Propositions," every one wrought out of the travail of his soul, and condensing the perplexities, the struggles, the agonies of years.

Such words always hold some marrow in them. At any rate, Luther has made up his mind to try whether they will not strike home to the German heart and conscience. And he is going to nail his Propositions up to the door of the parish church at Wittenberg. He has decided they will find a larger audience there than he can reach by any other means.

Look at the man as he moves with his rapid, characteristic gait through the pleasant German landscape. Though it was three centuries and a half ago, it is the very world where you and I are living to-day. There was a soft October sunniness on the great distant hills of Saxony, and there were tender rustles of wind in the birches and oaks by the roadside, and low, happy voices of running brooks, and murmurous hums of insects, and sometimes the delicious richness of a robin's song breaking out suddenly from a thicket.

Then the brown-frocked monk would halt and listen, and a great gladness would come up into his face. We all know how fond he was of music; how passionately he loved all the beauty and variety of nature as she showed herself to him in the heart of that pleasant world of Saxony where he had lived all his life.

Nothing, we may be certain, escaped the monk's bright, observant eyes in that morning's walk to the church of Wittemberg—a walk whose echoes will reach far beyond our own time. He must have seen the soft gold of the daisies shining among the high pastures, and the crimson glow of the clover in the fields—those great broad, sea-like fields of Saxony—and marked how the light frosts had been at work on the rich grasses of the low meadows.

Sometimes, too, a cloud darkens over the face, sensitive as a woman's for all its rugged Teutonic moulding. He thinks of what is going on this fair October day in the pleasant Prussian towns, wherever Tetzel comes with his gilded chariot and his Papal Bull on the velvet cushion, and the processions of monks before him and the nuns behind, and the waving of banners along the streets, and the pealing of bells, and the slow German nature working itself up into a mad riot of holiday, and the cheap pardons scattered broadcast at the decorated altar. "God's pardons" they call them. What a fiery scorn flashes from those deep-set orbs, such as must have blazed out of the old prophets' eyes when they hurled their derision at the false gods of the people.

Luther's gaze seems actually to see the face of the devil leering and grinning amid all the glare and noise. You know he believed in a living personal devil, with all that strong, simple, impassioned soul of his.

So, Pope Leo has found a way at last to build St. Peter's.

The monk reaches the parish church at last. How peacefully the old building lies sleeping in the autumn sunshine!

He takes out his papers and seizes his hammer. It seems as though the world must stand still, holding its breath to listen, for it is one of its great historic moments; but there is no stir in the stillness, only the happy hum of brown insects in the grass, the whisper of winds, the throb of a butterfly's wing along the bright, golden air.

Stroke! stroke! stroke! goes the monk's hammer. You may be sure the stalwart arm struck the blows straight home. Luther was always so thoroughly in earnest in what he did—life being something very solemn and real to him.

You almost seem to hear the sound of that hammer reverberating down the ages. They are to shake thrones and kingdoms; to fill the generations with deadly strife and mighty wars; they are to kindle lurid lights of the stake all over the land; and, at last, after all the struggling and misery, they are to ring in the new day of God's light and peace and liberty.

So, the work is done. I fancy Luther standing still and surveying his "Propositions" on the ancient church-door, at Wittemberg. There must have been a quiet exultation in his eyes, yet I do not suppose that it once entered his mind that he had done a brave or noble deed.

The people, as they went by to business, to market, to pleasure, would pause and read curiously what was posted on the church-door.

If there was any truth or right—God's eternal right at bottom, he could trust the German heart and conscience to find it out.

So, the monk went his way quietly, steadfastly, as he had come.

He did not know that those strokes of his had rung in the hour of the Reformation. Yet he must have known that he had done a fearless, perhaps a dangerous thing, for the Propositions were aimed at Tetzel's Pardons. And behind that gilded car of his was the mightiest power of the earth.

Yet, I am certain that, consciously or unconsciously, there must have been that morning in Luther's soul the same feeling with which, long ago, he had answered when the plague was at Erfurt: "I am afraid of death; but there are things worse than death; and if I die, I die."

That other great day of Luther's life lies more than four years farther up in the century. It forms one of the world's grand historic dramas. It is familiar to every school-boy. It furnishes to writers and artists one of the most magnificent subjects of all time; yet, with all its splendor of movement and color, it ought always to be set against that other quiet day, with the gray haze haunting the soft German landscape, and the tall, rugged figure of the old monk going up through the autumn to the parish church. Only four years, and this day at Worms has blossomed out of that one at Wittemberg! This sudden fruition could not have been in any other age; but, in the moral, as in the physical world, when the soil is ripe, God's sun and dews do their work rapidly.

So, in these four years Luther's name had been sounded all over Europe. It had been heard in the secret councils of the cardinals and in the ante-chambers of palaces; and, what was better than this, it had become a sound of hope and courage to the toiling artisans in the swarming cities and the lonely peasants among the mountains; and now in this old German town of Worms, the eighteenth of April, fifteen hundred and twenty-one, the name of the miner's son is on every lip; men speak it with bated breath and in every key-note of human passions—in hate and fear, in doubt and perplexity, in defiance and tenderness.

And the old German city holds to-day the greatest assemblage of the world. The Diet of the Empire has convened in the ancient town-hall, at the summons of the newly-elected sovereign, and for the first time and the last, Charles the Fifth and the Friar of Erfurt stand face to face!

What a moment it is, when the monk is led up to the dais, through all the splendor of that vast crowd of starred warriors and mighty princes and gorgeously-arrayed cardinals, to the presence of the monarch of Spain, of Germany, of the Netherlands, the Low Countries and the Indies.

Such a young man as he was—that newly-elected emperor of Germany, his age just corresponding with the centuries, and he held Luther's life in his hand at that moment, and each man knew it as he looked at the other!

There he stands—the friar in his frock, with his calm, rugged, fearless face, and Charles gazes at him with those cold, calm eyes of his, and the heavy, resolute, Austrian mouth, on whose words rests the fate of nations.

Judging from his later conduct, Charles's secret impulse at that moment must have been to send Luther to the scaffold or the stake. Had he been in his own Spain or among his native Low Countries, he could hardly have hesitated, but he had just been elected emperor of the Germans, and in the safe-conduct which he had granted Luther, the national honor was involved, and the emperor shrank from outraging, on his accession, that old, Teutonic sense of honesty and good faith, which was ingrained in the German character.

Luther knew perfectly well—perhaps better than any one else did, that he was taking his life in his hand, on that day when he entered the German Diet, and stood in the presence of the greatest monarch of the world.

All through that strange, wonderful journey from Wittenberg to Worms, secret and open warnings had beset the monk that his life would certainly be the price of his temerity, that no good faith would be observed with a heretic; and the Council of Constance and the fate of John Huss had been solemnly held up before him, and Luther had answered in the old, steadfast tones of his youth at Erfurt: "If the emperor calls, it is God's call—I must go. If I am too weak to go in good health, I shall have myself carried thither sick. They will not have my blood, after which they thirst, unless it is God's will. Two things I cannot do—shrink from the call nor retract my opinions."

So here he was to-day, at the foot of the throne itself; the greatest Paladin of the Reformation met face to face with its greatest enemy; and in that high presence Luther stood calm and tranquil and told his story and avowed his faith, seeing all the time a greater Sovereign and a grander court, before which Charles the Fifth, and all the princes and pomp of that hour faded and dwindled into dimness and insignificance.

Then came the great moment in which all that vast assemblage held its breath as one man, and listened for Luther's reply when he was called on to retract his heresies. Oh, Friar of Erfurt—oh, teacher of Wittenberg, will your strong heart fail you now! for life or death, in all human probability, hangs upon your answer—he swift clang of the scaffold, or the slow, sharper agony of the stake.

The monk stands quite still—the soft, spring sunshine falls through the tall, high windows on the splendid canopy, on the steel-clad warriors and the crowned princes, and they hear the clear, solemn tones of the monk as he answers: "I will retract nothing unless convicted by the very passages of the Word of God which I have read."

Then, after a moment's pause, looking up with dauntless eyes into the face of that vast assemblage, up, too, into the face of the young monarch on whose word hung his life, he spoke those immortal words that will live as long as the old German tongue: "Here I take my stand; I cannot do otherwise; so help me God. Amen."

The sublime courage of the man struck a responsive chord in that vast crowd; even the cold, stern soul of the half-Burgundian, half-Spanish emperor was impressed by it, and bigot, tyrant, miser and glutton though he was, Charles the Fifth was never a coward. He knew a brave man, too. The heretic's courage extorted something like praise even from the sovereign of the Netherlands. In the face of that speech he could not sentence Luther to death, and the monk was allowed to go out unharmed from the presence of the sovereign; and the princes of the empire, the warriors and the priests watched the tall, rugged figure as it went tranquilly down through their midst.

We all know how it ended. A mighty storm of passions shook the assemblage. Spaniards and Italians were clamorous for the blood of the heretic. But the great German party stood firm. Even those who hated the man and believed his opinions deadly insisted that his safe-conduct must be respected, but Luther barely escaped with his life, the emperor placing him under the ban of the empire, and pronouncing his condemnation in the severest terms; and the Reformer was only saved by that long, friendly imprisonment at the Wartburg, where the good elector hid the monk securely from his foes.

Thirty-five years later when the great monarch, weary and worn with power and pomp, laid down his crown and sceptre, and, an old man, when others have only reached the prime of their vigor, buried himself in the lonely monastery of Yuste, Charles lamented, among the sins and follies of his youth, the great one of permitting Luther to go from his sight that day at Worms before he had passed sentence of death upon him.

From his Austrian father, much more from his Spanish mother, Charles had inherited his hardness and bigotry. As he grew older, as defeats and disappointments darkened about the marvellous prosperity of his youth, the native gloom of his temperament, the taint of insanity in his blood became more apparent in his conduct.

No doubt that lonely life at Yuste added a fresh tinge of gloom to the emperor's reminiscences and meditations.

Certain it is, that, not content with the dreadful record of his own persecutions and cruelties, he resolved to atone for a single instance of lenity in his youth by his intolerance to the followers of the man whose life he had spared.

Luther was beyond his power. Beloved and honored, the great Paladin of the Reformation had gone in peace to his grave. He was beyond the reach of Charles the Fifth; but the codicil of the monarch's will, in which he enjoined his son, Philip the Second, to follow up without mercy or favor every heretic in his dominions, shows a spirit of inhumanity and bigotry at which one can only shudder.

And the seed fell into ripe soil. The monarch went to his long rest in the dark chambers of the Escorial, and with axe and fagot Philip did his best to carry out his father's mandate; but it was too late; the hour had been struck long ago, when the monk fastened his "thesis" on the old church door at Wittenberg; and the real victory had been won when he went out from the monarch's presence, from the princes and warriors, and all the pride and pomp in the old town-hall of Worms.

MAKING A HOME IN EARLY TIMES.

A REMINISCENCE.

BY M. L. OSBOURNE.

DEAR, happy childhood! Are there any pictures more lovely than those scenes that we look back upon and see in our memory as gilded with the rising sun? How they contrast with the care-burdens of after years. They are our beautiful flowers through which is formed the golden fruit of life, and that must brave the storm as well as drink in the sunshine before it is perfected.

One of those pictures is before me now. Wisconsin was then a territory, and father was working a hired farm not far from the shores of Lake Michigan—working diligently, and spending for nothing except the bare necessities of life, that he might the sooner procure the means to go out and get a farm of his own; mother at her loom—though "looking well to the ways of her household"—was doing all in her power to help; while we, their children, danced in eager expectation of the good time coming. Every change brought to us new excitement, and the prospect of soon taking a long journey in a covered wagon was very cozy. Of course the older ones shared the toil of our parents, and possibly a shade of their care; but youth wears care lightly, and it is well that it is so, their very light-heartedness makes them cheery companions of those who are burdened for their sakes.

Two years of hard work on the hired farm, two years dick, clack, of the old loom, and they had made and saved enough to start; but with the grain to be drawn off to market, and many other things to do, we could not go before the winter set in.

When we left the farm, we had to move into an old deserted log cabin, so open and shaky that we could scarcely keep from freezing in very cold weather; it was wanting, too, in that luxury of cabin furniture—the old fireplace—and we had to cook and keep warm by the last days of a poor old stove that we got from a neighbor.

Sometime in January the last load of grain was marketed, and we were ready to move; father and my oldest brother had gone with the first load, and would shortly return for the family. Amos—who was then fourteen—was left to see to things at home.

One night while they were gone, the wind whirled into the north, and besides being cold enough in the morning to freeze us, it was blowing straight into the stove-pipe, which stuck out through the side of the house.

Amos tried to build a fire, but it only filled the house with smoke; mother got up to help him, but it was of no use, the wind was too strong, the draught went the wrong way, and the smoke would come out at the bottom.

"We'll take the pipe out of that," said mother, "and put it straight up; it isn't long enough to reach the roof, but there are places enough for the smoke to get out; if it sets the old thing afire, we sha'n't be much worse off, for we shall freeze here if we can't get a fire started."

They put up the pipe as mother said, and found that it operated better than they had expected; the fire burned excellently, and the smoke went out at the top where it pleased, but it did not set the house on fire.

The rest of us stayed in bed until the job was completed; then mother hung bed-quilts around the wall to keep out the wind, and then we were quite comfortable.

In a few days father and Herbert returned. There was a friend, an old neighbor of former times, living out nearly a hundred miles farther west; he had lately moved his family into a good new house, and the old one, though small, was snug and comfortable, and he gladly allowed us to occupy it until spring. This would give father a better chance to look around the country and select his farm.

It was not many days before the big "covered wagon" stood at the door; the bedding and other things were packed around to shelter us from the cold; a large kettle was set in front nearly filled with hot coals, so that we could warm our feet and hands when they got cold; two yoke of oxen were put before the wagon, and we were loaded in. Father drove the team and the boys drove the two cows. So we started, with all our household goods, our cattle and our dog, and all our family, save one—ah, Beasie!

Wasn't it too bad? Somebody else had found out the treasure that mother had in her "grown-up" daughter, and all at once discovered how very lonely was his own bachelor home with nobody to speak to but his old cat, and—well, the promise to love, cherish and protect was given, and Bessie went with her loving heart to brighten his home, and share his joys and sorrows, before we started westward to find ours.

We could not "camp out" according to the general fashion of the times, the weather was too cold for that, but we travelled with but little more expense. Mother had prepared plenty of food for the journey, and at the log-cabin hotels where we stayed over night got permission to use the kitchen fire and table, and made coffee and set us a warm supper and breakfast. It was like moving and keeping house at the same time. In that way comfort and economy were both considered; but I have often wondered where we could find such accommodating hostesses now.

Father would fill up the kettle with fresh coals in the morning, and through the day would occasionally get a chance to renew them at some farm-house along the road; everything was done that could be to keep us comfortable; and I have heard my mother say, years after, that she never travelled with so much comfort as at that time.

The roads were excellent all of the way, and on the evening of the fourth day we came to our journey's end. Father pointed out the house to us as we came in sight of his friend's place; we almost shouted we were so glad, for we were getting tired of travelling, and were quite as well pleased to stop as we were to start.

The family were looking for us, and gave us a warm welcome, and in a few days we were settled in the snug little cabin that was to be our home for the rest of the winter. Now we were nearly through moving. Our journey in the spring would be a short one. Now we could sit by the fire—for that cabin had a fireplace—and enjoy the comforts of home. That was a very small place to live in, but no home of my parents was ever small enough to shut out love and peace, nor ever large enough to admit family jars; so, kind reader, come in and rest with us by the blazing fire—it was a little wearisome.

IRISH LADIES.

HAPPENING to be in Queenstown, Ireland, one evening in July last, I was invited to attend a grand ball. I had been doing some of the interior districts of Ireland, and was so tired that at first I was rather inclined to excuse myself. But before deciding, I asked a question or two: "Is it a big thing?"

"Never saw anything so grand in town?"

"What class of women?"

"The first class; the very best from Queenstown, Cork—in fact, the most beautiful women in the world."

I knew how the common women of Ireland looked. I had seen hundreds of them about Killarney selling "mountain dew and goat's milk," and in fact for some time had seen almost nothing else. But I had seen the common class only—the servants, peddlers and peasants. I had not seen the aristocracy. I made up my mind to go. I thanked the gentleman, and began at once on my hair and clothes.

The number of ladies was about one hundred and fifty. Their dress was like that of American ladies on similar occasions, only a trifle more so—sleeves a little shorter, corsage a little lower. The ladies were remarkably self-possessed, quiet and graceful, and I think on the whole averaged prettier than I have ever seen for the number on such an occasion.

Some of our naval officers were present in their stunning uniforms, and were honored with marked attention and the sweetest smiles.

I have written all this rigmarole in order to say something about the physical development of those Irish ladies.

The Irish girls we have seen in America have full chests, large, fine arms, and are altogether plump and vital. When an American lady has shown me her arms—candle-dips, No. 8—and has asked, "How can I get such arms as Bridget's?" and I have said, "Work—work as she does, and you will have her arms," the lady has generally said, "Oh, that is not work, that comes from climate. I tell you if I had been brought up in Bridget's climate, I should have had her fine bust, but this terrible, dry American air takes all the juices out of us."

My curiosity was on tip-toe to see how Irish ladies, brought up in this moist, even climate, but without work, would look.

I have said there were one hundred and fifty ladies present. They were certainly very pretty and very prettily dressed, but now, taking the witness-stand, I testify that I have never in America seen one hundred and fifty young women together with arms so small and chests so flat and thin.

They belonged to the idle class, and all the world over women of the idle class have spindle arms and thin chests, unless they become merely fat, which, with their weak muscles, is a sad embarrassment.

Elegance, education, rank, aspiration, ambition, prayer—these will not produce a strong, full, muscular body. They are not the appointed means. Exercise, exercise! work, work! this produces strong muscles, full chests and physical beauty. Work is the appointed means.—Dio Lewis in To-Day.

A CELEBRATED beer painter in Brooklyn made a contract with a German to paint his house. When the bargain was closed, the German wanted the painter to take a glass of Rhine wine. "No," said the painter; "I am a Son of Temperance, and never drink any kind of intoxicating drinks." "I am right glad I gave you the contract," said the German, "for these temperance men always do their work well, and they behave like gentlemen."

CHAPTER X.

EUREKA!

FERGUS LAURIE was already established as a domestic friend at Mrs. Harvey's hearth. He seemed everybody's visitor as much as Milly's, and yet he would have been nobody's visitor but for her, for he was no special favorite with any one else there. But all the Harveys had a genuine tolerant respect for each other, and for each other's tastes and wishes, and once they found there was a substantial friendship between Fergus and Milly, they refrained from little criticisms, and opened their eyes fully to all that was really likeable in Mr. Laurie. And they each found something. Even Miss Brook and Mrs. Webber were obliged to own that he was remarkably industrious, energetic and quick. George could fully appreciate his enlargement of mind and aim. Christian acknowledged his wonderful will force, saying that "it was half the material for the finest character." And yet her feeling toward him was curiously touched with a pity, which she never seemed to bestow on him whom most of the others called "poor David Maxwell." Milly was not affronted when she noticed this—there was a mysterious dash of pity in her own admiration—as indeed there is in most feminine admiration, where the hero is mentally summed up as so much courage, so much fortitude, so much wisdom, and such a broken leg! Only Milly felt that Christian's pity was not a component part of any admiration, but stood quite alone.

It can easily be understood that the new firm had a hard battle to fight. Not with anything but its own circumstances. Fergus's old masters were quite kindly disposed, and actually bestowed two or three signal favors on the early days of "Laurie and Co." David was delighted, hailing these, not only as practical benefits, but as proofs that Fergus's ideal of mutual help and honor was already not unknown in business matters. But Fergus was not so pleased as might have been expected. He acknowledged these favors with cool reserve, putting down David's eager gratitude with a quiet remark that he knew what these people were, and what their kindness was worth. When one of these kindnesses was shown, when the firm was sticking in a transitory difficulty, he hinted it was done because the old firm considered it no rival at all, but a mere helpless protégé, who might be safely petted and patronized, but that they would soon see differently! When another was bestowed just after a brilliant little success, Fergus said triumphantly that everybody was the friend of those who could befriend themselves. His friend's cynicism a little disappointed David. But Fergus declared that it was not because he thought evil of human nature, he only knew it—that was all—and he liked it too, though he despised it, and it could be made very useful in its own way.

Still, as months and months passed on, the new business did not make way. It scarcely paid its current expenses, setting some of them—David's remuneration for instance—very low indeed.

David worked hard among his chemicals, striving after certain results which were the desiderata of the trade. Nobody knew much about that, because he was always at it, and never had to make it his excuse for declining or curtailing visits, because he never paid any, except to George and Christian, and somehow he had fallen into the habit of spending Sunday afternoon and evening with them, and accompanying them to church. That began when Christian's baby came, and George for awhile was without a companion. But everybody heard a great deal of the midnight oil which Fergus consumed over his ledgers and correspondence, because after he had spent an evening hour or two chatting with Mrs. Harvey and Milly, he would tell them that he had oceans of work to get through before he could go to bed. And as Milly combed out her tresses in her secret chamber, she would think of him bending over his dreary ciphers, and would smile with a happy womanly pride to think that he had doubtless felt he could go back to his toil refreshed after a little talk with—her! She could quite understand it, and she wondered how Miss Brooks could not do the same, but was so unfeeling as to say—

"He'd better work while there's daylight, and save his candles."

Still in spite of the immense amount of work that was really put into the young business, it did not prosper. Debts which should be paid immediately began to be delayed. David grew frightened, Fergus smiled serenely.

"It is always so," he said, "a great deal must be sunk out of sight before anything appears."

"But if there is not much to sink!" David suggested, and got no answer, except a dark cloud on his friend's face.

On a certain morning, Fergus averted paying a debt of six pounds—a small affair, truly, but due to a man who was somewhat pressing, and even menacing. The account was not rightly due, according to its terms of credit, till a week later, and Fergus curtly declined paying it till that date, saying that unless things were kept in their regular order, his books would get hopelessly confused. David acknowledged that the principle was right enough, but knew in this particular instance that it was the cash-box rather than the ledger which would be inconvenienced. In the afternoon, Fergus sent this very creditor an urgent order for another article from his workshop.

"We have done without this implement till this time," David said; "don't you think we might do without it a little longer, and pay his bill before we increase it?"

"No," said Fergus, shortly. "He will trust us the more, the better customers we make ourselves, because he will not want to offend us. And we are no cheats. We mean to pay everything."

"Of course, we mean so. But can we do it?" David asked, rather timidly. The cash in the affair being chiefly his own, he felt as if any shame that there was not more of it was his too!

"I should rather think so," Fergus answered, dryly. "You can scarcely have made this scheme worth less than it was when you came into it! It was worth your sinking your money in it then. It will surely be worth other people sinking more money in it now. I knew from the first that we could not really succeed without more capital. But it is easier to borrow for a tangible affair, with a local habitation and a name, than for a mere airy castle, as this was when I came to you. Why, at the very worst, we can but arrange to give our creditors an interest in our business corresponding to their claims! But we shall have a fine sale next week."

David said nothing more, but returned quietly to his chemicals. He spent twelve hours a day in his laboratory, and he wondered what else he could possibly do to help or spare the cash-box, whose "Debtor" and "Creditor" compartments were now alike empty. He remembered that he had an old school-mate, who had succeeded to his father's business of law-stationer. So next day David nibbled his luncheon sandwiches as he walked from Bow to Chancery Lane, and there presented himself to his old acquaintance, and asked if he had any copying to give out. Law copying was very plentiful in those un-lithographic days, and the friend had some—yes, as much as David liked. David could not take more than he could do in six hours a day, he had no more time to spare. The experienced friend computed that sixty folios was a good allotment for that time, and entrusted him with an enormous abstract which would occupy him six hours for six days. As David left him, the good-natured tradesman privately reflected—

"Maxwell can't be doing much good for himself to want this kind of work, at his age, and with his capabilities. Surely he must be either shiftless or thrifless."

But David himself went back to Bow, rejoicing that he should be able to keep his own and Phœbe's immediate necessities supplied without himself becoming a troublesome creditor to his own needy firm. He must just work eighteen hours for a little while; it would not be for long, he thought, cheerily. He had an humble-minded confidence in Fergus's talents, which was at least its own reward, since it gave him a bright belief in his sanguine prophecies. And besides, David had a private hope of his own, which he never mentioned to Fergus, lest delay or possible failure in its consummation should give more pain than the prospect could give pleasure. This was something which had been David's chemical aim and ambition even before he had left the Blenheim House surgery; in fact, ever since Fergus had accidentally enlightened him as to the extravagant cost at which a certain very imperfect result in color was obtained. David felt quite certain that a much better effect was to be had at a much lower rate, and had been diligently experimenting for this purpose. Over and over again he seemed almost to have solved the problem, and over and over again something—a very small something it seemed to him—had baffled him. David's utter humility gave him courage and patience. He thought that "accident" had put him on the right track, and that if only other people had happened to get there, they would have smoothed away all difficulties and got straight to the end directly; but that his "stupidity" must be content to take double the time and trouble that any one else would require to use. "If one is rather dunder-headed, the least one can do is to try the more," was his only reflection. At the same time, he had the prudence to remember that it was impossible to keep temper and judgment for such work for more than twelve hours a day, and that the mind would be all the clearer if free from fears of debt and disgrace. His copying might tire him a little; but not so much as the wonder where next week's housekeeping was to come from.

Phœbe looked glum when he spread out his pen ink and paper.

"I should think you needn't be such a slave in that 'boratory, sir, it isn't worth enough without other work," she said.

"If you were in the laboratory all day, Phœbe," David answered, playfully, "you would be like me, very glad of a change of occupation. This washes my mind. Minds want washing as well as bodies, I can tell you, and if they don't get it, one's thoughts are as dim as writing on a smeared slate."

Phœbe grunted. "I can't be up to you, sir," she said; "but yet I know you are gammoning me somehow. If it ain't beneath the likes o' you to do this here, it ain't beneath the likes o' me to get a half day's washing or charring, an' I'm sure I've more time to spare. And besides, sir, you'll excuse me a-speaking; for I know I've no right, being your servant, anyways; but you'll not be able to go on without your natural rest."

"I'm always in bed for nearly six hours," said David, "and don't you know the old saying, 'Six hours for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool?'"

"Ah, well," Phœbe retorted, "there's no knowing how many hours he slept that said that; or if not, I'll go bail he lived to grow wiser. I don't hold with slug-a-beds. Down at ten and up at six has always been my way whenever I could; but down at twelve and up at six won't do for any folks that ain't made o' bell-ropes and wash-leather; an' you ain't, Mr. David. You're not that strong. You've got a go in you, sir. You're like them animals that win races and drop dead at the end. You'll not be able to keep on at this rate."

"I don't wish it, Phœbe," said David, seriously. "I hope and believe everything will soon be quite different." And then he added in her own pithy style, "If you put your shoulder to the wheel when the cart is in a rut, the cart will carry you to your journey's end."

And so he had the last word.

But at last, one day, when things were looking very dark, so dark that Fergus Laurie sat glumly over his ledgers, and said that nothing prospered in this world but iniquity and money grubbing, David ventured to whisper that he thought they must really take heart and struggle on a little longer, for he fancied he was on the eve of a great discovery. But Fergus was altogether out of sorts. In fact, his private cash-book was actually claiming more money than his trade creditor column could supply. For of late his sensitive pride had been conscious that people were beginning to wonder how he was getting on, and he had even felt it like an insult when some of his friendlier customers had been particularly prompt in their payments. And he had tried to cast off the suspicion of struggle and poverty by directing Robins to be liberal in her housekeeping, and giving her leave to go again to the draper's, not with money in her hand, but to "open an account." There was still no considerate hesitancy on Robins's part. "He must know best about his own affairs," she decided within herself. "She had nothing to do but to obey. That was her place"—a dictum whose force she never felt when it had reference to her geniality or hospitality, or in fact to anything, except spending money on herself! This sense of private involvement superadded to outraged pride, acted on Fergus Laurie absolutely like a nervous disorder, when the patient will not attempt any ordinary method of cure, but will place faith in any preposterous quackery. It would have been really easier for him to imagine that relief might come to them wildly—from an unexpected legacy, or even the discovery of a treasure buried in the counting-house, than to hope for it in the success of David's persevering experiments.

"I think I shall have it to-night," David said, eagerly, "for I am sure I should have had it last night, but for a slip in the last combination."

"Ah, that's the way it'll always be," Fergus answered, bitterly. "It's the way it always has been since the old alchemists sought for gold."

"This will be as good as gold when we have it," said David, choosing to take up the words without their despairing meaning.

"Ah, if it was to be done, others would have done it long before," Fergus returned, shaking his head. "What do you say—get the effect twice as beautiful at one-third the cost? You need not think that it has not been often tried before by better chemists than you, with far finer laboratories. It is a discovery which would be a fortune. But I don't suppose it is to be made, or it would have been made already. It is just a sheer waste of ingredients, David, and we need every penny that we have—and a great many more—to even keep up the merest show of going on."

"Well, I'm just going to try to-night. And to show you how sure I feel, I shall ask you to wait here an hour or two. I believe you will hear some good news the sooner. Will you grudge waiting?"

"I should, if I hadn't plenty of work to employ me. As it is, I may as well write my letters here as at home."

This was all the answer David got. Fergus's want of faith in his success would have shaken his courage had it not been founded in the deepest humility.

"It is no wonder that he can't expect me to do such a thing as this where others have failed. Well, it will save him from disappointment if I do fail after all. And if so, I must do a little more copying, and put aside something toward the chemicals I have wasted."

Such was the content and quiet spirit which David carried to his labor. But there was something to be done before he set to work. Perhaps it was this something which the other experimenters had omitted.

He kneeled down and prayed. "O Father, I am all ignorance, but Thou art knowledge. Teach me, Father; I am seeking my daily bread, and if this is the way wherein I am to find it, help me. For Christ's sake. Amen."

He rose up. His spirit had been to God, and had spoken to Him. Do those who say that prayer is nothing, say also that it is nothing to speak even with a wise and good man? Many a man goes to bed, and his boon of pence is denied him if it be not good for him; but such counsel and encouragement is given him, that he goes out strong to earn for himself, and perhaps comes back to thank his benefactor, saying, "When you refused the paltry gift, you made my fortune; for you gave me a share of your free spirit instead." Oh, while friend speaks with friend, while ignorance takes counsel of wisdom, and sorrow of sympathy, let no man say that it is no good to speak with God! If the Lord Himself cannot hear and respond, it were best for us all to walk silent through a heartless universe.

An hour passed. Fergus sat scribbling his letters, absolutely forgetful why he was waiting there. Another hour passed; and then a quick step rattled half way down the laboratory stairs, and David's voice cried eagerly: "It is done, Fergus. We have succeeded!"

In less than a minute the two young men stood together bending over the perfected discovery, comparing the soft, lovely new tint with the old, dim, thickish hue which had hitherto been the nearest approach to it.

"What a difference!" said Fergus; "and do you mean to say this will also be cheaper?"

"For every shilling which that old horror cost, this loveliness will cost but fourpence," David answered, triumphantly. "God has given us a fortune in this secret, Fergus."

Half an hour later the two were pacing down the dark road, arm-in-arm, speaking in whispers like those of men who have a mutual knowledge of a hidden treasure.

"Plenty of work for Miss Harvey now!" said David, as they came in sight of the lamp-lit window of the Harvey's cottage. "This new discovery will come before the world first in her designs. Eh, how lovely it would have made some of those that have been carried out on the old principle!"

"Millicent Harvey has fancied we have not been very successful lately, I think," Fergus observed. "I believe her family mistrust us."

"Well, it is only likely they should be anxious," said David; "for, you see, we withdrew her from regular work for your old firm—got her to leave a certainty for a hope!"

"A fine certainty, truly!" Fergus answered. "They will see now that it was well worth her while."

"I know the old firm did not appreciate her," David went on, "or they would not have restricted her to the most ordinary class of designs, as you say they did. Didn't I always say so? But what did Mr. Smith think when he found she was capable of those illustrations to the Leech Gatherer?"

"He never knew she did them," said Fergus. "He offered only five guineas in the first instance, and I afterward got it raised to ten. But I should never have done that if I had not kept the artist a mystery. Why, most likely, if old Smith had known she was somebody who was drawing more than a hundred a year from the firm, he would have thought she ought to let him have those pictures for nothing, or next to it, as a kind of bonus."

"When will Miss Harvey have occasion to come over to our place again?" David asked.

"Not for a week," said Fergus.

"Then might it not be kind, considering all circumstances, if we just dropped her a hint that we have had a great success, something far better than a gift of a thousand pounds?" asked David.

"Well—yes," said Fergus. "It seems only right. And it might be wise in many ways. But it is rather awkward for us two fellows to go rushing in there at this hour. I dare say they are at supper."

"You can go—not stay a minute—and I'll wait for you," said David, releasing Fergus's arm.

Fergus did truly stay only a moment. For Milly herself opened the door, and he just spoke to her there, under the clematis.

"Miss Harvey, I just called to tell you that we have made a great hit. We are certain to prosper now. Nobody knows yet but you. You have a right to know. I shall never forget your confidence; and, now, good-night, Miss Millicent."

And Millicent turned back into the house and sang this thanksgiving in her heart:

"God, I thank Thee that Thou dost reward the diligent and the energetic; that Thou puttest the power to bless into hands that will bless. Prosper my friend still, let him find that the cup of success Thou givest him is not only full, but runneth over. And, oh, I thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou makes this strong, silent heart of his, which cannot confide everywhere, to find pleasure in confiding in me. Make me worthy of it, O God."

Ah, well is it for us that God is a loving Father, who takes our very prayers and thanksgivings rather for what we mean them to be than for what they are, just as parents smile on the trailing weeds that their ignorant little ones bring them for flowers!

Then Fergus rejoined David, and the two young men went on together to the cross-roads, where they parted.

"Our fortune's made," Fergus Laurie announced to his mother and Robina. "We've hit on a discovery that I would not sell for five thousand pounds. You see what a good thing it is to have the faculty of selecting fit instruments. I chose David, and told him what it would be a fine thing to discover, and he has discovered it."

"Couldn't you discover it yourself, without bringing any one else in it?" asked Mrs. Laurie, who wanted her share to be exactly all, and everybody else's nothing."

"It was not in my line," said Fergus, curtly.

"But David could never have discovered it, if you had not told him of the want, Fergus," said Robina, "could he, now?"

"No," Fergus replied, more conciliantly. "And now we must think what it will be right to do, under circumstances that are altering as ours are. We must take a larger house, and live in altogether different style. We shall have to keep two female servants, at least."

"I hope you'll mind what you are doing, Fergus," said his mother. "You might just make us comfortable in a small way, and let me always have a fire in my bedroom."

"Oh, he knows what he is about," observed Robina. "And other people know he does, too. Those Harveys would have had nothing to do with him, unless they were sure he would prosper."

"There isn't a truer-hearted woman in the world than Millicent Harvey," said Fergus, speaking stoutly from the depth of his better nature.

"When did you see her last?" asked his sister, harpily.

"I—I just called in at their house to-night," answered poor Fergus.

"Oh, yes, I see it all," said Robina, "I may have all the work of getting up your fine house, and then be turned out to make room for certain other people."

"Well, at any rate, you will have had a better living in the meantime than you could have got for yourself," replied Fergus, coolly.

"Oh, yes, I know that it is only by toleration that an inferior creature like me is allowed to occupy a place in the same world with Miss Millicent," sneered Robina.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," said her brother, thinking to himself that he must keep up his dignity, and yet conciliate her at the same time. It would be so awkward to quarrel just now. "I answer you according to your folly, but you are talking what you do not understand. What reason have you to think that Millicent Harvey or any other woman has any influence on me? As for your working in my interests, and then being turned off,—you are my sister, and you can surely trust my honor to give you provision befitting my position, and the duties you may fulfil toward me."

"I am sure I love you too well to be bitter about anything that would be good for you, Fergus," said Robina, with melting reproach.

"As soon as my income is at all settled," Fergus went on, "I will fix you a handsome salary as my housekeeper, and another sum for household expenses, and then if ever we want to part it would be with perfect satisfaction, and no sense of injury on either side."

"I'd rather trust you entirely, brother," said Robina. "I would rather just ask you for whatever was needed for the house, and just let you give me what you choose for myself. I can't bear anything to make us seem independent strangers, Fergus."

"Well, so be it then," said he, "I own I like living and working together in perfect confidence rather than on strict business footings."

And so their squabble ended, and Fergus went to bed, and pondered over the prices of drawing-room suites, while Robina and Mrs. Laurie lay awake half the night, discussing dresses, the old lady saying that she did not wish to go into any extravagance, but she thought she might have a new satin dress, and could not make up her mind whether its color should be sage-green or maroon, while Robina stated that she should not care for much better dresses than she had already, only she should like them always fresh, and at least as much spent on their making and trimming as on their material.

When David reached home, he found that the unconscious Phoebe had set up his candles as usual, and arranged his writing-table. He felt weary and excited, and little inclined for his self-imposed task of copying, but he put the disinclination aside with the reflection.

"What I've done so long already, I can surely do a little longer. Besides, I should like to finish the work I have undertaken. And there are plenty of claims coming in upon us, and nobody is the worse off for a little ready money! If I don't need it myself, I can give it away."

It was long past midnight ere he permitted himself to lay down his pen; and then in his evening prayer rose the meek thanksgiving:

"I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of Heaven and earth, that some things which Thou hidest from the wise and prudent Thou revealest unto babes, choosing the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, that no flesh should glory in Thy presence. Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in Thy sight."

CHAPTER XI.

TWO HOMES AND ONE HERO.

IT was presently clear to everybody that a great change had come to the young firm of "Laurie & Co." Samples of the beautiful new tint, fully displayed in one of Milly Harvey's most tasteful designs, were circulated among the trade, and orders came streaming in—only too fast to be executed. A neighboring firm, old established and wealthy, actually made advances which might have easily been converted into overtures of partnership; and David was inclined to listen, and to think it would be wise to accept. But Fergus Laurie would not hear of it, declaring that they could now get the use of plenty of money on terms that would not hamper their freedom of action. And Fergus seemed right; for he was certainly able to obtain large loans on comparatively small interest.

David was quite ready to understand that as far as the perfect adjustment of money matters was concerned, sudden success had been almost as perilous as failure. Fergus was the head of the firm, with all its privileges and responsibilities. Definite adjustment of finances was found to be simply impossible. And so, in the meantime, it was merely arranged that Fergus was to take what was required for all the varying expenses necessarily falling on the head of the firm, while David was to be guaranteed a minimum allowance, with such additions as the profits of each year would permit.

David had no difficulty in settling into a proper style of life, because that seemed to him the proper one, which gave him and those connected with him the most genuine comfort with the least toil and expense, and was so safe within even his moderate minimum, that every addition would be left a wide, free margin for those true luxuries of life—the pleasures and duties not absolutely demanded by our circumstances.

He took a tiny house within a few paces of George Harvey's abode. Its miniature chambers were easily furnished by the cumbrous old articles which he had rescued from the sale at Blenheim House. Even Christian's large organ of veneration could scarcely understand how he held the wrecks of his so wretched past as precious salvage. Christian was his great stronghold in the days of his furnishing. David would come to her for advice, and then she and George would return with him to his cottage, and consult and plan "on the spot." She chose his parlor carpet and his bed-room curtains; she took counsel with Phoebe as to the best "range" to be put up in the kitchen; she knew of wonderful dainty ways which made beauty economical, and economy beautiful. Hatty Webber bade her send the sheeting and house linen round to her house, saying, that the Webbers' own "white sewing" was done up for years to come, and that the little stepdaughter Ellen needed something to learn needlework upon.

The two sisters-in-law had one day been making some helpful call upon the busy, important Phoebe, and while they were there David happened to come in, and took them out to the little back grass-plot, to consider whether there should be a tiny flower-bed in the centre, or only along the sides. David himself inclined to the former, and so did Christian and Hatty, too, "only" the latter remarked "there was something in Millicent's idea, that it was a pity to have flowers where one could not gather them after a shower without crossing wet grass."

"Ah, so it is," said David; "we won't have one. And as for brightening my window view, I can easily put a flower-box on my sill instead."

Christian withheld her eyes from a glance, and so forgot to repress a sigh.

Phoebe watched the three from her kitchen window, and when the two visitors had gone, she herself went out to take "a look round."

David came back from the gate with a beaming face.

"They are the sort of friends to have, Phoebe," he said. "How different it makes things!"

"You're right there, Mr. David," the old servant replied, "only I could not help being a bit vexed that they're but outside the place after all. I'd have liked it well if it was the young lady that'll be missis someday that was givin' an eye and a word about her home that is to be."

David's bright face grew a little grave—not sad. "You are the most of mistress that this house is likely to have, Phoebe," he said.

"Ay, I suppose you'll be always movin' from one house to another, each finer than the last, Mr. David."

"I don't think that's my way, Phoebe," said David; and then he turned, and walked into the parlor.

Everybody supposed that Fergus Laurie would also select another dwelling in the same lane. There were vacant some much larger houses than either George Harvey's or David Maxwell's old-fashioned, Georgian houses, with a sort of ready-made order in their prim internal arrangements, and with one room, at least, quite fit for the reception of a limited number of guests. People who supposed that Fergus Laurie's original "nothing" meant, at least, only "not much," and whose imagination set Mrs. Laurie's pension at more than double what it really was, concluded that the Lauries, being ambitious people, might possibly venture to take one of these residences, not as a family luxury, but as a business propriety.

Judge of the universal astonishment when it oozed out that Fergus had taken the lease of a substantial old family mansion standing in its own grounds, the wall of which came up to the vicarage-palings!

"I don't suppose it is true," said Mrs. Webber, as she reported the rumor during a visit to her mother.

"Yes it is," Millicent observed, raising her head from her drawing, with a slight flush on her face. "At least, he told me he thought of taking that house."

She did not look up as she spoke, or she would have seen that her sister and Miss Brook involuntarily glanced at each other.

"Well, great fortunes are raised by such hits as he has made," said Hatty, "but that house will be a great responsibility."

"He'd better walk before the flies," remarked Miss Brook. "That house will take a fortune to furnish."

"He won't furnish completely at once," said Millicent. "But there is so much more satisfaction in having a home where one can hope to settle permanently than one from which one is sure to wish to remove."

"He'd need to keep twenty fires burning in that great mansion, or else he'll have a doctor's bill as part of his regular family expenses," Miss Brook went on practically.

"One's house is the thing that most directly gives one status, and all the expenses belonging to a good house are small compared with any other kind of expense," Milly pleaded. "Look at the Lewsons with their carriages and horses; and look at the Benhams with their shooting-box. And Fergus Laurie is really in as good a position as they are."

"Only that the one family is in the second and the other in the third generation of successful business people," observed Mrs. Harvey. "I remember old Mr. Lewson myself, and his hair was white before he thought of leaving the little house by the warehouse, where the managers live now. And he himself never kept more of an establishment than two female servants, a middle-aged woman and a girl. That is the way the wealth accumulated through which his descendants enjoy their luxuries."

"Well, I think he would have done wiser to spend it himself in a more liberal way of life," Milly argued. "If the present Lewsons were not able to drive everything before them by their sheer force of £ s. d., maybe they would be more sensible women and more gentlemanly men. When a sensible man gets money in his hands, he had better spend it wisely and rightly than let it accumulate for he knows not who."

"You're right so far, Milly," her mother answered. "A wise liberality would keep down many an unwieldy fortune, and do in a natural way what charities do in an unnatural one."

Miss Brook grunted. "It's very well to say 'Don't hoard money' when you have it in your hands, but you might safely add, 'Don't spend it before it is there,'" she said.

"I am sure that Fergus Laurie wishes for position and influence only to do good," said Milly, disregarding the old lady. "And we, who owe so much to him, should be the last to criticize him unfavorably. See how much more he gives for my work than the old firm did."

"But then your work is so much better than it used to be," Hatty interpolated.

"And he gives me better than money, too," Milly went on, enthusiastically. "The interest he takes in my work always quite inspirits me. It is so different to being left to plod on without a word, as I used to be. If you knew how he has made my daily work a daily pleasure, I think those who love me would only wish him God speed and all prosperity, instead of carping at him."

"I am sure we all wish him well most sincerely, Millicent," said her mother, soothingly. "You see, Miss Brook and I are elderly women, and, perhaps, don't know it quite well enough, and are a little dumbfounded to see such young people coming forward and taking the lead in life. I'm sure, when I'm reading George's books, I often keep thinking they are written by some of the wise old professors and poets, whose works I used to read in my young days. It is hard to realize they are by my own boy, whom I taught to read. But those old writers were other people's boys, in their time. If my dear mother could come back to earth, I believe she would think I was a great deal too young to be wearing caps, and I don't believe she would have any particular confidence in my housekeeping! It's the way with old people, Milly. They don't feel old in themselves, dear; and that makes them think that everybody younger must be babies. I am sure I wish Mr. Laurie well, and so do we all."

Milly allowed herself to be pacified. She felt her friends' doubts very keenly, for this ample reason, that they had sprung up in her own mind, the moment Fergus had confided his intention, and though his arguments had cut them clear down, their roots remained, and gave an uneasy shooting in her mind, which she did not understand herself.

The great house was taken, and a few of its many rooms made habitable. The Lauries brought no old furniture with them. Even Mrs. Laurie's own bed-chamber was all spick and span new. The moment the old lady saw her mahogany wardrobe and marble-topped washstand, she parted without a sigh from her spindle-legged chairs and shaky tables, and from all the past associated with them. Of the three Lauries, it was actually Fergus himself who found it hardest to make himself quite at home in apartments, whose fashion and freshness made them look like an upholsterer's show-room. He would really have liked to keep some of the old things. But his mother and sister declared positively that the old parlor-chairs would never do for rooms that were to be dining and drawing-rooms, and that they would be out of harmony with the necessary new bed-room replenishing. So they went. The same plea availed to sacrifice everything. There was an old cradle in which had slept, in life and death, a little baby boy Laurie, for whom Fergus had felt the strange passionate tenderness which wilful reserved children often pour out on helpless infants. Even in his self-contained intellectual manhood, Fergus would pause to smile upon and pat a child who had a look of little Jamie. It was a peculiarity of his nature that it would have been torture to him to acknowledge this clinging remembrance. The nearest words he could find, was to say coldly to his mother, pointing to the cot, "I suppose you would like to keep that?"

"What use is it?" she asked. "If you ever have children, you'll want to give them a better bed than that."

"It won't fetch anything. People would almost want you to pay them for taking it away, mother," said Fergus.

"Well, then, let it be chopped up for firewood. Anything better than lumber standing about useless and gathering dirt."

And so the first fire round which the Lauries sat in their new home at Acre Hall was built of the old cradle!

They were a family who never possessed many of those relics on which Fergus could secretly lay hold and stow away. What he could he did. They had an old framed print, and a black profile of somebody. These he thrust into his own portmanteau and carried off himself; the first he put up over his bed-room mantel; the second he hid in his private drawers, under his gloves and handkerchiefs. They had very few books, except what Fergus had bought himself, and these few were nothing very attractive, being controversial theology, old dictionaries, and antiquated ready-reckoners. But those also he conveyed to his own room, and arranged on a bracket that he caused to be put up there.

This room of his was the smallest and barest in the house. It did not even command the lawn with its two or three fine old trees, but looked out on a strip of yard, bounded so narrowly that one standing at the window could almost touch the wall. When Fergus showed David through his new abode, this was the last room to which he led him. And when David saw the coarse druggel, the cane-chairs, and the poor, blue-checked bed, he reproached himself bitterly for sundry fears as to his friend's luxurious and extravagant tastes, which had been rising during the earlier part of his survey.

"You see what my own tastes are," Fergus remarked, as if reading David's thoughts. "I do not care for anything more than this. If I were an independent man, this is how I should live. All the rest is forced upon me by my position. It is nothing more than my stock in trade—one of the weapons with which I must carry on our warfare."

"Well, prosperity is certainly a trial as well as adversity," David answered. "It seems really hard if one must thus invest one's first success, when one would rather use it in providing solidly for the future."

"It is," said Fergus. "My peculiar post in the firm, as its ostensible head, compels me, for the benefit of everybody, to take the lion's share of the profits this year; yet, I dare say, by Christmas your own balance at the bank will be larger than my private one."

David did not for an instant dream that, though Fergus told the truth when he said he had bought his lease, he did not tell the whole truth, namely, that he had paid for it with money raised by a mortgage upon it. David only knew that there was a great deal of business come into their firm. His place was in the laboratory, not the counting-house, and he knew too little of the practical part of the trade to be able to make any approximate estimate of the actual profit. In fact, David had not received a commercial education, and his simple faith in others exceeded his shrewdness. The accident which had put him in business connection with Fergus Laurie had so brightened and settled his life, that he never thought of stopping to gauge his exact rights. He often wondered what would have become of him if Fergus had not taken him into the firm, but he never thought what might have become of the firm, if he had not made his discovery!

There was also a sunny glamour bewitching his simplicity. He had not the least doubt that Acre Hall would one day be Millicent Harvey's home. Poor fellow, the only love-dream that his new prosperity brought him was, that he might very likely make more money than would pay his self-imposed debt to his cousins, and provide for Phœbe, and then he would leave it as a legacy to the children of Fergus and Milly, perhaps to some bright-eyed Milly, the picture of her mother, who, maybe, out of old family friendship, would adopt him as "Uncle David." There are many such shadowy relationships in the airy castles of loving, lonely hearts like David Maxwell's. But such a dream of the future was certainly not calculated to make him very exact in his present monetary transactions with Fergus.

Millicent Harvey had set up a certain figure in her own ideal temple of supreme energy, patience and self-sacrifice. It was a sufficiently grand and pure temple, the pity was that like the great heathen temples of antiquity and orientalism, the wrong name was on the altar! Perhaps, by some instinct similar to Christian's about love affairs, Millicent was aware of the neighborhood of a hero, and only made a mistake by looking for him in the library of Acre Lodge, rather than in the tiny parlor of David's cottage! Half the mistakes in life come in just at that point.

"Oh, giving the heart's love is often a "crooked place," and so is "getting on in life." And though God has promised that "He will go before us, and make our crooked places straight," He has not promised that we shall lose nothing in our stumble, nor that his guidance will avail if we do not follow.

"Milly has my mother's face," said Mrs. Harvey to Miss Brook one day; "but she is like her father, too. She has her will and keeps to it."

"Aye, she has so," responded Miss Brook. "May God bend her himself; for He upholds with one hand while He strikes with the other. If anything else breaks those strong wills, it breaks the soul's back with it."

The mother sighed.

CHAPTER XII.

RIISING AND FALLING.

AND then time passed by, and months grew into years. More than one of the Harveys secretly wondered when Fergus Laurie meant to take Millicent out of her own family, and make her the mistress of Acre Hall. They had reason for their wonder. For there was many a merry-making at the Hall, and never one to which she was not invited. She was at the dinner-party of the city magnates; she was at the lawn tea, when the subalterns of the establishment were entertained together; she and Fergus appeared on that pleasant, friendly footing which does not fear to discuss differences, or to barter witticisms. Apart, Fergus delighted to stand by her utterances on subjects which she might be fairly supposed to know better than he, and made it his highest praise of others to trace a likeness in them to "Miss Millicent."

"Laurie & Co." had certainly made their way in the world. Their name stood among the highest of their trade. And in social style and expenditure, Fergus, with his sudden ascent from "nothing," managed to hold his own with the best. People shook their heads at first, and thought "he was pulling the reins too hard," but as the reins did not seem to break, most of the heads left off shaking, and their owners concluded that the aspiring young merchant was right after all, and was justified by his success. And then he was naturally expected to head every subscription list, and to organize every local movement or gayety, and to exercise every species of hospitality. The man who goes into the way of temptation need not be surprised to find temptation there!

Fergus presently began to realize that he was standing on a mine. He had not over-estimated his success, but he had under-estimated its cost. The early profits, which should have been husbanded to meet the further demands for capital, were swallowed to satisfy his private creditors. Nor were the latter profits so much larger as had been expected, because, in spite of the immense increase of business, the firm still continued too short of cash to buy in the cheapest markets, or to work in the thriftiest way.

Then, one fatal day, Fergus found that he was the possessor of a fortune as bewitching and beguiling as a pot of fairy gold. It was credit.

He felt quite happy on the first evening after he had satisfied a creditor by a "bill." He found Milly taking tea with Robina at Acre Hall. And afterward, when they chanced to be alone together for a few minutes before the candles were lit, and the soft early moonlight came stealing down through the elm-tree, and Milly said gently, "How lovely!" he was very near saying to her, that all beauty, and all success, would be nothing to him without her. He had been much harassed of late, and she looked so kind and good and sensible that he thought it would be a comfort to tell her about it, and what a rest it was to be out of it for awhile. Only he somehow felt that Milly would be sure to say, however sympathisingly, that it was a pity he had taken so much expense upon himself, and would it not be better to refresh. And he felt he could not do that, and therefore he must not tell Milly of his troubles. He must keep that to himself, even if he told her that he loved her. He would like to share his sorrows, but not with any one who would be so prompt to remove them by unpleasant ways. Besides, it would be kinder to Molly not to tell her. Why should one's "wife" (Fergus's heart leaped as he thought the word) be tormented with one's business anxieties?

And while he sat in silent cogitation Robina returned with a servant and the candles, and began talking about a poor tradesman in the neighborhood, whose wife had given a large order at the draper's the day before he committed suicide through severe pecuniary distress.

"What a shock it must have given her!" Robina remarked. "People are beginning to blame her; but it is not likely that she knew anything about her husband's affairs. Sensible men do not talk to women about business."

"And show their sense by such a dreadful result as this!" exclaimed Milly. "I cannot understand a husband and wife standing on such a footing toward each other! If it is not the wife's fault, if she had been always attentive and sympathetic and obedient, I can scarcely see how she can forgive the sin her husband has committed against her."

"But it would often trouble a wife unnecessarily," Robina observed. "There are so many business bothers which eventually settle down without affecting private life in the least."

"I should like to be in all my husband's 'bothers,'" said Milly. "I almost think if he didn't tell me, I should still be able to find them out. Oh, how dreadful it would be to be a wife, quite unconscious of things that many other people must know; quite innocently thinking she has a right to money to which they know she has none! Better and happier to live on bread and water, and wear one's old clothes year after year."

"Everybody's not such a Spartan as you," Robina said, and so ended a conversation, not without its result, as nothing is in this world. For Fergus felt thankful that he had not "spoken" as yet, and resolved that he would not do it, until he was fairly clear of business difficulties, saying to himself that Milly was a noble woman, but rash and unbusinesslike, and apt to cut down where trimming would do. So that he must be content to wait for her, till he had settled his foundations too strongly to be overthrown by any of her brave, self-sacrificing impulses.

Poor Fergus! May we not pity him as we would a man who tried to build a pyramid from its apex? Is not a moral twist as deplorable as a mental aberration?

And time passed by, and bills were met by bills, and though a few city men smiled cynically at the name of Laurie & Co., still local society, and society at large, found it quite easy to believe that Fergus Laurie's success had grown into wealth.

He had not repaid a loan of a few hundreds which Mr. Webber had advanced to him in the early days of the firm. Why need he? He gave good interest. He always spoke as if he gave such a very good interest that it must be really a help to such a man as Mr. Webber, in comparatively so small a way of business. Nobody ever thought of asking what security Mr. Webber had, or if any. In fact, Mr. Webber would never have made so rash a loan to anybody but a struggling young man who he thought had talents and wanted help. And Mr. Webber would have asked for the return of his money, but for one of those influences, which have more weight with all of us than we know. Hatty had been rather vexed at his lending it, had prophesied hard things, and, cruellest of all, had finally comforted herself by the thought that its loss would not absolutely ruin them. Her husband had been glad when, with this conclusion, she let the matter drop, and he felt reluctant to bring it forward again. Whenever he thought of asking for it, he always fancied it might be a particularly inconvenient time, and as long as the interest came in regularly, surely Hatty must be convinced it was quite safe! These were poor arguments, and this was a weak course of action; but if you or I, dear reader, cannot recall similar conduct of our own, it is probably only because we do not "know ourselves."

Bills! bills! There was plenty of success still. Fergus was working in a system which made success more disastrous than failure is to other men, but he still looked for new successes, to retrieve the irretrievable.

There was one who often looked very grave in those years. That was David Maxwell. David had once imagined that he was to be some sort of partner but it was without any soreness that he discovered he was to be but a paid official. He turned his mistake into a blessing.

"A regular salary is the best income for anybody who is not very businesslike," he decided. "And though mine is too narrow to save much, I shall always be able to save all my bonuses."

For he always kept in mind those five unknown girls in Yarmouth, none of whom either died or married!

David still knew little or nothing of the finances of Laurie & Co. But he felt something was wrong. Year after year his bonuses were either infinitesimal or nothing. Year after year Fergus's private "necessary expenditure" increased. David would not have heeded the fact if he could have discovered a justifiable reason for it.

But it was something changed in Fergus himself which pained his old friend so sadly. David began to question what had been his former thoughts about his friend's spiritual state. He concluded that he would never have declared that Fergus was a decided Christian, but that he had seemed one of those "not far from the kingdom of Heaven." Now, a looser tone was creeping in. The Lauries were growing very slack in their church attendance, and Fergus was falling into that tone of thought which decides that because the "form" is not the "spirit," therefore the spirit is never in the form! Quite unaccountably to David, he had made some very unaccountable friends—worldly, light-living men, "who feared not God, neither regarded man," and though Fergus did not run immediately to their excess of riot, he tolerated and excused it in a way which made a strange discord with those former days, when he sat regularly in the old pew, and attended Mr. Devon's Bible-class, and talked over the sermon with David in their twilight walks.

Perhaps this declension was not spiritually so great as it appeared to David. When Fergus had been a poor clerk, living in a needy household, an outward form of religion had been a social distinction, indeed in one way, almost the only one then at his command. Apparently devout and regular habits had won him the confidence of his old masters, the friendship of the Harveys, the notice of the vicarage. Alas, alas, godliness is so profitable even for this world, that its mere simulation is worth something!

Do not let it be understood that Fergus had been a voluntary and cold-blooded hypocrite in those former days. No. He had only been self-willed and ambitious, ready without question to take the nearest path to a desired end. When he had been in a class of life to which only religion can bring much refinement of mind and habit, he had been attracted to religion. When he could get something of these without it, its charms were gone. He could visit plenty of well-appointed houses now, and talk to plenty of intellectual people, and so he could afford to drop the vicarage, and did so, with a graceless pointedness, which had its true origin in a little pang of remorse.

For he satisfied himself that he was "obliged" to do it. The vicar had looked very gravely upon some of the visitors he had met at Acre Hall, and the vicar had afterward preached a sermon, which Fergus took—rightly or wrongly—as preached at himself. These visitors were the very men who awakened the doubts even of the charitable David Maxwell. Now, they were holding "bills" of Fergus's, and were being very "accommodating," and he said to himself that he "must not" offend them. The vicar ought to stick to him in spite of his backslidings, and if he did not, then so much the worse for the vicar's care of souls! He quite forgot that he would not allow the vicar to keep to him, unless he also kept a smiling silence which would have made him partaker in his sins.

Fergus Laurie developed "tastes," and so did Robina. Acre Hall was soon not only handsomely, but singularly furnished, so that everybody remarked it and remembered it. Robina's dress was a model for a duchess. To be sure she talked too much about it, especially about its quality and its style. She could never wear any but the best of everything—the best was the most economical.

"Yes, that is quite true," Hatty Webber said one day, rather bluntly. "Only some people cannot afford it, and some people do not make their first-class things look or wear so well as other people's poorer ones."

Millicent always preferred to keep Robina and Hatty apart. It did not require much finesse to do so. Milly herself did not always like Robina. She could be very kind sometimes, and Milly's own liking gave her a kindly tolerance for Robina's fatuous and radically selfish adulation of her brother. But Robina, with all her aversion to women's taking interest in business, could make very uncomfortable remarks about Milly's designs, and often vaguely suggested that, of course, she would always like to stand her friend, and take her part with her brother, who was naturally much dazzled by the many designs now pressed upon him by artists of acknowledged standing. Milly could not help chafing a little at the certainty which Robina felt that her brother had benefited the whole world—except perhaps Robina's self—but had never received a single benefit from anybody. Besides, Robina's small selfishness came out stronger and stronger. She fancied herself sickly, and with the lack of self-restraint indicative of poor breeding, turned her guests into amateur nurses, and carried her own valetudinarian whineies athwart all others' comfort. Robina was always too ill to make engagements to visit any but grand, gay people. And it was she, with her nerves, and her "mucous membrane," who first broke off regular church attendance. How Milly noticed this, and laid it to all Fergus's after shortcomings in this particular!

Out of all the Harveys it was only Milly who ever went and came familiarly in Acre Hall. Hatty Webber and Miss Brook were never there at all. Mrs. Harvey called once or twice, and George and Christian went when they were formally invited. Fergus spoke very freely to Millicent about David Maxwell's family misfortunes, with tolerably broad suggestions of the shield and shelter that David had found in his friendship. But in all David's friendship with George and Christian, he was never so candid about other folks' business, or about his own where it mixed with other folks'. They never knew of the little capital he had brought to Fergus, and though they could not help knowing that his had been, as it were, the hand that made the prosperous discovery, even they did not know how little any other head had been concerned therein.

When Milly returned from her visits to Acre Hall, she never said much about its splendid furnishing or entertainment. One does not speak about things which one wishes to veil, even from one's own soul. She found plenty of excuses for the dozens of wine in the cellar, and the Turkey carpets, and the reckless expenditure on fly-hire; still she tried to forget them, to put them far into the background. What she did tell was of Fergus's liberal payments, and of his active interest in his work-people—the little filles he gave them, and the way in which he sent them to the seaside or elsewhere when they were sick. She liked to tell with what deference he treated his aged porter, and how kindly he took the old man's blunt speeches, submitting his own position to the authority of years and honesty. She called that true humility, and waved it above the stern hauteur of Fergus's general character, like a lady's glove over a fierce knight's casque.

"There's many can submit to their inferiors that won't to their superiors," was Miss Brook's grim comment. "He'd have turned round on Mr. Devon if he had spoken out to him. It's a kind of humility that pride is made of. It's like some women who obey their children instead of their husbands."

Once, Richard Webber accompanied his step-aunt Millicent on a call at Acre Hall. He came home to tea with her at Mrs. Harvey's and was overflowing with accounts of the luxurious grandeur of the place—the great mirrors, the stained glass, the rare flowers, the singular and individual taste that governed it all.

"Laurie's mark is figuratively on everything," he said. "Yes, and rather literally, too, for he has the most curious antique modelled dining-room chairs, with his own initials F. O. L. stamped in gold on each of their backs."

"That'll spoil their price when they are to be sold again," snarled Miss Brook. "He ought to have thought of that, seeing he's had experience of the sale of all his mother's furniture. Seems to me it's a pity that he hasn't another O in his monogram!"

"But, do you know he really has?" said young Webber. "I've never noticed before what it made the monogram, but I've heard Aunt Milly say that he was christened 'Oesian' after 'Fergus Ogilvie,' only he thought it bombastic in sound, and that it made an absurd number of initials."

"Ah, it's like him to cut and trim everything to bring it to his own will," Miss Brook answered. "Can't even let his godfathers and godmothers have their own way. No reverence for anybody's notions but his own. If my parents had called me Karen-happuch Mesopotamia, I'd have stuck to it."

"I do not think Mr. Laurie likes newness and change in his very heart," said Milly, who had just returned from taking off her walking gear. "The other day he found Robina and I sitting together in a room with all the blinds down, and he asked if we preferred darkness, and Robina said, 'No, but it was to keep the carpet from fading in the sunshine.' And he went and pulled up all the blinds, and said he should be glad to see the honest signs of time and use, instead of the unmeaning freshness of a furniture warehouse."

The incident was scarcely in logical sequence with the conversation in which Milly interjected it. But it was full of meaning to her. It was such touches as these which kept her womanly interest and pity fresh and green in all the glare and heat of Fergus's apparently triumphant prosperity. It revealed to her a nature which these did not satisfy, which sat at the feast of fat things, longing for some homely "water and pulse" that was not on the board.

It remains an open question whether Milly would have married Fergus, had he asked her in those days. She certainly would not have married any one else. All of her heart which was open to her own knowledge was filled by him. But Milly was one of those old-fashioned women who keep some chambers of the heart which another hand must open before they themselves will enter.

Had he asked her to be his wife—had he even broadly shown her that he had hopes beyond those of a near and dear friend, very likely Milly would have paused and owned to herself that even some of the fairest points in his character might be but treacherous peat mosses, unfit to bear the heavy tread of daily life and companionship.

It was not a happy state to be in. The wall between love and friendship is not a fit standpoint for any one. On either side are happiness and content, but betwixt, neither.

David Maxwell could not understand what it meant. Fergus and Milly were still friends. Milly's praise was still on Fergus's lips. Milly still confided in Fergus. How was it that so much did not grow into a little more?

Once upon a time, David might have ventured to suggest his thoughts to Fergus. But not now. As those wild, reckless, ungodly men had grown into familiarity, David had grown out.

And David almost asked himself, "Would it do Fergus good to marry Milly? Or would it do Milly harm to marry Fergus?"

And he thanked God that it was not in his hands, but thought that Milly was too good for anything to harm her.

Only he saw she was growing to look older than her years, and was generally grave and often weary.

A CURIOUS RELIC.—A child, while playing near Drogheda, Ireland, found a curious piece of metal, which she gave to an old woman, who took it to a dealer in old iron and got a shilling for it. The dealer in his turn sold it for two pounds ten shillings, and it has finally been purchased for the Royal Irish Academy in Dublin for three hundred pounds. It proved to be the celebrated "Tara brooch," one of the most remarkable pieces of goldsmith's work known to exist. It is formed of white bronze—this probably saved it from the melting-pot, to which countless treasures of gold and silver have been consigned—the surface overlaid with gold filigree-work of surprising intricacy and marvellous delicacy of execution. Such is its excellence that one of the most accomplished living goldsmiths declared that he could not find a workman, with every apparent advantage of modern knowledge and appliance, competent to make such another.

REPUTATION, honor and preferment are gained, retained and maintained by humility, discretion and sincerity, with which, till a man be accommodated and accomplished, he is not esteemed as a worthy member in a commonwealth.

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

EFFECT OF LIQUOR-DRINKING, AND "VESTED RIGHT" OF LIQUOR-SELLERS.

THE last number of the Half-Yearly Abstract of the Medical Sciences, published in this city, contains an excellent article from a French physician, "On the Dangers to which the Abuse of Alcoholic Drink may give rise." The writer, Dr. Jules Bergeron, goes over the whole ground in an able and exhaustive manner. He makes twenty-six different points, some of which are subdivided. It is not necessary to go over the whole of his arguments, but I will try to give the substance of them briefly.

He makes the statement that, even admitting that the use of alcoholic drinks may have a certain utility, still, "however moderate it may be, it is not without danger, for it is not necessary to arrive at the abuse of fermented drinks in order to find that under the influence of the alcohol which all contain, the brain undergoes a certain degree of excitation, which gives to the mind more vivacity and a disposition to regard things on their best side. It is not surprising that an individual, when once he has felt this sensation, should seek to renew it. But here is precisely the peril; for, this slight cerebral excitation, however harmless it may be in itself, is, after all, but the first degree of drunkenness, and when this has been exceeded, the individual, carried along an insensible declivity, passes speedily from occasional excess to habits of drunkenness, to fall rapidly into all the physical and moral miseries which are engendered by habitual indulgence, and there he is lost."

The writer sums up the evil effects which even the moderate use of alcohol, in any of its forms, produces upon stomach, brain, liver, lungs, heart and kidneys, demonstrating undeniably that it results in diseases, and complications of diseases of these organs.

He gives, in the following manner, the diagnosis of drunkenness: "Alcohol, when brought into contact with the central structure by the small blood-vessels, excites the functions of the brain, and this excitation, the degree of which bears a relation to the proportion of alcohol absorbed, manifests itself in passing through all the stages of drunkenness, at first by a joyous condition, which is nearly always one of good temper, to which soon succeeds incipient babbling, with a morbid tendency to move in the same circle of ideas; the gait, which at first was very alert, and the pace of which seemed to defy all fatigue, then becomes less steady, the state of gayety is then followed by a certain degree of irritability, which almost always accompanies an irresistible disturbance of the head. From this moment the aspect of the scene is completely changed; there is not only excitation, but a perversion of ideas, a veritable delirium more or less quarrelsome, more or less violent, which sometimes verges on incoherent verbiage, and a condition of extreme agitation, and at others degenerates into a crisis of blind fury, in which the individual becomes capable of any crime, the horrible eventualities of which he usually avoids, because, exhausted by the very excess of the excitation to which he is a prey, he falls into a state of prostration and becomes an inert mass—a man dead drunk."

Not only, the writer says, does the use of alcoholic drinks engender many maladies, "but, before it has produced all these material disorders and disturbances of health, it has already had the effect of rendering the consumers of these drinks more accessible to the action of causes which give rise to casual affections, of aggravating these affections, and of compromising in a most serious manner the cicatrization of wounds, and the successful results of operations which may have been performed on drinkers."

"Epidemic diseases," he goes on to say, "such as variola, typhoid fever, dysentery, and cholera, rage by preference amongst drunkards. * * * In drunkards all acute maladies have a remarkable tendency to become complicated by delirium, which is always agitated, often very furious, and which, by its violence, places the patient in danger of death, and in all cases renders recovery more difficult, and convalescence more prolonged."

"Inveterate alcoholic poisoning has consequences which are still more formidable—a small wound, without danger in a sober and healthy man, often in a drinker becomes the starting point of terrible symptoms which art is powerless to remove. * * The antecedent bad state of the principal organs, as the liver, kidneys and lungs, is still more aggravated, and favors the development of internal complications. The reparation of the mischief caused by the wound requires pure blood and the regular concurrence of all the nutritive functions; with altered blood, and a profound disturbance of the functions, cicatrization is rendered difficult or impossible. * * The sores take on a bad appearance, they become painful and inflamed, and are covered by putrified debris or pus of a bad kind. Phlegmon, erysipelas and gangrene may manifest themselves, and the already altered blood takes up terrible poisons, which soon complete the work of destruction."

"Finally, not only does the drinker ruin his health, but he also compromises in advance that of his descendants. In many scrofulous and phthisical patients the malady which affects them has for its original cause alcoholic excesses on the part of the parents."

Though this physician seems hardly prepared to recommend total abstinence, the most zealous advocate of that doctrine could not wish for stronger arguments than those here made use of; for, bear in mind, all these dreadful evils result not from excessive drunkenness alone, but from moderate drinking also, which moderate drinking he admits is almost sure to "pass speedily," "along an insensible delivry" to immoderate drinking. He admits that "the immense majority of cases of acute or chronic alcoholism is due to the unhappy custom which at the present day has so many followers in all classes, and which consists in using, either in the morning or before the evening meal, wine, or pure alcoholic drinks, as eau-de-vie or liquors. It is to this pernicious custom, and to its rapid progress during the past twenty years, that one must attribute, in part, the physical and moral debasement from the sad effects of which France so seriously suffers.

In the same number of this Half-Yearly Abstract there is another article from the Lancet—"a contribution to the morbid anatomy of alcoholism, founded upon a comparison of post-mortem appearances between persons trading in liquor and persons occupied independently of it." This paper is by Dr. Dickenson, an English physician of high repute, and the grounds he takes in his general conclusions for the facts before him are identical with those of the French physician whom we have quoted at such length.

These are promising signs of the times, but still more promising is the attitude taken by the great organ of conservatism in every form—the London Times. That paper discusses the question of "vested rights" in the following able and radical manner:

"Publicans' Profits represent mis-spent money. This is the great fact to be recognized on both sides. What proportion of these gains might survive under regulations preventing anything like excess we need not inquire. Enough, we may be quite sure, would perish to produce all the depreciation now predicted. The liquor trade would cease to be the only trade flourishing in the most impoverished district; gin-shops would no longer be the only good houses in the most squalid of streets. The amount of money spent in drink when no more drink was bought than was good for the buyer, would not, it may safely be assumed, keep one publican out of three. The publicans desire to keep all their trade, instead of a third of it, from which it follows that two shillings out of every three of their customers' money must be thrown away for their sake. Do they really believe that such claims can be permanently sustained? They have everything against them except the vicious propensities of nature. The efforts of every teacher and preacher are directed toward keeping people away from the public-house. The fixed purpose of every minister of the gospel, every active philanthropist, and every workingman's friend, is to reduce the profits of the liquor traffic, to depreciate the property invested in it, and, generally, to produce the identical consequences predicted from Mr. Bruce's bill. The views entertained are not expressed in these words, but that is their true purport.

There is a standing conspiracy of all the friends of popular progress against the prodigious and productive investments now declared to be in peril. The advocates of the permissive act are only the advanced class of the main body, intolerant and occasionally irrational, as most zealots are, but still on a course recognized as substantially right. This is the fact overlooked by the trade. If pauperism is to be diminished, thrift encouraged, and crime depressed, half the profits of the liquor traffic, to say the least, must go. The prospect cannot be agreeable to those engaged in the business, but there is no use in blinking it. To put the case in half a dozen words, the profits in which the liquor-sellers now claim a vested interest are realized to a vast extent at the cost of popular degradation, vice and misery; and the question is simply whether the legislature of a country is not justified in placing, with due consideration, the welfare of a people above the gains of a trade."

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPESSWAY POTTS.

No. VII.

I FIND this recipe for washing-fluid in a very reliable journal. I have never tried it, but know the ingredients to be good for the purpose recommended.

Five pounds of sal-soda, one pound of borax, half a pound of unslaked lime, four ounces of salts of tartar, and three ounces of liquid ammonia. Dissolve the soda and borax in one gallon of boiling water, to which is added, when cooled, the ammonia and salts of tartar. Put the lime into a kettle, pour over it one gallon of boiling water, boil three minutes and let it settle thoroughly, then pour off the clear liquid. Mix both gallons which have been prepared, and add to them eight gallons of pure, soft water. Keep well-corked. When the clothes are soaked, the night previous to washing-day, use six spoonfuls of this mixture to a tub filled with clothes. To make a soap of this compound, take three quarts of the mixture, alice with it nine pounds of yellow bar soap, turn it into nine gallons of boiling water, to which add six pounds of sal-soda. Boil it for ten minutes, and when cool you will have a soft soap that will soften any water, cleanse all clothes, wash calicoes and flannels without disturbing their color or shrinking, and which is unequalled for scrubbing floors and woodenware. Its cost is slight—its value great. In using these recipes these clothes do not require as much boiling as is usually given. Time and labor are both saved. I would suggest if the liquid be used, that only a two-gallon jugful be made at one time, or, better make the soap entire.

We had a kind of a little Baptist party night before last at Brother Jenkins's. His strawberries are very fine this year—they have more than they will need for jelly, jam and canning, and I guess that is one reason he invited all the old members of the church to come in and spend the evening.

Sister Jenkins had set a long table in their dining-room—a bloom with flowers and sparkling with glass-ware—the windows were taken out and her hanging-baskets hung in them, and everything was just as pretty as it could be. We had cake and fruits and tea, but the strawberries crowned all. Sister Jenkins excels in making strawberry short-cake.

When we sat down to supper I took my seat beside father. I had to poke a little fun at him, and I said: "maybe the deacon'll need some friendly body to pound him a-tween the shoulders."

That set Mis' Dougherty to laughing—she that was Philinda Sneeks—and she kept it up until time to ask the blessing, and as soon as Brother Jenkins was through, she commenced again. Philinda always was an inveterate giggler. Now I don't mind a good, hearty, ringing, musical ha, ha! but these little, weak, dribbling cac-cac-cac's are positively painful and suggestive of hysteria.

Brother Mitchell, the Methodist minister, has a laugh full of mesmerism and music—the most contagious laugh I ever heard. When he was here the other day his laugh rang out like a bugle song among the mountain tops—we heard it sway to the kitchen. I looked around and saw father shaking all over as he sat reading the Baptist Banner. I said, "What's the matter, papa?" fearing some ungodly son of Adam had said something wicked in the paper.

"Do hear Brother Mitchell laugh!" said he. "I have to laugh every time he does; I can't help it; it catches right hold of me and tickles me so; it does him so much good to laugh."

After tea was over we had a word of exhortation from Brother Jenkins, and then we separated and went home. While father was hitching up Humbug, I took Sister Jenkins to one side and asked her how she made such delicious strawberry short-cake. I frequently meet with women who say: "I've often heard of such cake, but I never made any." Bless your hearts, you ought to know! You should treat your family to it often in the short season of strawberries. I give Sister Jenkins's recipe to such women with pleasure.

Into three pints of flour, mix well two heaping teaspoonfuls of pure cream of tartar, half a tea-cup of butter, a little salt, and one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a pint of sweet milk or water. Mix quickly and thoroughly, roll to an inch in thickness, and put it into round pie pans, in an oven hot enough to begin to bake it immediately. Or, if you can afford it, leave out the cream of tartar, and use sour cream instead of milk. Be very careful and use only saleratus enough to correct the acidity of the cream. Take a quart of strawberries, sprinkle them well with fine white sugar, mash them and let them stand two or three hours before using them. Split the short-cake twice, butter well, and spread the berries over, adding more sugar. Then place it together again, press down and cover with a white towel. Cut as you would a pie. If your berries are very fine and ripe, you need not mash them. Some people pour sweetened cream over.

For strawberry dumpling: make crust as for short-cake, roll half an inch thick, put about a gill of berries in each dumpling, boil, bake or steam half an hour.

For strawberry jam: for every pound of fruit take three-quarters of a pound of sugar. Mash the berries in a preserving kettle, and have the sugar thoroughly mixed with them. Boil from twenty minutes to half an hour, stirring constantly.

For jelly: take strawberries when fully ripe, strain, and to each pint of juice add a pound of the best refined sugar. Boil steadily, skimming when necessary, for ten or fifteen minutes, or until it will jelly, which may be known by dropping some in a little cold water; if done, it will fall to the bottom in a mass.

I never set jellies away until they have stood three or four days close to the up-stairs windows, in the air and sunshine. Last summer, while finishing our jellies, I was troubled by ants getting among the bowls and glasses. I didn't know what to do to prevent it, but after thinking right hard for a few minutes I hit on a plan that circumvented them.

The jellies stood on a low table; we lifted it and placed the legs in four old saucers, which I filled full of water. Such a nonplussed set of ants I never saw; they ran to the right and the left, they reared up on their hind legs, they made faces, and if ants ever do swear they did most vehemently. Many years ago the ants got into our milk-room, and I managed to keep them out of the cream-jar by placing it in a pan of water. This is only a last resort, however.

To make strawberry preserves: select the nicest berries, weigh them and spread on platters. For each pound of fruit allow a pound of powdered white sugar. Sprinkle half this amount over the berries, and let them stand several hours in a cool place to harden and form liquor. Put them in a porcelain-lined kettle, and by degrees strew on the rest of the sugar. Boil them slowly fifteen minutes, skimming thoroughly; then take them from the syrup and spread again on platters to cool and harden into shape. Then put them into wide-mouthed glass jars, pour the syrup on hot and seal up.

The girls have just finished making a beautiful rug. Now everybody can't plan a pretty rug. A lady whose eye is skilled in harmonizing colors, showed them how to do it, and make the different shades contrast beautifully. She put a coarse piece of coffee-sack in a frame like a little quilt, and drew the strips through with a rug-hook. For fear you cannot make the colors harmonize, I will tell you how Helen did. She commenced at the edge and worked a round or two in black, then two rounds of dark purple—a stripe out of an old balmoral skirt—then two rounds of wine-colored merino, very pretty beside the purple, then two rounds of bright scarlet, then one row of green, then one of plaid—green and brown—then two rows of gray, then one of bright blue, then all the rest of it, the entire centre, in plain gray. It is very pretty. If any woman who reads this don't understand how this substantial kind of rugs are made, let her ask some one in town, who will be glad to show her. A rug-hook costs only fifteen cents. Leave the centre of the rug plain; don't be tempted to work anything in it, if you do it will look coarse and overdone, and will be in bad taste.

Lily comes and peeps over my shoulder and says: "I have often wondered, Pipesey, what was the reason you didn't talk more about boys. I never saw a woman who loved boys as devoutly as you do, and yet you never talk special boy-talk."

I reply: "Oh, I talk to the mothers and sisters, and reach the little dears that way."

Yes, I do love little boys, and like to hear them talk and plan and tell good stories. I would hide behind a stone fence, and sit and chatter with the cold an hour, to hear two little fellows on the other side discussing dogs and pigs and horses. Would you believe it? I've done this dozens of times—hidden myself to hear enthusiastic little lads talk when they thought no one was near, and I never yet heard the little dears use a very bad word. Sometimes they would say: "Ding it all!" or, "Drat it!" but nothing worse.

Yes, I did hear one little nugget say, when the nut he was trying to crack got away from him: "Oh, that's a devil of a nut!" but I'll warrant his father would have said the same thing—maybe worse. I think it is funny to steal up where children are sitting and drop a pebble down among them and hear their "wonderment and guesses" and see them stare up at the clouds with big eyes full of astonishment. I remember when I was a little girl and my brother sat on the other side of the wood-pile alone, singing and fixing his top, that I stole up, with no evil intentions, and dropped a big chip over. It fell on his head and his cry brought my mother, armed and equipped, ready to fight the baby's battles.

A few years ago I very much enjoyed the visit of my sister who came from her far-away prairie home with her three-years-old boy-baby. The child had never seen big trees, or fruit trees bearing abundantly, or hills, or rocks, and his amazement was a luxury to us. They came on the night express and ate their supper out on the porch that opens into the orchard. The ripe fruit fell to the ground every minute. Every apple that would drop, Otto would catch his breath and straighten up and make eyes and mouth like three O's.

His ecstasy was without bounds when we took him into the heart of the old oak woods. His sweet, hale, olive-tinted face was glorified. It was better to me than any poem. One little incident happened while he was here that I shall laugh over as long as I live.

We two sisters visited our mother's grave, and our tears fell upon the long, soft grass that swept across it. From that grave we went to others. We kindly remembered the last resting-place of the good old gentleman who used to let us ride home from school in his glittering carriage—and that of our school-mate who was drowned—and our teacher's—and old Betty Watkins's—and the traveller's, whom no one knew—and the grave where the roses bloomed so very beautifully in the long-ago summers. Otto couldn't understand what such a great "city of the dead" meant—he was awe-struck and followed along behind us.

We had passed an old, sunken grave, we knew not whose, and not hearing Otto's step, we looked back just in time to see him slip with one foot down into the grave.

Without a thought of irreverence my sister said: "Oh, Otto! run! old Mr. McCracken'll catch you by the leg!" The child leaped like a flash and ran, looking back over his shoulder to see if he were pursued. His little, dumpy legs were not more than a foot long, but he made good time, twisting his head back every moment, and then looking forward, as if to measure the distance that lay between danger and safety. It was as lively a race as he'll ever run. I never saw a more ridiculous sight, and we didn't dare to let him see us laugh. I just tumbled down on the grass and pulled my bonnet over my face and pretended I was resting.

I never had a real laugh and a real cry come so closely together.

I told the deacon, when we came home, and he said it went to prove that we were both very human; he said some other things, too, that were not very flattering, but then we wa'n't afeard o' the deacon.

I presume he felt it obligatory upon himself to administer a word of rebuke, as how he was a deacon and in authority.

I think I have hit on a labor-saving plan that will find favor with housekeepers. I'll tell you; see what you think of it. You know if we women are in a hurry it takes some time to get the ingredients together to make a pan of biscuit. Well, try my new plan, make the patent flour and have it all ready.

To six pounds of good wheat flour, mix five teaspoonfuls of good, dry, pulverized soda, then seven teaspoonfuls of pure cream of tartar and five of salt. Spread a thick newspaper on the table and sift this two or three times through the sieve, put it away in a new paper sack, and you have risen cakes on hand, to which add water and butter and your biscuits are ready for the oven.

It is well to prepare a dozen or fifteen pounds of flour at one time with proportionate quantities of the ingredients.

At this season of the year, lemon-pies are in demand. There are many ways of making them, but none simpler or better than this: Allow one lemon for two pies, grate as much of the rind as you like, mash the pulp up fine, taking care not to get any of the seeds in. Take one cup of sugar broken with the yolks of four eggs, one and a half cups of milk and two teaspoonfuls of corn starch dissolved in the milk. Bake with one crust. Beat the whites of the four eggs with pulverized white sugar, for puffing, spread over the pie, return to the oven and brown lightly.

I think something handy for Sunday dinner is so much better than to cook a hot meal when you come home from church tired. We think the queen pudding is very nice for Sunday dinner; it is the kind Mrs. Kinzey used to make for Bub when he boarded there. He was always telling us what a handsome woman she was; just as likely as not her greatest charm lay in being such an excellent cook. I found out how she made her queenly pudding, and this is the way:

One pint of broken crackers or bread crumbs to one quart of rich milk, one cup of sugar, the yolks of four eggs beaten, the grated rind of a lemon and a lump of butter the size of a walnut. Bake until done, not overdone. Whip the whites of the eggs stiff, and beat in a teacupful of sugar in which has been stirred the juice of a lemon. Spread over the pudding a layer of jelly or any sweetmeats you like. Pour the whites of the eggs over this and replace in the oven and bake, lightly. To be eaten with cold cream.

I saw a pretty thing in the window of a sick room lately; it was the invalid's good cheer, and was easily made. Take pine cones and set them in sand, or soil, or moss, whichever you choose. While they are yet open and dry, scatter in as much earth as the scales will hold, then sprinkle in fine grass seed, and then sprinkle water lightly over the whole. The cones should be kept in a warm place, and not watered much, say once a day. In less than a week the seeds will sprout, and soon the graceful spears will jet out in every direction. If you wish, you can then take the cones out of the soil and hang them inverted in a window, a cluster of them. Or, put a wet sponge in a glass bowl, and sow over it flax, grass or mustard seed, or all four of them mixed. It will soon be covered with a thick growth of tender green, and if carefully watered every day the mustard will in time blossom beautifully. These are pretty adornments for an invalid's chamber or for a grandmother's cosy room.

When ready to put away preserves or jam, if a sheet of tough, fibrous paper be taken and brushed over on both sides with the white of an egg, as it dries it will shrink and tighten, and be quite impervious to the air, provided the preserves are kept, as they always should be, in a dry place, not against a wall. Preserves often ferment, grow mouldy or candied. These arise from three causes—insufficient boiling, being kept in a damp place and from too quick or too long boiling. When they ferment, the syrup should be poured from them, scalded and turned back on them while hot. In making a syrup for fruit which makes little or no juice, one gill of water to each pound of sugar is enough.

It may not be well known that the white of eggs well beaten up, so as to destroy their structure, forms the gloss of the book-binder with which he gives the shiny appearance to the newly-bound books.

If any one desires to renovate the appearance of some of their old library books, they can rub off the dirt and fly-marks with a slightly damp cloth, and then rub the covers over with a small piece of rag dipped in gloss, and they will be surprised and pleased with the improvement in their appearance. The use of white of egg in clarifying is well known. A small quantity mixed with any turbid or thick solution coagulates when it is heated, and entangling all the small particles that cause the turbidity, leave the liquid bright and clean as it boils up to the surface, in the form of scum.

We had a man mowing our door-yard yesterday. I watched him pretty closely, for fear he would snip off my rose-bushes. I put my shawl on and sat on the grass, and pretended I was keeping him company. He is a man of good sense, and he said a great many sensible things. I remarked that mowing must be his trade, he did it so well, and made such nice work.

"Heh!" he sniffed; "I'm jack of all trades and master of none. I can do most anything that I take hold of;" and he leaned over and shaved the grass neatly from about a snarl of rose-bushes, a beautiful tangle that I couldn't prune for very tenderness of heart.

"Oh, thank you!" I said; "you did that as kindly as a mother would dress her babe. Any other man would have said: 'Here's a dead branch, Miss Potts;' or, 'Yon is a useless shoot;' or, 'That bush yander is a sufferin' for the knife.' It's my bush, you see, and I want it to grow as wild, and ranting, and riotous, and just as extravagantly as it pleases. I don't care if it leaps up as high as the top of the house," said I, a good deal excited.

"Well, I calculate that it would be the better of a little trimmin', but, as you say, it's well enough to let natur' have her own way, just to see what all she can do when she takes a notion. If I was a reg'lar gardener, I s'pose I would have attacked that bush whether or no. I often wish father had apprenticed me to that trade—poor man, he's been dead an' gone this many a long year; he was a good father, and I don't find it in my heart to bring up a word o' blame agin him;" and here he leaned on the handle of the scythe in a comfortable sort of a way. "But, Miss Potts, I think it's every man's duty to give his boys trades. When father died he left a farm of one hundred and sixty acres; there was mother, and we three grown boys, and the two little girls, and Johnny, and grandmother. Well, we couldn't all have the farm, and we couldn't any more than make a good living, and pay the preacher and the taxes, and school the children, and meet an occasional doctor's bill; and so Jack and I talked it over one night, and though it did seem a little hard, we resolved, 'fore God an' ourselves, that we'd give up all right and claim to the old farm to Tom, our oldest brother, if he'd care for mother and the children, and do the part of a dutiful son and brother. It did seem kind o' hard, strikin' out to do for ourselves, two green boys who'd always been cared for. Jack'd always wanted more larnin', he never was satisfied, and so he went away to school to shift for himself as he best could. Well, he worried along somehow, until now he is qualified to teach—he teaches in the winter and goes to school in the summer. I'd taken a shine to Milly Brown—she was a modest little hard-workin' creatur—and so we concluded to marry and help each other along. We never regretted it; and though I don't own a foot o' land, and have no trade, we have always managed so that we never had to endure much privation. Be sure I've had to wear patch upon patch, an' Milly's had to turn her dresses bottom end up, an' t'other side out; we've got along grandly.

"But Miss Potts, it's just as much as I can do to stand up an' feel myself a man among men. I ain't an independent man; I've no trade. To-day I mow your yard, to-morrow I help Farmer Hutchins move his smoke-house, the next day I plow corn for Jack Williams, maybe the next I'll make a chimney in Ephraim's kitchen, or elevate grain in Taylor's warehouse, or haul coal for Caster, or make a pavement on Milk Street, or weed somebody's garden. That's no way o' doin', hackin' round for Tom, Dick, an' Harry, sometimes getting paid, and sometimes only paid in worthless promises. Why, very often I work half a day for a man and he'll say, 'I'll do you a good turn sometime, Wilkon;' or, 'it's a mighty nice thing to be as handy a man as you are, George.'

"No, Miss Potts, I'm not a free man—I am a bond-man, I wear shackles, an' here I've a family comin' on, promisin' boys and girls, an' I'm afraid I'll not be able to do my whole duty by 'em. God helpin' me I mean to give every boy o' mine a good trade, anyhow; maybe my girls, too. When Bowser broke up and had to sell his farm and move to town, I just spoke right up before I thought. I said, 'Bowser,' said I, 'now you can't do a better thing than to apprentice Ned and Timothy to trades. You don't want to live in town and have two big idle boys trifling away their time. Don't do as my father did, don't let 'em ever feel as though you had not done all a father's duty. You can have Ned learn the timber's trade, and let Tim be a mason, or a plasterer, or a cooper,' an' what does neighbor Bowser do but up and git mad, an' tell me to mind my own business, an' that he was capable of lookin' after his own family.

"Well, to-day those Bowser boys are like me, going jobbing 'round wherever they can get a hand's turn to do. I think it is a blasted shame for a man to bring poor children into this world and not do a father's duty by them, just leave them to shift for themselves, crippled, shackled, hobbled, wings clipped and not feeling that they belong to the class of men who are free and brave and bold, and who can stand up and look the world in the face and feel themselves no man's inferior.

"That was a nice thing, sensible, too, that Esquire Hamilton did last week. His youngest son, Ralph, don't like to go to school—is dull about learning—it is drudgery to him, and so, with his own consent, his father bound him to the blacksmith's trade. My! what a growth that boy'll get! He is pretty hearty now, but what muscle will be developed, and what a ruddy face, and strong arm, and how happy he'll be.

"Oh, I think it's a God's blessing for a man to have a trade, even if he don't fall back upon it to make a living! So—so—well—I'll try and do my duty by my boys;" and my neighbor drew his sleeve across his moist face and went on with his mowing.

My heart ached for the poor man, and I shut my teeth a little viciously in memory of the indifferent old father in his grave on the hillside. In my heart I sanctioned every word I had heard, and I thought what a pity it is that young men so rush into the over-crowded professional ranks, preferring to be a fourth-rate lawyer, an ungodly minister, or an illiterate quack-doctor, to that of a first-rate blacksmith, wagon-maker or bricklayer.

I'd rather see a young man know how to make a good basket, than a poor plagiarized plea at the bar; rather see him toil, horney-handed in a sweaty check shirt than to sneak 'round public places in a seedy black, trying to eke out a miserable, sham existence by pettifoggery dirty cases and manufacturing falsehoods, and then esteeming himself better than the honest toiler, just because he has the little tag of Esq. dangling to his name.

I like neighbor Susie's plan about her children's clothes in the summer time. Her little girls don't wear shirts at all when the weather is warm, and their drawers are unusually large and loose and short. Instead of chemise, Susie makes loose sacque waists, not lined, gathered on to a band that leaves the shoulders free, and a row of buttons round the bottom on to which she fastens the drawers. There is no child's garment so handsome, and that holds heat like the little clinging chemise or shirt. Let them be dispensed with in very hot weather. Make the little waists with short sleeves trimmed prettily, the length to come below the belt several inches. A skirt if necessary can be buttoned on the same as drawers. I am vexed sometimes when I see little girls sweltering in the hot weather with chemise and drawers and skirts and high-necked, long-sleeved dresses, and perhaps an apron outside of that, and their abundant hair long and warm about their necks.

If you are tired, and the weather is warm, and it seems a trouble to get supper, and you did have a hearty dinner, why, I'll tell you what to fix. Put six or eight butter-crackers in a deep dish, and pour over them boiling water enough to quite cover them.

They will be swollen to three or four times their size. When cooled off a little, dish them out, grate loaf-sugar over them, and nutmeg or lemon, and dip on enough sweet cream to make a nice sauce. This is good enough for anybody's tea.

OUR CLUB.

BY ANNIE L. MUZZEY.

V.

SUSCEPTIBILITIES.

IT may be that the Club observations had been unusually dull and uninteresting on this particular evening. We were not, it is probable, the party best qualified to judge as to that, being, in the weakness and vanity of our human nature, inclined to the supposition that our remarks were always highly-entertaining and instructive. But, certain of us were unable, in any other than this unsatisfactory way, to explain why it was, at the most vital and thrilling point in our discussion of some abstract question—no matter what, just now—that little Effie Seymour and the young divinity student, whom we have previously introduced, arose abruptly, and turning their backs indifferently on us and our conclusions, slipped stealthily out at the door, and went sauntering slowly down the walk, in the misty April moonlight, under the dim-shining April stars.

Such of us as were lovers—and who of us were not?—might have comprehended that all the wisdom of the universe concentrated in our reasonings would not have weighed against one stolen breath of that starry solitude, eloquent with soft, tremulous sighs, and murmured tendernesses; and possibly because we were equal to the comprehension of such marvellous mysteries in human nature, our sense was the more subtle and keen to detect a something spurious and insincere when it existed, as we instinctively felt it did in this particular instance.

Dr. Osgood, who had one of his recurring spasms of visiting us every evening, expressed, in fact, the sentiment of nearly the whole company, when cutting short the Professor, I think, in the middle of his profound argument, he broke forth in his sharp, abrupt way, "This thing has been going on long enough, and it ought to be checked by some means without delay. One can't sit still and see an honest, unsophisticated fellow like young Morton so egregiously fooled and victimized by sly, subtle feminine arts, in which he is all inexperienced."

Templeton flashed with momentary anger. Effie was his special favorite, and any implied censure of her could not fail to touch him sorely.

"Doctor," said he, with some warmth, "we had a talk not long ago on the dangerous qualities and evil propensities of tongues. I regret much that you were not present. But, the conclusion at which we unanimously arrived, if I remember rightly, was, that it is profitable for each of us to mind our own business."

"A decision, I assure you, which I heartily endorse, and have no disposition to reverse," returned the Doctor, blandly. "Now, my business, as you may easily conceive, is to strike at an evil wherever I find it; to trace it back to its hidden occult sources; to eradicate it by aiming directly at its causes, which are often far enough removed, seemingly, from their visible effects."

"Have a care that you do not exceed your domain, and in your zeal to exterminate errors, lay your destroying knife at the roots of things purely innocent," said Templeton, warningly.

"Thanks for your caution, my dear host," bowed the Doctor, politely; "but allow me the question, is it a purely innocent thing to reduce a man to a state of simple idiocy?"

"Let me in turn propound another question," responded Templeton. "Is it a sin in a woman to be beautiful, attractive, unconsciously sweet—in a word, womanly; and is she to blame, if, following the instincts of his highest nature, a man falls hopelessly in love with her?"

"Well, perhaps not," admitted the Doctor; "but I do not see that it is 'purely innocent' in her to add to her beauty, sweetness and attraction by seeming to respond to the inordinate affection she has unconsciously inspired."

"It is a difficult and delicate matter to decide sometimes, whether the response is altogether 'seeming,'" Templeton suggested.

"Our young theologian evidently finds it so," returned Dr. Osgood, drily.

Templeton moved uneasily again.

"I can't sit silent," he said, "and hear Effie Seymour charged with wilful trifling in affairs of the heart. The child is as unschooled in art, and as unconscious of the fascinating spell she exerts, as the shyest bird of the air. That soft, timid, depending, half-confiding, half-appealing way of hers—natural as the breath she draws—has an irresistible charm for a man of tender sensibilities, and carries him straightway captive; and what in her yielding, responsive manner may appear to him, and to lookers on, an encouragement, if not a return of his passion, is really, if rightly understood, the simple expression of a grateful, affectionate, sympathetic nature, that shrinks sensitively from the thought of giving pain. This may be weakness, but it is not surely intentional wickedness."

"Truly, a complicated and deplorable state of affairs," said the Doctor, sarcastically. "For such an infirmity of character as your charming protégée exhibits is there not a possible remedy which would tend to avert these unfortunate consequences? What," he added, turning to Jeannette, "would be a sensible woman's suggestion in the case?"

"Am I expected to answer in that capacity?" Jean asked with simplicity.

"If not, it is useless to seek farther," was the gallant rejoinder. "For our sentimental young friend who has gone out mooning with her latest adoring swain, so soon, like his predecessors, to pall upon her sense, what, in your opinion, my dear lady, would be the wisest and safest prescription?"

"Something useful to do and think about," replied Jeannette with satisfactory promptness.

The Doctor nodded approvingly.

Templeton smiled a little disdainfully.

"That is like Jeannette," he said. "Work is her grand panacea alike for all the ills and all the errors of humanity."

"And a wonderful remedial agent it most truly is," declared the Doctor.

"One that requires judgment in application, however," Templeton observed, sagely. "A butterfly cannot be made to perform the duties of a bee."

"The more's the pity," lamented Dr. Osgood. "I could have some admiration for the giddy, gaudy creature if it were good for anything in the world but to flap its lazy, languid wings in the sun, or if the first cloud that breaks on its summer-day existence did not leave it such a poor, miserable, dragged, pitiful, perishing atom of gay, painted dust."

"None the less, perhaps, does it serve its ends because it fails of your admiration, and elicits but your contempt," returned Templeton. "Beauty and frailty have their mission as well as wisdom and force. No one knows better than yourself, Doctor, that we are not all of the same fibre. Some of us are fitted by nature and liking for the rough, hard work of the world, others are born to sit at ease in the sun, to be loved and petted, and humored and sheltered from all the rude storms of life, to bear no burdens of care or responsibility, to have nothing exacted or expected of them but to be beautiful and lovable and altogether charming, like our dainty little Effie. You might as well think of converting a humming-bird into a staid, barn-yard fowl as to propose putting the work-a-day harness of coarser mortals on this delicate, nervous, sensitive creature. Why, subjected to the tedious discipline which in your philosophy is the corrective of all evils, how long do you suppose she could endure?"

"Longer, a great deal longer, my dear air, than she can under the strain and fever and agitation of the false, vain, frivolous life she is leading now," asserted the Doctor, very confidently. "There is nothing that so soon wears out and breaks down such an organization as you define as the continued and unnatural excitement of the emotions and feelings with no underlying motive of use or outreaching impulse of love and benevolence. In my long and varied experience as a physician, I have found my most trying and difficult class of patients constantly recruited from the ranks of these same selfish, indolent, irresponsible, tenderly protected creatures whom you think so charming and womanly, though I assure you as nervous, irritable, complaining, desponding, hypochondriacal invalids they are anything but winning, and one comes to care for them at last more from a sense of duty than from any special affection. On the other hand, I am very seldom summoned to the case of one who has a really earnest purpose in life, and an occupation that calls into play the restless activities and energies of body and brain, which, if not directed toward something useful and noble, will most certainly be frittered on low, trifling, demoralizing ends. So far from work, honest, hearty, wholesome work wearing out or breaking down the most delicate constitution, it is, if wisely adapted to one's powers, and systematically performed, wholly beneficent in its effects, physical, mental and moral, giving tone and energy, and steadfastness and weight to character, imparting zest to simple, healthful pleasures and preserving rather than wasting the vital forces of life."

"But, Dr. Osgood, we do not want a child like Effie to have weight and steadfastness of character," said Templeton, smiling. "It would be the most unnatural thing in the world, and not at all admirable. In fact, there is nothing more mournful in the young than too much gravity and sedateness. Life must have its season of pleasure, and we cannot be too careful about laying prematurely the heavy responsibilities of later years on the shoulders of gay, careless, happy-hearted youth. Do you realize what it is that you think to do? Would you deprive a woman of that bright, brief, witching reign of beauty and power in which she queens it so royally over all who approach to pay homage to her sovereign state? And what is it, after all, that appears to you so desperately wicked in those really innocent little coquetries, as natural to a maiden as to laugh when she is glad and to sigh when she is sad? Why, it looks a good deal like reproaching and reproving the Master and Maker for the imperfection of His gift when we seek to repress the impulses and affections essential to its power and loveliness and grace, and, in the folly of our self-conceit, to engraft qualities utterly foreign to its character. A woman, especially a young, beautiful, dependent woman (and really not more such an one than an older, plainer and professedly independent woman, except that she is more open and transparent in her desires,) covets what is her right, the unqualified admiration of the other sex, loves to be praised, to be flattered, if you will—loves, in fact, to be loved, and if she sometimes feigns—half or quite unconsciously it may be—to feel more interest than she would dare to take oath upon in her craving for the meed of appreciation and the tribute of worship which are necessary to her happiness, and I had almost said to her existence, we must not be too harsh and scathing in our judgment. It is but nature."

"Do not be too absolutely certain, Friend Templeton, that it is nature," said Jeannette. "It may be the result simply of a very absurd system of education. A woman from her cradle is schooled in an atmosphere of sentiment; and if she is not born, she is speedily trained into the belief that all her relations, and associations with the other sex, must be of a sentimental character. She does not get beyond the tutelage of the nursery before she begins to put on airs, and to practise little arts with her boy play-fellow that she does not with his sister. It is the same, only more so, when she progresses to the school-room, if, indeed, she is so fortunate as to have boys for classmates, though even in that case the ridiculous distinctions made by custom are such as tend to separate her interest as far as possible from theirs in intellectual matters, only the more strongly to concentrate it in the sphere of feeling, yielding, as a result, numberless juvenile flirtations and incipient love passages highly exasperating to perplexed pedagogy that does not see that the dividing line which it strives to draw between the sexes, precipitates the very catastrophe it is designed to avert.

"And thus through all the successive stages of her development she is forced to feel that the only point at which her destiny intersects and blends with that of man is under the passing reign of passion, hence that alert self-consciousness in his society, that adroit and unsuspected aiming at effect, that uneasy ambition to make conquests; and hence, also, too frequently, perhaps her unhappy choice in marriage, for having frittered away on one and another the fresh, pure affections of her virgin heart, she has no longer the clear, penetrant intuitive sense that should recognize the true lover when he comes, and thinking with a sigh that it is all a game of chance, when the necessity for election arrives she recklessly casts lots and draws, or she drifts with the tide until some obstruction she has not force enough to push aside, cuts short her aimless course. Do you call all this 'nature?' I call it nonsensical if not wicked interference with nature.

"If a woman were trained to active and responsible duties, and to habits of self-dependence; if she were brought constantly into association and sympathy with men in intellectual and business pursuits; if she were perfectly free to compete with them in all the trades, professions and industries without the haunting dread that she may be thought unwomanly; if she could meet them as an equal everywhere, with the acknowledged right that she may in the domain of the social affections; if, in fact, she were not so much instructed as to her proper sphere, but were left at entire liberty to find her sphere anywhere in the wide universe of individual power and effort, she would be less diseased with that sickly sentimentality which for any true apprehension and appreciation of the real article is falsely called love, and she would not see in every man, high and low, that approaches her a prospective adorer, a possible suitor, and a certain target for the exercise of that little round of fascinations with which we have grown so familiar that we wonder at the weakness, blindness and credulity of the victims who are slain by them."

"Because you know nothing of the bliss of being so victimized, Jeannette," returned Templeton, good-humoredly. "I dare say we should have a model womanhood on your plan, but I am not sure I should admire it any more than I admire this imperfect womanhood which you sketch. If that were possible I may as well prepare to go down upon my knees in perpetual adoration, for I assure you my spirit is prostrated in worship before the shrine of womanly divinity even in the degenerate state which you describe, and if it is to be clothed with additional grace, my devotion can know no limits. But, Jean, my excellent friend, you must not overlook the fact which is very clearly manifested on the face of human life, that the affections are woman's peculiar province, and that her greatest strength is there."

"I do not mean to overlook any fact which is patent to the blind," Jeannette replied, "though I have seen men with tenderer sensibilities than some women, and women with stronger intellects than some men, and I do not know just where to draw the separating line. In either case I think it wise to cultivate the deficient qualities, so if the worst come to the worst, and neither should have the other at hand to depend upon, they may not make utter shipwreck and failure of life. It is not always convenient nor exactly in order for a man when he has need of a heart to rush out in search of it among the shoals of dry goods that have no special individuality for him, and a woman, when she has use for a head, feels a good deal more self-respect in finding it upon her own shoulders than she would to seek it upon her neighbor's. There is no sense in making arbitrary distinctions of sex. Nature has made all that are necessary, and will take care that we remember them if we will dare to trust her."

"Dr. Holmes, you know, says a woman never forgets her sex, and that she would rather talk with a man than an angel any day," suggested some one.

"The Doctor knows, I dare say, or he thinks he does, which amounts to the same thing in this world," Jeannette responded.

"It is no less than I have been regretting that a woman thinks more of herself and of the impression she is making, than of the triumph of truth in the gravest issues of life. It is beyond question, too, that she would rather talk with a man than an angel, I am sure that I would, provided he gives me his best, and doesn't imagine he must talk down to my comprehension in order to please me. A sensible man has a thousand wise, helpful things to say, which sweep me out to a broader range of thought, and carry me up to a higher point of vision."

"Templeton," abruptly broke in Dr. Osgood, who had been curiously watching through the open door a tableau on which the hall light was shining, "I have to announce to you the twentieth engagement of your niece. Our intoxicated young student, of the Divine Mysteries, is bidding her good-night at the door, and is kissing rapturously the hand, on the fore-finger of which he has just slipped the visible token of betrothal. Do you suppose the mark of Gleason's ring is gone from it yet? By my faith, the girl is not off with the old love before she is on with the new."

"Hush!" warned Templeton, in a whisper, as though afraid a breath of the Doctor's harsh criticism might reach the sensitive ears of his favorite.

Possibly there did, for she came in presently with an embarrassed and highly-conscious air, and with the freshly consecrated hand hidden in her dress, only to gather up some articles she had left in her previous stealthy exit, and hastily turn to retire.

Templeton stayed her.

"Effie," he said, with unwonted sternness, "show us your hand."

She hesitated, blushed guiltily, then defiantly put forth the dainty offending member on which glittered the handsome seal-ring, doubtless a souvenir, that the student had worn somewhat conspicuously on his little finger since he had been among us.

Confused, the lovely culprit glanced timidly about, seeking an interpretation of the ominous silence that followed her action, and finding no sympathy, but only surprise, pain, disapproval and contempt in the circle of usually friendly faces, she burst into a copious flood of ever-ready tears.

"I—I never meant it! It was all a—a—mistake! I felt so sorry for him. And, oh, I'm the most miserable girl alive!" she sobbed, and fled precipitately from the room.

"Jeannette," said Templeton, with slow thoughtfulness, "you may see what can be done."

INSUBORDINATION;

OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER IV.

A NEW CHARACTER INTRODUCED.

"HERE, Jim, run to Mrs. Earnest's with these 'uppers,' and tell her I want 'em closed and bound as soon as possible," said Mr. Hardamer, handing a bundle to his smallest boy, who took it, and ran off at full speed.

"Mr. Hardamer wants these—" began little Jim, as he was always called in the shop, on entering Mrs. Earnest's room; but he stopped short on perceiving her daughter Anne, seated in a chair, weeping violently.

"What's the matter, Miss Anne?" he asked, after a moment's pause, going up to her side. Anne had always been kind to him, and he liked her very much.

For a few moments the weeping girl made no answer to the inquiry of her little friend.

"Oh, Miss Anne, what is the matter?" again asked the boy, his own eyes filling with tears. "Where is your mother?"

"She is dead!" murmured the girl, sobbing violently.

"Oh, no, Miss Anne!" But his eye turned involuntarily toward the bed, and saw the pale, death-stricken face of Mrs. Earnest. Bursting into tears, he leaned his head against the chair on which Anne was sitting, and wept with her. He, too, had lost a friend in Mrs. Earnest. For, since the death of his mother, she was the only one he had met who seemed to care for him with anything like a maternal regard.

Mrs. Earnest had long been in feeble health, and had been wasting away for years in a slow decline. But death came more suddenly than had been expected. Her husband, a physician, who had not succeeded in obtaining a very large practice, had been dead for many years. In dying, he had left his intelligent and interesting wife, with one daughter about six years old. The little that he had been able to accumulate did not last the widow long, and Mrs. Earnest was soon thrown upon her own resources for a support for herself and child. By careful economy and constant industry, she had contrived to keep her head above water, and, at the same time, to send her child to school until she was eleven or twelve years of age. About this time she began to feel seriously the inroads of a concealed but fatal disease, and it became necessary to tax Anne's young strength and patience in daily toil with her needle.

The little girl, who had a deep affection for her mother, and had often been led to notice the weariness and evident pain with which she toiled on from day to day, gladly entered upon the task allotted her, and, though often fatigued and restless from long application, she never complained.

Year after year passed, and, from one kind of work to another, they had changed, until at last they confined themselves to closing and binding shoes, as requiring less of wearisome application than ordinary sewing. At this they managed to support themselves comfortably, for their wants were few.

"I must go, Miss Anne," said the boy, lifting his head from the chair against which he had leaned it. "Mr. Hardamer'll beat me if I stay long."

"Poor child!" ejaculated Anne, forgetting for the moment her own sad condition. "I'm afraid you have a hard time of it, Jimmy."

"Oh, no, Miss Anne, not very. Only, I'm beat so, sometimes. But I must run back. I'll come again to-night."

"Do come, I shall want to see you," and as the pale, sorrow-stricken face of the child disappeared, her own thoughts went back again to the keen affliction she had been called to endure. But a few minutes before the boy came in, her mother had heaved her last sigh, and she was now friendless and alone with the dead.

On the evening after the funeral, Anne found herself alone in the room where for years she had been used to see the dear face and hear the kind words of her mother. And she was not only alone, but friendless. There were none to whom she could look for protection, and no place to which she could go and call it her home. While busy with sad thoughts and painful forebodings, the boy who had brought the work the day before came in. He was but a small boy, and she was in the early bloom of womanhood, but his face was to her a welcome one.

"Good evening, Miss Anne," he said, entering without ceremony.

"How do you do, Jimmy? I'm glad to see you, for I feel very lonesome."

"I thought you would be lonesome, and so I came," replied the little fellow, in simplicity of heart.

"You're a very good boy, Jimmy, to remember me now I'm in trouble."

"I can never forget you, Miss Anne, for when everybody beat me, or made fun of me, you were always good to me, and just like my sister that's been dead, oh, so long!" And the boy stood before her with the tears streaming down his cheeks, in remembrance of those who, while living, loved him and cared for him.

"You had a sister, then, Jimmy?" said Anne, forgetful of her own affliction, in sympathy for the sorrow of the child.

"Oh, yes! And she was so good to me! But she was sick a long time, and when mother died there was no one to take care of her. I was a little, little boy, and couldn't do nothing. And so the people put us into a cart and sent us out to the poor-house. There they took sister and put her in a room full of sick people, and wouldn't let me stay with her. I cried and cried to stay with her, and then they beat me so hard with a stick; and the man said he'd kill me if I didn't hush. I was afraid to cry loud after that, but I used to lay awake most all night long, sometimes, a thinking of sister, and crying all to myself. 'Mayn't I see sister? Oh, please let me see sister!' I said to the man, after I'd been there eight or nine days. He looked at me cross for awhile, and then he said, a little easy, and didn't look so cross, that if I'd be a good boy, and not cry any more, for the tears were running down my cheeks all I could do to help it, that I should see her the next day. All that night I slept but little, thinking about seeing sister; and I tried not to cry, but I cried all the while.

"Next morning I was up so early—it was hardly daylight, and I waited and waited for the man to come and take me to see sister. But hour after hour passed away, after breakfast, until dinner-time came; and I hadn't seen her yet. Two or three times the man came into the room, but I was afraid to say anything to him, for fear he'd be angry. But I looked him in the face as wistfully as I could, though he didn't take no notice of me. It was most night when he came in again, and he walked about the room as unconcerned as if nobody's heart was a'most breaking, like mine was. Every minute I expected him to call me to go and see sister; but he didn't seem to remember his promise. When he turned to go out, I thought I couldn't stand it any longer, and so I went right up to him, and putting up my hands, as if I was going to say my prayers, said: 'Oh, sir, do let me see my sister!' He turned around so cross on me for a moment, and then looking toward the woman who took care of our room, said: 'Here, take this brat in to see his sister.'

"The woman looked at me as if she didn't care whether she did or not—then she caught hold of my arm and said—'Come along, and be quick, too!' She almost dragged me through the passages, and up-stairs to the sick-room where sister was. But I didn't mind that. All I cared about was seeing sister; and in a moment or two I was by her side. Oh, how much paler and thinner she was! And her big, bright eyes looked into my face so strangely. But she was so glad to see me; and took me in her arms and held me tight to her bosom, and kissed my face all over. And then the tears rolled down her cheeks, and she shut her eyes, and was still for a good many minutes, but her lips moved all the while. 'Come, that'll do!' said the woman, 'I've no time to be fooling here,' and she took hold of me to pull me away. Sister, she looked so anxiously in the woman's face, but it didn't do no good, for her heart was cold and hard. 'Let him come again, won't you?' said sister, in a low voice. 'I don't know that I will, you make such a fuss over him,' said the woman, and lifting me down from the bed, she dragged me away.

"I didn't do nothing but cry all that night, and all the next day, too, and the man said, if I didn't hush, he'd half kill me, and said I shouldn't see my sister any more, if that was the way I acted. I stopped crying all at once; that is, outside, but I seemed to be crying inside all the while. In about two weeks more I got so impatient to see sister, that I made bold to ask the man again. 'What's that?' said the woman, who heard me. 'Jim wants to see his sister again,' said the man. 'He's a fool!' said the woman, 'his sister's been dead these ten days.'

"I didn't cry nor say nothing, Miss Anne; but I can't tell you how I felt. I wanted to die, too. Oh, it would have seemed so good, if I could have died. I stayed there a good while, when Mr. Hardamer came out one day, and said he wanted a boy; and then they bound me to him. He and Mrs. Hardamer scold me, and beat me so much, that I sometimes wish I was dead, and then I should be with mother and sister."

The poor little fellow now covered his face with his hands, and sobbed violently, while the tears trickled fast through his fingers. For some time, Anne's affliction was all absorbed in her sympathy for her little friend; but this gradually subsided, and she felt keenly her desolate condition.

"What are you going to do, Miss Anne?" said the boy to her, after his own feelings had revived a little from their great depression.

"Indeed, Jimmy, I don't know what I shall do."

"I heard Gertrude say this morning, that they wanted somebody to come there and sew. I wish you'd come; I know they'd like you."

"I will think about it, Jimmy," she replied.

"But, maybe, Miss Anne, they'll get somebody else if you don't speak quick. Won't you come to-morrow, and see about it?"

"I don't know, indeed, Jimmy; I can tell best after I have thought about it."

"Oh, I wish you would come!" said the little boy, as he thought more seriously of the matter. "I would be so happy."

The earnest desire expressed by her humble friend, and the sympathy she felt for him, influenced the decision of Anne in a good degree. On the next day she called on Mrs. Hardamer, and an arrangement was soon entered into for her to come and sew for a dollar and a half a week.

This happened about the time of Genevieve's abandonment by her husband. The circumstances of her marriage and desertion were noised about among that particular class of individuals who are interested in such matters; and, as it was very well known that the girls held their heads a little too high, it afforded a subject for no little ill-natured gossip. Some few pitied, while others secretly rejoiced at the bad fortune of Genevieve. As soon as her parents ascertained that Anderson had fairly gone off, they took her home, but evinced little sympathy for her condition. Mrs. Hardamer, Geneva and Gertrude, were too deeply mortified to regard her feelings. All hope of an elevation of the family by her marriage was cut off. She was irrevocably tied to a worthless fellow, from whom they had only to expect disgrace and annoyance. Any scarcity of gallants, was sure to be charged, by the girls, upon Genevieve.

"It's all owing to your miserable connection with that fellow," said Geneva to her, one evening, after having sat up for company, all furbelowed off, in vain. "No man that thinks anything of himself is going to marry either Gertrude or me, now you've brought such disgrace upon the family."

"I wish the puppy'd been in the North Pole, before he came about here," added Gertrude. "I always knew he was an impostor."

"Yes, and Genevieve might have known it, too," resumed Geneva, "if she hadn't been so mad for a husband. But, I reckon she's got enough of it, and, I can't say that I'm much sorry either, if it wasn't for the disgrace of the family."

Genevieve made no reply to these cruel remarks; but they entered her heart. She was too deeply afflicted to feel resentment, and she knew it would be of no use to complain. Anne was present when the remarks were made, and she at once retired to her chamber. There she was soon followed by Genevieve, who had been assigned a portion of Anne's bed. She was not considered worthy to occupy the same room with her two grown-up sisters; and she, by no means, regretted the banishment.

Anne was seated at a small table, reading, when

Genevieve came in; and, as the latter at once sat down by the window, and leaned her head upon her arms, she read on. In a few minutes she was conscious that Genevieve was weeping bitterly. Closing the volume, which was none other than the Holy Word, she drew near to Genevieve, and, with a tender concern, which could not be misunderstood, took her hand and said: "When all our friends forsake us, there is One who still looks kindly upon us and loves us."

Genevieve made no answer, but the tears fell faster, and she sobbed more convulsively.

"It is only through affliction, Mrs. Anderson," continued Anne, "that we can know ourselves. And this knowledge, if we make the right use of it, is worth all we suffer. In all our sorrows, there is One who stands very near, and permits the sorrows to come upon us. But, although the floods prevail, he will not let them overwhelm us. Our Heavenly Father loves us with a deeper and a wiser love than our earthly parents possibly can, and surely he will let nothing harm us, if we will look up to him in childlike confidence and submission."

Genevieve grew calmer, and seemed to listen with deep attention. Anne continued: "All affliction is for our good. When we fall into these deep waters, we should not despair, but look into our own hearts, and see if we cannot find some evils there which we could not have seen without the affliction. And, most certainly, my dear madam, we shall not look in vain."

"Oh, I am very miserable!" exclaimed Genevieve, and she clasped her hands together, and again burst into tears. This time she laid her head upon Anne's shoulder. For a few minutes the latter made no attempt to check the current of her feelings; but, as Genevieve grew more composed, she said: "There can no more be pain of mind, without mental disease, than there can be pain of body without a bodily disease. The pain is simply a call for some remedy. If there were no pain, externally or internally, in either case, the individual might die suddenly, naturally or spiritually, without having been conscious of the existence of any disease. This pain that we feel, is, then, a merciful provision, and we ought always to consider seriously, what it means, and profit by the lessons. You say you feel miserable; if all were right within, you could not feel miserable."

"But who could feel happy, Anne, under all the circumstances that surround me. Forsaken by my husband, and treated unkindly in my father's house."

And again she gave way to a flood of tears.

"That is to be expected, Mrs. Anderson," said Anne, after a pause of some moments, in which Genevieve grew calmer. "The man who suffers with a violent pain, cannot be indifferent to it, simply because it makes him conscious that he has a disease, brought on by some particular act of indiscretion; but, then, it may reveal to him, in its true light, the folly that brought on the disease, and cause him to avoid it in future. So in the case of great mental agony, arising from circumstances of affliction. By it we are enabled to see that we have acted from wrong motives, and thus blindly run into trouble; or, we have cherished in our hearts, a false estimate of things, and loved them purely with a selfish love; and, when they have been removed, there has been nothing upon which we could lean for comfort. Such discoveries, followed by a correction of long formed evil habits of the mind, secure for the future a measure of true happiness."

"Anne," said Genevieve, lifting up her head, and looking her young adviser in the face, with something of surprise and admiration, "you are a strange girl, different from any that I have ever met. Where did you learn these things, that sound so much like truth; and yet, are to me, new and almost incomprehensible."

"I had a good mother," replied Anne, her voice trembling as she uttered the dear name, "and she had known much sorrow. In the school of affliction, she had learned wisdom. I loved that mother," again her voice trembled, "and knew, that whatever she told me was truth. The nature, and cause of affliction she taught me, and since she has been removed from me, I have found them blessed lessons. But, it must never be forgotten, Mrs. Anderson, while thinking of these things, that, apart from a religious principle we never can be happy. The Lord is our father, and loves us with an unspeakable love. In His Word, he has told us what we should do to be happy."

"What can I do? How shall I begin, Anne?" asked Genevieve, with a new-born earnestness.

"Are you ever conscious of acting or thinking wrong?"

"Yes, almost every day!"

"And this doing, or thinking wrong, always makes you feel more unhappy?"

"Always."

"Then the way is plain before you. As soon as you are conscious of wishing to do wrong, or of indulging in wrong desires and affections, then shun such thoughts and desires as evil, and, therefore, sins against the Lord; and particularly refrain, upon the same principle, from bringing out into action, and thereby confirming them, these evil thoughts or affections, and you will then be doing all that is required of you. Tranquility of mind, such as you have never known, will succeed these efforts, if you persevere in them, looking all the while to the Lord for aid. Don't look at anything but your present duty. Let everything else take care of itself. In so doing you will find that every day will bring its peculiar duties, and in their performance you will find an internal satisfaction, of which no outward circumstances can rob you."

"I will try to do right, Anne; will you help me?"

"Even as I would help my own sister."

"You are kinder to me than my own sisters," said Genevieve, feelingly, looking with tearful eyes into the face of Anne. "And now I can see what is meant by loving the neighbor, and how much happiness must flow from it. I am nothing to you, Anne, and yet you seem to love me and care for me more than those who are of my own blood. This cannot be a selfish feeling. It must be a love for my good." And as the true idea dawned dimly upon her, and touched her heart, by its application to herself, as an object of that love, her feelings again gave way, and she laid her head upon the breast of her new-found friend and wept aloud.

Under the kind and constant direction and admonition of Anne Earnest, Genevieve was enabled to bear, with a degree of meekness and forbearance, the neglect of her parents, and the open unkindness of her sisters; and this change in her disposition was not long in being observed by her parents, and softening their hearts toward her. Month after month passed away, but she had no tidings of her husband. As the period of their separation became more and more extended, obliterating the remembrance of unkindness, and warming up the love that had been felt for him, Genevieve became more and more desirous to hear from him, and once more to be with him. But in this it seemed as if she were not to be gratified, for there came no tidings for her anxious heart.

Gertrude and Genevieve, in the pride of conscious superiority, looked upon Anne as far beneath them. Though she was tall and beautifully formed, with a face expressive of great loveliness of character, they could see nothing in her that was not vulgar. She was not suffered to sit at the table with the family, but was assigned the charge of that at which the boys ate. To this she had no particular objection, as she soon saw that her presence had a very great effect upon the apprentices, and that after the first few days their rudeness at the table gradually subsided. They soon showed a disposition to talk to her in a respectful manner, and not unfrequently referred to her the decision of little matters upon which they had disputed. It was a glad day for little Jimmy when he saw her take her place at the table. Although she could not change the quality of their food, materially, yet she could, in a great measure, see that it came upon the table in proper order. She saw that the cook did not allow their coffee or tea to get cold; and by rising very early in the morning and seeing how things went on in the kitchen, and looking in there, too, at night, she managed to have a good many things, in the preparation of their food, attended to that added to their comfort; particularly in the prevention of large quantities of corn bread from being baked up by the lazy cook, which they would be forced to eat cold day after day, she made their fare much pleasanter. The necessity of living upon the same coarse food that they did, was not one that rendered her at all unhappy, as she could, in submitting to this privation, make it more agreeable for them.

Among the many young men who visited occasionally at the house of Mr. Hardamer, was the only son of a rich farmer, who had recently come to the city and opened a store on Market Street. His name was Illerton. He had made but few acquaintances since his removal to the city, and among these happened to be Genevra and Gertrude. Usually about once every week he dropped in and spent an evening with them; but as he was a young man of fine education and fine principles, he did not become much interested in either of the young ladies. Still, as time frequently hung heavy on his hands, and he was fond of cultivating the social feelings, he continued to drop in pretty regularly.

It so happened that he called in one evening when both of the girls were out. He was shown up-stairs into the parlor by the black servant, who either did not know or care anything about the girls not being in, and who went back direct to the kitchen, without taking the trouble to make any inquiries. Anne, who of course never went into the parlor when there was company there, and rarely at other times, was, on this evening, sitting there alone at the comfortable reading. She rose at the entrance of Illerton, who, surprised and delighted at seeing so sweet a face, though that of a stranger, begged her to be seated. With easy politeness she resumed her chair, remarking, at the same time, that she was sorry to tell him that the young ladies had gone out for the evening.

There was something in the face of Anne that charmed Illerton the moment he saw her, and her low voice, that trembled slightly, sounded to him more musical than any voice he had ever heard. For some time he endeavored to draw her into conversation, but although every reply she made charmed him more and more, he could not succeed in getting her to converse freely. Her reserve he easily understood to be the natural maiden reserve of a pure-minded woman toward a perfect stranger. Illerton was a man who readily understood character, and rarely came to false conclusions in reference to any one. After sitting for nearly half an hour, much longer than his own sense of propriety told him he ought to have lingered in her company, under the circumstances, he rose to depart.

"You must pardon me," he said, "for having so long, being altogether a stranger, intruded upon your company. My only excuse is, that I have been interested."

"It is no intrusion upon me, sir," replied Anne; "and if, in the absence of the young ladies, I have succeeded in making your call a pleasant one, I can only be gratified."

"You must pardon me another act of presumption," said Mr. Illerton, smiling; "I did not know that you resided, as you have intimated, in this family. May I beg to know your name?"

"My name is Anne Earnest," she replied, modestly, while a slight blush deepened the color on her cheek.

"I must again beg pardon for this seeming rudeness," he said, and bowing low, he bade her good-evening, and withdrew.

Illerton could only suffer a single evening to pass before again calling. On entering the parlor, this time, his eye glanced rapidly around, but none were present save Gertrude and Genevra, who received him with all the interesting airs and graces they could put on. But in vain did they talk and sing and thrum the piano for his especial edification. He could not feel the smallest interest in them.

"How sorry I was that we were not at home when you called last," said Genevra, during a flagging pause in the conversation. "We were so disappointed when we learned that you had been here."

"But you left me an agreeable companion to compensate for your absence," he replied, in a livelier tone. "Why, you never told me that a Miss Earnest was staying with you. Where does she keep herself? I should really like to see her, and apologize for my rudeness in spending half an hour with her, although a perfect stranger."

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed out Genevra, "that is a good one! Why, she's only a girl that ma hires to sew. How could you have been so deceived? I shall have to tell ma to keep her out of the parlor, the forward minx! I am mortified, though, indeed, Mr. Illerton, that one of our hirelings should have pushed herself into your company. But it shall never happen again."

To this speech Illerton was at a perfect loss for a reply. He had often heard of accomplished virtue in obscurity. Here was an instance, he could not doubt, for he could not believe himself mistaken in his impressions. Every movement, every word, every varying expression of Anne's countenance, he remembered, as distinctly as if she were still sitting before him; and the remembrance only added to his admiration. He felt indignant at hearing her designated, sneeringly, as the hireling of girls who were in everything her inferiors. But he did not, of course, give form to his thoughts; he merely said, "Don't check her, or speak unkindly to her, on my account; for, I assure you, she acted with modesty and propriety. She was reading in the parlor when I entered, and rose to go out, I suppose, when I insisted upon her being seated. It was my fault, not hers."

"But it's annoying to have sewing-girls pushing themselves in the way of gentlemen who visit here. We must, hereafter, insist upon her keeping in her own room," said Gertrude, rather warmly.

Illerton was constrained to oppose this unfeeling resolution, but he forced himself to be silent, and soon after took his leave.

"Did you ever hear of such a thing?" exclaimed Genevra, as the front door closed after him.

"I'm mortified to death!" responded Gertrude.

"The pert, forward huzzy!" ejaculated Genevra.

"If ever she tries such a trick as that again, she walks out of this house in a jiffy!" added Gertrude.

"What an idea! An agreeable half-hour spent with our hired girl!" broke in Genevra.

"I expect he's mortified to death; and I'm afraid he'll not come any more. How could you laugh right out so, when he mentioned Anne?" said Gertrude.

"Because I couldn't help it; it was such a queer joke."

"Well, I can tell you, it is ^{is} very rude," replied Gertrude, warmly, whose fears were a good deal excited at the bare idea of losing Illerton, as a beau, through the indiscretion of her sister in laughing at him.

"Fiddle-stick! Your notions of propriety have grown very nice, all at once!" responded Genevra.

"I wish your's were a little nicer, that's all I've got to say," rejoined Gertrude.

"Well, I can tell you, miss, that I know what is right and proper as well as you do," replied Genevra, tartly, "and have no notion of being called to account by you. So you may just shut up!"

"I'll call you to an account whenever I please, Miss Touchy?" said Gertrude, growing more excited. "You are a rude, forward girl, let me tell you!—and have driven more company from the house than your neck's worth, so you have! I'll complain to ma, so I will!" she continued, more passionately.

"Will you, indeed? ah—that will be interesting," said Genevra, with a sneering laugh.

"Come! come! What's the matter here, now?" broke in Mrs. Hardamer, who had been attracted from the next room, by the loud voices of her daughters.

"Why, you see"—began Gertrude; but she was interrupted by Genevra, before she could utter another syllable, with—"It's no such thing, ma, it was—"

"It was!"—broke in Gertrude.

"It wa'n't no such thing, now," said Genevra.

"Both of you hush up at once!" said the mother.

"But, ma—"

"Listen to me, ma,"

"Don't I tell you to hush!"

"It was all Anne's fault, ma," said Genevra, not at all inclined to obey the maternal injunction of silence.

"What about Anne?" asked Mrs. Hardamer.

"Why, you wouldn't 'a' thought it, ma," continued Genevra, "but it's as true as death! Night before last, when Mr. Illerton called here, Anne was stuck up in the parlor, and the forward thing had the boldness to keep him there for half an hour or so, talking to her, just as if she was somebody. And here, this evening, he must ask for Miss Earnest! I was so much amused that I laughed right out, and told him that she was only our hired sewing-girl. And Gertrude is mad because I laughed."

"Is it possible that Anne was guilty of such unpardonable presumption?"

"Yes, it is so! Because Genevieve chooses to make a companion of her, she thinks she is as good as we are. But I can tell her, that she's mightily mistaken!"

"The pert, forward huzzy!" ejaculated Mrs. Hardamer, with a strong expression of disgust at the idea of one of her hirelings sitting up to entertain her daughters' company.

"Ring the bell for Millie!" she said, and Genevra rang the parlor bell.

"Tell Anne to come here," she said, on the appearance of the black girl.

In a few minutes Anne attended the summons.

"You are a nice young lady, now, ain't you?" said Mrs. Hardamer, as she entered, the face of the latter, red with passion.

Anne looked at her with an expression of surprise, and Mrs. Hardamer continued: "A pretty young lady, truly!"

"I do not understand you, madam," said Anne, in painful surprise. "Be kind enough to say, in what I have offended you."

"Pretty bold, too!—upon my word! Do you know who you are talking to, miss?"

"I am not conscious of having done anything wrong, Mrs. Hardamer, and only asked you to tell me in what I had offended you," said Anne, in a respectful voice, though her lips quivered, and her face had grown exceeding pale.

"Did any one ever see such assurance!" exclaimed Genevra.

"What can this mean!" said Anne, the tears starting to her eyes.

"Mighty ignorant!" said Gertrude.

"I must insist on an explanation," said Anne, more firmly, brushing away two drops that had stolen over their boundaries, and were gently gliding down her pale cheeks.

"Insist on an explanation!" exclaimed Mrs. Hardamer, in supreme astonishment at Anne's insolence. "Insist on an explanation from me! Do you know who you are talking to, miss?"

"I'd turn her out of the house, bag and baggage, so I would!" said Gertrude.

"Indeed, madam, I cannot suffer myself to be talked to in this way," said Anne, calmly, "at the same time that I am innocent of having done anything wrong," and she turned to leave the room.

"How dare you!" exclaimed Mrs. Hardamer, in a loud voice, stamping on the floor with her foot. "Come back here this minute!"

Anne paused, and half-turned herself toward her censors, when Gertrude said in a sneering tone—"She's got quite above herself since Mr. Illerton spoke to her."

Anne turned and advanced a few steps toward them, her face suffused with a deep crimson.

"You understand, now, I suppose, Miss Impertinence!" said Mrs. Hardamer. "How dare you stick yourself up in the parlor to talk to young men that come here? What good do you suppose they want with you?"

"Is that all I have done to offend you, Mrs. Hardamer?" said Anne, breathing more freely.

"And I should think that was enough, in all conscience!"

"But, Mrs. Hardamer, I didn't throw myself into his company. He came into the parlor where I was reading, and I at once told him the young ladies were out. If he would sit down and talk to me, how could I help it? I could not have acted so rudely as to have left him alone."

"Now that is too much!" broke in Gertrude. "And so you evened yourself with us, and set yourself up to entertain our company! Give me patience! I wouldn't allow her to stay in the house another day, if I was you, ma! Who's a-going to come here, if our hired girls stick themselves up to keep their company. Mr. Illerton was mortified to death, when he discovered his mistake, and I shouldn't blame him, if he never came to the house again."

"If ever you dare to play off such another trick, my young lady, it'll be your last day here, remember that, now!" said Mrs. Hardamer.

Anne made no answer, but turned and left the room.

"High-pop-a-lorum!" ejaculated Mitie to herself, as she retreated, silently, from the outside of the door, in the passage, where she had stood, listening to the whole conversation.

"Things have come to a pretty pass, truly!" said Geneva, when Anne had left the room, "that every hired girl must set herself up for somebody. There'll be no living here after awhile. I wish we were in England, where servants know their places."

"The fact is, ma," said Gertrude, who felt strongly incensed at Anne, for having passed an evening with Illerton, on whom she had designs best known to herself, "if I were you, I wouldn't keep her in the house. She'll bring discredit upon me. I don't believe she's any better than she should be, and her conduct in this thing has proved it. I'd pack her off to-morrow, so I would!"

SAVED BY A HORSE.

LET any man who ever struck a faithful horse in anger read this true story and be ashamed of himself:—

Some years since a party of surveyors had just finished their day's work in the north-western part of Illinois, when a violent snow-storm came on. They started for their camp, which was in a grove of about eighty acres in a large prairie, nearly twenty miles from any other timber.

The wind was blowing very hard, and the snow drifting so as nearly to blind them.

When they thought they had nearly reached their camp, they all at once came upon tracks in the snow. These they looked at with care, and found, to their dismay, that they were their own tracks.

It was now plain that they were lost on the great prairie, and that if they had to pass the night there, in the cold and snow, the chance was that not one of them would be alive in the morning.

While they were shivering with fear and the cold, the chief man of the party caught sight of one of their horses—a gray pony known as "Old Jack."

Then the chief said, "if any one can show us our way to camp, out of this blinding snow, Old Jack can do it. I will take off his bridle and let him loose, and we can follow him. I think he will show us our way back to camp."

The horse, as soon as he found himself free, threw his head and tail into the air, as if proud of the trust that had been put upon him. Then he snuffed the breeze, and gave a loud snort, which seemed to say: "Come on, boys! Follow me; I'll lead you out of this scrape." He then turned in a new direction and trotted along, but not so fast that the men could not follow him. They had not gone more than a mile when they saw the cheerful blaze of their camp-fires, and they gave a loud hurra at the sight, and for Old Jack.

BEYOND THE CLOUDS.

EDITH W. KENT.

ABOVE the clouds the stars are always shining!—
This precious thought is beautiful to me;
For, how'er dark and shift the night may lower,
I know they're there, although I cannot see.

And even thus 'tis with our lives, divining
In tenderest love, all that may us betide,
(Tho' hidden, oft, by clouds of doubt and sorrow,)
The Blessed One e'er lingers by our side.

Our Father sees our childish arms entwining
Earth's vain supports that, soon or late, must fail;
In tender love He shattereth those idols—
He teacheth us how vain they were—how frail.

For He would have us trust His love, resigning
All that our hearts and Him might come between.
Christ is the one and only sure foundation,
And His the only arm on which to lean.

As fierce and hot must be the fire refining
The precious ore—which proves the worthless dross,
So shall thy soul, however great thy trial,
If trusting God, win good—not suffer loss.

When all seems dark, He then the "silver lining,"
Of clouds which shade our life, would have us see;
The "stars" are there—God's love and sovereign mercy—
Beyond the clouds some good for you and me.

Let us look up and cease all vain repining,
In faith press on—He will the clouds divide;
And we, beyond life's sorrows, pain and turmoil,
Find endless joy upon "the other side."

Or all passions, there is none so extravagant and outrageous as that of anger; other passions solicit and mislead us, but this ruts away with us by force, and hurries us as well to our own as to another's ruin; it falls many times upon the wrong person, and discharges itself upon the innocent instead of the guilty, and makes the most trivial offences to be capital, and punishes an inconsiderate word perhaps with fetters, or death; it allows a man neither time nor means for defence, but judges a cause without hearing it, and admits of no mediation; it spares neither friend nor foe, but tears all to pieces, and casts human nature into a perpetual state of war.

ONE OF MANY.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

I STOOD beside the loom of a poor woman who took in weaving.

It was cold and cheerless—an old shawl was pinned about her head and neck; there was no fire among the scattered gray ashes that lay on the hearth. Everything looked desolate, and the very crown of this utter desolation was centred in a worn knapsack and haversack that hung in the corner of the room above the poor woman's head. They hung so that every time she went round to the back part of the loom to the yarn-beam, to fix and loosen the threads and thrid them through her fingers, her gaze would fall on them.

That was what she wanted, and why she hung them there.

I could not open the old wound in her heart by asking about them; I knew a little of the story, and this was what I knew: that their son, a boy of seventeen, had enlisted against the will of his parents, and that it almost broke their hearts to part with him. While his regiment lay in Kentucky, the boy, Hezekiah, was shot dead one night, a sentinel on duty.

My Brother Dick was in the same regiment, and he wrote home immediately, and told us to break the intelligence to the family as best we could.

My father took the letter, and with a sad heart started over the wooded hill, the shortest way to their home. When he came in sight of the house his heart misgave him. The father was out ploughing; the door and windows were open, and the sound of the poor mother's loom blended with the song of the sister, as she sat sewing on the door-sill, and the laughter of the little ones swinging in the beech above the spring. This was too much for my father, and he sat down among the dry leaves, powerless to do the sad errand.

A neighbor was hauling wood near by, and father asked him to be the bearer of the sorrowful intelligence; he demurred, but at length consented, and hitching his team he went over to where the doomed man was ploughing. The two stood still in conversation, then their heads bowed—a moment more, and the neighbor returned to his team. In a blind, dazed way, the father took up the lines, gave them a jerk, looked up at the sky, stared all around him, and then bethought himself that he was ploughing. The plough lay on its side dragging and making scratchy marks in the green sward. He took hold of one handle—he didn't place the point down into the thick sod, and the horses walked on in an aimless way.

The poor man! He went round that field, the plough lying on its side half the time—the horses in the furrow, or out of it, just as it happened. Sometimes he rubbed his forehead in a dazed, bewildered way, looking up at the sky, then away to the eastern hills, bathed in all the glory of a beautiful summer morning's sunlight—a shine that fell like the ailing of gold-dust. To him I doubt not that glorious warm sky was as brass above him.

After he had gone around the field, and started on again, never heeding the nice turn of a corner, he passed, the lines fell from his hands, and he turned his steps toward the house. Instead of climbing where the fence was low and the rails smooth, he went into a steep corner, full of bristling nettles and thistles, and clambered over the highest rails. There was no spring in his step when he came to the ground—he blundered through the wood yard, and fumbled long at the gate-latch, and then his unsteady step was on the porch, and out of sight of the tearful eyes that watched him agonizingly.

A moment it was before the clacking shuttle lost a note out of its monotonous work-a-day song—then it stopped—it fell to the floor; there was a crash of something falling, a chair, perhaps, or the loom-bench, or the mother. A shriek—another—and another; then the singing in the doorway was hushed, changed to wailing; the swing in the beech was left swaying alone and unoccupied, and the cries of the sorrowing family rose upon the still morning air.

The most pitiful cry in the world—a man's cry, it was—then broke forth for the first time, mingled with the mother's and daughter's and the little ones'.

My neighbor, who told me this, said: "Oh, I knew not how soon my turn would come! My beloved boys were as dear to me as her boy was to her and to them. I couldn't stand it to witness such grief, and I ran to my bed-room and buried my face among the pillows."

The team stood in the broken furrow for hours, and the plough lay on its side until the yellow rust gathered on its polished share.

Oh, hearts that have been rent with a like anguish, you know your own bitterness! God pity you—your tears have fallen like rain, and this broken swath will open your wounds anew. There are no sadder pages in your life-book than these, no more poignant sorrow than you suffered at that time.

You will understand the sympathy that wells out of my heart for all sorrow-stricken mothers, when I look upon the knapsack and haversack so tenderly kept and cared for by that bereft woman. That touches me as no other expression of sorrow could.

If any one speak evil of you, see home to your own conscience, and examine your heart; if you be guilty, it is a just correction; if not guilty, it is a fair instruction; make use of both; so shall you distil honey out of gall, and out of an open enemy make a secret friend.

RELIGIOUS READING.

CARE FOR TO-MORROW.

BY REV. JAMES REED.

"THE Kingdom of God and His righteousness" should be first in every affection, thought and action. That is to say, we should have primary regard to them in all things. No duty of life is so common or trivial that we may not rightly ask how the Lord's will can be most fully done in its performance. As far as the highest and best things really hold the chief place within us, all lower and more external matters become subordinate and secondary. We may not, nor should we, be indifferent to them; but our happiness is, not dependent on them. They are the accessories of our life—something added to it—but not our life itself.

In such a state of mind as this, no one can be anxious about the future. Hence, in the phrase, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow," there is a peculiar significance in the word, "therefore," which refers back to the words, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Because the Lord provides perfectly for all our needs, and in a state of heavenly order we clearly see and feel that this is so, therefore every troubled thought about the future is out of place. Instead of it should be unchanging trust in Him who holds in His hands the issues of time and eternity.

Nothing is more natural for man than to worry and fret, and indulge in gloomy forebodings about the future. Even though all is going well in the present, and our whole past life has teemed with blessings, yet when we look forward we are too often filled with doubts and fears. The events of the future are, of course, unknown to us; and we anxiously ask ourselves, How is this going to be? or, How is that going to be? or, What shall we do or say in such or such a case?—just as if the goodness and wisdom which had watched over and helped us in the days gone by would be found wanting in the time to come. The trouble which we thus borrow is not only needless but sinful, for it is born of the spirit of mistrust. To him who yields to such misgivings the Lord cannot be a near and ever-present God. He must seem like one afar off, even like Baal, of whom Elijah said, "Either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or, peradventure, he sleepeth, and must be awaked." The loving Father who notes the sparrow's fall, and numbers the very hairs of our heads, is a wholly different Being. Where He is the object of contemplation and worship, there can be no occasion for doubt and trembling in any of the circumstances which surround us.

Anxious anticipation always proves itself as groundless as it is painful. It is always in some manner or degree falsified by the reality. The event does not take place according to expectation, or it is modified by unlooked-for occurrences, or more certainly when it comes the strength is given us to meet it. If we but "rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him," He will show us on the morrow how to do the morrow's work.

But the morrow will then be to-day. This, then, is the conclusion to which we are brought by experience as well as by doctrine: that life is best spent in doing faithfully the duties of each day as they arise, whatever they may be; and that while the morrow need not be banished from our thoughts, it is foolish and unchristian to indulge in dreamy speculations about it, still more, to conjure up spectres in connection with it which do not now, and in all likelihood never will, have any substantial existence.

It is a beautiful and unvarying law of Providence that, if we look to the Lord for help and guidance, the power is always given to cope with the difficulties, and to perform the duties of the present moment. We can always see far enough in advance to enable us to take the next step. It is only when we try to anticipate some future condition or circumstance that the way becomes wholly dark and dubious. Divine Providence does not give us light and strength for dealing with events which are not yet present with us. But as we draw near to them, we can see them clearly, and have a power to meet them which surpasses all previous expectation. Truly the morrow takes thought for the things of itself.

One inevitable event which is often looked forward to with dread is the process of leaving this world. But how unprofitable it is to dwell on it with anxious forebodings. When the time comes for us to go, the way will be made as clear and easy as it is in any other work which we have to do. Angels draw near with the influences of peace to withdraw the spirit from the body, and all the shades of doubt and dread are chased away. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me."

There is but one thing about which it is allowable that we should feel any deep anxiety, and that is the evils of our own heart and life. If these never cause us any painful reflections, we may well doubt whether we are making progress on the way to Heaven. But even with respect to these, we should not let our anxiety carry us too far. The remembrance of our past life, and the consciousness of our sinful states, should not be suffered to paralyze our efforts. Above all, they should not be permitted to extinguish the hope which is always held out by a kind Providence to every sinner that repenteth.

PEACE is the evening star of the soul, as virtue is its sun, and the two are never far apart.

He who defers his charities till his death is rather liberal of another man's goods than of his own.

NATURE the evil nor the good that men do is ever interred with their bones, but lives after them.

Man's nature runs either to herbs or weeds; let him reasonably water the one and destroy the other.

It never was a wise thing yet to make men despondent for one who hath no hope of good hath no fear of evil.

THINK are men, who by long consulting only their own inclination, have forgotten that others have a claim to the same deference.

"This little fellow," said Martin Luther, of a bird going to roost, "has chosen his shelter, and is quietly roosting himself to sleep without a care for to-morrow's lodging, calmly holding with his little twig, and leaving God alone to think for him."

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

REAPING THE WHIRLWIND.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

"COME, Charlie, here is something good for you in this spoon; it will cure your head and make you well again—that's a little man! he likes good sweet things!" and Charlie's mother held the spoon so that he could not see its contents—a jalap mixture, bitter and nauseating.

"Is it nasty, ma?" whined the sick child.

"No, dear, it's good and sweet; I made it purposely for you. Now, take it, love, for me—go 'way, ugly Annie, you sha'n't have my Charlie's good things! Go right away, you bad girl! Here, take it quick, 'fore somebody else comes and gets it. Be ma's little man, and when he gets well he shall ride in grandpa's new carriage with the soft cushions in it;" and while he looked fully in her eyes, she slipped her hand under his back and raised him up, and thrust the spoon between his clattering teeth.

As soon as he tasted the vile mixture, and knew that he had been deceived, he strangled, and struggled, and whooped, and out the air with arms and legs, and sputtered some of the bitter dose over his pillow. She seized him by the little nose, and caught his limbs in their frantic gyrations, and held him down by main force and made him swallow some of the medicine.

"What made you tell me a lie, ma?" he said, as he lay tired and panting after the struggle, his eyelashes wet with tears. "You said it was good and sweet, and it wasn't—it was, oh, so nasty!" and he shuddered all over, and his lips quivered. "You might have told me it was bad! I don't like you very well, ma!" and the poor little child was grieved beyond utterance.

"Oh, I wanted to make you well again, dear," she said, apologetically; "I don't want my little Tarty to be sick; you're all the company I have. I miss you so, little sick darling!" and she kissed the wan face that cuddled closer to her own.

But it was vain, all this glaze of soft words; the child's confidence in his mother was already shaken; she had deceived him; and in doing that, she had fallen from the high place in which a child enshrines a true and loving mother. No after words or deeds could place her again where she had once stood.

Charlie's father had given him money at different times, which his mother had put up on the highest shelf of the cupboard in a large goblet. One day Charlie wanted to see his money; his mother told him he might lose it, that it was safer there; but the child cried, and insisted; and at last, worried and impatient, she took down the goblet, and—found it empty.

"Why, Charlie, your money is gone—gone—but I know where it went—the naughty mice have gotten into the cupboard and eaten your money! Oh, that's too bad!"

"Do you think they did eat it, ma?—do you?" said he, looking earnestly into her eyes.

"Yes; and I'll set a trap for 'em 'way up in the cupboard, and we'll catch the naughty mice," said she.

We don't know whether Charlie believed her or not—we doubt it; the mother who tries to deceive her child runs a great risk of being found out, or distrusted, which is even worse.

And, like half the children in our homes, this was the way Charlie was brought up. When he was fifteen years old, his parents shielded him in all wrong-doing that he committed, such as stealing apples, or melons, or peaches, or in lying or cheating, or doing "sharp" things in which he outwitted or overreached or deceived his associates; he always found a ready ally in his weak mother. They winked at his errors and were blind to his faults, and they were fast reaping the fruits of the seed they had sown so early.

So the sweet-faced, pretty boy grew up in idle ways, a victim to bad habits. And now, in his mother's widowhood, and in the years of his young manhood, her eyes have opened, the scales have fallen from them, and it is too late; she, bereft and alone, must reap the whirlwind.

One day last week he was arrested for burglary, and unless some one will come forward and bail him, the penalty of the law must be enforced.

As I was washing dishes last Saturday evening, my thoughts intent on Charlie all the time, I began to think that perhaps I had not done all my duty toward him. I couldn't quit thinking about it. I was so troubled and impressed; that I put on my bonnet and ran right down to Charlie's home. The mother met me with a cold, hard, questioning look in her gray eyes; their expression said as plain as speech, "What are you here for?" I dropped into a chair unasked, while she stood before me.

"I ran down to condole with you about Charlie," I said, bravely; and just then my heart sank within me, a vision of long ago seemed to come up before me. I saw the dear child, the Charlie of years ago, in his little delaine cloak and jaunty cap, and his round, clean, sweet face, with clear blue eyes and heavy lashes, just as he used to be when he sat in our table chair, and with a little spoon ate of "auntie's good dinners." With this vision before me, I cried right out good and loud; I couldn't help it; I wailed like an Irish banshee. I had not cried before; had not thought of it; hadn't it in my programme at all; and it broke in on my plans sadly. I tried, but couldn't quit crying. I looked up; she stood before me picking her teeth as coolly as a brigand.

"Oh, don't mind Charlie—I don't any more; he don't believe me, or heed me, or take my advice at all, and now he must take the consequences. I don't fret about him; it will do no good."

"But you know," said I, "that a mother's sharpest sorrow in this life comes to her through her children; no other sorrow is half so bitter, so poignant as this;" and I looked into her face.

Such a face as I saw! I shall never forget it. I wish it had not been a mother's; or, being a mother's face, that it had been masked. It seemed as if it were turning to stone—pained, and hopeless, and hard.

She turned to go back to her supper, coolly saying: "Save your tears and your words; don't mind Charlie; it's no use now, it's too late. I am not troubled; I've put him out of my heart;" and that poor mother, hard as though stricken into granite, turned away and left me, and I soon heard the cheerful clink of cutlery on her plate in the dining-room.

I did not feel insulted or hurt at her coolness; I pitied her; she felt that I intruded upon her, that I had ventured boldly into the most sacred chamber of her heart, and she had shut the door in my tear-wet face. I cried all the way home; I wept unavailing tears, because of the dwarfed and blighted lives all over the world.

How many mothers there are who sow the wind, as did this poor one, in their children's babyhood—begin by deceiving them and making them lose confidence in this one above all others.

If a child loses faith in the mother, if it sees her come down from the pure, white, exalted heights where it had enthroned her, and be human, and fallible, and irascible, and full of faults, then the sceptre will have fallen from her hands forever.

Her voice should never be sharpened with anger, or loud or rasping, her face never distorted with rage, her words truthful, her mien gracious and gentle, her rule the rule of love; she should always be shrined in their memory as one set apart, above all others, consecrated, immaculate, "OUR MOTHER."

HOW TO KEEP CHILDREN OUT OF MISCHIEF.

THE Herald of Health, in answer to a query, says "The surest and easiest way to keep children, and grown folks, too, for that matter, out of mischief, is to keep them busy. The trouble is, that babies begin to throw out the hands and feet after things within reach, and we begin by saying, 'No!' and holding them back; and by and by, when the little ones get out of our arms, and we say, 'No, no!' they turn faster than we can follow them to something else, only to be again reproved, until they are glad to get out of our sight and find vent for their activity in liberty."

"Begin rather by supplying the out-reaching fingers, and as the desires develop and enlarge, keep the busy brain and body interested in harmless ways, and there will be little cause to fear that they will go far astray."

MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

BY POLLY HAWTHORNE.

IN company, some time since, the conversation turned on the case of a young man who had met with a serious accident while intoxicated.

Various exclamations passed around the circle, till one lady said: "And his mother, how I do pity her!"

"I cannot say that I do," said a young man present.

Of course every one was astonished, and the lady turned to him and said: "You! Not pity his mother?"

"I can't say that I do," he replied, "for I hold her responsible for it."

"Mrs. M—— responsible for what her son does?" queried the lady.

"Yes, ma'am, I think so," he answered; "she should have trained him differently."

"You do not think mothers can make just such men as they wish of their sons?" said the lady.

"Perhaps not," said he; "but I know they can teach them to love virtue and to shun vice of every kind."

"But you forget," I said, "how many influences beside the mother's act on children, especially those raised, like Mrs. M——'s, in a town."

"No, ma'am," said he, "I do not forget; I know these things better than you can; but it does not change my views."

"I know," said a gentleman, "there is but one way to do anything with children, and that is to bear down on them all the time, from their very cradles up."

"I do not know," said the young man; "I don't know what fathers might do, but I know mothers can, by constant watching, by judiciously and continually repressing the tendency to evil and encouraging the good, train their sons to hate evil and to love good in their own lives."

That conversation has haunted me ever since, with its assertions and suggestions. Are mothers morally responsible for the lives of their children—and how far? How many of us to-day would be willing to see all the bearings of our lives reproduced in our children?

We know that there are unnumbered influences besides our own acting on them continually. Can we by our teachings cause all these influences to work for good to them, or else fall harmlessly away?

As I bewilder myself with these questions, a voice comes echoing down through the ages: "Oh, ye of little faith, why will ye doubt?" And, "I can do all things through Christ's helping me."

Mothers, let us see to it, by the help of God, that there is nothing in our lives that we may fear for them to copy, and then let us commit them to His care with a faith that will not doubt.

WOMAN'S MISSION.

BY MRS. M. A. FURNALD.

GUIDING the little footsteps
Where only daisies blow;
Striving to hold the roses back,
Because of the thorns below;
Longing to span the future,
Placing a mother's care
Over life's paths, where thorns lie hid
Under the flowers fair.

Combing the flowing tresses
Back from a little face,
Thinking of all the strength we need,
And of the needed grace;
To smooth each day the tangles
Out of the light-brown hair,
To keep as well all sorrow and sin
From marring a life so fair.

Flecking the milk so creamy
With snowy bits of bread;
Stillling the murmur of rosy lips
So eager to be fed;
Thinking of Him who casteth
Into our empty hands,
Bidding us feed His little ones
By teaching His dear commands.

Keeping the house in order,
And, ere the shadows come,
Hasting the snowy cloth to spread
To welcome loved ones home;
Thinking of woman's mission,
Nor caring to change her sphere,
Knowing the highest, the holiest work
Is given to woman here.

In general those parents have most reverence who most deserve it; for he that lives well cannot be despised.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

THE OTTER.

BY E. B. D.

THE otter is a fisher by trade, or perhaps I should say by birth, as he never has to serve any apprenticeship at the business. No man can equal him fishing, no matter how well he may be rigged out with the best of rods and lines, and fancy flies. The otter would laugh, if he knew how, at any such bungling contrivances. He does not have to sit on the bank and wait patiently for the fish to come to him, and give a nibble at his bait. Instead of that, he dives into the water, and using his long, tapering tail for a rudder, and his webbed feet for paddles, away he goes after the fish he has made up his mind to into the nets, and sometimes bring up the larger fish with their teeth.

I have read of numerous anecdotes of tame otters. A man named Collins, living in England, had a tame otter which followed him wherever he went. Mr. Collins used frequently to take the otter to the river and let him fish for himself; and when his appetite was satisfied, he never failed to come back to his master. One day Mr. Collins's son took him out instead, when he refused to come back at the accustomed call. Mr. Collins searched for several days, and was about to give him up for lost, when he finally came at the call of his name, and creeping about his master's feet, showed great affection for him.

breakfast on. Off darts the fish for dear life, up the stream, down the stream, into holes, under rocks, and behind and among reeds and rushes, and close after him keeps the otter, never stopping to come to the surface to breathe, and never giving his intended victim a moment's rest. At last the fish is tired out, and the otter easily catches it, and carrying it to his den, which is usually close to the water, eats it at his leisure, and then goes after another. It will catch and eat eight or ten fish for a single meal. At this rate it does not take long for a pair of otters with a tolerably large family to provide for, to use up all the fish of a pond or stream.

Otters are sometimes caught and tamed, and used to help in catching fish. They are taught to drive the fish Dogs are frequently taught to catch otters. Still, when they are brought up together they live on friendly terms.

The otter wears an under-vest of short, close, water-proof wool, to protect him from the wet in his fishing excursions. Over this he has a coat of long, coarse, glossy hair. He generally remains in his burrow—which is near the water's edge, and is carried deep down into the bank—during the day, and roams about at night.

This animal used to be abundant in England and Scotland, and is still occasionally found in those countries, especially in the northern portions of Scotland. One species is also found in the northern portion of North America near the Arctic Sea.

THE CAT THAT SAVED THE BABY.

"O H, mamma! Just see this picture!" cried Annie May as she sat turning the leaves of a new book. "Here's a pussy-cat pulling a lady's dress. What is she doing?"

Mrs. May took the book, and after reading a page, said:

"Why, this is wonderful! The pussy-cat you see in the picture saved a baby's life."

"Why, mamma! Saved a baby's life? Tell me about it."

"The book says it is a true story, and was told to the writer by one who saw it," replied Mrs. May. "A lady was sitting by the fire, when her cat came running into the room in a hurried, distressed kind of way, and looking up into her face, began to mew piteously. At first the lady, being busy with her work, paid no attention to the cat, but the animal would not be put off. She continued her piteous cries, running to the door and then back again to the lady, showing more and more distress. At last the cat stretched out one of her claws and pulled her mistress by the apron.

"The lady, beginning to feel alarmed at this strange conduct, started up, when the cat ran before her into a small wash-house. And what do you think she found?"

"What, mamma?" asked her eager listener.

"Why, her own two-year-old little boy in a tub of water, and nearly drowned. The cat had saved the baby!"

"Oh! What a dear good cat!" exclaimed Annie.

"Yes; I think you may well say a dear good cat," answered her mother. "If it had been a dog, we should not wonder so much, but for a cat to do a thing like this is strange indeed, for cats do not usually show much affection or intelligence."

THE HOME CIRCLE.

THE OLD COAT.

"SHADE of Pipsissway Potts! tell me what to do with this old coat," said Arabelle, turning over the garment with considerable snap.

"You girls will get to be profane over Pipsey, yet," said Tom, who sat reading the last HOME MAGAZINE by the east window.

"Call over the alphabet," said mischievous Maud, as she gave three shy raps under the table.

"That's too slow a process," said Belle. "I want some advice right away. I'll leave it to you, Cousin Lucy, if it isn't a great deal easier to make over these old dresses and things on paper than in reality. It sounds very nice, but oh! the practical application is what I dread. It's awful to be poor."

"Yes; but it is awful to be rich, and get so little comfort out of it, as most of the rich people I happen to know, do out of their possessions. Depend upon it, there is more vexation in having a splendid dress made up just a little amiss, and then seeing it outshone the first time it is worn, than there is in making over our old ones into something that pleases us, if it isn't so very fine. Every success of that kind makes me happy, as long as the article lasts. It is one of the cheapest recipes for happiness, I know. You will own yourself that you always liked that pretty home square you have on."

"That is true; and I never grudged the time and trouble it cost me—after it was done, mind you, Lucy."

"I understand," said Lucy, smiling.

She well remembered how Belle fretted, and said, "I never can get it out," when the process was going on.

Indeed, I think she was right. She never could without the aid of her patient, painstaking cousin, who planned and pieced so cheerfully.

It was a good thing for Belle that Lucy happened to be around in the present emergency, and that she had the skill to pin on a newspaper to her own handsomely-fitting coat, making pin pricks all along the seams, so that a pattern could easily be cut from it."

"That is half the battle," said Lucy, as she laid down the pattern smoothly on the table. "Now, let us take your coat apart and press out the seams."

The two set to work diligently, and soon the pieces were all ready for use. The old sleeves answered very well when newly trimmed, and the coat was soon out and stitched up on the sewing-machine.

"Belle would have been fretting ever that until now," said Maud, "and not even have made a beginning."

"Shouldn't wonder," said Belle, turning herself around before the glass with great satisfaction.

The coat was finished before tea-time, and when Tom took the girls to the concert that evening, Belle had the pleasant consciousness that her coat was as respectable as the other girls' were—a very satisfactory feeling, as any young girl will tell you, and one that added largely to her enjoyment of the music.

"BITS OF TALK."

A LITTLE book, by H. H., with the above title, has recently appeared, which I wish could be read and re-read by every mother, and every father, too, in the land. The articles on "Needless Denials," "The Awkward Age," "Breaking the Will," and "Whipping," are invaluable. So is the "Reign of Archelus." The book, throughout, has not a shallow idea. It is small—as gems are small. But, if these articles only were well read, pondered, and practised by parents, the little volume would prove a very angel of mercy to the children.

It is from no bias of personal friendship that I write these lines. I do admire and love the author, but I know her only through her writings. I have no interest in the book, other than the intrinsic value of its subject-matter, its bearing on the happiness and lasting welfare of the little ones, and the desire that so faithful and earnest a laborer in humanity's cause should be recognized as she richly merits.

M. O. JOHNSON.

DON'T TELL IT.

BY J. E. M'C.

"IT will so vex Harry when I tell him how spitefully John Gray spoke about him," said Mrs. Robbins.

"But why need you tell him? Mr. Gray was angry at the moment, and, I dare say, regretted what he said afterward."

"Why, Lizzie," said the other, "do you keep any secrets from your husband?"

"Indeed, I do. A hundred worrying things, that it would do him no good to know, I look up in my own bosom. I often think I should like to tell this or that, but it would make him unhappy for nothing, and I will not do it. When I feel it is necessary to tell an unpleasant truth, I try to do it as comfortably as I can, to look on the brightest side possible."

"Well, I must say," said the other, a little puzzled to know how to excuse her own course, which was quite the reverse, "that I think there should be no secrets between husband and wife."

"Yet, I am sure, my dear, you have a great many every day. 'You don't begin to tell all you think.'"

"That is quite another matter. No one tells all his thoughts."

"Then you do draw the line somewhere; you admit you have secrets from your husband. Now, I draw the line at whatever would cause unhappiness needlessly. Of course, when it is necessary to tell an unpleasant fact, I do so; but the hundred little annoyances we women have every day, what good can come of repeating them?"

"Now, I think that is a very absurd plan of yours, Lizzie. There is no reason why he should not share your troubles. It is quite as proper for him to bear the burden as for you to take the whole. It just spoils a man to indulge him so much."

"One fact is worth a dozen arguments," said Lizzie. "We do have a happy home."

There was not the slightest reflection on her friend's home-life, but the other could not but remember that her home was often very far from being a happy one. Her boasted "frankness" did not work so well in practice.

"I have always found," continued Lizzie, "that it paid to make home pleasant. When William returns, worried with his business, I do not harass him with tales of the children's faults, or the girls' shortcomings. I have the room snug and tidy, and something nice on the table, and if there is any good news to tell, or any pleasant circumstance that has happened while he was away, I make a point of bringing it up at tea-time. The result is, we take our meal in peace and comfort. I am certainly happier for seeing him cheerful, and for knowing he appreciates the comfort and rest of home. Depend upon it, my friend, happiness turns on very little hinges. If I were only selfishly seeking my own pleasure, I should try all the same to make home bright for the rest. For, there is nothing that brings so much joy to our own bosoms as the feeling that we have made others happy. The opposite of this proposition is equally true."

DEAR HOME CIRCLE: What has become of our once faithful Uncle Grumbler? For at least two years his voice has not been lifted up in solemn proclamation against the follies of womankind. Have the infirmities and disabilities of his forlorn bachelorhood so fearfully increased as to preclude further attention to the miserable ways of this wicked old world? We certainly cannot "lay the flattering unction to our soul" of having silenced him by saucy replies; for his "last," if we recollect aright, was fulminated against the Grecian band, and therefore found us silent and approving.

Perhaps he is so well pleased with the present stage of the "woman movement," that he also is "silent and approving." If this be the case, we extend our hand with hearty sympathy. If he has taken to himself a wife, and thus found it necessary to change his former striking and mistaken notions concerning the aims and ways of the "fair sex," he has our sincere congratulations. But, really, in either case, we trust he will once more shed upon us the light of his pensive countenance, and give us the result of his meditative silence.

In this wish, we presume, the other members of the "Home Circle" will join with COUSIN JENNY.

INDEPENDENCE OF DAUGHTERS.

IN the ideal household of father and mother and adult children, the one great aim of the parents ought to be to supply, as far as possible, to each child, that freedom and independence which they have missed the opportunity of securing in homes of their own. The loss of this one thing alone is a bitterer drop in the loneliness of many an unmarried woman whose parents, especially fathers, are apt even to dream—food and clothes and lodgings are so exalted in unthinking estimates. To be without them would be distressingly inconvenient, no doubt; but one can have luxurious provision of both, and remain very wretched. Even the body itself cannot thrive if it has no more than the three pottage meat. Freedom to come, go, speak, work, play—in short, to be one's self—is to the body more than meat and gold, and to the soul the whole of life.—From "Bits of Talk about Home Matters," by H. H.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

ATHIRST.

BY SARAH EDWARDS HENSHAW.

THE day had been long and tiresome
And laden with petty cares;
And a discontented spirit
Had crept on me unawares.

And I said to myself at evening
As I wearily sought my room,
And, dropping down by the window
Looked out on the gathering gloom;

Great, ah! great is the labor,
And small is the pleasure of life!
With its actual and ideal
In hopeless discord and strife.

We are here and must bear our burden;
We are here and must weep or rejoice;
Existence is forced upon us—
No chance for refusal or choice—

Made up with hopes to be thwarted,
With wishes to be denied,
With yearnings and aspirations
To be ever unsatisfied!

And oh, the wearisome sameness!
And oh, the discord and din!
The contrast of life as we find it,
And life as we paint it within.

In the grasp of the deadly real
We struggle, we flutter in vain;
And our beautiful, mocking ideal
Brings us but torture and pain.

Why is it? I dropped the curtain,
I moodily turned to the light,
And wearily made ready
To bid the world good-night.

At the last, as in my custom,
I seated myself, and took
My little, worn, long-used Bible—
The old, new, wondrous book.

At first, from the well-known phrases
Small meaning I seemed to gain,
But by and by, a strange comfort
Stole into heart and brain.

Only a few short verses,
And these oft read before,
But courage and strength and patience
Into my soul they bore.

And I laid me down to slumber,
Feeling that all was right,
And I always shall think God's angels
Brought me my dreams that night.

Oh, Book of books! around thee
Raging doubt, denial and strife!
What matter? the humble, thirsting soul
Finds thee the water of life!—Advance.

SPIRITUAL SONG.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.
FROM THE GERMAN OF NOVALIS.

THE times are all so fearful!
The heart so full of cares!
To eyes that question tearful
The future spectral stares.

Wild terrors creep and hover
With foot so ghastly soft!
The soul black midnights cover
Like mountains piled aloft.

Firm props like reeds are waving;
For trust is left no stay;
The thoughts, with whirlpool-raving,
No more the will obey.

Frenzy, with eye restless,
Decoys from Truth's defence;
Life's pulse is flagging listless,
And dull is every sense.

Who hath the cross upheaved,
To shelter and make whole?
Who lives from sight received
That he may help the soul?

Haste to the tree of wonder;
Give silent longing room;
Outgoing flames agunder
Will cleave the phantom-gloom.

Draws thee an angel tender
In safety on the strand;
Lo! at thy feet in splendor,
Outspreads the promised land.

I HAVE SOMETHING SWEET TO TELL YOU.

BY MRS. F. OSGOOD.

I HAVE something sweet to tell you,
But the secret you must keep;
And remember, if it isn't right,
I'm "talking in my sleep."

For I know I am but dreaming,
When I think your love is mine;
And I know they are but seeming,
All the hopes that round me shine.

So remember, when I tell you,
What I can no longer keep,
We are none of us responsible
For what we say in sleep.

My pretty secret's coming,
Oh, listen with your heart,
And you shall hear it humming
So close, 'twill make you start.

Oh, shut your eyes so earnest,
Or mine will widely weep;
I love you! I adore you! but—
"I'm talking in my sleep."

THERE.

BY MARY ALOYSIA FRANCIS.

THE pigeon lights on a friendly roof,
 North and south through the Russian cities;
 And the tread of man, and the steed's quick hoof,
 Spare the bird that the nation pities.
 East and west if its bright wings bear it,
 Shelter and food are its boon from all;
 No cruel hand from its nest may tear it,
 No brutal touch on its form may fall:
 Happy the bird, in that land afar,
 Under the sway of the stately Czar!

In the storied country of Eastern Kings,
 Where the crescent floats o'er the calm Bosphorus,
 And the minaret's music at sunset rings
 The "call to prayer" in a sad, sweet chorus—
 Far and near through the proud dominion,
 They hold of all homes that home most blest,
 That ofteneest sees the bird's white pinion
 Flash, in the sunshine, above its nest:
 And the innocent life is as sacred to all,
 As it was in Eden before the fall!

Hundreds of years have come and gone,
 Since, by the Doge Dandolo's order,
 The tale of that Eastern sceptre won,
 Flew, with the pigeons, across the border.
 Yet Venice still links that departed glory
 To the glory that hers in the present must be;
 And this is the sweetest and tenderest story
 Told of the city beside the sea:
 For there, by the will of the Doge long dead,
 The birds by thousands are daily fed!

Changing masters has Venice seen,
 And changing customs have swayed the city;
 But French or Austrian hearts have been Responsive to long-descended pity.
 When "two" on the bell of St. Mark's is ringing,
 The grain still falls from a civic hand,
 And there are the pigeons, cooing and singing—
 Graceful guests of a graceful land:
 Since this world was a world of pain, I ween,
 Never a fairer sight was seen!

—Our Dumb Animals.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GIVE THANKS.

A LITTLE boy had sought the pump,
 From whence the sparkling water burst,
 And drank with eager joy the draught
 That kindly quenched his raging thirst;
 Then gracefully he touched his cap—
 "I thank you, Mr. Pump," he said,
 "For this nice drink you've given me!"
 (This little boy had been well bred.)

Then said the Pump: "My little man,
 You're welcome to what I have done;
 But I am not the one to thank,
 I only help the Water run."
 "Oh, then," the little fellow said (Polite he always meant to be),
 "Cold Water, please accept my thanks;
 You have been very kind to me."

"Ah," said Cold Water, "don't thank me;
 Far up the hill-side lives the Spring
 That sends me forth with generous hand
 To gladden every living thing."
 "I'll thank the Spring, then," said the boy;
 And gracefully he bowed his head;
 "Oh, don't thank me, my little man,"
 The Spring with silvery accents said—

"Oh, don't thank me—for what am I
 Without the Dew and Summer Rain?
 Without their aid I ne'er could quench
 Your thirst, my little boy, again."
 "Oh, well, then!" said the little boy,
 "I'll gladly thank the Rain and Dew."
 "Pray, don't thank us—without the Sun
 We could not fill one cup for you."

"Then, Mr. Sun, ten thousand thanks
 For all that you have done for me."
 "Stop!" said the Sun, with blushing face,
 "My little fellow, don't thank me;
 'Twas from the Ocean's mighty stores
 I drew this draught I gave to thee."
 "Oh, Ocean, thanks!" then said the boy.
 It echoed back, "Not unto me—

"Not unto me, but unto Him,
 Who formed the depths in which I lie;
 Go, give thy thanks, my little boy,
 To Him who will thy wants supply."
 The boy took off his cap, and said,
 In tones so gentle and subdued,
 "Oh, God, I thank Thee for this gift—Thou art the giver of all good."

I DIDN'T KNOW.

HE gave me a knife one day at school,
 Four-bladed, the handle of pearl;
 And great black words on the wrapper said,
 "For the darlin'gest little girl."
 I was glad!—Oh, yes, yet the crimson blood
 To my young cheek came and went,
 And my heart thumped wondrously pit-a-pat,
 But I didn't know what it meant.

One night he said I must jump on his sled,
 For the snow was falling fast;
 I was half afraid, but he coaxed and coaxed,
 And he got me on at last.
 Laughing and chatting in merry glee,
 To my home his course he bent;
 And my sisters looked at each other and smiled,
 But I didn't know what it meant.

Ten years passed on, and they touched his eye
 With a shadow of deeper blue;
 They gave to his form a manlier grace—
 To his cheek a swarthier hue.
 We stood by the dreamy, rippling brook,
 When the day was almost spent,
 His whispers were soft as the lullabys;
 And—now I know what it meant!

A reading people will become a thinking people, and then they are capable of becoming a rational and a great people.

It is a most mortifying reflection for any man to consider what he has done, compared with what he might have done.

Nature makes us poor only when we lack necessities, but custom gives the name of poverty to the want of superfluities.

Young persons have need of strong reins; they are sometimes hard to be ruled, easy to be drawn aside and apt to be deceived.

Wise men are instructed by reason; men of less understanding by experience; the most ignorant by necessity; and brutes by nature.

Harsh words often rankle the wound which injury gives; but soft words assuage it, forgiving cures it, and forgetting takes away the scar.

There is an elasticity in the human mind capable of bearing much, but which will not show itself until a certain weight of affliction be put upon it; its powers may be compared to those vehicles whose springs are so contrived that they get on smoothly enough when loaded, but felt when they have nothing to bear.

I look upon every true thought as a valuable acquisition to society, which cannot possibly hurt or obstruct the good effect of any other truth whatsoever; for they all partake of one common essence, and necessarily coincide with each other; and like the drops of rain which fall separately into the river, mix themselves at once with the stream, and strengthen the general current.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Jubilee Singers, and their Campaign for Twenty Thousand Dollars. By G. D. Pike. Boston: Lee & Shepard publishers. Many people through the country have enjoyed the rare pleasure of listening to the Jubilee Singers. This book tells us who they are and for what purpose they are singing. They are a company of colored men and women, most of them former slaves or children of slaves. They set out penniless and sung their way through the country to raise funds to complete the Fisk University building—a university at Nashville, designed especially to furnish educational facilities for the colored race. The book contains portraits from photographs of the singers, together with brief biographies. In an appendix is given a collection of their songs.

The Wishing-Cap Papers. By Leigh Hunt. Boston: Lee & Shepard publishers. These papers are collected for the first time in book form from the pages of the Indicator, Examiner, Tattler, and other contemporaneous publications. They are lively, genial, occasionally humorous, and in every respect worthy of reading. They are a fair sample of the best literature of their class of the past century.

Partingtonian Patchwork. By B. P. Shillaber. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Any one who loves real genuine fun will do well to obtain this book. It contains "Blifkins the Martyr: The Domestic Trials of a Model Husband;" "The Modern Syntax;" "Partingtonian Papers," and "New and Old Dips from an Unambitious Inkstand." Mr. Shillaber is too well known as a humorist to need any special recommendation.

Bacchus Dethroned. By Frederick Powell. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. A prize was recently offered in England for the best essay on the entire temperance question. This volume contains the essay or rather series of essays which took the prize. The author considers "The Great National Curse," "The Supposed Dietetic Value of Alcoholic Beverages," "The Physiological Relations of Intoxicating Liquors," "The Social and Political Argument," and other phases of the question, concluding with "Legislation and the Liquor Traffic." Every temperance lecturer, writer, thinker and temperance society should have the book.

Pay-Day at Babel, and Odes. By Robert Burton Rodney, U. S. N. Author of "Albion and Rosamond." New York: D. Van Nostrand. "Pay-Day at Babel" is designated "An Office Dream," and gives in a semi-humorous strain a poetic account of the people and their doings during the building of the tower of Babel.

Bart Ridgeley; A Story of Northern Ohio. Boston: Nichols and Hall. This story, though published anonymously, we have reasons for believing to be from the pen of a prominent lawyer and ex-Congressman, now residing in Washington. It is a faithful picture of the country and the people, as they were found in the then newly-inhabited wilds of Ohio, nearly forty years ago. The local descriptions are accurate, and many of the characters are real ones who have figured to greater or less extent in local and political history. The sketches of prominent men made from personal recollection are exceedingly interesting. The story proper is a love story after the approved sort, though the plot is not specially original. In truth one must look for its excellency elsewhere than in its plot. Yet it has excellencies in plenty. Its style is original, vivacious and pleasing, without a particle of that crudity that even the best of essayists and public writers not infrequently display in their first attempts in the field of romance. We cannot help almost regretting as we read the book that its writer had not been forced, or shall we say encouraged, to give his life and talents to literature rather than to politics and the dry details of law. American literature would undoubtedly have been the gainer. The chief charm of the book is the character of the hero—a character so carefully and faithfully delineated that it seems as if drawn from life. The character is an original one in novels at least, lacking many of the attributes of the conventional hero, yet heroic, brave and noble withal, and of an unblemished purity of mind and soul that leads one to have a higher estimate of humanity, and to rejoice that there are yet writers left us in these days of sensational and senseless fiction who can conceive of and describe such a character. The story is a beautiful poem—it is more an epic or a pastoral, than a novel—and no one can read it without being charmed.

A Woman's Poems. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. Away on the banks of the Ohio, not many miles from the spot where the Cary sisters first sung their songs, there dwells in the quiet of a happy home-circle a woman who, now that Alice and Phoebe Cary are dead, ought to be recognized as standing at the head of the women poets of America. Her poems have found their way for years into the chiefest and best publications of the country, yet strange to say the name of Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt is one that would fall unfamiliar on many ears, or if the hearer recognized the name, he might be in doubt where to place her. Julia Ward Howe once spoke of her in high terms of praise, but called her the wife of Don Piatt, editor of the Capital. Her husband is John James Piatt, himself a poet of no mean repute, who has published one or two charming little volumes of poetry. "A Woman's Poems" are by Mrs. Piatt, and they are a most valuable contribution to the poetic literature of the country. They are suggestive in character—too much so for a careless reading; exceedingly imaginative, and overflowing with an abundance of warm womanly feelings. Each poem which the volume contains is a gem polished to perfection, and gleaming with a light and beauty all its own.

Play and Profit in my Garden. By Rev. E. P. Ree, author of "Barriers Burned Away." New York: Dodd & Mead, publishers. This volume is a pleasant though I fear not without a profitable book. Its author, charmed with delights of country life, depicts them in glowing colors, and shows that from his amateur farming, to which he devoted an hour a day upon an average, he reaped a marvellous pecuniary harvest. At least it seems so until we compare the outgo with the income, when we find there is not so large a balance after all. The balance would undoubtedly have been all on the other side, if Mr.

Roe had not been peculiarly fortunate in regard to markets, the greatest stumbling-block of both the amateur and the professional farmer. While admitting the necessity of learning most trades and professions, there are two occupations which every one has unlimited faith in himself that he can enter successfully if he only has the opportunity. These occupations are literature and farming. And when he fails, as amateurs always must do in either business, he lays it to an unfortunate combination of outside circumstances rather than to the want of experience in himself. We do not need books to encourage the young, foolish and sanguine to enter either of these pursuits too hastily, in the belief that the road will be a golden one. Nevertheless one who has a genuine love of nature, will find gardening a pleasure if not a profitable employment; and after experience has been duly acquired and paid for, it may even make a certain pecuniary return which may be satisfactory if the expectations are not too exalted. For sale by J. B. Lippincott.

The Glass Cable, and the Storms it Weathered. By Margaret E. Wilmer. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. A pleasant and profitable temperance story for the young, illustrative of the good influences springing from the "Band of Hope" Society.

The Dead Sin, and Other Stories. By Edward Garrett, author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead. Those who seek for a pure and elevated literature, will not fail to find it in Edward Garrett's writings. The style is superior, full of thought and earnestness, and the stories in this book of uncommon interest. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Pascarel. Only a Story. By Ouida, author of "Strathmore." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. This story is written in Ouida's usually fascinating style, and is perhaps less objectionable in certain points than her novels usually are.

Oxley. By Lyndon, author of "Margaret: A Story of Life in a Prairie Home." New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. A pleasantly sentimental and philosophical story of American life, with little or no sensation in it, yet written in a finished and attractive style. The book should please a large class of readers. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Text Book in Intellectual Philosophy, for Schools and Colleges; Containing an Outline of the Science, with an Abstract of its History. By J. T. Champlin, D.D., President of Colby University. New York: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.

Philosophy of Rhetoric. By John Bascom, Professor of Rhetoric in Williams College. New York: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co. These are valuable textbooks designed for use in Academies and Colleges, though they will be found equally valuable as additions to a private library. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

HOW TO MAKE BOYS HATE FARMING.

IN a report of the doings of the Farmer's Club, of New York, contained in the Herald, we find some sensible remarks concerning the management of boys on the farm. A farmer wrote to a member of the club requesting him, if possible, to find for him a boy who is honest, truthful, not lazy, and who will be likely to love farming. He wanted a boy to pick up stones, churn, milk the cows, turn grindstone, etc., and one also that will not hate farming and run away every chance he gets.

The chairman handed it over to Sereno Edwards Todd to answer, who replied as follows:

"If a boy is ever justified in running away, most assuredly he would be when he is directed to go alone to perform a job that every faithful laborer hates. If you wish to keep a boy on the farm, never set him alone, when the birds are singing, the squirrels are chattering, and the violets are unfolding their charming petals, at picking stones in a large field. The truth is, those little arms and soft muscles are no more suitable for handling stones than the muscles of a young colt are for drawing a sub-soil plough. If you wish to make a boy love the farm better than any other employment, don't keep him turning a big grindstone at noon, when all the men but the one who is grinding, are lying in the shade; and don't bear on with all your might, so hard as to stick him, and then ridicule him tauntingly, telling him he must eat more pudding and milk before he can turn a grindstone like a man. Perchance that boy weighs only fifty pounds. You weigh one hundred and fifty, and the grindstone one hundred and fifty. Now, then, suppose we let you turn a huge stone of four hundred and fifty pounds, while a giant of four hundred and fifty pounds weight bears on—which is a fair proportion between yourself and the boy. Before the giant has applied half his weight, if we don't see you balk square from the mark, and crack, if you don't break the third commandment and assume a profane and pugnacious attitude, then write me as a false prognosticator.

"Unless you want to make a good boy hate farming, and every employment connected with it, don't manage in such an underhand manner that he will have to milk the cow which every one dislikes to milk because she milks so hard. When the boy comes in at night so tired that he would rather lie down on the hard side of a maple plank than to eat his supper, don't tell him to hurry up and eat his supper so as to do that churning, when all the men and older boys are allowed to read the newspapers or to smoke unmolested. If you wish to induce a boy to think that Indian corn and potatoes are profitable crops, don't give him an old rusty hoe that no sensible man would use, and then tell him if he will cut in smart when hoeing that you will help him keep his row up even with the rest. If you do not want to make a boy hate the country, when a task is assigned to him, don't pile on so much as to compel him to summon all his energies for three-fourths of the day to complete it, and then, as soon as the job is done, tell him he will have to go mill, or the cook can make no bread for the next day.

"If you don't want to make a boy hate all the operations of a farm, don't tell him while all the men are taking their 'nooning' in harvest time to water the cows and horses, and to hurry up so as to go with the men when they are ready to return to the field. Don't encourage a boy to rear a nice calf or colt, and tell him the animal shall be his when grown up, and then sell the beast for a good price, pocket the money, and tell the boy the price received don't pay for the hay, oats and grass consumed. If you want to make an energetic and successful farmer of a boy, don't encourage him to rise before daylight so as to rake the wheat stubbles while the dew is on, telling him he shall have half of the gleanings, and then sell his part of the grain with the crop, and tell him, when he inquires about his share of the money, that the little sum received will not pay for half his board next winter. Don't badger a good boy to the verge of desperation with the mischievous and obnoxious 'go boys' system of management. If you want to make him like farming operations, don't fret every ambitious desire out of the young aspirant with the repulsive and incessant ding-dong of

"Jim do this, and Jim do that,
When all Jim gets is an old straw hat.

"There is no precept and no reasoning that will induce boys to stick to the farm like the cheering words, 'Come, boys,' always accompanied by an irreproachable example in leading the way. Strange as it may seem to some, boys are human."

BRIGHT'S DISEASE.

WE take the following from Dr. John Bell's report, made last year to the American Medical Association, on the "Relations of Alcohol to Medicine." He says—Intemperance is the most usual predisposing cause of albuminaria, or Bright's disease, as exposure to cold, or to cold and moisture, is the most commonly exciting one. Dr. Bright remarks: "Where intemperance has laid the foundation, the mischief will generally be so deeply rooted before the discovery is made, that even could we remove the exciting cause, little could be hoped from remedies; but at the same time, a more impressive warning against the intemperate use of ardent spirits cannot be derived from any other form of disease with which we are acquainted."

The words of warning, adds Dr. Bell, do not carry with them the needed force here, as they are directed against what the writer calls "the intemperate use of ardent spirits," instead of saying the habitual use; for one may very pertinently ask—"What is the line between the temperate and intemperate use of ardent spirits? Every drunkard begins with the temperate use of alcohol, and in doing so puts himself on the road to intemperance, with all its consequences. A man may, as we have previously shown, destroy his health, and become the victim of incurable disease, by continued small drinking of alcoholic liquors, without his ever having been drunk or subjected himself to the imputation of intemperance.

"What plea of necessity, what promises of pleasure are there to make a man encounter such alarming risks and positive sufferings? He begins to drink alcohol moderately—temperately, as he believes—and, without meaning it, drinks, for a longer or shorter time, immoderately and intemperately, and gets an incurable disease of the liver, or kidneys, and dropsy, and all kinds of complicated disorders which end in death. Was this sacrifice of self made for the sake of advancement in the world, the acquisition of wealth and honor, the benefit of his family, his friends, or his country? Would he, in fine, be less a free agent under a pledge of total abstinence than under the dominion of an invincible habit?"

LAY PREACHING.

ON this subject, about which some high churchmen are so sensitive, Mr. Beecher says in one of his lectures:—

"This leads me to speak of the lay element in churches. I am satisfied that we are never going to have professional ministers enough to convert the world—never. We have got to have the whole church preach, or we shall never cover the ground. The population increases a great deal faster than ministers do, especially in the outlying territories. Just think of attempting to closely follow up that rush of emigration, and the opening of those vast intermediary and far-away States and territories with schools and churches and professional ministers! You never can do it. In this present intelligent age of the world, I do not understand why a layman has not just as much right to be a public teacher as a minister. He knows as much, he averages as well. He does not undertake to conduct an organization in all its details and to be a leader, but in his sphere he is prepared to preach the Gospel. There are many men in the law, in medicine, in mercantile business, many teachers in schools, many men retired from active business life, who are competent to take this, that, or the other neighborhood, and maintain service from Sabbath to Sabbath. Able lecturers they are upon education, able lecturers they may be on temperance; and they may just as well preach also sermons that have in them the root of the Gospel."

"CAST ADRIFF."

WE call attention to the publisher's advertisement of this new book by Mr. Arthur. As it is sold only by canvassing agents, and cannot therefore be had from book-sellers, we have made arrangements by which we can send any of our readers a copy by mail, on receipt of the price, $2.00.

THE PHILADELPHIA LAWN-MOWER.

WE have now in use a Philadelphia Lawn-Mower which has proved most satisfactory. It is scarcely more than a pleasant recreation to go over the lawn with this machine, and it is kept in beautiful condition by its frequent use—the ground level and the grass velvety. The sixteen-inch machine is best size, as it is not too heavy to work with ease. The twelve-inch machine is adapted to a lady's use, and is not too large for the smallest grass-plot, while the ten-inch one is a useful plaything for boys and girls. The largest size is twenty inches which may be worked by one man, but is better adapted for two. These machines are made and sold by Graham, Emlen & Passmore, whose place of business is at 631 Market Street, Philadelphia.

A lady writes:—"I never was so glad to circulate your magazine as I am this year. I kept it on the wing—even taking it to Sunday-school and slipping it into the hands of mothers. Its teachings are better than gold, and find their way through their own attractions."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mrs. T. P. S. writes: "I see in your May number an inquiry as to the author of that lovely poem, 'The Angel of Patience.' It is by John G. Whittier, a free paraphrase from the German." The poem in our April number, page 275, beginning—

"Beside the toilsome way
Lonely and dark, by fruits and flowers unblest,
Which my worn feet tread sadly day by day,
Languing in vain for rest.

"An angel softly walks,
With pale, sweet face, and eyes cast meekly down,
The while from withered leaves and flowerless stalks
She weaves my fitting crown."

is a different one from Whittier's beautiful paraphrase from the German, which we give below:

"To weary hearts, to mourning homes,
God's meekest Angel gently comes—
No power has he to banish pain;
Or give us back our lost again;
And yet in tenderest love our dear
And Heavenly Father sends him here.

"There's quiet in that Angel's glance—
There's rest in his still countenance!
He mocks no grief with idle cheer,
Nor wounds with words the mourner's ear;
But ill and woes he may not cure,
He kindly trains us to endure.

"Angel of Patience! sent to calm
Our feverish brows with cooling palm;
To lay the storms of hope and fear,
And reconcile life's smile and tear;
The throb of wounded pride to still,
And make our own our Father's will!

"Oh, thou, who mournest on thy way,
With longings for the close of day!
He walks with thee, that Angel kind,
And gently whispers, 'Be resigned—
Bear up, bear on, the end shall tell
The dear Lord ordereth all things well.'"

The inquiry as to the authorship of the poem in our April number is still unanswered.

T. I. M. writes: "In the last number of the HOME MAGAZINE, I notice a column of 'Answers to Correspondents.' I was glad, for I have been wanting the name of another book calculated to bring to poor, tried women the comfort and sweet hopefulness that 'Stepping Heavenward' has done—one that can point out Christ as winningly, with the strength and hope and joy to be derived from Him in one's daily living. If you will allow me, I will tell you why I write for information of such a work. Last year, in the midst of my first great grief, which followed in the train of many distressing trials, a friend sent me 'Stepping Heavenward.' I could not tell all that book did for me. But I began to lend it around to my friends—many of them sorrowful women, whose lives had in them little of hope, and who were besides walking in spiritual darkness. I believe, without exception, they are all now braver, brighter women; and I know it would do Mrs. Prentiss's heart a Heavenly good could she see the words of hope and joy that have been written me because of her book. When my little boy—my only child—was taken from me last fall, he left his little bank full of pence. The sum may be sufficient to buy two or three books, and I do so want them to be just such as can do the most good, that I may see and know that the little life dear to me did not bloom so sweetly here in vain. I want the names of two or three such books as I describe, to lend around wherever I may find that they are needed, and you will do me a great kindness to inform me in your next issue in regard to them."

We give the whole of our correspondent's letter, which will be read with interest. There are two books, "Our Children in Heaven," by Dr. W. Holcombe, price $1.75, and "Comforted," price 75 cents, both published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., of this city, from which we know many sorrowing hearts have derived consolation. "Lifting the Veil" is another book written for hearts in affliction.

HERBERT.—If you are only "ambitious to make a name" for yourself, we fear that the end will be vanity and disappointment, no matter what profession you choose. Only they who give themselves to earnest work from the love of it ever succeed, in the true sense. He who sets before him the poor, unworthy end of "making a name for himself," will surely fail of making an honorable name. They only win that who work nobly; that is unselfishly, thinking less of the acceptability than of the excellence of their work.

A. E. H. sends an answer to the inquiry for a recipe for making yeast without hops: "Pare two good-sized potatoes; then grate them into a large bowl. Put in a large spoonful of sugar and one of salt. Pour in a quart of boiling water; stir thoroughly. When about milk-warm add a cup of yeast and set in a warm place to rise. It will be ready to use in three hours."

W. H. H.—Whatever will put a man in better condition to work through his six days of labor, is right to be done on Sunday. To pursue his regular business will not do this; neither will drinking, nor any kind of dissipation. These will hurt and incapacitate him for the useful labor by which he, as well as others, are benefited. "The Sabbath was made for man," that he might get rest from toil, and have opportunity for doing good to his neighbor; but especially that he might be so freed from the cares and interests of business and the things pertaining to his life in the world, as to be able to give his mind to things spiritual and eternal. It is a day for religious thought and external worship; and wisest and happiest are they who make a right use of its blessed privileges. They will be stronger and better and safer when they go back to their common life of work and care and toil.

To those who do not accept the higher blessings of the Christian Sabbath it offers many and abundant benefits. It should be to none a day of mere idle self-indulgence. That is not true rest. Let there be activity of mind and body in some new direction; only let it be innocent—and that is innocent which neither hurts the neighbor nor one's self. If the mind hungers for books, read, either at home or in some public library, if a false notion of what the Christian Sabbath really means does not keep these library-doors shut. If the exhausted body and mind need change and the refreshment of nature, get for a little while into the country, if possible. Do anything but drone and drowse on Sunday—anything innocent, we mean, of course—and you will be more fitted for your common duties, and more in the true order of God's providence. An eminent clergyman says: "All theories of Sabbath-keeping that make it a burden grievous to be borne, or a day of revelling and excitement, are in antagonism to the true spirit of Christian Sabbath-keeping. But how shall we rest? Not, surely, by imprisoning our restless bodies and minds in the four walls of a house. Rest is not mere inactivity—that is often more tiresome than toil. A weary man who enjoys green fields and fresh air with his family on Sunday is not guilty of any wrong. The Sabbath of severe inactivity was not taught by Christ, was unknown even to the Pharisees, and is a burden which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear."

A CORRESPONDENT wishes to know the duties of president, secretary, etc., of a society. The officers of a society usually consist of president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, and sometimes a corresponding secretary and executive or business committee. The duties of the president are to preside at each meeting of the society, and to conduct its affairs, enforce order and settle disputed points. The president is not allowed to vote except in case of a tie, when he or she gives the casting vote. In voting by ballot, at the election of officers, however, the president may vote the same as any other member of the society. The duties of the vice-president are the same as the president, in the absence of that officer. The secretary must make out and preserve a report of the proceedings of the meetings of the society, reading a report of the last meeting at each succeeding one. The corresponding secretary, if there is one, attends to the correspondence of the society. The treasurer receives and pays out the moneys of the society, rendering a strict account of the same. The executive committee, if there is one appointed, attends to all the business of the society—the place of meeting, the programme of exercises, etc., etc., which would take too much time and trouble to be settled at the meetings of the society. These matters are usually brought up in the society, and then referred to the executive committee, either with or without instructions. The committee then reports back, which report may be accepted or rejected by the society at its pleasure. The usual order of exercises is: calling the meeting to order by the president; reading of minutes by the secretary; communications; reports of committees; unfinished business; new business; regular or miscellaneous exercises, and adjournment.

SELF-QUESTIONING.

BY R. B. D.

(See Engraving)

DEARLY, dearly, night comes down—
Sadly the wind sighs like one in pain;
The heavens are black with an ominous frown;
Low and monotonous falls the rain.

Cosy and warm, with the curtains drawn,
I sit me in front of the open grate;
I am not lonely, though all alone—
Though the night is stormy, the hour so late.

Crouched by my fireside content I sit,
And study the flare of the burning fire;
Into the corners the shadows flit,
As the bright light flashes out high and higher.

All unheeded the open book
Falls by my side, a forgotten story,
As into the glowing coals I look,
And watch their changeful, fantastic glory.

What do I see in the burning coal?
What do I see in my fancy bright?
Tell me, oh, tell me, my inmost soul!
Keep thou no secrets from me to-night.

Wonderful things I see pictured there—
Castles and temples of marvellous splendor;
Faces of those I love—oh, so fair!—
Love with a love that is warm and tender.

Burning letters together combine,
And change and fall in the fervid coal.
Is there nought else? No sight, no sign?
Whisper, and tell me, oh, secret soul!

Answers my soul to my questions low:
"There is one face, and there is one name,
That are ever seen in the ruddy glow
Of the burning coal and the leaping flame."

One face! one name! I will ask no more.
I half suspected your secret, soul.
The name you have whispered so often o'er—
No wonder you read it amid the coal!

THE FRANKLIN REFORMATORY HOME FOR INEBRIATES.

IN our April number we gave an extended account of the inauguration and success of this "Home" for the treatment of inebriates, which was started in our city by a few earnest individuals, with prayer to God for wisdom to see what was best to do and strength to work patiently.

On the evening of the 27th of May, the new buildings, Nos. 913 and 915 Locust Street, which have been fitted up in an admirable manner, were opened to the public, and was a deeply interesting occasion to the large number of our citizens who were in attendance. No one present could have failed to be profoundly impressed by what he heard and saw. The result of work, regarded as almost hopeless, was presented in the form of men testifying with fervid thankfulness to the influence of the "Home," and telling how, through the kindness and watchful care of the Christian men and women, by whom it is managed, they had been lifted out of their dreadful condition, and their feet again set in safe ways.

It was an occasion that none who were present can ever forget, and gave new confidence to many who had almost come to believe that there was no hope for the drunkard.

This "Home" is essentially a "Christian home;" and therein lies its true saving power. Its inmates are led to distrust themselves, and to seek help from God, as well in prayer as in a religious obedience to His precepts. None are taken into the "Home" except such as are in earnest about reform. It is no place for merely getting over a debauch, or hiding the present consequences of inebriety. It is for those only who intend to stop, and lead a new life—and to such every possible help is given.

The good results in a single year are surprising, and far beyond anything its most hopeful projectors had imagined.

We have room for only a single extract from the annual report, and it gives one of many cases of reform that are recorded:

"Mr. — was among our first admissions. A young man of great promise, but who had contracted the habit of drinking whilst in the army. His parents, by lives of patient industry and integrity, had amassed considerable property, and looked to see their declining years spent happily with their children, but this was not apparently to be the case, for so very reckless did he become, that it was with fear and trembling they ever took up a newspaper, lest they should see news of his untimely death. God in His providence led him to the Home, and when once the effects of liquor were removed from him, he saw the danger he had been in. He earnestly set about the work of reformation, and led an entirely different life, maintaining his interest in the Home and its workings. His father took him in business with him, and all went well. He afterward made a handsome donation to the Home in the shape of a large carpet for the reading-room. Two months since he commenced to sicken, and in a few weeks was pronounced to be beyond hope of recovery. After a short time he died, a monument to the saving efficacy of the Home; for, through its influence he was led to seek and to trust that Saviour in whom he found peace in his dying hours. His parents could now gratefully bow to the will of God, for He had restored the child of their heart to his true position, and then taken him to Himself, the first fruit of the Franklin Home gathered in the garner of the Great Father of all. Almost his last-expressed thoughts were what he would do for the Home if he got well. When the president, the evening previous, and two of the lady managers, but a few hours before his death, in visiting him, asked if he was resigned to God's will, whether it be life or death, his answer was yes, perfectly resigned. By this young man is the Franklin Home registered in Heaven, and we feel amply repaid for all our anxiety and effort by this single soul saved from destruction, and the drunkard's terrible destiny."

ADVERTISERS' DEPARTMENT.

IMPORTANT TO THE LADIES.—COOL HOUSES IN SUMMER.—On our first page will be found advertised a new contrivance to help lighten the lot of woman, and save her some steps in her tiresome journey through life. "Lyon's" Portable Furnace is a perfect household wonder, since it can be attached to any stove or range, and supply fire for cooking at the slight cost of one cent daily. Any one can use it, as no gas, oil or explosive fluids are used to heat it, and its small cost brings it within the means of every one. There is an exhibition of these furnaces at No 908 Arch Street, where the whole process of cooking is carried on in the open air. We hope all housekeepers who value cool houses in hot weather will call and see it in operation, or send for descriptive circulars.

GAS COOKING-STOVES.—No person can question the utility of an apparatus that will do the ordinary cooking for a family as perfectly and as economically as any coal or wood stove, and at the same time be entirely free from smoke or odor, dust or ashes. By the use of such a stove for family cooking, the labor is reduced to almost nothing. One match in all the kindling-wood required to start a fire, and a simple movement of the finger will extinguish it, or increase or reduce it to any desired point, so that the amount of heat generated is always in exact proportion to the work to be done. But perhaps the greatest advantage is that, the heat being applied directly to the purpose for which it is required, you entirely avoid heating your house during the summer months. This admirable invention, of which we give you a cut in our advertisement columns, is for sale at the old-established warehouse of J. W. Weymer, No. 52 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia, to whom we would cheerfully recommend you.

"HILL'S ARCHIMEDEAN" LAWN MOWER.—D. Landreth & Son, of Philadelphia, have a superior Lawn Mower, which they offer to the public. It is called "Hill's Archimedeas;" and is the only balanced Lawn Mower which has an adjustable handle. It is offered in various sizes and prices suited for either man or horse power. Some are so small that children can easily operate them. They have been so extensively sold throughout the country, that they really require no recommendation. They have always proved satisfactory, and are indispensable adjuncts of a farm or garden. If the lawn or grass-plot is to be kept in a neat and desirable condition.

BETTER THAN AN EXHIBITION.—We refer to the Grand Business Entertainments at the Popular Clothing House of Messrs. Wanamaker & Brown. Judging from the immense number of happy buyers, one would think all the clothing business of America is done under the roof of Oak Hall, at Sixth and Market Streets, Philadelphia.

NEW MUSIC.—Come Here Galop, by C. DeBubrac, comes to us from the publishing house of W. H. Boner & Co., 1102 Chestnut St., and is, without exception, the most sprightly, attractive and fascinating of any galop we have ever heard. Come Here Galop is inscribed to Madame Janauschek, with whom it is a particular favorite.

"Day by Day in Wondrous Beauty," or, The Asra Song, by Rubenstein, is a strange, weird-like romance, particularly inviting; it is needless for us to add comment on any composition from the pen of the renowned author and pianist, suffice to say that The Asra is unequalled.

I'm in Love, by Fred Clay, as sung by the popular English tenor, Sims Reeves. The song tells the story in a very interesting manner. Words and music are both pretty, and will undoubtedly be popular.

Nocturne, by J. Boulanger, is a classical composition of more than a little merit. The author has given a fine composition, which will undoubtedly be sought after by the more advanced pupils. Copies can be had of the publishers, W. H. Boner & Co., 1102 Chestnut St., Phila.

BUTTERICK'S BULLETIN OF FASHIONS for July will be found in this number of the HOME MAGAZINE. It is a very attractive, and marked by good taste in all the illustrations of ladies' and misses' garments. It will be seen that the number of yards required for each dress is given, as well as the sizes and prices of patterns. The styles are all new, and drawn from actual garments, not copied from French or German fashion-plates, representing a style three or six months old. With these patterns any woman of good taste can be her own dressmaker, if she will.

LOOKING BEYOND.

BY RICHMOND.

"YES," answered the invalid, speaking in a quiet voice, "I know that my earthly home will soon crumble and fall; but then, you see," and a smile rested on her lips, "I shall have a house not made with hands, eternal, in the Heavens."

Her friend had come to comfort her, and was trying to lead her thoughts onward to the better country whither her feet were hastening. Intimate as they were, it was the first time they had talked together of death. The invalid had listened to her friend, as she referred, in a voice that was husky and almost broken, to the coming change that every outward sign too surely indicated, and then answered, as we have seen.

"A body," she continued, looking at her thin white hands, "that will never fail me as this has done."

"You have been pondering these solemn things," said the friend.

"I think of them a great deal. I am looking beyond."

"Into that unknown country, whither we are all going." There was a tone of sorrow and regret in the friend's voice, as if the approaching change were a calamity to be feared.

"The land of peace," said the invalid, in the quiet voice with which she had just spoken, and with the tender smile again on her lips.

The shadow which had been deepening on the friend's face lifted itself. She had come with oppressed feelings, drawn by a sense of religious duty, to talk of death and the grave. She was not sure of her friend; was in fear lest her mind lay in darkness and doubt; and, lo! she found her peaceful and waiting. It was a sweet surprise.

"And you do not shrink from death?" she asked.

"Why should I? What is death?"

A sober look came back into the friend's face.

"Ah! the mystery of death!" she answered.

"Not a mystery, but a simple change. Only the laying off of an outer garment that has become useless. A tranquil sleep, and then a peaceful waking."

The friend was silent with wonder. A simple change! The laying off of an outer garment that had become useless! Death only this! She had expected to find doubts, and shrinkings, and mortal fears; but instead eyes full of serene trust and hopeful anticipations looked into hers.

"It is not for us, as Christians," said the invalid, "to magnify death as an evil; to surround an event that comes in natural order with vague terrors and awful experiences. Death is but a loving angel, sent to take us by the hand, when we are done with earth, and lead us to the land immortal. At his touch, this body of clay will fall in ruins, and then I shall find myself living in a more perfect body, wrought of spiritual substance, and in all things meet for that purer world in which spirits and angels dwell. I do not call this change death; it is really a resurrection. A rising out of a lower into a higher sphere of life. A beautiful transition."

"Thank you, my dear friend! I came to lead your thoughts onward to this great transition, but you do not need my office of Christian love."

"Dear friend and sister!" was answered. "It was so good in you to come; and I need you more than I can tell. I want to talk with you about heavenly things; about the new country to which I am going; its inhabitants and employments. For you know, dear, that Heaven is only another country, or world, into which God takes us when we are done with this. What shall we do there? And how shall we live?"

"God will take care of all that," said the friend. "Of one thing you may be sure, your life will be peaceful and happy."

"I know that; but the idea of mere peace and happiness does not fill my anticipations. They are only states of the soul."

"What more can you ask? If you are peaceful and happy, what is left to desire?"

The invalid did not answer immediately. It was plain from the expression of her face that something perplexed her thoughts.

"This looking forward to peace and happiness as the great good in store for us if we keep the divine law, has in it, to my perception, an element of selfishness. Must not a true Heavenly state be one of self-forgetfulness in a divine love for others?"

"Oh! I see where your thought is turning," said the friend, her countenance lifting. New intuitions began coming to her mind. "Peace and happiness are only consequent states."

"That is it. Consequent on some good we have done. To me, peace and happiness are incompatible with idleness. I am sure Heaven would be anything but a state of blessedness to me if I had nothing to do but sit down and enjoy myself—to contemplate my own happiness. Why, my dear friend, I should grow miserable in a week—get blue mouldy, as an odd acquaintance of mine once said, when she had no employment."

"Oh, of course we shall not be idle."

"Very well. Then comes the next thought—what shall we do?"

"I wouldn't trouble myself about that," said the friend, seeing on the invalid's brow an earnest contraction.

"I am not troubled about it in the least," was answered, a soft smile playing about the colorless lips. "But, as I am about going to reside in a new country, it is only natural that I should think a good deal about its inhabitants, and the way they live. There is no harm in that."

"Not unless it disturbs your mind, and brings into it a doubt of God's goodness."

"As it does not, but only seems to give me broader glimpses of His love, and wisdom, and great beneficence. Whenever we read about angels in the Bible, are they not always represented as doing something—as agents of God's good purposes? Now, I have read somewhere that all angels were once men and women, living upon some earth in God's universe. Don't you remember that the angel who appeared to John in the Apocalypse told him that he was one of his fellow-servants, and of his brethren the prophets? And that the measure of a man is called the measure of an angel? You see, I think a great deal about these things. If I am to become an angel, and one of God's ministering spirits, then it is all clear to me. I shall be peaceful and happy, because, like God, I shall be employed in doing good. He, the greatest worker and greatest benefactor in the universe, is the most peaceful and the happiest; and the nearer our life comes to His, the sweeter and more perfect it will be. Do you know what I would most like to do in Heaven?"

A bright look came into the invalid's face.

"What?" asked her friend.

"Take dear little babies that come from the earth, and be as a mother to them. Oh!" and the brightness of her face grew into a glad radiance, "that would be happiness indeed!"

"Maybe it will be so," answered the friend, gazing in tender surprise on the face that seemed to have caught a light from Heaven.

"But I must not choose my work. God will know best," said the invalid. "He may send me to strengthen some poor sister walking in the world's hard and dangerous places, and so help me to save a soul that, but for an angel counsellor and guide, might be lost forever. Or, my work may be to comfort the sick, and keep their thoughts stayed on God; or, to be with the sorely tempted, holding them back from evil by counsels spoken to their inner thought. It will be all right, I know; and I shall be happy in my work, be it what it may. Oh, yes, God knows best; and it will all be well."

With a soft sigh of relief, as of one in whose mind some questioning doubt had been laid to rest, she let her head fall back upon her chair, her white lids slowly dropping down. There was a smile of peace upon her lips. She was looking beyond into the Heavenly land whither she was soon to go; not thinking of golden streets, and mansions of delight, but of the angel-work that waited her coming.

THE PACIFIC MILLS, LAWRENCE, MASSACHUSETTS.

AN eminent English clergyman, W. G. Blaikie, D. D., gives, in some notes of travel in America, the following interesting account of his visit, two or three years ago, to the Pacific Mills at Lawrence, Massachusetts. He says:

These mills, which are held by a joint-stock company, were started on the principle that there was to be an acknowledged mutual dependence between employers and employed; and that, inasmuch as the success of the proprietors must depend on the cheerful and intelligent co-operation of the work-people, certain plans should be adopted to secure the material, moral and intellectual welfare of the workmen, both as a duty to them, and one of self-interest to the proprietors. This preliminary condition is the more worthy of notice, that in England some workmen are apt to regard such measures as an interference with their rights; a view which does not seem to have been taken at all in America, though there the rights of workmen are held pre-eminently sacred.

Among the material arrangements designed for the benefit of the people, the first was, the erection of factory buildings, well lighted and well aired, of cheerful and comfortable aspect, in which the workers should have presented to them the brighter and not the gloomier surroundings of a life of toil. Next, comfortable dwelling-houses. Residences were provided for the heads of families at moderate rents; the rent answering to Adam Smith's condition, not exceeding one-eighth of the income. Large buildings were also erected for single females, divided into apartments, arranged for two persons each. These boarding-houses were placed under the charge of trustworthy superintendents, and they have proved a remarkable success. They accommodate in all upward of eight hundred girls. The boarders are under pretty stringent regulations in many things, yet seem to enjoy their mode of life. This is the more remarkable, that some institutions of the same kind at home have failed. In Fountainbridge, Edinburgh, a boarding-house was opened of a similar kind, designed for the accommodation of girls working at a factory there. It has not been a success; partly, perhaps, because in a large town like Edinburgh the choice of lodgings is very large; partly, it may be, for other reasons. Of the male workers at Lawrence, many now own houses in which they dwell. About £50,000 has been thus invested by them. Besides these, there is a benefit society for sickness and other times of trouble. The payments vary from two to six cents, or say, one to three pence a week. In some conditions of the fund, the payments are suspended altogether. The fund is managed by the work-people, with the manager as chairman, and certain persons are named as stewards, whose duty is to attend to the comfort of the sick all the time they are disabled. The company show their mindfulness of all the possible conditions of their people, by providing a burial-ground for the use of those who die poor. All these arrangements draw the members of the factory together, and establish a subtle but powerful bond between them. Altogether about four thousand people are employed—half male, half female—the female workers being mostly young. The oil supplied in these arrangements lubricates the wheels, and the work goes on pleasantly, and to the shareholders most profitably.

The persons appointed to superintend the boarding-houses are selected for their ability to exercise a wholesome domestic influence on the young women who occupy their houses; and as may be looked for, when a Christian man has the appointment of them, are often persons of superior Christian character. The doors of these houses are locked at ten o'clock every night, and any improper behavior on the part of the inmates is checked. Throughout the whole establishment, drunkenness, profanity and other coarse and evil habits, are so discountenanced, that it is impossible for a person addicted to them to retain his connection with the works. It is not alleged that no woman of loose morale is in the establishment, but it is not thought that any become lax in it, and it is certain that there is no open propagandism of vice. Even overseers, when guilty of tyrannical or harsh treatment of those under them, are liable to censure, and there have been instances of their dismissal for such offences.

A library is also provided, and separate reading-rooms for the men and for the women. This branch of the operations is evidently carried on with vigor, and with unceasing endeavors to provide what will keep up the interest of readers. Evening schools are provided, partly by the company; and those boys and girls who are at the time of life (from ten to sixteen) when by law they must partially attend school, have facilities offered to them for complying with the requirement.

The success attending this system has been very considerable. In the first place, strikes have been unknown. A higher class of workmen have been secured. A liberal scale of wages has been adopted, for the company has been exceedingly prosperous. The arrangements, especially where young women are employed, are, however, subject to some drawbacks. There is an immense amount of coming and going. Girls will often go away for a month or two months holiday and return at the end. The sum earned by the girls is about a dollar a day, and as their board and lodging cost little more than a third of this, there is an ample surplus for dress and what not. The amount of finery sold in Lawrence is said to be very large, and on Sundays the mill girls are dressed like ladies. I must own, however, that the appearance of the girls at work disappointed me. There was often a coarseness and ungainliness which I did not expect to see. But then it must be and moral aspects, is due to the manager and the superintendent, and especially to the earnest Christian spirit by which they are animated. There are needed for such operations a degree and kind of patience, a kindness, a paternal consideration and a dependence on higher influences to guide and bless, that are only bred of earnest Christianity. If, in some cases, men making no profession of Christianity show a considerable amount of interest in their workpeople, and if, in other cases, men professing Christianity show none, but are hard and stern as granite blocks, this only shows how liable profession and practice are to part company. I must say, in behalf of the school of Arnold, Maurice and Kingsley, that it did great and good service, twenty or thirty years ago, by indicating the connection between the spirit of Christ and arrangements for the social well-being of the working classes, and by strongly remembered that a great proportion are "foreign," that is, Irish and German. I was told that twenty years ago, two-thirds were natives of New England and one-third foreign; now the proportion is more nearly one-third native and two thirds foreign. And this, of course, must cause considerable difficulty in carrying out the spirit of the undertaking.

The company encourages the workmen to become owners of its stock, after the manner of the Crossleys of Halifax. The amount of stock thus held exceeds $60,000. More than one of the workmen has been a member of the Lawrence City Government in its Board of Aldermen and Common Council; and not an annual election passes without the choice of one or more to some of these important offices.

I have only to add that, in my judgment, very much of the success of this undertaking, in its social urging such arrangements, as a right and necessary development of the Christian spirit. From some of their views I differ widely; but I trust I shall never be deterred from giving honor to whom honor is due, and thus indicating one thing, at all events, in which the Broad Church has deserved well of the country. I make this acknowledgment the more readily, because I have observed that the Arnold school are for the most part feeble in motive power. They can give a direction to a spirit already generated; but to create Christian devotedness, to inspire the passion and self-denial of philanthropy, to breed the patience and hopefulness of sustained Christian effort, their system seems to me all too feeble.

LET our lives be pure as snow-fields, where our footsteps leave a mark, but not a stain.

THE BENGAL TIGER.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

THE tiger is nearly equal to the lion in strength, while it surpasses him in activity. It is found only in Asia, and especially in India, though it is not confined exclusively to that country, as it lives also in China quite far to the eastward.

the most thickly settled of any upon the globe, tigers and other wild beasts should abound to the extent of making travelling dangerous and dwelling insecure. But, to understand this, we should know something of the geography of the country. Though many parts of India are densely populated, there are still other regions where the foot of man has seldom if

We who, in a comparatively new country, have succeeded in either exterminating the wild beasts, or driven them back gradually before us as civilization has progressed westward, can hardly comprehend how it is possible that in a region the longest inhabited and ever trodden. The mountainous portions of India are almost inaccessible, and will probably continue to be, as they have always been, the undisturbed abodes of wild and dangerous animals of all kinds. The swamps and jungles which line the coast are equally abandoned by men to the dominion of wild beasts. Again, the Ganges, with its many mouths, passes through a large section of the country called the Soonderbunds. These Soonderbunds are thickets and morasses, intersected by a hundred natural canals, incapable of cultivation or settlement, and the haunts of tigers, monkeys and poisonous reptiles. Thus, while on one side of the Hoogly, as this mouth of the Ganges is called, is found Calcutta, one of the great commercial cities of India, on the other side is a wilderness which must ever remain unconquered.

In these inaccessible regions tigers and other animals have their fastnesses, and from thence they venture on depredatory excursions.

The royal Bengal tiger is a most beautiful and magnificent creature. His hair is thick, fine and shining, its ground-color of a bright, tawny yellow, shaded into pure white on his under parts, and beautifully marked with dark undulating stripes and bands. He is in form a combination of strength and grace. As lithe in his motions as a cat, he can seize an ox in his mouth and carry it off with as much ease as a cat does a mouse, and without allowing its feet to drag on the ground. He sometimes attains to four and a half feet in height, and nine in length. The following anecdote will illustrate his strength:

"A buffalo, belonging to a peasant, having fallen into a quagmire, the man himself was unable to extricate it, and went to call the assistance of his neighbors. Meanwhile, a large tiger coming to the spot seized upon the buffalo and dragged him out. When the men came to the place, they saw the tiger with the buffalo thrown over his shoulder, in the act of retiring with him toward the jungle. No sooner, however, did he observe the men than he let fall the dead animal and precipitately escaped. On coming up they found the buffalo quite dead, and his whole blood sucked out. Some notion may be gained of the immense power of the tiger, when it is remembered that the ordinary weight of a buffalo is above a thousand pounds, and, consequently, considerably more than double its own weight."

It was once not uncommon in the Island of Java to have combats between tigers and buffaloes, in which the ferocity and agility of the tiger would sometimes prove more than a match for the strength of the buffalo. Combats between elephants and tigers were sometimes held in Siam, in which the elephants usually proved victors, though the tigers would show great bravery.

Tigers commit serious ravages in some portions of India, carrying off numberless cattle, and frequently children, and even men and women. In one district, a traveller tells us, three hundred men and five thousand cattle were destroyed during three years. The same traveller says:

"Whilst confined in the forest the tiger is comparatively harmless. There, feeding principally on deer, he rarely encounters man; and when the solitary hunter does meet the grim tyrant of the woods, instinctive fear of the human race makes the stupid monster avoid him. But, in the open country he becomes dangerous. Pressed by hunger, he seeks his prey in the neighborhood of villages, and carries off cattle before the herdsman's eyes. Still, he rarely ventures to attack man unless provoked or urged to desperation. But, under whatever circumstances human blood is first tasted, the spell of fear is forever broken. The tiger's nature is changed; he deserts the jungle, and haunts the very doors of his victims. Cattle pass unheeded, but their driver is carried off; and from that time the tiger becomes a man-eater."

Strange as it may seem, some of the natives regard tigers with a superstitious veneration, and take few, if any, precautions against them. They believe in the transmission of souls, and suppose that the souls of their ancestors are dwelling in the bodies of the tigers. They, therefore, when a tiger approaches their village, make him propitiatory offerings of rice and fruit, so that he may pass them by unharmed.

Tigers will sometimes attack alligators, and then the battle between these fierce monsters becomes terrible and exciting. A captain of a Guineaman vessel tells the following story:

"The ocean was very smooth and the heat very great, which made us so languid that almost a general wish overcame us, on the approach of evening, to bathe in the waters of the Congo. However, I and Johnson were deterred from it by an apprehension of sharks, many of which we had observed in the course of our voyage, and these very large. Campbell alone, who had been drinking too much, was obstinately bent on going overboard, and although we used every means in our power to persuade him to the contrary, he dashed into the water, and had swam some distance from the vessel, when we on board discovered an alligator making toward him, behind a rock that stood a short distance from the shore. His escape I now considered impossible, and I applied to Johnson to know how we should act, who, like myself, affirmed the impossibility of saving him, and instantly seized on a loaded carbine, to shoot the poor fellow ere he fell into the jaws of the monster. I did not, however, consent to this, but waited with horror the event; yet, willing to do all in my power, I ordered the boat to be hoisted, and we fired two shots at the approaching alligator, but without effect, for they glided over his scaly covering like hailstones on a tiled pent house, and the progress of the creature was by no means impeded. The report of the piece, and the noise of the blacks from the sloop, soon made Campbell acquainted with his danger; he saw the creature making toward him, and with all the strength and skill he was master of, he made for the shore. And now the moment arrived in which a scene was exhibited beyond the power of my humble pen perfectly to describe. On approaching within a very short distance of some canes and shrubs that covered the bank, while closely pursued by the alligator, a ferocious tiger sprang toward him, at the instant the jaws of his first enemy were extended to devour him. At this awful moment Campbell was preserved. The eager tiger, by overleaping, fell into the grips of the alligator. A horrible conflict then ensued. The water was colored with the blood of the tiger, whose efforts to tear the scaly covering of the alligator were unavailing, while the latter had also the advantage of keeping his adversary under water, by which the victory was presently obtained—for the tiger's death was now effected. They both sank to the bottom, and we saw no more of the alligator. Campbell was recovered, and instantly conveyed on board; he spoke not while in the boat, though his danger had completely sobered him, but the moment he leaped on the deck he fell on his knees and returned thanks to the Providence that had so protected him. And, what is most singular, from that moment to the time I am now writing, he has never been seen the least intoxicated, nor has he been heard to utter a single oath."

Hunting the tiger is considered royal sport, and those who can boast having once engaged in it, consider themselves qualified to look with contempt upon all sport of a less dangerous and exciting character. The elephant is frequently used to advantage in these combats. His superior strength and sagacity is of advantage to the hunter. Those who engage in this pastime sometimes come to grief, and are fortunate if they escape with their lives. A writer gives us the following story:

"Mounted on elephants, some Europeans, among whom were some indigo-planters and officers of a native regiment, left Bombay, intending to devote some time to the noble pleasure of tiger-hunting. They had not yet reached the skirt of the forest when the noise of their march aroused a huge tigress, which, far from flying, attacked furiously the line of elephants. One of these animals, seeing the tiger for the first time, was frightened, and in spite of the efforts of the hunter who rode him, turned tail on the terrible beast. Seeing this, the tigress rushed in pursuit, leaped on the elephant's back, seized the hunter by the thigh, dragged him to the ground, and throwing him over her shoulders as easily as a fox would have thrown a fowl, bounded off toward the forest. All the guns were at once directed toward her, but no hunter dared to fire, in the fear of hitting their unfortunate companion. They were soon out of sight, but they could follow by the trace of blood shed by the victim. Soon these traces became more and more indistinct, and, arrived in the heart of the forest, not knowing on which side to direct their steps, the hunters, in despair, were about to give up the pursuit, when, at the very moment they least expected it, they perceived the tigress and her prey both extended in the high grass. The beast was dead. The man, with his eyes wide open, was still conscious, but his thigh still remained in the jaws of the tigress, and he was too feeble to reply to the questions of his friends. It was necessary, in order to release him from his terrible position, to cut off the head of the animal, and to disjoint her jaws.

"Fortunately, a surgeon was present, and the best care was given to the wounded man, and he was conveyed to the nearest dwelling from the theatre of this frightful scene. When he had sufficiently regained his strength, he related his adventure thus:

"Stunned by his fall, weakened by loss of blood and pain, he had fainted a few seconds after the tigress seized him. When he regained consciousness he found himself on the back of the animal, which was trotting at a rapid pace toward the thicket. Every second his face and his hands were torn by the bushes through which the tigress carried him. His death appeared to him certain, and he remained motionless, resigned to his fate. Then the thought struck him that he had in his belt a pair of pistols. He seized one of them, and pointing it at the animal's head, he fired. The tigress shook violently, her teeth were pressed more deeply into the flesh of her victim—and that was all.

"The poor fellow fainted again. When he came to himself once more, wishing to try his last chance, he took his second pistol, and this time aimed under the shoulder-blade in the direction of the heart, and the tigress fell dead, without a struggle or a groan, whilst the hunter, exhausted by this last effort, had not even strength to shout to his friends when he heard them approach."

The tigress is a very affectionate and devoted mother, and is even a more dangerous antagonist when she has a young family, than is the tiger. The young cubs, when captured, make pretty and amusing pets.

"A young tiger," says a writer, "which was brought from China in the Pitt, East Indiaman, at the age of ten months, was so tame as to admit of every kind of familiarity from the people on board. It was as harmless and playful as a kitten. It frequently slept in the sailors' hammocks; and, when stretched on the deck, would allow two or three of them to repose with their heads resting on it for a pillow. It was, like the cat, given to thieving, and frequently stole the sailors' meat. One day, having stolen a piece of beef from the carpenter, he followed it, and, after taking the flesh out of its mouth, beat it severely for the theft, which it suffered without offering to retaliate. It would frequently run out on the bowsprit, climb about the ship like a cat, and perform a number of tricks with surprising agility. There was a dog on board, with which it would often play in the most diverting manner. This animal was placed in the menagerie of the Tower of London, where it remained many years, and never evinced any ferocity. It was called Harry, and answered to this name like a dog."

In holding of an argument, be neither conceited nor cholerick; one distempers your understanding, the other abuses your judgment. Above all things, decline paradoxes and mysteries; you will acquire no honor either in maintaining a rank falsehood, or meddling with sacred truths; as he that pleads against the truth, makes wit the mother of his error; so he that argues beyond warrant, makes wisdom the midwife of his folly.

THE PRAIRIE ON FIRE.

BY PHOEBE CARY.

THE long grass, burned brown
In the summer's fierce heat, Snaps brittle and dry
'Neath the traveller's feet,
As o'er the prairie,
Through all the long day,
His white, tent-like wagon
Moves slow on its way.

Safe and snug with the goods
Are the little ones stowed,
And the big boys trudge on
By the team in the road;
While his sweet, patient wife,
With the babe on her breast,
Sees their new home in fancy,
And longs for its rest.

But, hark! in the distance
That dull, trampling tread;
And see how the sky
Has grown suddenly red!
What has lighted the west
At the hour of noon?
It is not the sunset,
It is not the moon!

The horses are rearing
And snorting with fear,
And over the prairie
Come flying the deer,
With hot, smoking haunches
And eyes rolling back,
As if the fierce hunter
Were hard on their track.

The mother clasps closer
The babe on her arm,
While the children cling to her
In wildest alarm;

And the father speaks low,
As the red light mounts higher—
"We are lost! we are lost!
'Tis the prairie on fire!"

The boys, terror-stricken,
Stand still, all but one:
He has seen in a moment
The thing to be done;
He has lighted the grass,
The quick flames leap in air;
And the pathway before them
Lies smoking and bare!

Now the fire-fiend behind,
Rushes on in his power,
But nothing is left
For his wrath to devour;
On the scarred, smoking earth
They stand safe, every one,
While the flames in the distance
Sweep harmlessly on.

Then reverently under
The wide sky they kneel,
With spirits too thankful
To speak what they feel;
But the father in silence
Is blessing his boy,
While the mother and children
Are weeping for joy.

LOOK AT HOME.

SHOULD you feel inclined to censure
Faults you may in others view,
Ask your own life, ere you venture,
If that has not failings too.

Let not friendly vows be broken;
Rather strive a friend to gain;
Many a word in anger spoken
Finds its passage back again.

Do not, then, in idle pleasure,
Trifle with a brother's fame;
Guard it as a valued treasure,
Sacred as your own good name.

CRAWLING BATRACHIANS.

THE Crawling Batrachians are technically called Amphibia Gracientia. All these creatures have a much elongated body, a tail which is never thrown off, as in the frogs and toads, and limbs nearly equal in development, but never very powerful. The young are hatched from eggs, pass through the preliminary or tadpole state, and, except in a very few instances, the gills are lost when the animal attains its perfect form. Both jaws are furnished with teeth, and the palate is toothed in some species. The skin is without scales, and either smooth or covered with wart-like excrescences. There is no true breast-bone, but some species have ribs. When the young are first hatched they bear some resemfire, and remarks with evident surprise, that it was burned to a powder.

A piece of cloth dipped in the blood of a Salamander was said to be unhurt by fire, and certain persons had in their possession a fire-proof fabric made, as they stated, of Salamander's wool, but which proved to be asbestos.

The Salamander is a terrestrial species. It is slow and timid, generally hiding in some crevice during the day and seldom venturing out except at night or in stormy weather.

The Crawling Batrachians, called by the name of Meantia, contains a very few, but very remarkable species. In all these creatures the body is long and smooth, without scales, and the gills are very con-blance to the tadpole of the frog, the gills being very conspicuous.

In these creatures, however, the fore-legs make their appearance first, and are soon followed by the hinder pair; whereas in the frogs the hind-legs are seen some time before the fore-limbs are visible externally.

The celebrated Salamander belongs to the order of Crawling Batrachians, and is found in many parts of the continent of Europe. This creature was formerly thought to be able to withstand the action of fire, and to quench even the most glowing furnace with its icy body. It is singular how such ideas should have been so long promulgated, for although Aristotle repeated the tale on hearsay, Pliny tried the experiment, by putting a Salamander into the spacious, retaining their position throughout the life of the animal. The celebrated Proteus is an example of this order.

At Adelsberg, in the Duchy of Carniola, is a most wonderful cavern, called the Grotto of the Maddelena, extending many hundred feet below the surface of the earth, and consequently buried in the profoundest darkness. In this cavern exist: a little lake, roofed with stalactites, surrounded with masses of rock, and floored with a bed of soft mud, upon which the Proteus may be seen crawling uneasily, as if endeavoring to avoid the unwelcome light by which its presence is known.

These creatures are not always to be found in the lake, though after heavy rains they are tolerably abundant, and the road by which they gained admission is at present a profound mystery. Dr. Beale has given the following account of these curious creatures:

"One of the Proteuses I brought from Adelsberg lived for five years, and, what is very interesting, passed four years of his life in the same water, a little being added from time to time to make up the loss by evaporation. He lived in about a quart of water, which was placed in a large globe, this being kept dark by an outer covering of green baize. He was not once fed while he was in confinement."

The gills of the Proteus are very apparent, and of a reddish color, on account of the blood that circulates through them. The blood discs of this animal are of extraordinary size; so large, indeed, that they can be distinguished with a common pocket magnifier.

The color of the Proteus is pale, faded, flesh tint, with a wash of gray. The eyes are hidden beneath the skin, those organs being useless in the dark recesses where the Proteus lives.

Its length is about a foot. What are the natural habits of this strange animal, what is its food, of what nature its development and what is its use, are a series of problems at present unanswered. By some writers it has been thought to be merely the larvæ state of some large Batrachian at present unknown; but the anatomical investigations that have been made into its structure seem to confirm the idea that it is a perfect being, and one of those species which carry the gills throughout their whole existence.

In the Necturus, the head is much broader and flatter and the tail much shorter than in the preceding species. This animal belongs to the same family as the Proteus, but is a native of America, being found in the Mississippi and several of the lakes.

It is rather a large animal, attaining, when adult, a length of two or three feet, and being of a thick and sturdy make. The gills of this creature are large and well tufted, and the limbs are furnished with four toes on each foot, but without claws. The general color of the creature is olive-brown above, dotted with black, and with a black streak from the nostrils through the eye, and along each side of the tail. Below it is blackish-brown with olive spots.

BELIEVE THE BEST.—He who thinks better of his neighbors than they deserve, cannot be a bad man, for the standard by which his judgment is formed is the goodness of his own heart. It is the base only who believe all men base—or, in other words, like themselves. Few, however, are all evil. Even Nero did a good turn to somebody—for when Rome was rejoicing over his death, some loving hand covered his grave with flowers. Public men are seldom or never fairly judged, at least while living. However pure, they cannot escape calumny; however incorrect, they are sure to find eulogists. History may do them justice, but they rarely get it while alive, either from friend or foe.

WHOM SHALL WE HONOR?

"I AM out of all patience with this thing," said Mr. Jones; "it ought to be suppressed! No man should be permitted to make such scandalous remarks about one of our best and most public-spirited citizens!"

The speaker was in considerable excitement. He walked the floor nervously. The friend who had just come in, and to whom this speech was addressed, asked what had disturbed him.

"Read that!" said the other, slapping his hand spitefully against a newspaper. The friend took the paper and read:

"It is to be regretted that so large an outlay of money is to be made for hurting and demoralizing the people, instead of serving the common good. Neither great wealth, social position, nor ostentatious charity, can cover the infamy that must attach to any pursuit whereby a man builds up a fortune on the ruin of the health, morals and thrift of his fellow-citizens!"

"Now, what do you think of that, sir?" exclaimed the first speaker.

"Is it not true?" was asked, calmly.

"True! My gracious! Do you know of whom the fellow is speaking?"

"No."

"Look there, at the paragraph just above the one you have read! Ball Cardiff is the man!"

"Oh! it refers to the extensive addition he is now making to his breweries. Half a million is to be expended, I am told."

"Yes, sir. It is about Mr. Cardiff that the hound has written this libellous tirade. He ought to be horsewhipped, sir."

The friend took up the paper and read again: "Neither great wealth, social position, nor ostentatious charity, can cover the infamy that must attach to any pursuit whereby a man builds up a fortune on the ruin of the health, morals and thrift of his fellow-citizens."

"Looking up from the paper at Jones, he asked, soberly: 'Is not that true?'"

"Oh, yes, in the abstract, as a proposition in morals. But no man has a right to charge such infamy upon a high-minded, public-spirited citizen."

"Come to the window," said the friend. The two men looked across the street, where stood a lager beer saloon. "You have had fair opportunity to know whether that shop is a blessing or a curse to the people of this neighborhood. What say you, is it a blessing or a curse, Mr. Jones?"

"A curse!" was the unhesitating answer; "an unmitigated curse!"

"Do you call the keeper of this saloon a good citizen?"

"No, sir!"

"There are from four to six thousand places of like character in our city. Isn't it fearful to think of?"

"It is fearful," said Mr. Jones.

At this moment the keeper of the saloon came out, and, crossing the street, entered the office of Mr. Jones, who was a lawyer.

"Good morning," he said, in the easy, satisfied way of a man with whom the world is going all right. "I've got a little business I'd like to have you attend to, Mr. Jones." And he laid down a ten-dollar bill. The lawyer took the money and inquired into the nature of the business. After it was stated, as the saloon-keeper seemed disposed to talk about his own affairs, the friend of the lawyer put in a few words to draw him out.

"How long have you kept this house?" he asked.

"Two years come next May," was answered.

"You have a good run of custom?"

"First rate, sir."

"And are laying up money?"

"Yes, sir."

"How much capital did it take to start your saloon?"

The man shrugged his shoulders. "Not much, as far as I was concerned."

"But it must have cost something to fit up and stock a place like yours?"

"So it did. But you see I had a rich uncle." And the saloon-keeper looked knowing and comical.

"Oh! Then a good many of you must have rich uncles," said the lawyer.

"I rather think we have," and the saloon-keeper laughed a queer, gurgling sort of laugh.

"Who was your uncle?"

"Mine? Maybe you'd like to know."

"Seriously," said the lawyer, "I would like to know just how you got a start in this business. I'm interested."

"Well, sir, my uncle was Ball Cardiff. He's a tip-top man, and rich as a Jew."

"Your uncle, really?" asked Jones's friend.

"Oh, no. Only the kind of relation Uncle Sam is to an office-holder. He just gave me a start. That's all. I've been uncle to myself ever since."

"Mr. Cardiff set you up?"

"Yes, sir, and a good many more of us. What's the use of his brewing if there's nobody to sell his liquor? The more saloons there are, the more demand for his beer. So, you see, whenever he finds a fellow like me, that can be trusted, he fits him up a saloon, puts in a few kegs of lager and strong ale, and sets him going. In a year or two all the fixtures are paid for, and kegs of lager by the hundred into the bargain."

"Oh! that's the way it's done!" said Mr. Jones, scarcely concealing his surprise.

"That's the way it was done in my case, and in the case of half a dozen more I could name."

The saloon-keeper went out, and the friend said: "Put that and that together, and what do you make of it? Is Ball Cardiff any more a good citizen than this man? Are his breweries public blessings, and this man's saloon an unmitigated evil?"

"The thing confounds me," replied Mr. Jones. "It seems that Cardiff really set up this moral pest-house over the way, and said to the man he put into it, 'Make gain out of the ruin of human bodies and souls, and when you have gathered in enough to return the money I have expended, the establishment is yours.'"

"I could not state the case in truer sentences," answered the friend. "What then? Because a man is rich and lives grandly among us, giving largely of his wealth to public institutions, or scattering it in ostentatious charity, are we to accept and honor him as a high-minded and noble Christian gentleman? I trow not! Let the work every man is doing in the community be his judge. If it is good and useful work; if the man be a producer or a dispenser of things good for body or mind; let him have respect and honor. But, if he seek gain by ministering to depraved and sensual tastes and appetites, thus hurting all with whom he comes in contact through his work, let public sentiment brand him as unworthy of respect."

"I guess you are right," said the lawyer. "But this rule should apply as rigidly to those who, by vicious publications, poison the morals of the people."

"Just as rigidly. The two great evils of liquor-drinking and bad reading are doing an amount of injury to the people fearful to contemplate. In thus ministering to the demoralization and destruction of the souls and bodies of men, one class giving mental and the other physical poison for food and drink, large fortunes are being built up. Is society just to itself in taking by the hand and offering to the men who thus get gain honorable recognition just because they are rich? No! Every principle of right, of humanity, of religion, says no! What if a man like the one of whom we are speaking should give half a million dollars to found an orphan or an inebriate asylum? What compensation to society would this be for the stream of pauperism and crime that has flowed into almshouses and prisons for years, the head-waters of which may be found in his breweries? Do I put it too strongly? If so, let me suffer condemnation."

"A brewer," said the lawyer, "is not regarded in the light of a distiller of ardent spirits. Alcohol we know to be a poisoner of the blood, a hurtful and dangerous thing to take into the human stomach. Whisky and brandy-drinking we know to be injurious; but there is a large class that consider malt liquors not only innocent, but beneficial."

"Do you belong to that class?"

"No. I only speak of it in order to break, in a degree, the force of your condemnation of brewers. Only a short time ago some members of the Massachusetts Legislature visited an extensive brewery in the neighborhood of Boston, when one of them called the attention of the brewer to the harm he was doing, and urged him, as a good citizen, to give the matter his sober attention. To this the brewer replied, that he regarded himself as a public benefactor; that the brewery was an antidote to the distillery."

"What a fallacy!" exclaimed the friend.

"Yes, I think the declaration a great fallacy."

"A brewery is to a distillery what the primary school is to the advanced grades," said the other. "Beer-drinking is the way to whisky-drinking. First we have light malt liquors, in which the element of intoxication, in the form of alcohol, is small. It is this alcohol that vitiates the taste, and creates the morbid desire for continued and increased stimulation. Then stronger beer and ale, in which more alcohol is contained. And so on until, with too many, the craving thirst will not be satisfied with anything less than gin or whisky. Those who matriculate in the beer-saloon, are pretty sure, in the end, to graduate at the gin palace."

"You have a very direct way of putting things," said the lawyer.

"If there is any defect in the 'putting,' let it appear. I have no interest in gainsaying the truth. No cause is worth contending for that cannot stand the rigid test of the highest and broadest truth—even Divine truth. 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.'"

"You cannot order society by that rule," was answered.

"There is no other safe rule for society. If all men observed it, all men would be prosperous and happy."

"But all men will not observe it. Every one looks to his own interest; and he must do it, if he would not be driven to the wall."

"A man serves his own interests while he serves others in useful work. This is a law of social order. The miner, the farmer, the artisan, the merchant, the artist, and professional man, each does good to the neighbor while serving himself. For what he receives he makes a return that adds to the wealth and comfort, or supplies some need of society. But he may, if he be dishonest and unscrupulous, give unfaithful work, overreach in bargaining, lie and cheat for gain, and so get from society an undue share of its wealth. Is the lazy thief, or daring robber, less honest or honorable than such a man? One hedges himself around by legal immunities; you cannot catch him at his villainies; he is too cunning and cautious; the other is reckless and bold, and society hunts him down and shuts him up in prison."

"Now, I hold it to be a wretched and perverting fallacy, that men cannot prosper in honest work. Faithfulness to any useful calling—that faithfulness which includes skill, industry, thought and perseverance—always must give a sure return. The man who masters his business or profession, and conducts it with intelligence and prudence, has no need to swerve a hair's breadth from the golden rule, in order to attain success. This I maintain against all argument to the contrary."

"But the makers and venders of intoxicating drinks, the publishers and sellers of vile and corrupting books and papers, and all others who get money by doing things hurtful to society, are another and a distinct class, who do not even make a pretence of being useful citizens. They serve no great interest. They produce nothing that men may use without hurt. They absorb the earnings of the weak, the unwary, the vile, the besotted. They give poison instead of bread for the money they receive. The evil of their doings cries aloud from every lane and street of our cities, and from every town, and village, and neighborhood in the land. Their work is seen in prisons and almshouses, in orphan and insane asylums, in the haunts of poverty, wretchedness and crime. There is no good in it—nothing but unmixed evil."

"And because men grow rich in the doing of such fearful wrongs to society, shall society do them honor? Let every man answer to his own heart and conscience. We must have a higher, a purer, a manlier public sentiment. We must begin to call things by their right names. We must judge of men by what they are."

"As you are certainly doing," said the lawyer.

"Am I right or wrong?" asked his friend.

"Right! And I would to Heaven that all men were as bravely outspoken," was the prompt reply.

T. S. A.

OUR FATHER.

A GOOD woman, searching out the children of want, one cold day last winter, tried to open a door in the third story of a wretched house, when she heard a little voice say: "Pull the string up high! Pull the string up high!" She looked up and saw a string which, on being pulled, lifted a latch; and she opened the door upon two little, half-naked children, all alone. Very cold and pitiful they looked.

"Do you take care of yourselves, little ones?" asked the good woman.

"God takes care of us," said the older.

"And are you not very cold? No fire on a day like this!"

"Oh! when we are very cold we creep under the quilt, and I put my arms round Tommy, and Tommy puts his arms round me, and we say, 'Now I lay me;' then we get warm," said the little girl.

"And what have you to eat, pray?"

"When granny comes home she fetches us something. Granny says God has got enough. Granny calls us God's sparrows; and we say 'Our Father' and 'daily bread' every day. God is our Father."

Tears came in the good woman's eyes. She had a mistrusting spirit herself; but these two little "sparrows," perched in that cold upper chamber, taught her a sweet lesson of faith and trust she will never forget.

A SURE friend is best known in an adverse state; we know not whom we trust till after trial; there are some who will keep us company while it is clear and fair, who will be gone when the clouds gather. That is the only friendship which is stronger than death; and those the friends whose fortunes are embarked in the same bottom, who are resolved to sink or swim together.

SAGO.

AMONGST the important farinaceous substances which we derive from tropical climates, sago holds a prominent place; together with arrow-root and tapioca, it is one of those pure forms of starch so useful in the dietary of invalids and children. Like many other articles of every-day use, but little is generally known amongst consumers about its origin, or the countries from whence we obtain it. Though sago, tapioca and arrowroot are all similar in their composition, and are used for similar purposes, they are yielded by distinct plants, and are natives of widely different parts of the world. Genuine sago is furnished by two or more species of Sagus, true palms, natives of the islands of the Indian Archipelago, where they not only form extensive natural forests, but are likewise very largely cultivated. The two most important species are Sagus Rumphii and S. levis. They are both trees, the latter growing to a height of from thirty to fifty

S. RUMPHII—A SAGO-YIELDING PALM.

The fruits of this group of palms are, perhaps, the most beautiful of any throughout the entire vegetable kingdom. The figure will give a better idea of their character than any written description.

FRUIT OF S. RUMPHII.

Sago is contained in the soft cellular or central portion of the trunks, and to obtain it the trees are felled, and the trunks cut up into truncheons, about two feet long, which are split down the middle, and the interior scooped out, pounded, and thrown into water. The starch, of course, separates from the remainder of the pulpy mass, and is poured off with the water, which is allowed to stand or settle, and the residue is collected and purified by successive washings, and finally dried, the result being the production of a meal or flour known as sago meal. This, however, undergoes a further system of refining and granulating before it enters into European commerce. The granulating process is said to be of Chinese origin, and it is chiefly carried on at Singapore. The meal, as taken to the manufactory, is usually packed in bags made of plantain leaves. It is carefully washed and strained, and exposed to the air for a short time. When the mass becomes tolerably dry, it is then broken up into small pieces and again placed in the air under cover, where it remains until it is thoroughly dry. The lumps are then pounded until the whole has become small enough to be passed through a sieve, the meshes of which are so made as to produce, by the final operation of granulating, the several forms or sizes of the "pearls." This last operation of granulating or "pearling" consists of placing the sifted sago in large bags, and thoroughly shaking them backward and forward for several minutes, when the sago is turned out of the proper form, and requires only to be dried before packing for exportation.

The largest quantity of sago is formed in the trunk just at the period when the flower spikes appear. If the flowers were allowed to develop, and the fruits to ripen, the trees would become exhausted and die, and in this state the central portion of the trunk is feet, and the former somewhat smaller. They bear a crown of large pinnate leaves, somewhat erect, but bending over sufficiently to give a very graceful appearance to the plants. The flowering spikes are terminal, arising from the centre of the crown of leaves. In S. Rumphii the leaf-stalks (petioles) and the sheaths, which enclose the lower portion of the flower spikes, are armed with long sharp spines, while in S. levis they are smooth—hence one is known as the prickly and the other as the spineless sago palm. The flower spikes are produced when the trees are about fifteen years old, and it takes three years to ripen the fruits, after which the trees die.

dried up and is consequently worthless, therefore any delay beyond the proper time in cutting down the trees would be attended with loss to the grower. The plants are usually propagated by offsets.

Sago is exported from Singapore not only to Europe, but also to India and the Cape. Quantities of sago meal are carried in native boats from Sumatra and other neighboring islands to Singapore, to be manufactured into "pearl sago;" but the article is not so important in Sumatra as it is in the Moluccas, where, indeed, it is the staple food. It is used in various ways. In Ceram it is made into flat cakes, about two inches square, and a half inch thick, four of such cakes being considered sufficient food for one day. The granules of sago starch, as seen under the microscope, are large, and of an elongated form, compressed at one end and round at the other, where there is usually a crack or slit, and a series of fine ring-like markings surround the granules. This appearance, however, is somewhat altered in granulated or pearl sago. The heat used in its preparation causes the starch masses to become larger and much more irregular.

STARCH GRANULES OF PEARL SAGO MAGNIFIED.

Sago is known in commerce under three distinct terms, namely, "small," "medium" and "large." Several sizes, however, do actually occur, the smallest being about the size of pins' heads, and the largest about the size of coriander seeds. The color also varies much, some sorts being of a beautiful white, and others of a dull whitey-brown. A good deal of the very white sago is bleached by chloride of lime.

Sago is imported both in bags and boxes, each containing about a hundred-weight or rather more.

A great deal of fictitious sago is made from potato starch, and is used chiefly for mixing with genuine sago.

SPURIOUS SAGO FROM POTATO STARCH, MAGNIFIED.

Sago flour, an article but little known in trade, is the meal after it has undergone a perfect system of washing and sifting, minus the granulating process.

The generic name sagus is derived from the commercial sago, which, perhaps, would be more properly spelt sagu, and which in the language of the Papuan races means bread, in allusion to its use as an article of food.

Sago is, to a certain extent, nutritious like tapioca, arrow-root and other alimentary starches. Its great recommendation is that it is very easy of digestion, and on this account is valuable as an article of diet for invalids and children. Though commerce is chiefly indebted for its supply to the two species of Sagus before mentioned, several other palms yield sago, which is used in the respective countries where the plants grow, such for instance as Phanix farinifera in India, Corypha Gebanga in Java, and Sagus Vitiensis in Fiji. It is also obtained from the stems of some of the Cyodaceae.

"GIVE, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal, it shall be measured to you again." This Divine law rules, in regard to spiritual things, both on earth and in Heaven. We must minister because we have received; and we must minister that we may receive more abundantly. In ministering to others, we enter into the true order of our life. Our life comes from God, who is the universal Giver. It must therefore impel us to give; it must prompt us to words of help and deeds of use.—Words in Season.

MOTHER AND SON. *

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF."

"H AS my John been here to-night?" asked Mrs. Brown, as she looked in about nine o'clock at one of her neighbor's.

"Yea. He was here just after supper, and he and Jim went off together."

they're going to turn out well, it'll all come right in the end; if not, nothing that we can do is going to help it."

"No—no—no, Mrs. Moyer! Don't say that," spoke out Mrs. Brown, warmly. "We can do almost everything with our children if we go right about it. We must watch over them, and keep them, as far as

"Do you know where?" asked Mrs. Brown, her voice unsteady from the anxiety she felt.

"Oh, dear! no," was the rather sharp reply of her neighbor, whose name was Mrs. Moyer. "It's more than I can do to keep run of them. Jim's getting ahead of me. Boys are boys, and will have their own way; and it's no use worrying about them. If we can, out of harm's way. We must teach them what is good, and try to make them afraid of all that is evil and wrong. 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it,' says the good Book, and I believe it."

"Maybe it's all so," answered Mrs. Moyer, showing some annoyance of manner. "but, as far as my experience goes, the old lady who said, 'Train up a child, and away he will go,' had the right on't. As for my Jim, you might as well try to ride a colt as to train him."

"The wildest colts are broken," said Mrs. Brown.

"Boys are not colts," was sharply replied.

"Good-evening," said Mrs. Brown, who went home with an anxious heart. Her visit to Mrs. Moyer left that person in an irritated frame of mind, chiefly growing out of the fact that something in what Mrs. Brown had said set conscience to work, and conscience accused her of neglected duty. "I'll turn over a new leaf with Jim," she said, angrily, to herself, after sitting and thinking for a good while after Mrs. Brown went away. "He sha'n't tramp off every night just as he pleases."

So, nursing her anger, Mrs. Moyer waited for Jim's return, when she meant to berate him soundly, and lay down the law for his future government. He was later in coming home than usual, and this lateness worked on Mrs. Moyer's frame of mind as an irritant.

"Where have you been, sir?" was the unexpected demand that surprised the boy as he came in. The angry voice and countenance of his mother surprised him still more, for of late he had been allowed to go and come pretty much as he pleased. "Where have you been, sir? Why don't you answer me?"

Mrs. Moyer caught Jim by the shoulder, and shook him in a paroxysm of rage. When her anger rose, it usually overmastered her. Self control was one of the lessons she had never learned.

Treatment like this roused all that was evil in the boy's nature.

"I've been where I pleased," he answered, roughly.

At this his mother beat him about the head in a blind fury. Jim defended himself as best he could until his mother's rage had spent itself, when he escaped from her, and went off to bed in a most rebellious state of mind. He lay awake for a whole hour, meditating evil.

"I hate her, and I'll spite her!" So he thought and said in bitter anger.

It was after ten o'clock when John Brown came in. He opened the door softly, hoping that his mother would not hear him. But she met him as he entered, saying, gently, but in a voice that was troubled—"This is all wrong, my son. Where have you been?"

"I didn't know it was so late, mother," answered the boy, respectfully.

"Where have you been?" Mrs. Brown repeated her question.

John was silent, and his silence sent a sharp pain through his mother's heart. He stood with drooping eyes, and something dogged in his manner. There was a look like guilt in his face.

"John," said Mrs. Brown, speaking in a tender, yet serious and impressive manner, "the boy who is afraid or ashamed to tell his mother where he has been, is walking in dangerous ways. Were you with Jim Moyer?"

"Yes, me'am."

"I'm afraid he is not a good boy. Do you think he is?"

John made no reply to this.

"There is one thing, my son, that I will have to insist upon," said Mrs. Brown, firmly. "You must not be out in the evening after nine o'clock. Indeed, being out at all is against my wishes. If your father were living, he would, I know, forbid your leaving the house at night unless he knew, in every case, where you were going."

To all this John answered nothing, but stood with downcast eyes, and an expression of countenance that troubled his mother.

"My dear boy"—there were tears in Mrs. Brown's eyes, and her voice shook as she spoke—"there are only two ways in life—a right way and a wrong way. The right way leads to happiness, the wrong way to misery. You are old enough to know what is right and what is wrong. If your feet are going astray, you are not walking in ignorance of the dangers that surround you. Oh, John! for my sake, for your dead father's sake, for your own sake, I beseech you to come back into better and safer paths."

A hot flush spread over the boy's face, and his eyes glistened, as he looked up hurriedly at his mother, and then turned himself partly away.

"Good-night, my son," said Mrs. Brown.

"Good-night," answered John, and went up to bed.

Mrs. Brown retired to her room, and sat there for nearly an hour, still, almost, as a statue. Then, kneeling at her bedside, she prayed for her boy, weeping bitter tears.

In the morning John was in a better state of mind, and, when his mother talked to him, promised to keep himself away from all bad companions.

In a very different frame of mind from this was Mrs. Moyer's boy when he left home in the morning, and went to the shop where he worked. His mother rated him angrily at breakfast, and when he left the house, bitterness and rebellion were in his heart. The two boys met on the street.

"Did you catch it last night?" was the salutation of Jim Moyer.

"No," was answered.

"Well, I did! The old woman pitched into me like a thunder-storm. But I'll be even with her. Next time I'll stay out until eleven o'clock; and if she cuffs me about again, I'll stay out all night—see if I don't."

"You'd better not," replied John. "I've promised mother to be in at nine o'clock."

"Ho! What a spooney!" shouted Jim, derisively.

The blood mounted to John's forehead. He could not bear ridicule. This was one of his weaknesses.

"I'm not an apron-string boy," added Jim, with a sneer.

"Neither am I," said John. "But right's right."

"It isn't right to force a boy who works hard all day to stay in the house at night, and never let him have a bit of fun," answered Jim Moyer. "They can't break me into that. I'll run away first."

"Run away!" responded John, in momentary surprise at the suggestion.

"Yes; and I've a mind to do it anyhow. I'm tired of being harped at all the time. It got into my head last night, after the old woman cuffed me, and it's been going round there ever since. Wouldn't it be jolly to go about and do just as you please? I think so."

The boys parted, having agreed to meet after supper at a saloon—not to get liquor, though they often treated themselves to a glass of beer when they had spending-money, but to play at dominoes, and to listen to the coarse and too often obscene talk of the men and boys who nightly assembled there.

Already the imaginations of both were sadly corrupted, yet, in the case of John Brown, there were in him elements of good, and he had home influence, all of which were a perpetual restraint—that, but for the too close companionship of Jim Moyer, would have held him back from the evil ways his feet were entering, and might have wholly withdrawn him from danger.

The boys met in the evening, as they had agreed. There was much company at the saloon, a good deal of story-telling, ribald songs and boisterous mirth. As the hands on the clock approached nine, John watched them uneasily. He had promised his mother not to be away later than that hour, and he meant to keep his promise. But never had the attractions of the place seemed so strong. A man who had been to sea was telling a story of adventure, and John was listening with eager interest. Nine o'clock came. The man's story, not half done, was in the most exciting part. How could the boy tear himself away? Minute after minute went by, and still the story went on, John listening with an almost breathless interest. He lost himself in the stirring narrative—forgot time and place—starting with surprise and almost pain, at length, as his glance fell upon the clock, whose dial showed them that it was almost ten.

"Good gracious!" he exclaimed, half aloud, as he rose to his feet.

Jim, who was by his side, caught hold of him, saying, in a positive voice—"Stop, old fellow! You're not going?"

"Oh! but I must. I promised mother to be home by nine."

"And it's nearly ten. So you can't keep that promise, my hearty! In for a penny, in for a pound. Might as well die for a sheep as a lamb."

"What's the matter, boys?" asked the man who had just been telling his adventurous story.

"Oh, nothing; only John Brown is one of your apron-string chaps, and wants to get home to his ma!"

The blood mounted to John's face as the man laughed coarsely.

"He'll soon get bravely over that," answered the latter. "How old are you?" he added, looking keenly into John's face as he asked the question.

"Thirteen next March," replied John.

"And how old are you?" speaking to Jim.

"Twelve," said Jim.

"Two likely chaps. Just the kind to see the world. Here, waiter! bring out one large and two small glasses of ale. Were you ever at sea?"

"No, sir," answered Jim.

"Would like to go—see that in your eyes."

"Guess I would. Go to-night if I had the chance," answered Jim.

"Boy after my own heart," said the man, slapping him on the shoulder.

Jim straightened himself up and looked very proud.

The ale was brought by the waiter, and the two boys invited to drink. It was strong ale, and went quickly to John's head, thus giving him over to the tempter.

Well, sorrowful to relate, neither John Brown nor Jim Moyer went to their homes that night. When day broke for them, they were on board a whaling ship, with sails spread to the winds and moorings just cast loose.

Three days of fear and uncertainty passed, when Mrs. Brown got these brief lines from her boy, sent by a pilot who had taken the ship to sea:

"DEAR MOTHER: I did mean to come home by nine, as I told you, but I was tempted to stay later. I've gone to sea, and don't know when I'll be back. It's all wrong to bring this trouble on you—you've been so good. If it wasn't for you and little Emily, and Harry, I wouldn't care. I shall like the sea, I know. Don't worry about me, and don't let Harry go out at night. I'll come out all straight. Good-bye, dear mother. JOHN."

Poor Mrs. Brown! The shock was so terrible that it made her sick, and there was a time when the doctor despaired of her life. Very slowly she rallied, but her feeble health was feebler, and the hope of better days to come, when her eldest boy should be able to help her bear the too heavy burdens of life, was almost dead in her heart. John's weekly wages had for some time been her main dependence; and now, with two children to provide for, and only the resource of her needle, poor Mrs. Brown had to fight more fiercely the wolf at her door.

Months went by, but neither Mrs. Brown nor Mrs. Moyer had any tidings from the boys. A year, and still a silence like that of the grave was on their fate. Two, three, four years, and yet there came no word.

Mrs. Moyer, when she found that Jim had run away from home, was very bitter against him, and prophesied his utter ruin.

"He was always a ne'er-do-well," she said, "and no good will ever come to him. If he's not drowned, he'll be hung."

And yet, even as she said this, nature pleaded for him, and made the mother's eyes wet with tears. Ah! if she had been wiser and more loving—if she had ruled her own spirit while trying to rule him—the boy's chance in life would have been a hundred-fold better.

It is more than six years since John Brown left home. He is nearly twenty years of age. For all that time he has been a wanderer in distant lands and seas, thousands and thousands of miles away from the land of his birth. He has met hardships and danger, has been through many temptations, and fallen into many sad evils and vices, but never into crime. From this, the thought of his mother, and the lessons she had stored up in his mind, has always held him back. Many times has he written to her, but always destroyed the letters. He had not the heart to send them. "She thinks me dead, and it is better so," he would say bitterly to himself as he tore them up.

It was a wild night on the sea. The wind was blowing a gale, and the waves dashed heavily. Standing near the side of the ship, looking into the black sky, out of which every now and then leaped blinding flashes, was a young man in a sailor's dress. The lightning that lit his face revealed a handsome countenance, browned by exposure, and clear, strong eyes, full of courage, yet saddened by some intruding thoughts.

Lifting his hands without a seeming purpose, as if in absent-mindedness, he took firm hold of the shrouds. In the next instant his feet were high in the air! A mountain wave, the onward roll of which had not been seen in the darkness, broke over the ship, sweeping off men and boats, and everything not held by the firmest fastenings.

The young man's involuntary gripe of the shrouds had saved him! The captain, who had stepped on deck at the moment the ship was struck, went over, and was lost; so was the mate. Of those that were left, only this young man could sail the ship, and on him devolved the duty of command. Those who saw him on the day before, and on the morning after the storm, scarcely recognized him as the same individual. All his gay recklessness was gone—all his careless bearing. In their stead was a grave, half-sad, quiet and reserved manner, that seemed to lift him away from his old companions, at the same time that it inspired respect. In his new position all gave him obedience.

The ship was from China, bound to Valparaiso, with silks and teas. Here a cargo of hides was to be taken in for the United States. At Valparaiso, reached in three weeks after the young man took charge of the vessel, it had been his intention to leave her and go up the coast to California. But a change had come over him. New life-purposes were forming. "Let the past die—I have another future," he said resolutely to himself.

When the consignees at Valparaiso learned all the particulars of the captain's loss, and the good service the young man had rendered in bringing the ship safely to port, they not only made him a handsome present in money, but put him in command for the homeward voyage to New York.

"Seven years to-night," said Mrs. Brown, raising herself in bed with an effort. "Seven years to-night. Oh, Father! where is my boy?" And a look of anguish, blended with hope and entreaty, swept over her face as she lifted her eyes upward. "I have kept him ever before Thee, oh, God! Daily have I prayed that he might be held back from evil. If he still lives, oh! lead him home to his mother!"

A hand was on the door. Mrs. Brown started, and an eager, expectant look came flushing into her face. The door opened into the small, poorly-furnished room, and a girl of fifteen entered.

"Oh, it's you, Emily," said Mrs. Brown, in a tone of disappointment, that did not escape her daughter's ear.

"Yes, mother; but who did you think it was?"

"Oh! no one in particular," and the sick woman turned her face away from her daughter's searching looks.

"Mrs. Moyer's heard from Jim," said Emily.

At this her mother started up quickly, her pale face growing paler.

"What of him?" she asked.

"Nothing good, of course. He's dead!"

"Dead?"

"Yes. And that isn't the worst of it—he's been hung for piracy."

"Hung!"—and Mrs. Brown fell back on the bed, uttering a deep groan.

"The news came to-day, in a letter written to his mother before his death. Mrs. Flack told me as I came home. It was a dreadful letter, she says. He told her that it was all her fault; that if she had taken better care of him when he was a little boy, and not scolded and knocked him about the way she did, it might all have been different."

"Did he say anything about John?" asked Mrs. Brown, rising up in bed and looking eagerly at her daughter.

"No."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. I asked Mrs. Flack—and she heard the letter read."

Mrs. Brown sunk back again on the pillows from which she had lifted her sick head, closed her eyes, and turned her face to the wall, while Emily, who had just come home from her day's work at a dress-maker's, drew out a small table, laid it with a white cloth, and commenced getting tea.

"Harry is late to-night," said Mrs. Brown, a slight uneasiness in her voice.

"They keep him late," replied Emily. "The fact is, they put too much on him. Mr. Graylost has no more feeling for a boy than for a dog. And, then, to give him only a dollar a week! If we were not so poor—"

A quick, strong knock caused Emily to start. Before she could move to answer it the door was pushed open by a stout man. His face was brown from exposure, and partly covered by a short beard and mustache. For a few moments he stood silently surveying the room, then striding across to the bed, he bent down eagerly, and catching the sick woman in his arms, cried out in a voice broken with feeling, "My mother! Oh, my mother!"

Oh, the blessedness of that moment! There lies in our pen no skill to describe it. The wanderer had come back. The lost was found.

"God has answered my prayers for you," sobbed the happy mother, as she lay with her head on his breast, looking up into the clear, loving eyes that rested tenderly on her face.

"I believe it," he answered; and then he told her of that wild night on the ocean, and how, by an involuntary act of catching hold of the shrouds, he had been saved. "I had been thinking of you, mother," he said, "as I stood looking into the blackness of darkness around me, lit up every few moments by strong flashes. I remembered the early times when I put my little hands together as I knelt beside you, and the words of a prayer then said came into my mind. At this moment, without a thought of danger, I grasped firmly hold of the shrouds. But for that act, prompted, I am sure, by some angel who came to me in the memory of that prayer I said at your knee, I would now be lying in the depths of the sea."

Ah! the loving, long-grieving mother, who had never wholly lost faith in the power of her early precepts and watchful care over her boy, had her sweet reward. He had come back in the very prime of manhood to be her stay and comfort.

"I have been a wild, reckless boy, mother," he said to her; "tempted in many ways; but, thanks to your loving, patient care over my childhood—thanks to the good and true things you were ever trying to teach me—I have been saved from the commission of crime. And now I bring you help. Good fortune has met my purpose to lead a new and better life. The owners of the ship I brought home are so well pleased, that they have offered me, young as I am, the place of captain. So, mother dear, after the long, sorrowful night, day has broken, and the darkness—God being my helper—shall never fall on your life again."

And it did not.

STEVEN COOK, DOG.

BY ROSILLA RICE.

"CAN'T stand it any longer 'thout a dog—it seems so lonesome and quiet with nothing to bark, or whine, or waggle, or eat the bones," said my Brother Rube, one day two years ago, as he leaned on the well-curb and drank again and again of the delicious draught that ran over the mossy rim of the oaken bucket and fell with a cool drip upon the ferns and mosses that made the old well a marvel of beauty.

"But, Rube," I said, "it would really be better to take somebody's poor, little, lonely child, and feed, and clothe, and care for it. It is downright wasteful to pour out one's affection on a brute when there are children starving for it, perishing for the love that would make their bleak lives all a-bloom."

"But, Zelle, if you'd see the breed of dogs that Snurr has—why they know almost as much as children, and they are such companionable dogs, too! If I had one of them I wouldn't miss my wife so much when she goes to her mother's on a visit, I could converse with the dog, you see."

About a week after this talk I heard a "yeep, yeep, Zelle!" and looking down the street I saw Rube, taking very long strides, and holding one hand on a pouchy-looking protuberance on his breast—holding as tenderly as if he had a sore breast.

"I've got it! I've got it!" he hailed, tipping his hat back off from his sweaty forehead.

"Got what?" I said, thinking of poultices and plasters.

"Why that dear, little puppy, and I wouldn't take one hundred dollars for 'im now."

"What color?" I asked.

"Pale buff"

"Bad," I said, in disgust, "I never knew a dingy buff dog to amount to much. I don't like a diluted color; wish he'd been gray, and as ringed as a zebra."

"Oh, no, they're too common! Come over to-night and see 'im; he's a real treat, I tell you."

"Well, we'll all come over. But what did you pay for him, Rube?"

"I tried to trade; I offered a calf, and then a pig, but Snurr wanted the money. I hadn't a cent, so I gave my note for three dollars. I don't know where the money is to come from, but, Zelle, you know I had to have a dog."

I stood and watched the rich poor man as he strode homeward, looking down lovingly every few steps into his bosom—poor fellow. I did laugh as I thought of his pressing need of a dog, and I remembered of a like necessity that beset him in his childhood. He wanted a pocket-book, and he had no money to pay for one, but he went to the store and told the merchant his sore need and he let him have one on trust.

In the evening we went to see the new puppy. He was one of the most winsome little dears we ever saw. He was as soft and puffy as a cushion, and his precious little nosey looked as if it was meant to be kissed. It was very snubby and wrinkly, and Rube said it positively was dimpled, but, then, Rube is such a dog-lover that he would idealize ugly fighting scars into dimples.

"I want no furse about naming my dog," said Rube, sticking his thumbs, in a wise way, in his arm-holes; "to avoid that I have named him myself, and have the name recorded on the stable-door. I knew it would be such a task for you women folks—my wife here would have called him Orratee, and you would have named him Clarence Theodore, and the girls, Fernando or Daniel Wallace or some such twaddle. I knew how it would be, so I took the responsibility myself, and named him Steven Cook, after that half-witted fellow who used to live down the creek. You'll redeem the name, though, won't you, honey?" and Rube lifted him by the creasy skin on the back of his neck, and the dear creature hung like a little wallet.

We abominated the ugly name of Steven; we oh'd, and ah'd, and shook our several heads, and were horrified, but the deed was done, the dog was named and the name was recorded in keel.

While we all sat on the porch admiring Stevie, who was waddling round his lodging basket, we observed that he rolled down off the steps and walked round and round a rose-bush, and from there he went out beside the fence. It was twilight when we rose to go home. Just then Stevie gave a sharp bark that ended in a piercing scream of dog-distress, and tumbled over on his back in the fence corner. Rube tip-toed out to see what had hurt the dog. He peeped about, he leaned down, and there, close up to the fence, sitting up as though ready to spring upon innocent little Steven Cook, was another dog; or it seemed to be one in the dim twilight. He was dark-colored, and he sat up on end and his two ears stuck up straight from the sides of his head. Rube was very angry—he rushed into the house with his howling little Stevie in his arms, and then rushed out again with a loaded rifle.

"I don't care if that murderous whelp is General Grant's dog, die he must; it was an unprovoked attack upon an infant puppy. I'll make buzzard feed of 'im quicker'n you could say Jack Robison," said Rube, with an air of injured importance. He took aim and fired. The dog never moved. Rube seized a club, saying, "I killed him so dead he can't be any deader, that's the reason he don't tumble over. I'll 'sist him a little;" and he hurled the club viciously at the dog, who still sat bolt upright. Rube took a few steps nearer—he leaned down and squinted closely, and then spitting his hands on his legs with a gesture that meant a good deal, he turned and came to the house.

"Well," we said.

"Well," he said, and looked sneaking as a thief.

"Did you kill that dog in the corner?" said his wife.

"Don't let us talk about dogs," he replied; "there are things of more importance that should claim our attention—dogs are perishable creatures, anyhow."

We ran past him to look at the dead victim, and there sitting bolt upright, with its imaginary ears uplifted, was an old boot standing with the stiff straps up, looking not unlike ears.

This incident is one of our standing jokes on Rube. His years are peppered full of jokes, and he enjoys them in a rational, refreshing way.

It was not long until the little roly poly puppy would come over to our house with his master. We would meet him at the gate, and say, "Good-morning; did you want to see your grandpa and your aunts?" and we would shake him, and hug him, and roll him around; he was as loose-skinned and round and soft, that it was a treat to frolic with the little dear.

Sometimes he would come over to his grandpa's alone—the darling; he would come swinging along, from side to side, like a lymphatic alderman, his little puffs of feet looking as tender as a young baby's. But he never could climb the fences, and he would stop and cry, and peep through, and shake his head dolefully, as much as to say, "Ah, woe is me! woe is me!" Then we always went out and lifted him over.

And so, for two years Steven Cook, dog, has grown into our affections, until we love him humanly, and now we think pale buff is the finest and richest dog-tint extant.

Last Sabbath morning I saw him standing beside a board that lay flat in the door-yard; he was trying to peep under it and turn it over. He strove valiantly, thrusting his nose down, and poking his nails under, and whining in a very earnest manner. I saw him, and said, "What's under there, Cookie? Did you lose a bone, son? Do you want auntie to help you?"

He whined out in a half-laughing, half-crying voice, "Oh, auntie, it's more than the marrowiest kind of a bone that's under the board! Oh, I long to be there!—it's a rat, woman, that's under here! a rat!"

I said, "Now, you stand here, and be wrought up to your very sharpest, and I will tip the board over and give you a good chance to catch the rat."

As soon as I raised it, the whole dog, in a heap, alighted right on the rat and killed it at one fell crush, and shaking his head, tossed his victim to one side and looked up at me, as much as to say, "Your most obedient servant, madam."

Because we have no boy to attend the girls when they go away, Steven accompanies them. He tries to behave like a boy. He ignores other dogs entirely, and walks along beside the girls with a strut that is perfectly ludicrous. He carries his tail up with as much pride and satisfaction as a dandy would his twirling cane. The girls say that if other dogs attack him on the street, he slinks close up to them, and very often makes it seem to outsiders that they are his colleagues, that the proffered fight is theirs to resent as much as his.

Every morning he comes over here for his breakfast, and then goes back home in time for the shaking of the tablecloth. And so we all like Stevie. I never was angry with him but once, and he is still under the ban of my displeasure.

With a dog to eat the bones, I never felt as if we needed one of our own; but Stevie's owner, in his largeness of heart, insisted that we did, and said the first time he could get a good dog for me he would. I said that I wanted no more claim on any dog than I had on Steven Cook—and, believing the matter settled, I thought no more of it. But, one day last winter, Rube came home from town leading a poor little mangy cur by a string. He turned in at our gate, and, to my dismay, putting like a porpoise, said, "Well, Zelle, I got you a dog at last, and your title is good—you can have it to keep forever."

I was horrified, but for the sake of the feelings of the over-generous brother, I smiled and took the string in my hand as gracefully as I knew how, and then took an inventory of the dog. He was about the size of an overgrown cat, so poor that he would have been a fair specimen of a skeletonized dog—about the color of Orange county cream, and the expression on his face that of a dog doomed to death on the scaffold. He trembled all the time as though he scented the officers of justice on his track. His back and sides had been scorched until they were the color of toast bread. There was a skin eruption on his neck and breast, and his eyelids were red and swollen, which gave him the appearance of a decided toper.

"I feel a little delicacy in adopting a dog of whose habits I know nothing," I said to Rube. "He may eat lambs or suck eggs, or pilfer, who knows! I'd rather have the entire training of a dog from his infancy; I'd rather choose his habits for him than to let him run the risk of picking up correct ones."

"Oh, the man said he was just as innocent as if he was only a month old! They never did anything with him, but just let him lie in the corner all the time—they wanted to keep him innocent, you see. Why, he's just like a sheet o' white paper that nobody's ever written on at all; you can fill out the blanks to suit yourself," said poor Rube, believing that he was advancing an incontrovertible argument.

I stuffed my handkerchief in my mouth and turned away a minute. What did I want of such a very innocent dog—I wouldn't let him proceed in his innocent career! I wouldn't let any dog lie in my corner in such inglorious ease; but, looking up into the eager face that was scanning mine, I said, "Well, if Nan Coulter could marry George Crouse, and make of him a man to suit her mind, I can take this wishy-washy little Laddie, and no doubt mould him over into a noble dog." So I tied him to the wood box, and made him a nest, gave him supper, and then, before I retired, I spread a stable-blanket all over him, and tucked it in about the edges, and chucked the little cur under the chin and told him "Good-night, boy," and left him to pleasant dreams.

The next morning I set him a plate of broken victuals, and while he was in the full enjoyment of his luxurious repast, Steven Cook came round the corner on a jolly trot, and saw Laddie for the first time.

I don't know what thought of jealousy filled that dog's bosom, but with a vicious yell, that seemed to say, "Traitor! villain! interloper! demon!" he sprang at the little stranger and seized him by the throat and shook him terribly. The puppy wailed out in a voice pitiful as a baby's, but Steve's vigorous shaking broke the cry into a series of yelps. I ran to the door as soon as I knew what was the matter. The little dog was standing on his hind-legs, with his back up against the wood-box, and his paws were raised, it seemed pleadingly. The foe had come upon him so suddenly that he was not prepared, and a nice little meaty-bone was sticking out of his mouth like a cigar. He cut a very sorry figure. I took Cook by the tail and assisted him to a more favorable and less dangerous position, and then, in no very measured terms, invited him to retire.

I felt of Laddie and found one leg limp and useless, and full of pain. I untied his string and invited him to partake of the hospitality of a farmer's kitchen, but, with a cry that seemed to say, "Oh, no! no! no! there's no place like home and my own cosy corner!" he bounded off the porch, ran round the house and down the street in the direction of his own home.

The last I saw of poor Laddie he was going on a rocking lope on three legs. His destination was miles away, and at the rate he travelled he soon reached it. Poor boy! I think I could have learned to love him, and in time he would no doubt have grown into quite a presentable dog. I should have treated him for mange and been careful about toasting his back and sides, and would have endeavored to restore his general health.

Since then I treat Steven Cook, dog, kindly, but coolly. I rarely smile upon him, and only touch him with the tips of my fingers. I call him "sir," where I used to say "nephew" or "son." If he so forgot his doghood and his principles as to abuse a weak little brother, he must be punished—his pride must be touched in a way that he will feel humbled and abased.

GIBSON'S FIRST COMMISSION.—In the course of time I began to sell my drawings to the boys at school, which enabled me to purchase paper and colors. I made no profit, for my prices were small. There was a very amiable boy who was fond of me, and who was so amiable as always to admire my drawings. His father had presented him with a new prayer-book, beautifully bound; this gift, with sixpence from his mother, was for good conduct at school. The boy said to me, "Gibson, you know how much I like your drawings; if you will make me one in colors for the new prayer-book, I will give you the sixpence." At that time there was a fine print of Napoleon crossing the Alps, from David's picture, in one of the shop windows, which I had already copied in my peculiar way. I showed my copy to my patron; he was charmed, and commissioned me to repeat the subject as a frontispiece to his prayer-book. It was executed in bright colors, and he paid me the sixpence—the largest sum I had yet received for a work of art.

JUSTICE seems most agreeable to the nature of the Deity, and mercy to that of man. A Being, who has nothing to pardon in himself, may reward every man according to his works; but he, whose very best actions must be seen with grains of allowance, cannot be too mild, moderate, and forgiving—for this reason, amongst all the monstrous characters in human nature, there is none so odious, nor indeed so exquisitely ridiculous, as that of a rigid, severe temper in a worthless man.

EDWARD BULWER, LORD LYTON.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

MANY articles have appeared, both in the English and American periodicals, commemorative of this illustrious man, and his character as novelist, dramatist, poet, philosopher and statesman would seem to have been thoroughly discussed. Some of these articles, however, were such extravagant panegyrics as to be nearly worthless for purposes of criticism; others were as unjust as the first were generous, and treated their subject as a mere literary charlatan, with no claims whatever to exceptional talent or genius; while a few, and only a few, judged the dead man and his writings impartially.

Since so much has been written, then, on this theme, by abler and wiser pens, it may well be asked what we can have to say either new or interesting. Nothing, perhaps; and yet the effect an author has upon different minds is worth preserving; for, as we all know, individual judgments make up popular opinion, and however mistaken that may be at times, it is the final test by which real worth in literature is tried and determined.

Bulwer—for by that name he is best known to American readers at least—was born in the year 1805, in the county of Norfolk, England. Of his father we hear little; but his mother was a woman of remarkable energy, and to her, as he himself tells us, he owed his taste for literary pursuits. She was his first guide and his earliest critic, and no passage in his writings touches us more deeply than those wherein he testifies to the beauty and unselfishness of her character. Whatever else is false or artificial, they have the ring of truth and honesty, and for once we feel that his written words spring right from the heart, and are not governed altogether by cold and formal rules.

Perhaps Bulwer clung to his mother's memory the more tenderly from the fact that he made a most unhappy marriage. Upon whose side the fault lay in the domestic difficulties that ensued, we know not, but Lady Lytton's course after separating from her husband was not certainly that of a pure-hearted, delicate-minded woman. She wrote novels merely for the purpose of satirizing Bulwer and his friends, accused him publicly of all sorts of meanness and cruelty, and even turned his personal defects into a subject of ridicule. To this he replied nothing, and his silence, when contrasted with her noisy denunciations, wins not only respect but sympathy.

The only surviving issue of this marriage is a son, now forty-two years old, well known both in England and this country by the nom de plume of "Owen Meredith," the author of "Lucile" and other poems, and a rising diplomatist. He was attaché to the British Legation in Washington when his uncle, Sir Henry Bulwer, Lord Lytton's elder brother, was ambassador; and his political successes, though different from his father's, are none the less remarkable.

Bulwer's first appearance in literature was in the character of a poet, and we learn from one of his biographers that he commenced writing verses at the early age of six years. In 1826 he published two books, one entitled, "Weeds and Wild-Flowers," the other, "O'Neil; or, The Rebel;" both containing rhymes and sentiments weakly imitative of Byron's, and neither destined to attract any notice from the public. The next year "Falkland" appeared, his first, and without doubt his worst, novel. He himself characterized it as the "crude and passionate performance of a mere boy," and omitted it from the edition of his collected works.

That Bulwer was not discouraged by these repeated failures, shows what patience and perseverance were in the man, and in reviewing his career we are chiefly struck by the predominance of these two qualities. All his success, either as author or politician, was due to laborious study and self-culture, and this is the more commendable when we remember that he never enjoyed robust health, and possessed an ample fortune that placed him above the necessity of toil.

The publication of "Pelham" followed that of "Falkland," and was a great improvement upon its predecessor. Afterward, in quick succession, came "Devereux" and "Paul Clifford," and from that time Bulwer's popularity was assured. He wrote in all twenty-three novels, and many of these were translated into German, French, Italian and Spanish, and were perhaps more widely read than those of any other author, if we except Scott, Dickens and Thackeray. But a short time previous to his death he received one hundred thousand dollars from a London publisher for the privilege of publishing a cheap edition of his works.

Besides his novels, Bulwer wrote seven dramas, the best known of which are the "Lady of Lyons," "Richelieu," and "Money," and it is remarkable that here again he persisted, in spite of failure at first, and fairly won the success that critics thought impossible.

But he was not satisfied with these achievements, and in his "Athens" produced a history worthy of the praise bestowed upon it; and apparently resolved to pluck laurels in every field of literature, wrote essays that have been compared to those of Charles Lamb and Leigh Hunt, translated into English verse the German of Schiller and the Latin of Horace, published a satire, "The New Timon," bitter but powerful, and other poems that, though wanting in the divine afflatus, are at least creditable performances.

We are surprised, in counting up his works, to learn that he wrote but three hours a day, and can well believe that during that time he put forth his whole strength. For it is certain that Bulwer extracted from his intellectual faculties all that they were worth, and executed whatever he attempted in a thoroughly workman-like manner. In reading Thackeray, one feels that there is a reserve of power, and that the author could have done better if he had tried, and this is the case with some of George Eliot's writings, and others we could mention; but not so with Bulwer, for he always gives us his best, and we are made to realize it.

And yet, to our mind, there is no comparison possible between him and Thackeray, or George Eliot, or Dickens, for that touch of nature which made the whole world kin to them was lacking in him, and his creations beside theirs seem like fancy studies rather than real ones. We are impressed, it is true, by their remarkable cleverness, but that electric flash which stimulates the mind and thrills the soul, suggesting rather than revealing thought, never vivifies his pages, or leads us to mistake art for reality. His figures are carefully drawn, and bear a marvellous resemblance to life, yet their artificial and unsubstantial nature is at once detected, and they remain to us simple abstractions rather than typical human beings. We are not moved by their joys or sorrows, our self-consciousness is never lost in theirs, and though perhaps as real as many people in everyday life, whom to meet is to forget, no distinct impression of their individuality is stamped upon the mind. The mechanical perfection of his work actually interferes with our enjoyment of it, and the ingenuity displayed in the arrangement of scenes and characters is carried so far as to divert the attention from the spirit of his conceptions to their form.

And this leads us to the consideration of Bulwer's merits as an artist. His writings have been highly extolled for their beauty of structure and details, and the studied harmony of their parts; but his art, as we think, lacks one essential, it proceeds from the head, not the heart, and true greatness cannot be achieved, Ruskin tells us, unless the two work together. True, there are those who hold a contrary opinion, and contend that art is a product of the brain, and has nothing to do with moral purpose; but do not the immortal masterpieces that have come down to us through the ages bear a different testimony? Is it the manner in which the work is done, or what the work itself represents, the nobleness of the truths it discloses and the emotions it awakens, that determines its value? Is not the greatest artist he who embodies the greatest number of the greatest ideas, and is Bulwer entitled to the first rank if tried by this standard? We are willing to admit that he had splendid intellectual abilities, and a literary skill that had been cultivated to the highest point of excellence; but something else is needed to constitute genius, and creative thought is that alone whose circles grow wider and wider until swallowed up in the ocean of eternity.

Bulwer's materials were not original, but he combined them judiciously, and the effects he produced were often admirable. His novels are far above the average mass of fiction, and show in many respects a degree of talent only a little less than genius. And though the sentiments advanced in his earlier ones are often objectionable, the productions of his riper years are not thus disfigured, and show a marked improvement both in their moral tone and views of life. Their wisdom and philosophy, it is true, are of a worldly kind, but not for that reason to be despised; and are valuable at least, as being founded upon shrewd practical knowledge.

The pedantic apesches and metaphysical dissertations introduced in "The Caxtons," and the facility with which infidelity and vice are eradicated by these means and the young made to see the error of their ways, are perhaps a little tiresome and withal unnatural, yet the story itself is worked out with power, and has been justly considered one of Bulwer's greatest. That it was modelled after Sterne's "Tristram Shandy" was not disputed even by the author, and that the copy falls below its original we think is equally evident. Both works have humor, but in one it is always sustained and harmonious, in the other often absurd and commonplace. Sterne united the eccentric and lovable, and formed a perfect whole; but this was impossible to Bulwer, for he lacked that penetrative imagination which is the accompaniment, if not the sign, of genius. The Shandys, with their foibles and virtues, are as immortal as Pickwick, or Sam Weller, the Caxtons, though worthy and amiable, have a lease of life that is at best uncertain.

Notwithstanding these defects, however, the novel is so good that we are surprised it does not impress us more deeply, and hardly know, upon finishing it, whether the fault is in the author or ourselves. Compared with the ordinary run of fiction it ranks high, and only needed a few touches, perhaps, to place it among those works that forever remain a permanent delight. But those touches involved the possession of an insight into the springs of human character, and a sympathy with human needs, that Bulwer's study and culture were powerless to bestow.

"My Novel" and "What will he do with it?" are distinguished by the same excellencies, and marked by the same errors as "The Caxtons." They all belong to the ripest period of Bulwer's development as a novelist, and contain the results of varied study and experience. Something more than a casual perusal is needed to get at their full meaning, and though the thoughts presented are not absolutely new they are at least worthy of careful attention.

Among his earlier productions, "Rienzi" and the "Last Days of Pompeii" charm us most. The subjects were suited to his romantic turn of mind, and he was farther assisted to treat them successfully by an extensive acquaintance with Greek and Egyptian learning. He performed his task admirably, and produced works that are, in the true sense of the word, romances, and that, even though exaggerated in tone and sentiment, fascinate us by the spell of that past whose reality seems to us now like a poetic dream. It may be, as some have said, that the pictures are not drawn with the fidelity of a historian, and that what seems so grand and magnificent is in fact a splendid sham, but we have no wish to penetrate the illusion, if illusion it be, and are content to admire and wonder as in the fairy tales that amused our childhood.

Perhaps no novelist has tried so many different methods of construction, or chosen such diverse subjects, as Bulwer. In what we believe to be his latest effort of the kind, "A Strange Story," he appeals to that love of the supernatural which lurks in human nature, and though repressed in civilized man is never annihilated, as the fantastic beliefs that occasionally spring into existence, even in our own day, testify. But he was not satisfied to leave the mysterious in that dim light where it can alone be seen to advantage, and by pushing it into the broad glare of day destroyed its effect, and rendered what he meant to be awe-inspiring simply ridiculous. In this respect how far inferior he is to our own Hawthorne who, by a single touch, can evoke such haunting visions as curdle the blood and thrill the very soul with terror. Hawthorne, however, was a man of powerful imagination, and as unlike Bulwer as possible, both in mental and moral characteristics.

That Bulwer's fame will rest chiefly upon his novels we think is certain. Not but what he performed meritorious work as a dramatist, historian, essayist, translator and poet, and was enabled by his polished intellect and cultivated taste to do himself justice in these various roles; this we readily admit, but held to our opinion that it was his culture, and not a special aptitude for either, that produced this result. The natural bent of his mind was toward novel-writing, and the success he won in that department of literature is what will determine his future greatness and claims to immortality.

Of his political career we can only speak briefly. Nearly every one knows that he made a miserable failure upon his first appearance as a public speaker before the House of Commons, and it is characteristic of the man that he was not discouraged by that defeat, but retrieved it thirty years afterward, and gained by one stroke the name and fame of an orator. His triumph was the greater that he withdrew during all those years from parliamentary life, and, so far as the public knew, had no intervening training or practice. Add to this that his elocution was wretched, his voice weak and thin, his gestures artificial and constrained; that he was slightly deaf, and in personal appearance spare and attenuated, and one begins to understand, upon counting up these disadvantages, what force and energy and persistence were needed to overcome them.

There is something almost heroic in Bulwer's perseverance, his apparent resolve to make the best of his gifts and reach the highest point of which his nature was capable, and whether it sprang from ambition or purer motives, it furnishes a lesson that we should all do well to ponder. No easy successes were his; he worked, and worked bravely, not skimming over the surface of things, but delving to the bottom of them; and the secret of his versatility lies in the fact that he threw his whole strength into whatever he did, and was only spurred to nobler efforts by failure and discouragement.

One thing only he lacked, and was it not, as Dr. Holland says, a heart? Would not a touch of love—universal love—toward God and man, have transmuted his gifts into genius? Is it not certain that he who looks down upon humanity from the egotistic height of self-consciousness, refusing to enter into its trials and troubles, cannot touch the heart, though he may dazzle the brain?

GIRGENTI AND ITS TEMPLES.

BY C.

ON the Island of Sicily, the City of Girgenti (the ancient Agrigentum) is famous for the remains of its many temples, and for its imposing external appearance. It is on the slope of a mountain twelve hundred feet above the sea, which it faces, being distant from it about three miles. It has many public buildings, a cathedral of the thirteenth century, many churches and convents, and some antiquities and treasures of art, but its temples attract the most attention and interest.

Agrigentum was much renowned among the ancients. Different stories are told of its foundation; among which is the fabulous tale, that Dedalus, who fled to Sicily from the resentment of Minos, erected it. Its situation was peculiarly strong and imposing, standing as it did on a bare and precipitous rock. Its soil was fertile, and its wealth became very great. It was the second city in Sicily, and surpassed in grandeur of appearance, on account of its many temples and splendid public buildings, most of its contemporaries.

The extensive remains of the ancient city are east of the modern town, where the temples are mostly situated. The magnificent Temple of Concord is the most perfect existing structure of early Greek architecture. It is remarkable for the grandeur of its design. Its roof is supported by six immense pillars on each of its four sides, and ornamented with admirable sculpture. The Temple of Jupiter Olympus vied in size and magnificence with the finest buildings of Greece. It was 370 feet long, 182 wide and 120 high, the foundation not being included, which was itself remarkable for the immense arches upon which it stood. There were also the beautiful temples of Minerva, of Jupiter Atabyria, of Hercules, of Juno, of Vulcan, of Castor and Pollux, and many others. Near the city was an artificial lake, cut out of the solid rock, about a mile in circuit, and thirty feet deep, from which fish were obtained in abundance for the public feasts. This pond has since become a remarkably fruitful vineyard. Both the temples and the lake were the work of Carthaginian captives. The people, noted for their luxurious and extravagant habits, fell with little resistance under the power of the Romans.

CROOKED PLACES.

A STORY OF STRUGGLES AND HOPES.

BY EDWARD GARRETT,

Author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," "Premiums Paid to Experience," etc.

PART IV.—MILLCENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER XIII.—MILLCENT'S WAYS.

ALL those years Mrs. Harvey, Miss Brook and Milly had still continued to live in the same pretty, leaf-covered cottage, which they had taken in the early days of George's prosperity. It was much prettier now. They had never spent much upon it. But very small spendings for many years fast accumulate in beauty and comfort. And Milly's taste was never idle, and her mother's fingers were always busy. And now that the family had grown so small, there was room for elegance of arrangement, and there were a little dining-room and drawing-room, and each had a chamber to herself. Milly had the largest, with a big closet off it, because she made it serve as a studio as well. Mrs. Harvey had the one with a western window.

It was a very pleasant, peaceful home. The old ladies seldom went out, except to George's or Harriet's, but Milly's professional life kept the house astir with plenty of interest and excitement. Her mother and Miss Brook enjoyed it more than she did herself.

For the bright, fragile girl had developed into a pale, keen-eyed woman. Strangers thought that she must be very delicate; but, in truth, she had the high-bred strength of a fine tempered blade. Altogether, Milly was not unlike a swift, sharp sword.

Her habits were much the same as they had always been. She had never been a notably early riser, like Hatty, but still she was always punctual at the breakfast-table, as scrupulously neat in her attire as when she was going out to dine. Nay, more so; for Milly's personal neatness could never pass a certain point, and always failed where details grew elaborate. That was one sign of her impatience.

There was a little shelf at her bedside, filled with the quaint devotional books that were still her favorite religious reading. Perhaps, if anything were omitted from her daily orisons, it might be the Bible itself rather than these. Perhaps, because in it she was left free to choose, instead of a passage being marked hard and fast for each day. But if Milly omitted the Bible occasionally from her morning and evening devotions, she studied it earnestly at other times. She almost knew the Psalms by heart, and even the book of Job, and some of the minor prophets. In her Bible the Old Testament was much more worn than the New.

Her professional work seldom occupied her more than four or five hours a day, often not so much. She was a rapid worker, one who was accustomed to say, "that if she was not doing a thing quickly, she knew she was not doing it well." She made no scruple of speaking about her methods, for she was wholly devoid of that professional humility which is often masked conceit. She did not work constantly, but with frequent intermissions, varying from a single day to a whole month. Her own explanation was that she "waited" for new ideas. "When I have done all that is in me, I stop till more comes in," she said.

"Do you feel it coming?" people would ask her.

"No," she replied, with a mysterious half-smile. "There is no need to watch the pitcher at the well; it is time enough to move it when it brims. All of a sudden I want to go to work again; and then I go."

"And you have not been thinking about it all the time?" they would inquire.

"No," she said. "At least, if I do, I have to wait just twice as long."

"Arn't you frightened lest it should not come?" said some.

"I should be if I could help it," she answered.

"But it does not depend on me."

And that faith of Milly's always seemed to Mrs. Harvey to be the best part of her daughter's special inheritance. It was like a parent's letter sent with a birthday present. It was the very hand of God conveying his gift. And we cannot see all of any blessing that we have, unless we see also the hand that holds it. Mrs. Harvey herself secretly confessed to some slight uneasiness, when Milly first indulged in these intermissions of labor, which was almost immediately after the household became mainly dependent upon her exertions. For, though George still persisted in his allowance to his mother, Milly, in her turn, proudly insisted on returning him as much as she could, in presents to his little Robert, so named after his wife's uncle, and his own first benefactor. But Mrs. Harvey presently learned that there are still barrels of meal and cruses of oil that do not fail. It inspired her with confidence to find that her daughter looked upon these snatches of leisure with calm delight, and planned little pleasures to occupy them. But even when Mrs. Harvey shared her daughter's faith she never ceased to wonder at and admire it. It was a comfort to her for Milly's own sake. For Milly seemed to trust herself rather than God in so many things.

Milly still continued fond of needlework. But when Mrs. Harvey ceased to be a bread-winner, she took the family mending upon herself, and Milly now entirely eschewed all repairing, altering, or trimming. In honest truth, her mother even mended her gloves, and sewed on her straying buttons. But whenever her new white work was needed, especially if the seams were long and the material tough, Milly took it in her charge and got it done in an incredibly short space of time.

She never dabbled in household matters, as they arose day by day. In "spring-cleanings" Milly would give herself up for a week, as if there were no such thing in the world as art, and as if she had wielded brushes and spied out "corners" every day of her life. But once the house was set straight again, she retired into her own duties, oblivious of all beside them. She would wait for her mother to make tea or order dinner with quite masculine helplessness. Yet when her mother went away for a week to stay with Christian, she guided the house well, and Mrs. Harvey found nothing neglected during her absence. She was not an useless woman, but an absorbed one, who could set herself aside for a time, but could not bear to be broken in upon. She could make her own little crosses of spiritual discipline after her own ideal, but shirked those which God makes for each of us, and puts where we are sure to find them, unless we turn out of our way to avoid them. It would have been easier for Milly to wear sackcloth, or to fast utterly on certain self-appointed days, than to bear with good humor an unexpectedly spoiled dinner or an accidentally torn dress. Perhaps she was no wiser than those housewives who shut out the healthy fresh air lest its current should raise the dust! It might be that Hatty was somewhat right when she said to her husband, and in her abrupt, off-hand way: "If our Milly would sometimes infuse the tea, and go to market, she would find there is something else in the world beside those Lauries."

Milly kept up a pleasant chatter with her mother and Miss Brook, and many strangers would have thought her an unreserved woman. But her mother, at any rate, knew better. Milly's life and heart were large, and had many open chambers, some free to all, others cheerily open to those she loved. But her mother knew that there were many unaccounted-for spaces among the windings of her daughter's experience.

Milly received and paid many visits, and had a wide circle of acquaintance. But there were very few who rose above this level. Milly herself was in the habit of saying "that she had not patience with people." Clearly she did not cultivate it. Where she had no affectionate prejudice she was quick to see faults and unsparing to condemn them.

"She can't take folks as she finds them," Hatty would say. "She makes their characters out of her own head, and when they don't fit she just throws them away."

The few people who did get near Milly's heart were a strange jumble. She and Miss Brook were always sparring, but Miss Brook's voice was in all Milly's thoughts, and one light would die off Milly's world whenever her keen eyes were withdrawn.

Milly did not care much for David Maxwell. He was somebody who might be always invited when there were visitors, and he would never feel himself neglected if other people had to be entertained, and would be sure to entertain anybody else in danger of feeling neglected. Milly always said that "Mr. Maxwell was very kind." But she had never "made up" any character for David. Such of his early history as she knew had repelled rather than interested her. It did not clearly manifest those lines of independence, and struggle, and daring, to which Milly's sympathies ran. Its manifold virtues were rather patience and submission, which were set down in Milly's secret heart as rather poor things, the resort of those who had nowhere else to go. Then the ugly rumor in the old local paper, which Milly would never have happened to see if Fergus Laurie had not shown it, with a hinting explanation, would return upon her mind sometimes, like a nameless horror between her and David, and give her an almost physical shrinking.

But Milly enjoyed Phoebe Winter. Her voice at the back door, discussing some kitchen loan, or other business, would always bring Milly down from her studio. Milly called her "a grand type," and revelled in her old-world shrewdness and dogged loyalty. It was perhaps a proof how much Milly's faith in ideals was, after all, as George had once warned her, rather a faith in her own opinion, that she never thought the more highly of David Maxwell for Phoebe's great love and belief in him. She only delighted in the love and belief as part of Phoebe's own character.

Perhaps Milly's nearest friend was her sister-in-law, Christian, with whom she had much more in common than with her own Sister Hatty. In this she was under the disadvantage which every maiden has, in friendship with a wife, especially a happy one—the idle heart claiming something more than the busy heart has left in its power to give. Yet Millicent was unusually fortunate in Christian, who, though she kept a lover's romance in her wisely affection, and was a very madonna whenever she looked at her boy—nay, rather because of this—was still never a mere "married woman," but had a strong, sweet individuality of her own, which the influence of husband and child only raised and softened, as saints' names give human interest to churches sacred to far higher worship. Millicent had always been free from any taint of small sister-in-law jealousy, and now she felt that she loved and knew her brother far better in Christian than she could ever have done without her.

Christian herself had a growing love for Millicent, and enjoyed far more of her confidence than Millicent guessed. In their talks over fiction and politics, poetry and pictures, Christian always felt when Millicent was giving out her very self, could always detect whether the blood of a thought came from the head or the heart. Out of her own full, happy married life, Christian Harvey pitied Millicent, not for her maidenhood—Christian had no "married woman's" pity for that, but would even tell George sometimes, with a smile dying into gentle gravity, that she was sure she would have made a very happy old maid herself, if he would have left her alone! But she pitied Millicent for her overflowing heart, sealed up, and for all the pathetic heresies with which she tried to make herself believe that this was best. She felt that Millicent was like a foolish miser storing gold in a bottomless well, while lives around were famishing for lack of a single coin, and thinking himself rich only to find some day that he was as poor as the poorest. She would try to give Milly suggestive warnings, just as kindly physicians may strive to convey wholesome hints about sufferings that are not absolutely presented for their cure. But Millicent's intuitions were almost as quick as her own, and she so proudly shrank into herself, that it was precisely the point where Christian could have helped her most that she withheld from Christian.

But Millicent had still some confidants, who poured out their souls to her without any limit. Not Fergus Laurie. Limits there had always been to his confidence, and now it had nothing but limits. He still liked to talk with her, but it was very much "a talk of the lips." But she kept her faith in the sacred secrets of the heart that was all shut up now. She would not defend much that others blamed in him—his arrogance, his recklessness, the high-handed, forgetful spirit that so often brought inconvenience to others and loss to himself. But the woman who was generally so impatient, was patient here.

"I know him," she would say. "Everybody has faults, and his are just the faults that everybody is severe upon. You all have patience with the helpless, and the ne'er-do-wells; you all stand still to pick up the man who has tumbled down, and to heal his scars. Let me trust in the man who tumbles up, and let me at least pity the scars which his reserved and sensitive spirit hides unhealed."

"I should think it was the will of God, for it seems a beautiful idea, and a sweet softening in Milly," said poor Mrs. Harvey to Miss Brook, "only it does not grow in her. It stays just there. When patience and pity begin, anyhow they generally spread."

"This isn't patience or pity," retorted Miss Brook. "It's just pride. But it isn't the worst kind."

No. Fergus Laurie had ceased to be Milly's familiar friend, in the old, pleasant way. The freshest breeze that now blew into her guarded life, came from the lives of her sister's step-children.

The Webbers' home was quite uncommon, because it was directly matter-of-fact. It was a very comfortable, well-to-do home, but all affectation was left outside the door. Artistic taste might have scorned every detail of that house, but the best artists would have loved the whole. It was a jovial place, where one might put everything to the use it was intended, and where nothing was too good to wear out, but had a curious trick of improving in the process. How the bright big-patterned carpets had horrified Millicent, and drawn forth sneering jests from Mr. Laurie and his sister! Yet how handsome and respectable they looked, when the bustle of active feet had toned their hues and melted down their lines! But, perhaps, the peculiar style and spirit of the house is best revealed by the fact, that the boys' friends delighted to frequent it, and that those who elsewhere seemed all arms and legs, shyness and titter, astonished themselves and everybody else by appearing respectable members of society in Mrs. Webber's "sitting-room."

The young people all adored their step mother, and hung about her in all her rapid busy ways. The worst of Hatty was, that her immense capacities of loving service seemed to leave her no leisure to be served by love. All their affection had to be concentrated in the morning and evening kiss, an occasional five minutes' hand-clasp in the twilight, and a yearly birthday present. And so they paid her vicariously, by pouring out the love she awoke, on others whom she loved—"dear Grannie" and "Aunt Millicent."

Yes, it was really to Hatty's lowly, loving ways that Milly owed the bright, wholesome affection of these lads and lass. She would never have won it for herself—nay, her absorbed heart scarcely knew that it was worth the winning. She would have often preferred a solitary walk, to their volunteered companionship, while their eager confidences, the hopes and dreams of their young lives, seldom seemed to her really worth the smile or the sigh which she gave them.

Milly was a great walker. Hatty took her exercise chiefly "running in and out," as she called it, bargaining in the market, looking up sick neighbors, slipping round for a half-hour's chat with Mrs. Harvey. Mr. Webber was not a walking man. His wife said he stood too much in the shop, to care for anything but sitting down when he was out of it. Once or twice a year Hatty would dress herself ceremoniously, and go with Milly for a long walk. It was a true test of the healthfulness of her general "running in and out" exercise, that Milly, the pedestrian, never outwalked her. On her return from these excursions, Hatty would confide to whoever came nearest.

"I've enjoyed myself very much. Milly and I always talk more freely walking side by side than sitting opposite each other. But it is one thing for me to enjoy myself walking with her, and it is quite another to understand how she enjoys flying along by herself, as she does—just up one way and down another, as if she was hunting something."

It was a touching revelation, that as her brother George had walked and wandered in the days of his restless, yearning youth, so his sister Millicent walked and wandered in her middle age.

For Milly was middle-aged now, and knew it, and ached wearily as she knew it. Happy women do not sigh to know their youth is past. The blossom is better than the bud. But if the bud has never blossomed?

People would turn to look at Milly as she passed them in her lonely walks. She went so swift and straight that they wondered where she was going, and what she was going to do. But she was going nowhere, and to do nothing, except to turn back at an appointed time!

CHAPTER XIV.

A PAIN AND A DOUBT.

NOBODY ever knew anything about Milly's business transactions. She never talked them over. She never asked advice. Mrs. Harvey herself had always shrunk from pointed inquiry, feeling, from her own experience, that the burden of responsibility is often increased by the lightest touch, and that some hard things that must be done are easier to do in silence. Latterly—that is to say, for years past—she had been silent and uninquiring, out of utter satisfaction and content, just as in the earlier and prosperous years of her married life.

But at last Christian began to detect in Milly a despondency that was quite a new thing. Sundry extreme economies, long laid by, began to reappear. Not any that touched her mother or the home, but Millicent wore her gloves shabbier, and bought no new dresses. She spoke more tenderly of failing people, whose work was not quite what it had been, but was still strong on the truth that they should be ready to acknowledge the fact, nor feel wronged when they were put aside. Once, when Christian accidentally entered Milly's studio, she found her practising the old humble kind of work she had done in her early girlhood. Milly thrust it out of sight, and nothing was said on the subject.

The fact was, business matters had not been going quite brightly between Millicent and Fergus Laurie. He had reduced the payment for several of her last designs, saying that their success had not been what he had expected, vaguely hinting at certain losses as if they had been incurred through these. Then his orders had come at farther intervals. But when Milly ventured to tell him, what had happened often before, but had hitherto been passed over in silence, that the old firm of his former masters had been looking her up, and inquiring if her hands were still too full to do anything for them, this was the response she got: "Ah, they are wanting something cheap! But your real friends feel that you need the repose which brings fresh ideas, rather than to go slaving on in the old groove, Miss Millicent. Don't have anything to say to those people."

And Milly obeyed, but with sundry puzzled, painful reflections as to what was hidden under the phrase of her "needing repose."

She thought she needed no further explanation when another new discovery of David's was put before the world, not this time in her designs, but in those of a young lady, upon whose head Mr. Laurie heaped the prizes he had once showered upon herself, with the addition that this artist worked con amore, being wealthy, and having no mercenary needs mingling in her ambition to soil and impoverish it.

On the same evening that Millicent heard all this, sitting in the splendid drawing room of Acre Hall, Robina, chatting, as it seemed, quite naturally over the affairs of some third parties, was full of praises of her brother's tenderness and loyalty of heart, which made him strive "to keep on" employés whom anybody else would throw off to sink to lower and fitter levels of work.

That night, Millicent, sitting in her studio, shed some very bitter tears. She said to herself that, after all, like most other failing people, she was not aware of her present falling off, though all the work she had ever done suddenly seemed poor, mean and pretentious. But at any rate—and she shook back her high-bred head till the streaming tears flew right and left—she would be royally proud in her readiness to submit to the judgment of others, in a case where she had so often seen that it was worth so much more than the judgment of the person nearest concerned.

Poor, haughty, humble Millicent! How could she dream that Fergus would have been only too glad to put her drawings into this newest discovery, but that one of his largest creditors claimed this honor for his daughter, the con amore artist, who for all her wealth demanded and obtained, for work which none but a debtor would have taken as a gift, twice the sum which would have satisfied Millicent? How could she, blinded by preconceived partialities, perceive that all Mr. Laurie's praises, past and present, were due not to a work in itself, but as done for him, and issued under his auspices—that Fergus was really scarcely a wiser art-critic than poor old Mr. Smith, of the "Leech-gatherer" order, and not half so simple and honest an one?

But all of a sudden Milly felt that her affectionate gratitude, which she had hitherto so proudly displayed, as if it were the very crown of life, had become a crown of thorns. The fact is, there are very fine lines drawn about gratitude, and it is well that it is so. The higher natures cannot easily be gracefully and contentedly grateful for any relief that comes to them by the pain of another. They can be bountifully grateful for the superior strength that can lift off, and carry readily the burden that was crushing themselves, but if they see that it is also a burden to its new bearer, there first impulse is to snatch it back, crying, "Let me, rather than another, perish under mine own burdens."

This is one reason how it is that so many think they get least gratitude where they seem to have earned most. Noble hearts, such only as are capable of gratitude, would never have allowed themselves to get so deep in debt. The man whom we dare not help, except by a letter of recommendation, which we are ashamed to remember, feels himself indebted to us forever. The other, who allows us to maintain him, shakes off the dust of his feet upon us whenever we at last venture to hint that he may be self-supporting.

Nor can any man be grateful for what is done for him consciously, painfully and with a grudge. Few of us could be made happy by the hospitality of a host, who kept an account of all we cost him—breakfast, dinner, bed, boots and attendance, just like an inn-keeper, although he never sent in his bill, and only expected us to pay him by an exact return of his civilities! The fact is, we are grateful not so much for what we receive, as for the love or kindness which makes our benefactor feel it a pleasure to give. If any man does not feel it infinitely "more blessed to give than to receive," let him expect no thanks. It is doubtful whether we should weep for a man who died for us, if he claimed our tears as a reward of his sacrifice. The Great Sacrifice of the World, the just who died for the unjust, bade His mourners, "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children."

But poor Milly, sitting there in her darkened chamber, could not think—she could only suffer. Feelings came to her heart, rather than reflection to her head. Now it was a wild wish to repay Fergus for all the kindness he had shown her, and the inconvenience he must have suffered through it. Next it was a stabbing wish that she had found the truth out entirely for herself, instead of receiving it through the Lauries' hints. It would have been so easy to say to Fergus, "My powers have disappointed you; let me go," and all his kindness, and all her gratitude could have gone with her, stainless and unflawed, treasures for the rest of life to keep, if not to use. The terrible pity of it was, that Milly felt already they could never be so now. They had received a blow, and at the least touch they would fall to pieces, and however she might afterward gather them up and mend them, they could never again be unbroken.

Other feelings would come. If Fergus were disappointed in her—if he had measured her powers amiss, and put her in places too high for her; had he been really kind to her after all? If in mistake, a man dub a plain mister "his lordship," has he done him real honor? Milly almost felt as if she had small reason to be grateful to Fergus for taking her from the quiet, regular duties where she had always given boundless satisfaction, and that it was a poor thing to be raised to a pedestal only to be tumbled from it. She caught herself actually calculating that one year with the other, and one chance with another, she might easily have made as large an income with the old firm as she had with Fergus. It was true that she might not have saved as much, for Fergus's times of payment were always so dreadfully uncertain, that while the more improvident of those who worked for him were constantly out-at-elbows and living on borrowed money, Milly, from the experience of her youth, and her hereditary horror of debt, diligently kept down expenses in every way, so as to be forearmed against ever such long periods of waiting, a process which, regularly repeated for many years, had now resulted in a very respectable sum of savings. Out of considerate desire to save troubling Robina Laurie's brother, Milly's one black silk dress had worn out half a score of Robina's.

Then again, if Fergus was sometimes very liberal in his payments, Milly had long since been forced to own to herself that it was under particular conditions. If he had at first given her a higher class of work and paid her more highly for it, he had since paid her absolutely less than she would have got elsewhere. She had not heeded that—she had been glad of it—proud of it—delighted to feel that it was a fitting reward for his kindly faith in a beginner. But now she felt—and displeased herself for feeling—that she would like to let Robina know this side of the subject, as well as the side of her brother's magnanimity.

Then again, she knew that Fergus was in the habit of indulging his generosity at the expense of justice, that lately he had been doing two or three showily magnificent liberalities, while she herself was very wearily waiting for her rightful payment. Once or twice, against her will, she had actually caught herself wondering if anybody—and who—had suffered in the long-ago days when her own receipts were always prompt and ample. Little did she guess the light that David Maxwell could have thrown on this question!

These shadows had flitted across her mind sometimes, just now and then, and only for a moment. Now they mustered in force. But the old, wilful, womanly faith, roused itself from fainting, and gathered itself up to repel them. They seemed mean and paltry and below it, and it would drive them down and banish them as was fit. It was surely but the shadow of her disappointment in herself which was darkening over Fergus. Better to think one's sight is wrong than that the sun is growing black!

There are senses in which Millicent was both right and wrong. Common sense is one of the best of things, but there are grander things than it is. There are times when its dictates are the dictates of the devil. Poor Don Quixote appears a fool beside his Sancho Panza, but that is because he is wasting his knightliness in Sancho's proper domain of windmills and kitchen wenches. On Don Quixote's own level of daring and sacrifice, Sancho would be not only ridiculous, but contemptible into the bargain. Which would you prefer to be within ear-shot, if you were really a distressed damsel in extreme danger? But the mischief is—and it is a mischief—that Don Quixote will waste his heroisms on the windmills!

And so, all Milly's pain and doubt and bitterness ended in a conclusion and a wish. A conclusion that it was Robina and not Fergus himself, who made gratitude galling. And a wish to make some return, which without effacing her own gratitude—to which she clung like a drowning mariner to his last spar—should make Fergus grateful to her, and set them both once more on a noble equality, to be friends as they used to be!

So little did she know what it really was that had come between them!

CHAPTER XV.

A WOMAN'S GRATITUDE.

BUT at last, as the complications of "Laurie & Co." thickened and deepened, the creditors began to watch the business so carefully, that Fergus Laurie could snatch from it no more than barely sufficed to keep the wolves of last year at bay, while those of the present were clamoring at the door. The firm still kept up in respectable working order. Its creditors took care of that, for it was their only chance of repaying themselves. It was Fergus's private income alone which came to a dead lock. He was still deriving a tolerable sum from the business, but what was any sum with limits to a man who had launched into extravagance on borrowed money, and extricated himself from one loan after another, by contracting new and larger ones, at higher and higher interest?

One expedient by which he had often kept a little ready money in hand, was to defer the payment of those who worked for him, more especially those who were on friendly and trustful terms. Some of his people, with small means and heavy charges, had been driven to ask payment. They did it very reluctantly. He had held forth such brilliant pictures of his idea of the relation of employer and employed, that they absolutely forgot they had never derived any benefit therefrom. And if they forgot, how much more did he! Fergus's mind grew sore with his constant reflections on ingratitude.

Fergus had a special grievance against David Maxwell. David's minimum salary was in arrear, and he had received absolutely no bonus for the last twelve months. David had said nothing about this, and had not asked for any money for himself. But Fergus's old friend and faithful coadjutor had committed what Fergus held to be unpardonable sin. He could and did easily forgive some of the more thriftless of his people, who asked for money before they had earned it, and these often got it from him, while the others went without. He liked their "trust" in him; and to pay money that was not earned, in a dashing, unledger-like fashion, fostered the sense of magnificent autocracy, into which all Fergus's ambitions had finally resolved themselves. Paying what was due was a humdrum affair. Everybody did that!

But David, though kept in profound ignorance of all the larger concerns of Laurie & Co., could guess at something, by such fragments as from time to time accidentally dropped before him. And David would constantly remind Fergus that it was the date to pay this one or that one; nay, in cases where the people were elderly, needy or unprotected, would so press the matter that Fergus could not shirk it without a plainer statement than it suited his pride to make. It was David's constant hints which had long kept Millicent's accounts from falling into hopeless arrear and confusion.

But, as the rude old saying has it, "one cannot get more from a cat than her skin;" and when there was positively no money in Fergus's hands (not even to pay Robina's dressmaker), David's hints on even this matter became ineffectual. Only the higher Millicent's debt rose, the more Fergus insinuated and insisted on the gratitude due from her to himself, the more he criticized her work, and the less he gave her of it.

Millicent writhed in secret tortures. If she could only recompense Fergus for the loss, which, rightly or wrongly, he and his family seemed to feel he had incurred through "taking her up," she would go forth happily, and earn her bread cheerfully elsewhere, wherever she could find it.

A chance remark developed in her an idea on the subject. Somebody said—it was the wife of a wealthy tradesman in the neighborhood—"that for all the wonderful way Mr. Laurie had got on, he seemed always very short of money—perhaps his business took it all up."

Millicent turned this over in her mind; and it seemed to her that both the fact and the supposition were likely to be well founded.

Then it occurred to her that it might really be in her power to do Fergus a service. The savings of her lifetime amounted to seven or eight hundred pounds, duly invested in the three-per cents. Her family knew she had money there, but they did not know how much. She had not allowed even her brother George to know the fluctuations of her affairs, having a proud fear lest he might at some time want to help her where she could help herself.

Milly knew nothing of the loan still existing between Fergus and her brother-in-law, Webber. She had heard something at the time, but had supposed that it was all settled long ago, as, "of course," all the earlier matters of the firm must be. Hatty had never told her otherwise. Hatty knew how to keep counsel. In her own words, "she might gossip about what she guessed of her own wit; but when she was fairly told anything, she held her tongue."

Millicent thought to herself that she might really oblige Fergus by putting her little fortune at his disposal. She was a sensible woman, and at another time and with another person, would have understood that it could be no particular service to lend him a sum which he could have easily at command, simply by leaving Acre Hall, and living in a way more consistent with his antecedents and means. But pain and grief and pride blinded Millicent.

She had no wish to humiliate Fergus, by letting him think for a moment that she believed he needed the money. She wished to make it appear a mere business transaction, by which she might get a trifle more interest than from her stocks. Millicent was a magnanimous woman, and rejoiced in the hope of repaying something of whatever she might owe for the ease of her own heart, not for the pain of another's. She only hoped to make Fergus think of her, as a serviceable friend, as of old, instead of the burden which she had lately appeared. The moment that her plan formed within her, she said within herself that kindness can never be repaid, and that every kindness given in return is a new blessing bestowed by the first benefactor.

As she made up her mind to follow out this sudden plan, which seemed to her like an inspiration, the soreness died out of her heart, and she remembered it only as one remembers a fevered dream. Now it felt easy to accept much with which she had been fighting fiercely. After all, what did it matter if her drawings had never come up to the standard which Fergus had set for them. Having done this service in return, it would be quite bearable to go back to the old humble ways of toiling. Life was not in these things—the soul had a history distinct from these. To bind it to them was scarcely less ignoble slavery, than to bind existence to its trappings of dress and furniture—like—poor Robina!

For as she sat at her desk, planning her letter to Mr. Laurie, Millicent could not help thinking of Robina. She could forgive Robina now, for many a sting which had once seemed as if it must rankle forever. Robina had a habit—common to most who know nothing of the real bliss of near ties—of making her relationship to Fergus a vaunt and a taunt to outsiders. Whenever there came forward any of those little questions, whether financial, legal or political, which specially interest women, Robina was addicted to dismiss them from discussion because “they could not matter to her. She had her brother; she need not trouble herself about such things, though it was only natural, that other people should do so, who had nobody to look after them.” But Milly remembered this now with a smile, and forgave it. Poor Robina! Her idle, selfish life would never enjoy the privilege of offering even such a little service as this to her brother. Millicent thought of her in her heart as “poor Robina,” and felt she would be able to bear all the helpless sister’s boasts for the future.

She had no fears for the worldly wisdom of what she was doing. Amid all her doubts and anguishes, she still trusted Fergus. And in those events of life and death in which human faith and trustworthiness avail nothing, she felt she was willing and able to take all risk.

Her letter was very brief:

“DEAR MR. LAURIE—Forgive me for troubling you about a little matter of my own private business. I have saved money to the amount of nearly eight hundred pounds. It is now invested in three percents. But I think I might get a little higher interest. I believe some merchants consent to receive such loans from people at about four or five per cent. Would you do this for me? I do not ask my brother-in-law, Mr. Webber, because I do not like my family to know every up and down of my business life. Their knowledge, and perhaps wish to help me, would be a pain and a burden to me. Will you let me have a speedy answer, as, if you consent, I shall like to make the change as soon as possible.

“Faithfully yours,

“MILLCENT HARVEY.”

She put on her bonnet to post the letter herself. As she passed through the little hall, she found her mother dealing with an itinerant flower-vendor for groundsel for the canary. The man had some prim-roses and violets at the other end of his basket, and Millicent paused to admire them, and bought a dozen of the tiny bunches. It was a long time since she had spent even such a trifle on pure pleasure. But with her letter in her hand, Millicent Harvey felt rich.

Then she went swiftly down the long, sunny road. She encountered a neighbor whom she had generally passed with a civil nod, but to-day she paused to say something about the bright spring weather.

“It agrees with you, I can see, Miss Harvey,” responded the old lady, “for you are looking quite blooming!”

Millicent smiled. She knew it was true. And yet it was only yesterday that somebody else had warned her that she should take great care of herself, she looked so fragile! Millicent’s frame was like a transparent sheath—when the sword within was bright, the sheath was illumined.

Two or three hours later, the postman delivered her letter at the counting-house. At the same moment, a servant girl came running up, breathless, with another. The office boy carried them both to Fergus.

Fergus Laurie read them, one after the other. That which was delivered by hand he crumpled up, and tore into twenty pieces. He would need no memoranda to keep its purport in mind. For it was much like this:

“The man has got in. I stayed on guard, as you told me, all the morning, but nobody came. I had only just gone to my room to try on my blue silk when a man came and said his boy had dropped his cap over our wall, and might he look for it; and the donkey of a cook let him in, and here he is. It is no use scolding me. You ought to be ashamed of yourself for leaving me in such a plight, and getting us into such disgrace. The man is smoking, and his vile tobacco poisons me. I do not see why I am to bear these things for you. I am dying.

“ROBINA.”

“Is the girl who brought this waiting for an answer?” Fergus inquired of the office-boy, with a coolness as perfect as if it had related only to the hour fixed for dinner.

“Yes, sir,” said the lad. “I told her you was busy, but she said she daren’t go back without something.”

Fergus took up an envelope, and wrote inside:

“Don’t die till I return. Take a glass of wine, and go up-stairs and try on your blue silk again. Have not you any eau-de-cologne in the house?”

And having dispatched this cynical missive, he reperused Millicent’s letter.

“There are women and women,” he said to himself.

CHAPTER XVI.

FRIENDS AND LOVERS.

IT was quite true that Acre Hall had just received a new and very disagreeable tenant—a man in a brown great-coat with frayed sleeves, who said it was thirsty weather, and asked where the beer was kept, and laid a long clay pipe on the beautiful hall table. He was not an unexpected visitor.

One of Fergus Laurie's private creditors had been pressing hard for a long while. He had written half a score of letters, civil and almost kindly in their very sternness. Anybody but Fergus would have seen that the writer meant to carry out his will, and so framed his demand like a request, and did not bluster. But Fergus thought this calmness augured patience, and superbly took no notice, till one day he found that legal processes were commenced, and next, that that sort of domestic barricade was necessary, which so often begins among ormolu and choice wines, to be set up again and again till at last there is nothing behind it but a pawn-ticket and a corpse!

To Fergus the bitterness of the blow lay in the fact that it happened to come from a man whose connection Fergus had scorned, and whose kindness he had slighted in his old lofty days. This was the kind of pang that Fergus really felt. He had grown callous to most but the sting of personal pique.

Fergus was always vaguely expecting a shower of gold to fall and fill the gaping purse of his creditors. The wonderful indomitable hopefulness, which might have been the greatest blessing of his life, had grown into his greatest bane, as great blessings have it in them to grow. Several times things had happened, as he put it, "just as they should," and he had found unexpected ways—though they might not be the cleanest—out of bogs of difficulty.

It seemed to Fergus, standing there with Robina's letter in fragments at his feet, and Millicent's in his hand, that one might be the "providential" solution of the other.

Not that he thought of robbing Millicent of the savings of her patient, laborious life. He expected that something else would happen which would enable him to pay her again, or at least to pay her interest in due course. He felt quite sure that he could get plenty of money from other quarters if he only tried hard enough, and he had a delusion that there were securities in his power to offer. Alas, a man is a poor deceiver if he is not the first person to be deceived by himself!

At that instant, he hastily thrust the letter away, for David came into the room. He looked even unusually quiet and grave. But Fergus could read a knowledge in his eyes and a regret in his voice, which made him say, within himself, as it seemed, inconsequently: "Where would Maxwell be now if it had not been for me?"

"It is more than two months ago since you ought to have paid Miss Harvey, Fergus," David began.

"Well, I know it is," Fergus said, tartly; "but she can wait. She has been too well paid to be in such extreme want of money."

"It is not a question of want of money or no," David went on. "It is a question of justice."

"Well, she cannot be paid now, and that must be the end of it," said Fergus.

"She must be paid," David returned, steadily. "I have just found out what is going on in Acre Hall at this moment. It is known in the office somehow, and I heard it there. After this, there will be sure to be a settlement of everything. At the present time, Millicent Harvey is the only one among those who work for you, whose debt is very considerable. The others have got into the habit of asking you for money, while my representations of her case have lately gone quite unheeded."

"So, this is the end of your friendship, is it?" said Fergus. "To turn upon me in my day of difficulty?"

David's face quivered just for a moment. "I am Millicent Harvey's friend as well as yours, Fergus," he said. "And I am more your friend in this than you think. I want you to do what you will be glad to remember you have done, Fergus."

"How can I pay her?" Fergus asked, restively. "I shall have to borrow money to pay this execution out of the Hall. It is a terrible revelation to find one's friends taking advantage of an awkward shortness of ready money, although there is plenty behind the scenes."

"I will advance you what is needed to pay Miss Harvey," said David. "It is just a hundred and fifty pounds. It can be set down to my account against the firm, and I can wait indefinitely. Call upon her to-night, Laurie, and tell her candidly how things are, and the circumstances under which you cannot give her so much work as formerly, and set her free from all tie to us; and tell her that if she calls here to-morrow, she shall be paid all up. It is the plain truth, Fergus, and you will never repent speaking it. If you will not tell her, Fergus, I will go and tell her myself. I had no idea how bad things were, or I should have said this before. Perhaps I ought to have known, so as to be able to help you to take the brave and right course. If there was any indolence and over-easiness in my ignorance, I hope you will forgive me."

Fergus looked up at David with a bright, eager gaze, and David's heart leaped within him, as he thought that perhaps this time of hard facts and plain speaking might be also a time for the renewing of the old true, open friendship.

But this was the only interpretation of Fergus's eyes.

"Why not lend me this one hundred and fifty to pay out the execution, old friend? The debt is not so much as that. And then whatever measures I would have to take to pay it off, I will take to pay Millicent instead. It will not be so hard to sell something to pay her as to pay that fellow."

David shook his head sadly. "I am but a poor man," he said. "All my means could not extricate you from your difficulties, even if such extrication, by itself, would be any real service to you."

"But I am your old friend, Maxwell," said Fergus. "Why should not you wish to help me, as far as you can, as much as Miss Harvey? Miss Harvey is not in need. She can always be independent; and she has helpful friends. I don't know that I have any—unless it be you."

A faint flush passed swiftly over David's face. Through all those years his old boyish love for Millicent had seemed to linger in his heart, only as the faint perfume of faded flowers lingers in a shut-up room. But now it was as if a door was opened, and the flowers lifted up their heads as the breeze rushed through.

He walked slowly up and down the room.

"I have never said a word to anybody all these years," he said. "Indeed, there is nothing to say. It is only a folly of mine. But I bless God for it, notwithstanding. A man does not ask a woman to marry him if he is sure she would refuse. If I had thought there was the least chance for me, I would have asked Millicent Harvey to be my wife years, and years, and years ago. She is the only woman I ever loved in my life. There, Fergus, old boy, if I did not think of you as of a dearest friend, would I tell you this?"

He held out his hand to Fergus, who put his into it, saying, "I believe you are a good fellow, Maxwell, I know you are. I will see Miss Harvey to-night, or if not to-night, to-morrow. It will all be well again. And though I tell her she need not tie herself down to us, that's no reason why we should not give her so much to do that she won't think of any one else. I'll manage matters very differently to what I have done; and you'll stick by me, won't you, David?"

In those words—the suggested endearment, the fatally ready admission, the half promise, and the groundless hopefulness—lay all the danger and all the promise of poor Fergus Laurie's character! David's words came to him like a 'guardian angel's whisper in a dream. The worst of it was that the world, represented by Robina's clamorous voice, was sure to seem to him the waking reality, to which he would turn, with half a sigh, for the sweet ideal gone out of his reach.

And so the two parted.

David went off to his lonely home thinking, "We will save him yet—we two, Millicent and I. He has been walking in dangerous paths; that he chose them for himself only made their greatest danger. I think he will confide in me now, as he used to do. And when he once begins to speak with her, he will be sure to confide in her, and she will give him so much help. Who knows but that this time of revelation and humiliation may be the very sealing of a life-long bond between Millicent and Fergus? If he has been false to himself and unkind to her, I am sure there are depths of pitiful loving-kindness and tender mercy in her."

David himself had forgiven the unknown mother who had left him but a legacy of shame—he had forgiven the father who had blighted his youth, and the woman who had embittered it. David had practiced forgiveness till the power had grown so easy that he never even noticed when he exercised it!

Only as he went along, David thought within himself how selfish he was, and what an especial blessing it was to him that no goodness of one's own is any item in one's acceptance with God. For, out of all the shock and pain, he felt a little bit of happiness shooting like a blue mountain flower from the devastation of an avalanche. In this time of trouble, he was the one who could advise Fergus, and shield Millicent. There was a sense in which, after all, he was useful and necessary to the two—man and woman—in whose life he had lived far more than in his own. He did not think he had ever wanted much more than this. At any rate, nothing else could have been half so good. Of other dreams, other hopes, he thought now as a grown man thinks of the toys he coveted in childhood!

Fergus Laurie went home to Acre Hall. He gave a contemptuous grunt at the clumsy salutation of the disagreeable man seated in the hall, and passed on to the drawing-room. There seemed something in the very atmosphere of the house which made him think within himself that David Maxwell's way of talk was all very fine and well-meant, doubtless, but that it must be modified in such a world as the real one.

Mrs. Laurie was in bed. She had retired thither on the first appearance of the disagreeable man. But Robina was ready to receive him, with a grievance longer than herself.

"What other woman has to endure such treatment as this?" she cried. "Is the vicar's daughter expected to entertain a man in possession? Does your fine Miss Harvey have to put up with such a humiliation in the sight of her servant?"

"Miss Harvey is in altogether different circumstances. You can't compare her with yourself," said Fergus. "If she had a man in possession, it would be of her own goods; she is the real mistress of her house."

"Then you ought to be ashamed of yourself for bringing your house to such a pass," Robina retorted. "As you say, it isn't my affair, and I'm sure it is not my fault. Nobody can say I'm extravagant. I've never had more than a half-pennyworth of milk taken in for tea, just for the sake of saving; and whenever chance visitors have happened to come, I have had to send out for more; and one half the time they have known it, so they couldn't think me extravagant. And I've never given a single present—so different to you who are always throwing away on strangers! You had no right to set yourself up, in such grandeur if you can't keep it up."

"That's a true word, Robina," said Fergus, carelessly.

"But you ought to be able to keep it up," she went on, only more angrily. "I don't believe it is a bit more than we have a right to. And now I suppose we shall have to go and live in some hokey-pokey hole, hardly better than the Harveys' cottage. Of course, it is easy enough for them who have never been used to anything else; but, after what I have been accustomed to, it will be very hard. It will be unendurable!"

"What have you been accustomed to?" asked Fergus, with his provoking calmness. "Do you mean to Acre Hall, or to the single room over the tripe-shop, where we all lived in father's time, when there were five of us to be supported on the pension that mother spends on her own washing bill now-a-days?"

Robina gave him one unutterable look, and went out of the room, leaving him alone in the splendid saloon—the same, only still more resplendent with satin and gilding, where, on that far-away summer evening, he had sat with Millicent Harvey, while the soft early moonlight came stealing down through the elm tree, and he was very near saying to her that all beauty and all success would be nothing to him without her. He was not the first man who, having to choose between the princess and the palace, chooses the palace, only to find that all crumbles away without the princess, while she makes a palace wherever she goes.

Fergus had not sat there long before he rang the bell hard, and bade the servant bring up some brandy and soda-water. That was no unusual order. The excited, feverish life he was leading, deprived him of appetite. Wholesome food had grown thoroughly distasteful, and the highly-seasoned, artificial morsels he could still enjoy, only fostered his craving for stimulants.

Fergus sat there sipping his glass, and felt himself a bitterly ill-used man. He took up the grand visions of his aspiring youth, and put them side by side with his blasted present, and set the two down as cause and effect, without reference to anything between them. He thought his ambition had been to make business but a wider and truer philanthropy, "therefore" he was a ruined man. Others had only aimed at fortunes for themselves, and so had made them. But it never struck poor Fergus that this purely unselfish philanthropy of his had grasped at the glories of fortune, without even the trouble of making it.

It was no new thing for Fergus to say to himself that "something must be done." What he had never yet dreamed of doing was to give up Acre Hall, and reduce his expenses to whatever trifle there might be to meet them. That alternative seemed now staring him in the face.

He had spoken truly—truer than he meant or knew—when he said to David that he was his only friend. He had given up his Friend in Heaven. That sounds an awful thing to say: alas, that men find it the easiest thing to do! What can a man have to do with God who only wants help to pay for the wine that is destroying him, defence against claims which are just, wisdom and counsel to scheme for wrong and selfish ends? These are not the "crooked places" which the Lord has promised to straighten. And who were Fergus's friends on earth? Not the two hard selfish women who were ready to make up their minds that whatever he did was right, because it was his doings that fed them daintily and clothed them softly. Chance words of theirs were never likely to cast a gleam of sunlight on any storm-battered soul as the chance words of some women might. Help and inspiration did not grow wild in their conversation. Oh, had Fergus raised his eyes from the mean and sordid plague spot that had crept over his young ambition, to see such a woman as Christian Harvey smiling love and peace beside his hearth, perchance he would long ago have started as from an evil dream, and awaked to his better self. But it was Fergus's own wilfulness which had shut him up with those two women as the geni of his life.

Gradually thoughts began to rise out of the whirl of heated feelings, and to link themselves together.

At first, "I am tired of this kind of life. What the better am I now that I am sitting on a carved and velvet chair? It might as well be a wooden one with a chintz cushion!"

Then, "I have never enjoyed what I have had in this way. There has been no time for anything but worry."

"Oh, I wish I was young again! I wish I was just starting in business. What a different plan I should lay out!"

"And so David Maxwell has had a liking for Millicent Harvey. I used to think so. Lately I've forgotten all about it. She has never cared a straw for him. He was a wise man to know it. It would have been different with somebody else, I think. I did not refrain from proposing to her, because I thought there was no chance of acceptance" (and in all his misery, Fergus, alone in the twilight, smiled a vain man's smile). "I only wish I had proposed to her at the very beginning. I believe I should have got on better. At any rate, she would not be such a squeaking idiot as Robina."

"And so David Maxwell is paying my debt to her out of his romantic affection! Well, I can believe things of that sort of David better than of most men. But I shouldn't wonder that he has a sneaking idea that he will help her to get work, and so on, and that somehow she'll find out this is his money, and so forth! I don't say he does it for that, or that he knows in his heart he wants it, but yet he'll work it round so."

"And after that she might marry him, just out of gratitude. Women will do that sometimes. She'll think it is too late for her to do any better. What a pity?"

"I really do not see why I shouldn't marry her myself, after all. If I go myself to night and tell her that we are going out of business, and that she will be paid to-morrow, that is what I promised David, and he will have no excuse to go there bungling himself. I shall say what he said I ought to say, and what more I say is my own business. I won't borrow her money—that, under the circumstances, would be only putting myself in a dangerous position. But, once we are married, it would enable me to settle up these two or three little personal debts to people whom I can't bear to triumph over me. And then my business will be wound up, and I shall get a share of something, somehow. And then I'll begin again, in the quietest of ways. How can one be wise without experience? Robina must go away. She has never been satisfied with what I've done for her, and she can't expect me to forget her reproaches now. She can take a situation of some kind. Her manners have been polished up by the society she has met here, so she has lost nothing by being with me. It don't matter much to me what she is, for I won't set up in business in London again, but far down in the country. I'll allow mother a little if I can; but, anyhow, she has her pension, and she must have more clothes by her now than she can ever wear out."

But while this undercurrent of thought really flowed through Fergus's soul, his self-knowledge went no deeper than the surface whereon rippled such self-delusions as these: "I have gone wrong for want of such a woman as Millicent to be my household friend. I don't think she is happy. Why should we not both endeavor to make the best of what remains for each other? She ~~may~~ be lonely, poor thing, for all the rest of her family have their own private interests. I can't be marrying her for her money—nobody can say that. What are her seven or eight hundred pounds to a man in my position? And I could get them if I liked without marrying her. If I wanted to marry money, I would marry tens of thousands. No, I want herself. I could face poverty, or any change with her; and I am sure I shall be a great comfort and stronghold to her. I'll tell her at once that I won't borrow her money, nor have anything to do with it, except by our both having one purse henceforth. We'll be married as soon as possible—in about a week, say. And there is no need to trouble her about my business arrangements. I'll tell her the truth, that I'm going out of business; and, really, she could not understand the ins and outs, if I tried to explain them; and, besides, I myself know everything will be all right, though she, as a woman, might be nervous. We shall be in Acre Hall for another six months, at least, while things are wound up. Mother and Robina can go and stay at the seaside for that while."

The thought of six months in the glories of Acre Hall, in Milly's society, and with the responsibilities, at least, of business lifted off his shoulders, was a prospect beyond which such a mind as Fergus's did not care to look. To others it might have seemed only a respite. But that was all his ambition now. He lived in such a hot momentary struggle, that the thought of even a week's freedom was like ages of paradise.

The last ray of spring daylight had just faded as he took his hat from the rail in the hall, and started off for the Harveys' cottage. He seemed no longer to notice the presence of the disagreeable man in the hall—an omission which that worthy resented by granting to himself.

"I should think that difficulties is that gemman's native air. His eye seemed to take me in as natural as if I was a walking-stick."

WHAT AN ENGLISH WRITER SAYS OF THE COSTUME OF GENTLEMEN IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

IN this age, however, it would be difficult to impugn us for a too great fondness for display, the male costume being reduced to a mysterious combination of the inconvenient and the unpicturesque, which, except in the light of a retribution, it is puzzling to account for. Hot in summer, cold in winter—useless either for keeping off rain or sun, stiff without being plain, bare without being simple, not durable, not becoming, and not cheap. Man is like a corrupt borough—the only way to stop the evil has been to deprive him of his franchise. He is no longer even allowed the option of making himself ridiculous. Not a single article is left in his wardrobe with which he can even make what is called an impression—a conquest is out of the question. Each taken separately is as absurd as the emptiest fop could have devised, and as ugly as the staunchest Puritan could have desired. His hat is a machine to which an impartial stranger might impute a variety of culinary uses, but would never dream of putting on his head. His coat is a contrivance which covers only half his person, and does not fit that, while his waistcoat—if a straight one—would be an excellent constraint for one who can contentedly wear the rest of the costume. Each article, in addition, being under such strict laws, that whoever attempts to alter or embellish, only gets credit for more vanity than his fellows and not for more taste.

This being the state of the case, the responsibilities of a wife in that department are very serious. On point of fact, she dresses for two, and in neglecting herself virtually wrongs her husband. Nature has expressly assigned her as the only safe investment for his vanities, and she who wantonly throws them back from their natural course, deserves to see them break out on his own person, or appear in that of another.

SLEEP.—The man who sleeps little, repairs little. A man who would be a good worker must be a good sleeper. A man has as much force in him as he had provided for in sleep. The quality of mental activity depends upon the quality of sleep. Men need on an average eight hours of sleep a day. A lymphatic temperament may require nine; a nervous temperament six or seven. A lymphatic man is sluggish, moves and sleeps slowly. But a nervous man acts quickly in everything. He does more in an hour than a sluggish man in two hours; and so in his sleep. Every man must sleep according to his temperament—but eight hours is the average. Whoever by work, pleasure, sorrow, or by any other cause, is regularly diminishing his sleep, is destroying his life. A man may hold out for a time, but the crash will come, and he will die.

CONCERNING NAMES.

BY MISS E. T. WHEELER.

A NOTED lexicographer speaking, in the preface of his greatest work—a Greek lexicon—which had cost him years of application, of the drudgery which most people would think his labor, said that the study of words, classing, grouping and searching out new meanings, had been not tiresome but delightful. Had his subject been names, many of us would join in his pleasure. For in them lie much rare tradition and entertaining history; and to glance over the various customs of naming, the meanings and superstitions connected therewith, can hardly fail to amuse us. For our names are the one thing that unalterably belong to us; given over the cradle and written on the marble that shelters our last sleep, through all the varying light and shade that lie between, they cling to us; spoken by loving lips, they are thereby consecrated ours forever.

In olden times naming seems to have been more important work than now; the sense was of more account than the sound, and if they seem barbarous to our ears, we may find on examination that many of them have lovely meanings. The Hebrew mother named her darlings so, and her delight in them, her worship of God, her faith in her people, all shone out from the long list of Bible names. The ceremony of circumcision is familiar: modern Jews require ten witnesses, and the name is given between benedictions. A singular custom prevails with some of them, of changing the child's name in illness: when all remedies have failed, this is tried, the idea of misfortune attaching to the old one.

With the Greeks, naming was an important affair. The seventh day from birth was kept as a high festival, sacrifices were offered and a banquet given to friends; with the child in arms, the nurse ran around the fire, so putting the new-comer under the protection of the household gods. An olive garland hung at the door was the sign of a boy; a fleece, symbol of spinning and weaving, of a girl. Sometimes names of illustrious ancestors were given, and sometimes the decision was left to chance: tapers were lit, different names being attached to them, and the one that burned longest—as giving longest life—was the chosen one. This superstition was wide-spread. It crept into the early Church, and the bishops vainly preached against it. Several cases are recorded where twelve tapers, named for the apostles, were used in this way. One poor princess earned so the name of Simon.

The Romans followed Greek customs, but their practical character is shown by their seizing on personal characteristics as bases of names: Longinus, tall, Gracchus, slender, Cæsar, hairy, are examples of this.

As the Greeks divined by candles, the Hindoos place two lamps over two names, and the one which burns brightest is chosen. The name of the reigning planet is sometimes added. In Thibet two names are given, one from some god to be used only in religious ceremonies, and one for every-day service. In Ceylon the ceremony is full of poetry: the mother carries her child to the temple with an offering and three flowers to which names are attached, the initial letter in all being that of the reigning constellation; the priest presents the offering, and, after a little, returns one of the names; the mother believes that he is guided in his unconscious selection by the gods, and hence that her child is named by them. African babies have the pleasure of naming themselves: the new-born one is placed on a palm leaf, palm-wine drunk over it, and a few drops spilt on its face, from its cry of resentment the name is taken and it is generally Quaco. Forty days feasting celebrate with the Abyssinians a child's naming.

One may see in glancing over the names given to women among various nations, the respect in which they were held. Greeks gave them those expressive of beauty and power: Eulalie, speaking sweetly, and Arsinoe, elevation of mind, are instances. With the Romans a poor girl had only the family name feminized; if there were more than one of them, only numerals distinguished them. So the sisters of Brutus were Junia Major, Junia Minor and Junia Tertia. Only the Chinese join in this scant courtesy to daughters; with them, owners of the "golden lilies" of deformed feet were sometimes known as One, Two, Three, etc. The followers of Mohammed deny woman a soul, but they take pains to select for her names from flowers and gems, as useless but beautiful parts of creation. They call them Gulnare, pomegranate-flower, or Yasemeen, fragrant jasmine. The Hindoos likewise ordain that the names of women shall be simple, musical and of good augury. But it is not until we come to Teuton and Celt that we find appellations rich in meaning given them. They believed the sex inspired, and the royal names given them show this: Dagmar, mother of day, Bertha, bright one, Adelaide, noble lady, and Gertrude, trusted and true, are examples.

The Japanese change their names four times in life, the Chinese still oftener. With the latter the first is the "milk name," on entering school the boy has a "book name," and on marrying another is given. With our own Indians of old, men and women exchanged names on marriage, and the young brave's proudest title was earned by his own deeds in battle. In Rome, slaves on becoming freedmen took new names; but soldiers were never allowed to change theirs; it was graven on their buckler and was inseparable from them. Kings ascending the throne took new names, and popes on assuming the tiara. The superstition connected with this latter change was strengthened by the fact that in the only case in which it was not done, the unfortunate pope died in nineteen days. Converts to Christianity were baptized with names of solemn meaning: one case deserves mention. A captain of Trajan's guard, called Placidus (easy-tempered), took on his conversion the name of Eustace (steadfast). His faith was tried by fire, but his noble name was the index of his brave endurance of martyrdom. Sometimes names were forcibly changed. The conversion of a king to Christianity was, of course, followed by that of his people. One of the Polish kings was so turned in the thirteenth century, and by his orders his people were renamed for the saints. To one part John and Mary were given, to another Peter and Catherine, and so on. A clever writer tries to prove this the cause of the innumerable army of John Smiths; the first name is accounted for, and as in those days the surname came from the trade, and that of a smith was one of the most common, the explanation is complete. In 1465, Edward IV. of England, ordered all his Irish subjects to take English names, on pain of forfeiture of their possessions. A century later, Philip II. of Spain, issued a similar command to the Moors of his kingdom. In 1603, the great Highland clan of Macgregor were, for their misconduct, deprived of their name. By their bravery and devotion to the Stuarts they afterward won it back. Justly is this loss of name thought a degradation fit only for the convict.

At first one name was sufficient; but as the world's people divided into tribes and bands family names were soon added, and with the Romans it was a matter of pride to have as many as possible. So highly was the surname esteemed that, in the twelfth century, an heiress refused to marry a suitor who had not this qualification.

"It were to me a great shame
To have a lord withouten his true name."

A modern princess has had twenty bestowed on her, all pleasant sounding and of happy meanings.

With nearly all nations many superstitions are attached to names. In Greece and Rome, oracles were consulted concerning them. In religious ceremonies pains were taken that all concerned therein should have fortunate ones. Trials of criminals began with those of most unlucky appellations; and when soldiers were enrolled, fortunate names must head the lists. Before the battle of Actium, Augustus was rejoiced by the good augury of meeting a donkey and driver whose names signified conquering and fortunate. After the victory he built a temple wherein figures of the two were placed.

Who will say there's nothing in a name, when he remembers the story of the Persian slave whose whole destiny was changed by change of name? Poor and friendless, Nuari (destitute) was a perpetual reminder of his condition. One day his master, pleased with some service, added the single letter A to his name. But Anuari meant brilliant, and inspired by the prophecy the young man made it true by his after life. The Roman guards once elected an emperor solely for his name. Regilianus had indeed a royal sound and meaning, but his rule was short. In another instance a fair princess lost a husband and a throne because of her name. Louis VIII. of France, surnamed "Cœur de Lion," desiring a Spanish princess for his bride, sent ambassadors to the court of Madrid to form the alliance. The eldest and most beautiful of the two princesses was the one desired, but when her name was pronounced they drew back. Uracca (magpie) was equally unmusical and of unhappy meaning; and her younger sister, Blanche of Castile was carried in triumph to France to become the proud mother of St. Louis.

There are fashions in names as well as in everything else. In Italy, in the fifteenth century, a fancy existed with literary men, of taking classical names. As a precedent they claimed the academy founded by Charlemagne all whose members bore Greek and Latin ones. The reigning pope, suspicious of heretical plots, imprisoned and tortured some. Some of them contented themselves with translating their names into Latin. This fashion has been often followed, and the case of Luther's friend is familiar. Philip Schwartzert, (black earth,) became by this means Philip Melancthon and by this name is known in history.

At one time in England, it was the fashion for lovers to address their sweethearts as Delfi, Chloe, Phyllis, etc. But when the sweethearts became wives and mothers, they called their children after them simply Betty, Kitty and Mary. English hearts cling most, not to the noble Teutonic, but to old Hebrew names. "A good old-fashioned English name," means not, Edith (blessed), Ethel (noble), Ermine (lady of high degree); but Mary (exalted), Martha (bitterness), and the like. France and Italy prefer classic names. At one time a novel idea seized French writers. The last letter of the alphabet suddenly became most important. Heroines were called Zaire, Zuleime, till the thing reached the climax of absurdity with an author who announced the life of Prince Zzzz.

Cornwall has some curious names. Zenobia and Philippa are favorites among peasant women, and ladies like the title of Sage. Two brothers rejoice in the names of Cherubim and Seraphim, and a girl bears that of Azimuth. We smile at the Puritans, who imitating Hebrew fashions produced such combinations as Praise-God Barebones, More-Fruit Fowler, and Kill-Sin Pimple. But modern registry lists furnish as bad ones. Will Bill, Faith-Hope-Charity Green, and Joyful-Moses-Lazarus Solomon seem more like jests than real names. "The 15th of June," was a name actually given to a girl born on shipboard.

A hundred more curious facts in relation to our subject might be given. We have done enough to show that there may be much in a name, and with this story of an anagram we close. In Greece it was the fashion to drink as many cups to the health of one's lady love, as there was letters in her name. The honor to "her of the beautiful eyebrows," Charitoblepharos, must have been an exhaustive undertaking, but could hardly have been as fatal as was once a lover's anagram. It was the days when they were very fashionable; and, determined to please the fair lady with whom he had secretly fallen in love, he shut himself in his room for six months at his task. At last he came forth victorious. Her name had been given him as Mary Boon. He had been obliged to substitute Moll for Mary, and on presenting it to the lady he was horror-struck to find that he had taken equal liberties with the surname. It was Bohren instead of Boon; and the lady frowned on his effort. His mind, previously weakened by intense application, could not endure the shock, and in a few days he became insane.

Moral—"Be sure you're right before you go ahead."

A DAY IN OLD LONDON.

MAY 31st, 1533.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

IT was Saturday morning—one likes to be particular about the day—in that old London, which was, at this time, the richest city in Europe. The hawthorn hedges were in full bloom, and the larks were singing up in glad blue deeps of air, and the primroses and daisies were shining in the sunny pastures and among the dark old meadows. The wreaths had faded on the May-poles around which, all over Merrie England, the national holiday had been kept, with dance, and song, and banquet, on the greensward.

"The Silver Thames—it deserved its name then, when the sun could shine on it out of the blue summer sky," must have been crowded and picturesque with its boats and barges; and the old streets, with their tall, dark stores and houses, were radiant with glittering tapestries and draperies, "and the rich carpet-work from Persia and the East."

Never had London been so gorgeous. Never had she decked herself in such hangings of crimson and scarlet, in such splendor of cloth of gold, and velvet, and tissues, as on this fair May morning, when outside the old city the dews were sparkling among the snows of the hawthorn hedges.

There was an eager, breathless curiosity in every face on the swarming streets, and among the crowds on the balconies, while the sheriffs rode up and down on their great Flemish horses gay with liveries.

Fifteen hundred and thirty-three! We have to grope far along the dusty centuries to find that bright May morning which shone over the ancient city, decked for the bridal of her king.

It had come to this at last. Out of the stormy years, the passion and the clamor, Henry VIII. had had his will, and Anne Boleyn, the daughter of the old London mercers on her mother's side, of the proud old Norman Howard on her father's, was going after the manner of ancient queens, from the Tower to Westminster, to be crowned.

But never had so splendid a pageant celebrated a royal bridal as this one, amid which the young maid of honor was going up to sit on the throne of her mistress; never, though the ancient queens had come of long lines of kings, and brought titles and gifts to add lustre to the English crown.

She who was coming up to the throne to-day, and for whom the old city was going half wild in its riot of welcome, brought nothing but her beauty, that rare and wondrous grace of manner and speech which had fascinated the proud and haughty king, and turned him into the most ardent of lovers. Yet Anne Boleyn was to bring to the English throne a gift more precious and splendid than all the queens who had gone before her, for she was to be the mother of Elizabeth Tudor.

The guns of the Tower thundered suddenly into the May morning; the great gates swung back on their iron hinges, and under the archways, in the bright sunshine, the long cavalcade began slowly to defile.

Look at it as the May light glitters on the splendid column. The French knights come first in their blue velvet surcoats, with sleeves of yellow silk, their horses trapped in blue, and the white crosses shining on the hangings.

Then followed the English gentlemen mounted on their magnificent horses, the Knights of the Bath in their violet robes, the mitred abbots and the barons in crimson velvet; then the nobility of the realm in gorgeous splendor, and one by one the chief officers of England, in all the blazing magnificence of that age of glitter, and show, and pageantry.

Last of all the gorgeous procession came the Duke of Suffolk, Charles Brandon, Henry's brother-in-law, married to the younger of his sisters, that fair Mary Tudor, who went to France to wed its king, and found herself so soon a widow.

"It is no easy matter to picture to ourselves the blazing trail of splendor which such a pageant must have drawn along the London streets—those streets which now we know so black and smoke-grimed, themselves then radiant with masses of color—gold, and crimson, and violet. Yet there it was, and there the sun could shine upon it, and tens of thousands of eyes were gazing on the scene out of the crowded lattices."

But at last the object for which all this glorious spectacle had been prepared drew near, and all else was forgotten.

There was a wide, solitary space, and then a white chariot, drawn by two palfreys in white damask which swept the ground, the silver bells of the golden canopy making soft music in the hush which filled the air, and fell for a moment upon the swarming crowds before the loud welcomes thundered out.

There she sat in her morning loveliness, this bride of a king. Her fair hair fell loose upon her shoulders, and her face in its proud triumph must have been at its fairest that morning. The great court-painter, Holbein, left it to future generations on canvas, but the real power and charm of the face which had fascinated the king, were something which no artist ever caught in his divinest rapture of brush or chisel. She was dressed, as became a bride, in robes of white tissue, and a circlet of rubies blazed upon her head.

After her came her ladies in crimson velvet, over which flamed trimmings of cloth of gold, and then the chariots of the court ladies, and their long-trains of attendants followed. The eyes of the beholders must have been dazzled by the glare of splendor as it wound along the dark old streets.

Never had queen such welcome as she who had come from the quiet country shades of her father's home at Henric-castle, to take her seat on England's throne. At the crossings and the church-corners they waited for her. The old classic legends bloomed out suddenly on English soil. There was a fountain of Helicon pouring forth its dark ruby side of Rhenish wine through all that day "for the refreshment of the multitude," while the god Apollo and his attendants waited around to welcome the English queen.

There was an uncrowned white falcon among heaps of red and white roses; and amid the spectators there must have been gray-haired veterans who could look back to the bloody battle-fields of the Plantagenets—battle-fields whose awful spectres must have started up suddenly at that sea of June roses. Then an angel came down and placed a crown of close gold on the falcon's head, as the chariot of the queen came slowly up. It was a graceful device; nothing under the circumstances could have been prettier; symbolizing, as the whole did, the union of York and Lancaster. There was a burst of wonderful melody, and the shouts of all loyal Englishmen must have shaken the very ground at that sight.

At Cornhill Conduit the three graces on a throne welcomed that white chariot; and at Cheapside the conduit spouted from one end its white river of wine, and at the other its crimson stream of claret.

A little beyond, at the great Cheapside Cross, the aldermen waited in their magnificent robes, and a purse filled with a thousand gold marks, their gift to the queen; and further on were the trio of goddesses—Pallas, Venus and Juno. The little children with their sweet, piping voices sang their ballads; and all the long way, bursts of music and triumphant peans shook the sweet May air. And so Anne Boleyn went on in her youth, and loveliness, and splendor to the old Westminster Hall, which was all hung around with rare tapestries for her coronation.

London never before saw a day like that. In all the centuries since, it has never seen such another morning as that last one of May, when Anne Boleyn rode up from the Tower through the streets, to be crowned Queen of England.

She had been long waiting for this day. Among the green shades of her country home, it had glittered for years above all her hopes and dreams. She had reached, as few human beings ever do, the highest summit of their ambitions—she was Queen of England.

And yet, as I follow that white chariot, and the woman who sits there alone in her supreme loveliness, in the flush and fulness of her proud triumph, while I seem to hear the blare of the trumpets and the thunder of the shouting multitudes, my heart aches for her with a real human pity. Yes, leaning across the dusky centuries, to where that last spring morning shines out of the May, my heart aches for the woman, thinking of her brief day of pomp and splendor—thinking of the end of it all, only three Mays later!

The next day—the first one of the beautiful English June, you remember—the work was done. Amid the splendid old Peetrage with the Knights of the Garter blazing in the dress of their order, while the monks and bishops were filling the dark old aisles with their solemn singing, Anne Boleyn swept out from under her canopy, her beautiful hair floating in a cloud from the wreath of diamonds which encircled her brow, and seating herself between the choir and the high altar in the rich coronation chair. At last, when all the trains had fallen into their places, and the preliminaries of the ceremonial were dispatched, she was led up to the high altar and anointed.

Then the archbishop, Cranmer, set the crown of St. Edward on her head, and placed the sceptre in her hand—not knowing what a fiery price he was to pay for that deed. A mighty Te Deum thundered through the vast hall, and outside, in the bright June morning, the people were telling each other that now, at last, Anne Boleyn was Queen of England.

I have wondered sometimes if, as she rode that May day in her sovereign loneliness from the Tower to Westminster, one spectre did not rise and steal a sudden shadow across all her bliss. I should like to be more certain of this than I am; for Anne Boleyn seems hardly to have carried herself with sensitive delicacy toward the woman whom she supplanted. One can scarcely tell, however. It was a coarse, hard age on which that fair May morning shone; and the standards of conduct and the circumstances themselves were so unlike our own, that it is difficult to form a correct judgment of deeds or characters.

Yet we do know that away down at Ampt-hill, that fair May morning, while the guns were firing from the Tower, and the long, glittering cavalcade was passing, and the shouts of the swarming thousands were ringing through London streets, there sat, lonely and desolate, a pale, sick, broken-hearted woman, worn and old before her time.

She was the daughter of a long line of Spanish kings. For more than twenty years that proud, worn, sad-faced woman had worn the crown of England, and now it had been torn from her brow to be set on a younger, fairer rival, and in her proud, insolent triumph, the maid of honor, the mistress of the king, as Katharine of Arragon must have inevitably regarded Anne Bolyn, was to take her place on the throne to-day, as the wife of Henry Tudor.

It was a bitter, galling thought. The haughty daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella felt herself the most insulted and outraged of women.

What thoughts must have crowded on the stern, proud soul of the woman as she sat there in her stately grief, while outside the woods and fields around Ampthill were bright with the joy of the May morning. She must have remembered her happy childhood when she played in the sunny gardens of the Alhambra; she must have remembered the autumn journey from Spain when she came, a young, wondering girl in the middle of her teens to wed the heir of the English crown.

Did all the feasting and rejoicing with which they welcomed the Spanish bride to England in the pleasant October days come back to her?

And, while her sad thoughts crowded, did Katharine of Arragon hear the larks singing and the plough-boy whistling at his work among the pleasant fields around Ampthill? Did she remember—and perhaps a wan smile came for a moment into the proud, sorrowful face—how the father of her boy-bridgroom clattered with his train across the Downs in the stormy November rains, to look upon the Spanish wife, which the first prince of the house of Tudor was to wed?

Did she remember, too, how the solemn Spanish cavaliers of her train delivered King Ferdinand's injunction that his daughter's veil should not be raised until she stood at the altar with her betrothed?

King Henry, the first of the Tudors, had waded to his throne through the blood of Bosworth field. There was a dark rumor—perhaps any man who dared to breathe the story above his breath would have paid for it with the loss of his head—that Henry Tudor's grandfather, that stern, handsome old Owen, who lived among the Welsh marshes, was the son of a brewer.

But the haughty Tudor spirit was roused at this message. No son of Henry's should wed a bride, though she came from a long line of Spanish kings, and though her hand was the proudest alliance in Europe, before he had looked on her face.

So, there was no help for it, and the Spanish girl gave her future father-in-law an audience on the very night of his coming.

She had learned since what that haughty old Tudor will was that had borne down every thing in its way—even her, with her pride of race, and her stern, unbending Spanish nature.

Did she think of the joyous bridal, of the brief happy life, of the sudden death which smote down into her young hopes, and left her a girl-widow in the strange English land?

She must have remembered all these things in a sad, weary way, that day at Ampthill, when the earth was shining outside, as though in mockery of her bitter grief; and all the world had gone after her triumphant rival—all but the few attendants who had followed her to her lonely home, and were faithful to her through all her fallen fortunes.

There was another bridal, that could not have been pleasant to remember. Katharine had been forced into it most reluctantly by her own and her husband's father; for the bridegroom had just entered upon his teens, and was five years younger than his bride.

As the years went on, however, this disparity of age became less marked. She must have thought how she had been Henry's wife all these years, and the mother of his children; how she had worn his crown, and sat on his throne; and her heart must have swelled with an unmasterable bitterness toward the beautiful rival who had come between them, and worked all this misery.

It was hard on the poor, pale, proud woman sitting there, among the green shades of Ampthill that morning of May, fifteen hundred and thirty-three.

I suspect Katharine of Arragon could hardly have been an agreeable wife. There seems to have been a rigidity, an inveterate bigotry, a gloomy stateliness about all the feminine descendants of the great Ferdinand and Isabella. There was a taint of insanity in the race, which in some members was pronounced madness, in others it amounted to a stately, chronic melancholy, which could hardly have made them, notwithstanding their loyalty, their high spirit, their narrow, intense devotion, attractive wives or companions.

Henry the Eighth was, like all the Tudors, thoroughly an Englishman. He had all the stoutheaded faults of his house; their coarseness, their hardness, their despotic will, their merciless cruelty, when the heroic Tudor spirit was roused, but the man himself was English in his whole organization, tastes and temperament.

His practical, clear-headed intellect; his lead good-nature; his indomitable courage; his strong, iron will; his fondness for sports and pageants; his love "for the hounds, the horn, and the huntsman's bugle," were essentially English. This was, perhaps, the secret of his long popularity with the hard, stubborn islanders over whom he reigned.

He understood their temper, what strains it would bear, and when the reins could be grasped with a firm, powerful hand, and when they must lie loosely.

So he guided the steeds through all the stormy years amid which his reign fell, and with all his hardness and despotism and cruelty, he seems to have left England a better and a happier country than when he went up in the morning-pride and strength of his youth to the throne.

The marriage with Katharine of Arragon could never have been a happy one. She had been forced on Henry, for state reasons, in his childhood. In her temperament, tastes, to her very marrow, Katharine was a Spanish woman, and compliance, adaptation, flexibility of any sort, does not seem to have been in the rigid fibre of her race. She must always have had, too, a lofty consciousness of the great line from which she had sprung; and it is likely the contrasts of her own long, illustrious race, with that of the house into which she had married, and whose glories were of only two generations, made the Tudors, whose name she bore, seem to the Spanish woman "like the mushroom growth of yesterday."

Yet, whatever were the faults of her temperament, her sorrows seem to excuse them all; and we only see the woman, disrowned, desolate, broken-hearted, sitting in her bitter solitude that day at Ampthill.

One of the sharpest griefs of the deserted wife must have been the absence of her daughter. Mary, the only surviving child of the Tudor line, had been cruelly torn from her mother, and was living, at this time, some miles apart from the parent she adored, and whose wrongs she naturally and bitterly resented.

Mary Tudor was never an Englishwoman. In her the Spanish qualities were strongly pronounced: the narrowness, the bigotry, the passionate devotion and hatreds, above all, the remorseless cruelty. Unhappily the wrongs of her mother, the sufferings of her own youth, all had their influence in developing the worst side of her nature; and when, at last, her turn came, it found her a lean, worn, haggard woman, old before her time; and she took her place on her father's throne "to fill the years with the lurid fires of the martyrs of the Reformation," and "to swathe her name in the bloody epithet which shall cling to it forever."

She was a young girl, just past her eighteenth birthday, on that bitter morning at Ampthill, which must have burned itself into her memory, and in long years afterward, Mary Tudor was to reap in the fires of Smithfield the slow, lurid harvest of her revenge.

If it were not for that dreadful record which history writes against her, one could only regard Mary Tudor, on this morning, with feelings of the tenderest pity.

Whatever bloom and fairness youth could give to the sickly daughter of Katharine must have been in her face then. She, too, had had terrible wrongs—that young daughter of the king. Was it nothing that she was banished from the court, that the shadow of her mother's sorrows fell with such dreadful darkness into her youth, that the crown was wrested from her brow and her place in the succession denied to her, though she was born princess of England?

But one can never think of this morning and the ride through all that pomp and splendor from the Tower to the Abbey, and the beautiful woman sitting there in her white chariot, alone in her glory and loveliness, without thinking of that other morning three short years afterward.

Now, as before, the hawthorn hedges are white with their foam of blossoms, and the plough-boy, at his work among the sunny fields, sings some old English ballad, and the clear sweetness of the lark drops out of the glad blue skies, and the wreaths droop on the May-poles, beneath which the dance and the song and the feast have gone merrily on the greenward. The world outside is the same world, rejoicing in sunshine and in the freshness of leaves and grasses, which it was on that morning, when, amid the thunder of the guns and the shouts of the people, Anne Boleyn came out from the grim old gates of the Tower. She is coming back to them now, but in such different plight.

A solitary barge sweeps up the river bringing a prisoner, not radiant then with beauty on a gay errand of coronation, but a poor, wandering ghost on a sad, tragic errand, from which she will never more return, passing away out of an earth where she may stay no longer into a Presence where, nevertheless, we know that all is well for all of us, and therefore for her.

Yet think of her, sitting there in her still, white anguish, the old grace of attitude clinging to her, as the barge drew near the Tower-stairs, and the grim gates frowned down on her once more; those very gates out of which she had passed in her proud loveliness only three years before, to take her seat in the gay chariot drawn by palfreys.

Before she passed under the grim arches, she sank upon her knees—she to whom all England had been kneeling for the last three years—and she prayed, in the anguish of her soul, "Oh, Lord, help me, as I am guiltless of that whereof I am accused."

It does not seem as though a guilty woman would have dared utter those solemn words at that moment.

When the stern lieutenant of the Tower approached she asked him in her wild, pitiful way if she was to go into a dungeon.

"No, madam," he answered, and if he had a man's heart, used, as it was, to scenes of grief and misery, it must have ached at that moment. "No, madam, to your own lodging where you lay at your coronation."

At those words she burst into a great passion of weeping; yet there seems to have been no refinement of cruelty intended here. She was a queen. For three years the crown of England had rested upon that fair, bowed head. It would never shine there again, but they would treat her like a queen to the last; and so they led her under the dark arches, and the great iron gates swung back, out of which Anne Boleyn was never to come again until that last time, when she was to go down to the scaffold on the green, to the headman there, with the sharp, deadly glitter of his axe, and Anne Boleyn was to stand there a moment in the bright May sunshine, a fair, tragic figure for all future centuries.

It was likely enough that that coronation day, and the dizzy height to which it lifted her, turned the woman's brain. Only the strongest could have borne all the glittering pomp and incense which were offered to Anne Boleyn during the brief day of her pride and power.

It is likely that she was giddy, vain and imprudent. That early life at the gay, corrupt French court had, it is probable, infected her more or less with its sentiments and habits. It was quite natural that she should not always have remembered that she owed everything she was to the favor of one man; and presumed upon that too far. It was not surprising, after the proofs he had given her of his long, passionate devotion, that Anne Boleyn should have regarded herself as seated securely in the king's affections, and acted too decidedly on her conviction.

The facts will never be cleared up now. It is quite possible that Henry believed her guilty. It was sure to go ill with her if she once aroused the wrath of that hard, jealous, Tudor nature, and his love once turned to hatred trampled her down in remorseless vengeance.

The morning on which she died, a little while before she left the Tower, partaking of the sacrament, she solemnly declared her innocence of all for which she was to die, but in that last speech on the scaffold she neither protested or denied it.

They dressed her like a queen to the last. She wore that morning of her execution a robe of black damask, with a deep white cape falling over it, and a small hat set upon the beautiful hair that was always floating like a loose cloud around her face.

With her own hands she took off hat and cape, and placed the linen cap upon her head. The bitterness of death must have been past then. If she had a final pang of regret at leaving the world, it must have been for the little girl, two years and eight months old, who was prattling her English tongue away off in the deep country quiet, under Lady Margaret Bryan's care, and who was to wear in such honor and glory the crown for which her mother had paid her life.

In that last moment she was very calm, laying her head down softly as though she were going to sleep on the scaffold. "She had a little neck," she told the Tower keeper that morning, putting her hands about it with an odd laugh.

When a single gun was fired from the Tower, Henry, waiting in the woods, knew that all was over. Then he put spurs to his horse, and swept away to join his new bride at Wolf-Hall.

So, for Anne Boleyn, that ride from the Tower to Westminster Abbey, with all the splendor and pageantry, with the tapestried streets, and the pealing guns, and the stormy music, and the shouting people, had led three years later to this, to the scaffold on the Tower green, and the deadly glitter of the headsmen's axe in the bright May morning.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPRISWAY POTTS.

No. VIII.

I WROTE to Sister Joel the other day to know how she made those delicious little sugar cakes that I found in the bottom of my basket, when I was returning from a visit to her Western house, years ago. This is the recipe. One cup of white sugar, half a cup of butter, half a cup of sour cream, two eggs, half a teaspoonful of soda, season to taste, mix lightly, roll on the cake-board, sprinkle with grated loaf sugar, turn it over, cut out and bake quickly in an oven not too hot. Bake so they will be light-colored.

She also added a recipe for ginger cakes, a kind that will keep a long while, and that is what every woman should have on hand all the time for poor shacks, and for growing boys who are always hungry, and as ready to eat as an ostrich is. Take two cups of molasses, one and a half cups of lard, two cups of sour milk, or water, one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of ginger, mix, roll thin, and lay on buttered pans, and bake quickly.

The time of the runaway, one of the ribs of my umbrella got very badly twisted. I still used it though, but last Sabbath at church I heard one fellow say to another: "my eye though! do look at that old veteran of an umbarill! it looks as though it had come out o' Noer's ark!" So I told granny I wouldn't be the means o' doin' anything to distract people's attention off sacred things, on the Lord's day, and last Monday I took it down to the tin shop. It was lonely sitting there, and I went into the store joining the shop. While I was there the merchant's wife and sister came sailing in, ribbons and laces a-flying, and flowers and plumes a nodding.

"Where are you going 'now?" said the merchant to his wife.

"Well the day turned out so fine and beautiful that Minta and I concluded we'd go out into the country some place a-visiting; we're both hungry for spring chickens and good country cream, ha, ha! after such a long cold winter as we had. It will do us both good to get a sniff of fresh air, and hear the birds sing, and get a taste of the other folks' victuals," and she sailed across the store with her pretty dress, like a puff of vapor, enveloping her languid figure.

"Where'd you conclude to go?" said he, listlessly, as he measured off two yards of gingham for a poor customer for a sunbonnet.

"We thought we'd go to old man Harper's this afternoon; he's deaf as a post, but Minta says for the sake of the chickens and cream we can worry through one half day;" and the lady winked, and smiled knowingly at Minta.

"Oh, dear, I dread the walk!" said Minta, "it must be nearly a mile over there; but then the recompense, the chickens and cream, and the fun of hearing the old lady tell about, 'when my Jeems was a baby,' and when he cut his teeth, and had the measles, and saw the wild cat, etc., etc., oh, dear! oh, dear!" and she closed her eyes with laughter and clapped her pretty hands like a sentimental dreamer.

Just then who should come into the store with a heavy basket of eggs, and a pail of butter, but Rose Harper, the only daughter in the family where the ladies were going that afternoon.

The beads of sweat stood on the girl's forehead, and her little brown hands were trembling from very weariness.

"Why, Rosy! how do you do, dear!" said one of the ladies, extending the tips of her dainty fingers. Now, Rose Harper is a girl of good sense, I'd trust her judgment as quick as I would Deacon Potts's, so I leaned back against the big hat box, and waited to see what I'd see. She has a good common-school education, is not a bit proud, is fearless and brave, and truly womanly; indeed she was in all ways superior to the ladies present.

"We were just starting to your house to spend the afternoon," said Minta. "We want to see Father Harper, once again, and hear the blessed voice of your dear old mother, and to breathe the pure, fresh country air; last winter was so wearisome, and all this spring we have been so tied down at home."

"I am sorry, Miss Minta, but to tell the truth, it would not be convenient for us to have visitors this afternoon," said poor, tired, little Rose, looking her full in the face. "We have hands at work in the lower field to-day, and I must do an ironing as soon as I go home. This forenoon I did a-churning of six gallons of cream, boiled a web of muslin, and laid it out to bleach, took up the dining-room carpet, and have cooked, washed dishes, swept, and have skimmed and scalded all the milk pans. Mother's not able to be out of the rocking-chair to-day—and our window curtains all are down and in the ironing, and everything seems out of order."

"You know we have a good deal of work to do, mother can't stand much and so it all falls on me. I milk four fresh cows myself, and have a good deal to do, but by dint of economizing time, I manage to get along very well. It leaves me no leisure to sit and visit though, and no time to read, only after night. I am frank with you, but I do just as I wish you'd do with me—deal honestly, and candidly, and tell the truth. I'll send you word sometime when mother is feeling real well, and when I am not so crowded with work; but I must hurry now—good-afternoon," and she snatched up her pail and basket—there was a little flirt of the hems of her white skirts in the doorway, and the truthful, little, wise woman, Rose Harper, had tripped off homeward.

"Well, I do declare! did you ever! ever!" said the merchant's wife.

"Cool—cooler—coolest!" said the pretty Minta, and a devil looked out of her eyes.

"There's a little spit-fire for you!" said the man at the helm; "there is audacity! how do you feel to-day, ladies? she cut ye up pretty fine, didn't she? I vow I'd see her in Davy Jones' locker before I'd ever speak to her again! Why the little sunburnt country snipe! she has no more of good breeding, and knows no more of where she belongs than our dog Carlo, there. If she didn't set you down plumply though! I swear, I can hardly believe my eyes and ears! The likes of her! she don't seem to feel but that she is as good as the best of ye. My! but she does put on dignity—that's rich! the little termagant! I pity the man who marries her! but how did you relish the spring chicken, girls? eh, ho-ho-ho-ho! and his laugh rang out broadly.

I was tickled. I didn't know whether to say anything or not. They seemed to ignore my presence entirely. I sat there with my calash thrown back—the dear little kitten with pink bows in its ears had jumped up into my lap and nestled down, and I let my fingers slip over its furry back in an aimless way, as though my thoughts were not about kittens, or visiting ladies, or little Rose Harpers.

"Gracious me! one'd 'a' thought the Harper's would feel glad to have us visit them! I don't see why they need feel so important," said Minta, "they're not very well off, and they've nothing to feel so grand over!" so the two women talked while their eyes were bright and glittering with shame and anger. I did wish they'd say to me; "what do you think about this Miss Potts?" I'd 'a' given them a piece o' my mind, quicker. Just then the boy from the tin-shop brought in my umbrella mended up as good as new; charge—five cents, but he was a poor boy, the only son of a widow, so I generously paid him six cents.

As I walked home I thought to myself, what a pity it was that all women, the world over, were not as clear-sighted and brave and true as dear, little, honest Rose Harper. What a world of trouble it would save us! How many lessons of deception it would keep from our growing daughters—how much of honest dignity and independence it would give us all—how systematical would our household labors become—how much of the fear and dread that haunts us now would never come a-nigh us! we would be our own masters instead of the craven sneaks, custom makes us, per force. It would put an end to having visitors you don't like—to a species of servitude you loathe—it would loosen shackles that we women have worn from time immemorial. Musing thus, stopped under a crab-apple tree, a heap of fragrant, foamy bloom, to catch my breath, and inhale the delicious odor.

While I stood there, looking up, and sniffing great, extravagant sniffs, and admiring the scenery and listening to the dreamy hum of the myriads of happy bees almost lost in the tangle of mingled pink and white, old Granny Greenstreet's "man," as she calls her husband, came along with a wheelbarrow load of nice, tender rhubarb stalks.

I said; "how's granny to-day, Uncle Greeny?" that's what I always call him.

"Oh, fair to middlin', barrin' a few twinges of her rheumatiz," said he. "She out an' got all this pieplant this afternoon, to send to Issachar's wife."

"I don't see what on earth his wife'll do with all this load of rhubarb," I said, with surprise.

"She uses a heap o' truck, one way an' 'nother," said he; "she's a'most allus a-makin' uthin' to eat—she likes good things; she often sends me an' mother a pie, or a couple o' tarts, or a glass o' jelly, or a bowl o' preserves, or the like. I guess she's goin' to make jelly o' some o' these, an' preserve some with oranges, an' can some, an' make pies o' the rest. Yes, Issachar's wife's a stavin' woman; he did well when he married Dassa Henderson, an' she did just as well when she got Iss. Greenstreet, if I do say it myself—I, as hadn't ort ter," and the trembly old man cleared his throat, and adjusted the lopping rim of his hat, preparatory to starting on his way.

I said I didn't know that rhubarb could be made into preserves, and if it wasn't too much trouble, I did wish he'd tell Dassa to write down her recipe, and let him bring it to me as he came back, 'cause he'd be passing our house, anyhow, and it would be no trouble at all.

The poor old man came back just as we were sitting down to supper. He was tired, and I made him sit up to the table and take a cup of tea. We had chicken for supper—cold chicken warmed over.

I'll tell you what we had that evening, it was a picked-up supper, then you'll know, maybe, how to get a meal sometimes, when you've nothing to get. There was only a small bowlful of fowl, gravy and all, left from the day before.

I put the contents of the bowl into a kettle with nearly a teacupful of boiling water. I then looked into the cupboard, to see what was there that I could add to it, to eke out a meal. There was perhaps half a pint of boiled rice, a little butter-plateful of sliced fried potatoes, two crusts of bread—the first and last cuts off the loaf, one slice of fried beef, and two cold boiled eggs. I broke up the crusts of bread, cut into little bits the piece of steak, sliced the boiled eggs, and added all to the remnant in the kettle, except the potatoes. I put in salt, a good lump of butter and a sprinkle of pepper and a pint of sweet cream, being careful not to allow it to come to a boil. Last of all, I added the potatoes, because I didn't want them to cook all to pieces. The poor old man had no teeth, and he thought the dish was, as Swiss family Robinson's things always were, "most excellent." I was delighted to see the dear old laddie eat with such a relish. He brought me Dassa's recipe 'way down in the bottom of his deepest pocket, wrapped all up in his handkerchief.

I never tried it yet, but if I do, I will leave out a part of the orange-peel. Take six oranges, peel and take away the white rind and seeds, slice the pulp into the stew-pan along with the peel cut very small, add a quart of rhubarb, cut fine, and from a pound to a pound and a half of loaf sugar. Boil as for other preserves.

Dassa makes a jelly of rhubarb and elderberry juices, mixed; and of rhubarb alone, flavored with lemon—both said to be nice.

I care the most for currants. When I make all the currant jelly we need, I always save the balance of the juice, in half-gallon self-sealing jars. It will keep for years, and can be made up any time. I think dried-apple pies would never have fallen into disrepute if currant juice had been added to the fruit while stewing. It really makes dried-apple pies quite as good as tart green apples would. Try it, and see.

An excellent jam is made of ripe currants and ripe raspberries, cooked well, together with the usual amount of sugar required for jams. Don't allow your ripe currants to be wasted, then, if you have more than you and your neighbors need. Can the juice, and save it.

Currants can likewise be candied, or dried after cooking in syrup, and be used in cake.

A lady friend of mine says the most delicious jam she makes is made of currant juice and raspberries. One pint of juice, one pound of berries, and two pounds of sugar.

Sometimes a taint, almost imperceptible, will be found on the chicken killed yesterday, and meant for dinner to-day, or on the last of the steak in the bottom of the jar. If it is a really suspicious taint, real decomposition, throw it away; but, if not, it can easily be removed in boiling. When you put it on to cook, take cold water, into which you have put a few lumps of charcoal, tied up in a thin white cloth. After it has boiled awhile take out the charcoal. The meat will be found all right. In cooking corned beef or pork, or a boiled dinner, if the smell annoys you, and you have to keep out of the kitchen, it will be found effectual to put a bit of red pepper in the boiling pot, say twice the size of your thumb nail.

There is nothing we women desire more, while we are canning and pickling and preserving, than to know a sure way of canning green corn; but we have found it to be of no use, haven't we? Dear, me! how those burst-open cans did smell! you all know.

I have been told by good housewives, who know from experience, that the only way we persistent women can save green corn without putting down in salt, or drying it, is to cut it off the cob and cook it long and well with tomatoes—say half and half—adding a little salt. Then, when used in the winter, we can put in pepper, butter and cream, and it will taste, perhaps, quite corn-y.

Another way is, to cut it off the same as for succotash, and put it down in jars or crocks, in layers, with salt. Press down closely, put a plate and a weight on top, to keep it under the brine that will come.

Another way is to make brine in a barrel, as for meat, and put into it the ears of sugar corn, with two or three layers of the husk left on. Then put on weights to keep the corn under, and cover the barrel.

When used, soak the ears all night after removing the husk, and boil in a large pot of water, which must be changed once in boiling.

Then corn can be dried out in the sun enough in one day, by giving it your attention, that it can be put in a paper sack and laid close to the kitchen stove-pipe to finish the job.

Green beans and peas can be shelled, scalded well and put down in layers of salt the same as green corn.

We were talking last night, the deacon and granny and I, about liars. We had learned from observation that every lying father or mother bequeaths this inheritance to some one or all of his or her children. Now this is very sad to dwell upon, and is a subject that parents should take to heart. We could not name a liar, man, woman or child, whom we knew, but, back of that unfortunate one was a lying parent, and behind him another parent-liar, and so on.

How sacred the obligation that parents look well to the inheritance they give their children—not the gift of money or lands, but the pernicious inheritance whose roots strike into the blood, whose growth is inevitable, whose results are for life and for eternity. Think of this, ye whose children lie upon your breasts, and climb upon your knees, and look up to you, and hang upon your words and trust you so implicitly. Oh, their beautiful and loving faith! let it not be shaken.

Grandma was telling us one of her best stories on the subject we were discussing, when the dog, Steven, gave a series of yelps. We heard a "Hallo, Deacon Potts! hospitality—ahoy!"

Father went to the door. Grandma instinctively felt of her cap border to see if it was plumb, while I sat back the chairs and put down the window-curtains.

"I do hope it is no old brother and sister, tired and hungry and out o' sorts, come to tarry with us," said I, a little fretfully.

"We must turn from no one, Pipeey, especially if they be of the household of faith—no matter what persuasion they may belong to," said granny, a little severely, I thought, and with a very sanctified arching of her eye-brows.

Now I never was angry with her in my life, but really, just for one minute, I thought she was the ugliest old woman outside of the poor-house. Really I did, and I confess it to my shame.

There was a shuffling of feet in the doorway; and sure enough 't was a little Baptist delegation who had come to "tarry within the gates." I don't know just what those last words mean, but I think they sound so sleek I'll use them at a venture.

Father led the way with his head up, as big as though he was a candidate for county commissioner.

"Brother Leveret, this is Mother Potts; and this is my oldest daughter, Pipsissaway," said father.

The brother was still outside the door digging away at the imaginary dirt on his heels; but as soon as he heard his name called, he broke into the house and shook hands with us both as vigorously as though he was pumping water to put out a fire.

"How do you do, grandmother? How's times with ye?" said he to me.

"Yon is the grandmother; this is my eldest born, my Pipsissaway," said father, with a gorgeous wave of the hand.

"Oh, excuse me! How do you flourish, Miss Pizzaway?" said he.

"Like a green bay tree, thank you," I replied, with dignity.

Just on this blundering brother's heels came in, as gracefully as he knew how, our friend Elder Nutt, whom I mentioned in connection with the runaway that father and I had a few months ago. He shook hands warmly. They had both been to tea at Brother Hammond's on the ridge road. So I didn't have to get supper for them. I was glad of it, too.

We spent a very pleasant evening together. While father and Brother Leveret and granny talked over the affairs of their several churches, Elder Nutt and I sat at the other end of the room by the table, and we turned through the photograph album several times.

Now some people will whirl through an album and never look twice at any picture; they are not observant, they let slip many opportunities for improving their immortal minds; but not so with Elder Nutt. He is like the "little busy bee that doth improve each shining hour, and gathers honey all the time from every opening flower." He finds good in all things; sermons in trees, and books, and stones, something worth while in all things created. His critical eyes—I should have said eye—lingered long upon each picture; he commented upon their attitudes in a kindly spirit, and with a poet's appreciation. One picture he admired more than any other, that of two little girls, sisters, standing alone together, with their hands clasped, their arms crossed in a way that the right hand of one clasped the left hand of the other, and the other hand vice versa. He said it was so unique, or antique, or something. The attitude was suggestive of a pleasant trick, or some kind of sleight of hand. After he had looked through the album, we examined the pictures in the old Book of Martyrs, and he said some very pointed remarks about the heroism of those brave men.

The elder reads poetry, too. He read "John Gilpin's Ride," and Mrs. Browning's "Bertha in the Lane." He laughed immoderately over them, especially the former. He doesn't read very well; there is no pathos in his voice; he elips off the finest sentences, and leaves them without the finish that a good reader would give them. There is a nose-y twang to his enunciation that takes away all the beauty, and if one looks at him, his torn, red eye, gaping like an open mouth, strips the poem and the reader of all sentiment.

Granny says I am visionary, but I know that I am intensely practical.

After they were gone, the next morning, the girls plagued me about the elder, and said he watched me out of his winsome eye all the time, but I guess he didn't watch me any more than I did him; he-he, he-he! I always look at people when I talk to them, it is good manners.

I think granny needn't call me a visionary. I don't want to tell of our private home life, the things that should be sacred, but I must tell a little joke at granny's expense.

There are two dainty bits of statuary on brackets in our sitting-room, one a Cupid, the other a little flower-girl.

One day last week while the girls and I were down at Parker's meadow, gathering bouquets of grasses—the most magnificent I ever saw—our dear, simple grandmother went and made a pair of blue drilling trousers and put on the little naked Cupid.

The girls and I just tumbled down on the carpet and laughed.

The sweet old lady—we didn't laugh at her—we dare not, we so heartily respect her, but Cupid, the little darling, was transformed into a real money-loving, sharp-looking tradesman. The pantaloons didn't make a very good fit, they were a little baggy, and to make them appear genteel and fashionable we stuffed cotton into them and gave them a sense of fulness.

Granny is so good—she's just as innocent as skim-milk. Cupid shall wear his breeches out of respect to his granny until they are worn out, and then he shall have a new pair, so he shall, and the next pair shall be good lasting duck trousers.

One of the daughters of the wealthiest farmer in our neighborhood was here the other day, when we had a woman washing for us.

I said, "I declare, Ida, we forgot to buy a new washboard, and you know our old one has a bad break in it close to the lower end of it; poor Betty, that has troubled her, I fear, all day, to keep from tearing the clothes on that jagged place. We must not allow another week to pass without getting a new washboard."

"If it is not worn out badly, you know your papa can pry it apart and take out the zinc and turn the other end down, and with a little ingenuity make it quite as good as new," said the brisk little maid-of-all-work. "That was the way father did with ours after the lower end was worn jagged. I saw a washboard thrown out into the street in town the other day that was a good deal better than our old one that father mended. I suppose the folks were like you, didn't know it could be made to last as long as it had lasted already."

"Thank you," I said; "you are really ingenious; tell me of something else new."

"I think of nothing else now, except that when a tin fruit-can is all good, only that the lid and the upper part has rusted so as to render it unfit to use for canning fruit any more, I turn it bottom side up on the stove, and let it remain there until it is so hot that it unsolders itself, then I smoothe over the rough edges, put a little wire bail across it, and use it to stew fruit in. I have half a dozen of them. You know a tin stew-pan soon wears out if used much, and these handy little things are a very good substitute, besides the economy, and that is very gratifying to one's self-conceit."

This same wise little body told me that though they lived close to the creek and the thick fog enveloped their house every morning, they contrived to dodge the ague, while all their neighbors were chattering and grappling with this relentless foe.

She said that about an hour before the chill or shake came on they went to bed with warm brick at their feet, and around their bodies, and then drank weak but hot pepper tea. She says about the time the usual chill comes on one experiences the most delicious languor—feels as though a soft bed and pepper tea and warm brick were the three desirable things in this life, wanting "only this and nothing more."

So there were three good things I learned from that sensible little girl—the bright, intelligent, practical daughter of a good old common-sense farmer.

IF WE KNEW.

IF we knew the cares and crosses
Crowding round our neighbor's way,
If we knew the little losses
Sorely grievous day by day,
Would we then so often chide him
For his lack of thrift and gain,
Leaving on his heart a shadow,
Leaving on our life a stain?

If we knew the clouds above us
Held but gentle blessings there,
Would we turn away all trembling
In our blind and weak despair?
Would we shrink from little shadows
Lying on the dewy grass,
While 'tis only birds of Eden
Just in mercy flying past?

If we knew the silent story
Quivering through the heart of pain,
Would our manhood dare to doom them
Back to haunts of guilt and groaning?
Life hath many a tangled crossing,
Joy hath many a tale of woe,
And the cheeks tear-stained and whitest,
This the blessed angels know.

Let us reach into our bosoms
For the key to other lives,
And with love toward erring nature,
Cherish good that still survives;
So that when our disrobed spirits
Soar to realms of light again,
We may say, "Dear Father, judge us
As we judge our fellow-men."

Oh, it is excellent
To have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant.—Shakespeare.

INSUBORDINATION; OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER V.

ANOTHER MOVEMENT.

"THE devil!" ejaculated Ike Wilson, with an indignant expression, as he sat rubbing the sole of a boot, one morning before breakfast.

"What's the matter, Ike?" asked Tom.

"Why, I'm mad, and can't get over it!"

"What are you mad about?"

"Something that Millie told me this morning."

"And what was that, Ike?" asked both the boys at once, pausing in their work.

"Why, I've found out the reason the best friend we ever had in this house has left it."

"Indeed! Who? Anne?"

"Of course."

"What was it, Ike?" was asked by both Tom and Bill, with an earnestness that indicated the strong interest they felt in the matter.

"You wouldn't guess in a month of Sundays. But I'll tell you. Millie says a young gentleman, Mr. Illerton, who keeps the dry goods store up street, came in one night when Gertrude and Geneva were out, and found Anne in the parlor. He was so pleased with her, that he sat and talked for half an hour. Somehow or other they found it out, and kicked up a row about it. They called her to her face a mean, low, hired girl, and wanted to know how she dared to stick herself up for a lady, and entertain their company."

"The devil!" ejaculated the two eager listeners, at the same moment.

"It's true as preaching! Millie says she listened at the parlor door, and heard it all."

"Well, if that don't beat the old Harry!" said Bill. "Now just look at it. Here's Anne Earnest, who's got as much beauty in her little finger, and as much sense in her toe-nail, as Gertrude and Geneva have in their whole bodies, insulted and forced out of the house, because she happened to talk for half an hour with a man who had sense enough to be pleased with her, and who was foolish enough to keep their company."

"They're proud, stuck up fools, that's what they are!" said Tom, with indignant warmth. "I'll never forgive them for this, now see if I do! While Anne was here, we did live a little kind of comfortable, and that's what we never did before. It makes my blood boil all through me!"

"I don't care so much for myself," broke in Ike. "But to have such a sweet, good girl abused and insulted in that kind of a style, is too much for me to bear. Here's my hand to your's, Tom, never to forgive 'em for it."

"And here's mine, too," said Bill, joining his hand to those of the two worthies in a solemn compact.

"I've got the devil in me, I believe, and I don't care if I have. I could bite a ten-penny nail in two." And he ground his teeth in impotent rage.

"I relished the corn bread and herrings, the salt beef and potatoes, well enough, after I saw her eat them so cheerfully," continued Ike; "but it made me mad to see her, the only lady in the house, forced to live on that kind of stuff, while them painted powder-monkeys up-stairs could hardly get things delicate enough for their dainty stomachs. How I wanted to blow out! But then every time I'd say anything about it, or sneer at them, before Anne, she would smile so sweetly while she checked me, that it made me love her. It was only for her sake that I kept in, for I wouldn't have done anything that she didn't want me to do for the world. But she's gone now, and it'll be strange if the devil ain't raised in this house before long."

"Yes, and she's gone to a better place, that's one consolation," added Tom. "Mrs. Webster is a lady, and will know how to treat one like Anne."

"That's true, Tom," said Ike, "and I'm glad in my heart that she's better off. But that don't make the old queen of Sheba up-stairs any better, confound her picture!"

"I've got an old grudge against her and all the rest," said Bill, "and I'll have it out with 'em if I die for it. I'm for striking while the iron's hot. A good deed is always done quickly."

"That's a fact," responded Ike, warmly.

"How shall we begin?" asked Tom.

"There'll be ways enough, and we'll not have to look long to find 'em," said Ike.

"Them herring begin to smell rather loud, I'm thinking," said Bill, turning up his nose with an expression of disgust.

"Yes; and if that butter we've had for the last week wasn't made before Noah's flood, my nose is no judge," added Tom.

"Come to breakfast," said Millie, poking her black face into the shop door, and showing a couple of rows of snow-white teeth, grinning from ear to ear.

Dropping a kit of tools on benches and floor in admirable disorder, our three worthies were drawing their chairs up to the kitchen table in one minute from the time Millie gave them notice that all was ready. Mrs. Hardamer was at the head of the table a place she had occupied for the last two days, Anne having been gone for that time. Three herrings, a small piece of butter and a plate of corn bread, made up the stereotyped meal. Ike passed the plate of bread around with an air that did not escape the ever active eye of Mrs. Hardamer, and which put her more on her guard in observing what was to follow.

"Have a turkey?" he said, cutting a herring in two, and offering a part to Bill.

"I'll take the tail, if you please," said Bill; and Ike shovelled the tail-end off upon his plate.

"Heads or tails, Tom?" continued Ike, cutting another herring in two.

"Tails," responded Tom.

"Tails it is," said Ike, scraping another half off the dish.

Mrs. Hardamer's blood went up to fever heat, at this piece of bold disregard for her presence.

"Come, mind what you are about, my young gentlemen!" she said, tartly, her face assuming the color of scarlet.

Ike turned out his cup of pale, lukewarm, rye-coffee, and lifting his saucer daintily to his lips, sipped a little, and then leisurely poured the fluid back into his cup, and replaced it in the saucer.

"What's the matter with your coffee, Ike?" said Mrs. Hardamer, unable to contain herself.

"I didn't say anything was the matter with it, ma'am," replied Ike, with a respectful air.

"Why don't you drink it, then?" she asked, in a loud, angry voice.

"Because it's so cold it turns my stomach!" said Ike, decidedly.

Just as Ike made this answer, Bill leisurely replaced his tail-end of the fish upon the plate from which he had received it, at the same time giving his nose a very perceptible curl upward.

"And, pray, what's the matter with your fish, Bill?" said the old lady, turning toward that worthy, with a fiery countenance.

"It ain't good, ma'am," said Bill.

"Ain't good, ha? And pray, sir, what ails it?"

"I should think it had hung in the yard rather long, ma'am."

"Do you know who you are talking to, sir? What do you mean?"

Just at this moment her eye detected a movement of Tom's, not to be mistaken. That gentleman was coolly and leisurely scraping off the smooth surface of his corn bread, the thin stratum of rancid, oleaginous matter, which had been dignified by the name of butter, and depositing it on the edge of his plate, while an expression of ill-concealed disgust sat upon his countenance. This was like fire to gunpowder, and Mrs. Hardamer exploded with a loud noise. Having no desire to bandy words with their mistress, as that was, by no means, their game, the three chaps beat a quick retreat. But they were not to escape her so easily, for, following them into the shop, she poured upon them a volley of abuse, which quickly attracted the attention of Hardamer, and brought him at once to the spot.

"What's the matter here, ha?" he exclaimed, with an expression of both anger and alarm upon his countenance.

"Why, they've insulted me at the table," began Mrs. Hardamer, in a loud, shrieking voice, "and I won't bear it, the low-lived, dirty vagabonds! Talk to me of spoilt fish, ha! Mighty dainty your stomachs have become all at once!"

"What does all this mean, I'd like to know?" now broke in Hardamer, looking fiercely toward the boys, who had hastily seated themselves, and were in the posture of bending over their work.

"Why, you see, Ike, there, the impertinent scoundrell! undertook to play off his pranks at the table, and Bill and Tom must both join him in it. One couldn't drink the coffee, another said the fish was spoiled, and Tom, there, turned up his nose at the butter."

"You villain! what do you mean?" said Hardamer, losing all command of his feelings.

"We didn't mean to insult Mrs. Hardamer," replied Ike, in a respectful tone.

"You did!—you did!—you lying vagabond!" said Mrs. Hardamer, breaking in upon him. "How dare you put on that sanctified face about it!"

"Indeed, then, ma'am, we did not."

"Hush up your tongue, you puppy you!" responded the old lady, wrought up to a high pitch of indignation.

"Come, come!—enough of this!" said Hardamer, impatiently, "I want to know the truth of this matter."

"The truth of the matter, indeed! The truth of the matter! What do you mean by the truth of the matter, sir? I want to know if I haven't told you the truth of the matter? A pretty pass, indeed, when you talk to me about the truth of the matter!"

"If you want me to settle this affair, madam," said Hardamer, to his wife, in a low tone, not so low, however, but that the boys heard it distinctly—"you must go into the house, and let me alone. I've heard your story, and now I'll hear theirs."

Mrs. Hardamer turned upon him with increased fury, and he at once left her in full possession of the field. After berating the boys for five minutes longer, all of which they stood with silent heroism, she retired, still full of wrath, to her own part of the house.

"She's keen, now, ain't she?" said Bill, as soon as she was fairly beyond earshot.

"Keen as a razor!" responded Ike.

"A whole team!" added Tom.

"I wonder what old Lignumvite will do, my how?" he continued. "The queen has got her back up as round as a cat's, and, I'm thinking, we can easily creep under it, and escape with whole skins."

"Never fear; the old chap's had a taste of our quality, and, it's my opinion, that he don't care to have another," said Ike.

"He will have another taste, though; and not only a taste, but a good bottle full; and if he don't get drunk on it, it'll not be our fault, I'm thinking," said Bill.

"What's all this fuss about, ha?" said the individual just alluded to, in an angry voice, suddenly breaking in upon the young plotters of insubordination.

"Do you hear, you young scoundrels?" he continued, after a moment's pause, seeing that none showed a disposition to respond to his interrogation, "Ike, what's been the matter?" he now said, addressing the ringleader in the mischief.

"I didn't do anything sir, but turn my coffee back into my cup, and refuse to drink it. Millie always sends on the table such lukewarm, watery stuff, that I can't get it down any longer. I tried this morning, but indeed, sir, I couldn't drink it," said Ike, in a respectful manner.

"And what caper is this you've been cutting up, ha?" he said, turning angrily toward Bill.

"I didn't do nothing; only I couldn't eat the herrings, for they were tainted. Millie let's them hang up in the sun until they're clear spoilt, sometimes. She don't care how we get our victuals."

Even to this Hardamer felt no disposition to reply, and he addressed Tom.

"You turned up your nose at the butter, did you? I know that to have been downright impudence, for I always buy the best of fresh butter in market twice a week."

"We don't get that butter, though," said Ike, speaking up, "Millie always takes it out of the keg of cooking-butter; and, you know, that is strong enough to knock down an ox."

"Confound that nigger!" said Hardamer, at once retiring and making his way to the kitchen.

"Didn't we ease it off on poor Millie, though?" said Ike, exultingly. "That was done to a charm! It's a good rule, and we ought to adopt it, never to throw blame on a man's wife."

"It'll be better times, now, I'm thinking," said Tom. "Old Lignumvite's a little mad with the queen, and he'll reform matters, if it's only in spite. After awhile we'll give him a little more to do. It will never do to eat corn bread and drink rye coffee much longer. We're just as good as they are, and work to support 'em, and it's not fair to put us off on slops."

"We'll reform that matter when we once begin. Slow and sure must be our motto," said Tom.

Upon investigation, Hardamer found that there was real cause of complaint, and, this being the case, he thought it best to pass over the rude conduct of his boys toward Mrs. Hardamer. She was indignant at the censure which she received, and declared that it was "good enough for 'em, and as good as they'd get."

"It's no use for you to talk, Sally," responded Hardamer, to her indignant threat of keeping them on the old fare. "The boys work hard, and must be attended to. Besides, they're beginning to feel their age, and if things shouldn't go on pretty smoothly, they'd as lief clear out as not; and their loss, let me tell you, would be no light matter."

"Put a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to—you know where!" said Mrs. Hardamer. "If you go to giving in to their insolent demands, the house'll soon be too small to hold us all, I can tell you. Give 'em an inch, and they'll take an ell. You must make 'em toe the mark all the while, or they'll go zigzag, like a worm-fence. I'm astonished at you, Mr. Hardamer."

Hardamer felt, in some degree, the force of what she said. But he stood in this unpleasant predicament. He had treated his boys like slaves, while they were small, and, now, from having no respect for him, they had ceased to fear him. In their first act of insubordination, they had conquered him, and he felt that his power over them was at an end. From the very necessity of his position, he was compelled to regard their comfort. Yet, at the same time, he felt that the young rebels would not be contented with the power they had already gained. Not disposed, however, to take much share of the blame to himself, he replied to his wife's last remark:

"It's just as bad to hold the rein too tight, as to let it go loose. While I have been trying to keep things in a right trim, you have been galling the boys in the tenderest places, by not giving them palatable food. I don't blame 'em for not eating them herrings, and I wouldn't have given that butter to a dog!"

"It was all good enough for the discontented vagabonds! Do they think we can afford to feed them on pound-cake!" said Mrs. Hardamer, warmly.

"I tell you it was not good enough, madam," replied the husband, much excited.

"Well, I tell you how it was, sir," responded his high-tempered wife.

"Go to—" But he kept in the angry word, and retreated in disorder to the front shop, where he resumed his work at the boot he had been dressing up, and choked in his indignation as best he could. Mrs. Hardamer, it will be perceived, has as much need as the boys to understand rightly the meaning of the word subordination.

In a few evenings Mr. Illerton again called upon the Misses Hardamer, as they liked to be called, in hopes of again catching a sight of Anne, in whom his interest began steadily to increase. On that day she had left her uncomfortable retreat for something like a home, with a lady, in the true sense of the word—a Mrs. Webster. No allusion could, of course, be made to her by Mr. Illerton; and, after sitting an hour, he retired, without, of course, catching a glance of the one he so much desired to see.

"Do you see that, now?" said Gertrude, after he had gone; "that forward hussy has ruined us with Mr. Illerton. All I could do, I couldn't interest him, and he has gone off in a little or no time since he came in."

"I could see her gibbeted!" exclaimed Geneva, in return, who had also begun to look with favorable eyes upon the young merchant, whose real wealth rumor was beginning to exaggerate. "But she'll come to no good—that's one consolation."

"I do assure you, you wrong Anne, as I have said before," remarked Genevieve, earnestly.

"No one asked for your opinion!" responded Geneva, snappishly.

"It is not kind in you to talk so to me, Geneva," said Genevieve, mildly. "I only speak of Anne as I believe, and I have had some little chance to know her."

"And I suppose you justify her insolence in sticking herself up to entertain our company," said Gertrude, sneeringly.

"I must confess, Gertrude, that I do not, and cannot view her conduct in the light that you do, and therefore must say so," replied Genevieve.

"Now, ain't that too bad?"

"But, in sober reason, Gertrude, I cannot understand in what Anne was to blame, or in what consists her great inferiority."

"I've no patience to talk to you!" said Gertrude, passionately. "If you choose to put yourself on a level with such as her, you can do it; but you can depend upon it, I am not going to keep company with any such characters."

"There is no use, Gertrude, in getting excited about this," said Genevieve, mildly. "Certainly, as sisters, we ought to talk upon any subject without growing angry, or calling hard names. I, for one, have no wish to do so, and will not do so, no matter what you may say to me."

"That's all very well," remarked Gertrude, in a less excited tone, "but it requires patience to hear you take the part of that dirty trollop."

"Indeed, indeed, Gertrude, you are wrong in using such language about a girl who has not been guilty of any impropriety of which she is sensible," said Genevieve.

"Don't talk to her, Gertrude," said Geneva, indignantly. "She's no better, in my opinion, than Anne."

"I should be glad, Geneva, if I were half as good as Anne," remarked Genevieve, in a calm voice.

"Didn't I tell you so?" responded that young lady.

"In sober earnestness, I should like to know in what you consider Anne so far beneath respect," said Genevieve. "I am afraid you have, what I had, once, too many false notions of true elevation of character. In the external circumstances that surround us, there can be nothing truly honorable, apart from internal excellence. If, within, there be not purity of affection and uprightness of thought, there can be no real superiority. Elevation in society, is, in most cases, the accident of birth. If our father had been very poor, could we have helped it? His being better off than others, can, therefore, impart no merit to us."

"You're a fool!" said Gertrude.

"Ain't you ashamed, Gertrude?" said Geneva.

"No, I am not ashamed! Genevieve talks like a fool, and always was one. Would anybody but a fool have married that worthless vagabond, Anderson, and thus brought disgrace upon the family? It's all very pretty for her to talk about her change of views—but I'm not to be taken in by such gullnets. She's like the fox that lost his tail; very anxious to bring us down to her level." But she's mistaken if she expects to fool me."

A tear stole out, and rolled over the cheek of Genevieve. The cruel remark of her sister, in reference to her husband she felt keenly and deeply. Something of returning tenderness, more genuine than anything she had yet felt, had warmed up her heart, since better thoughts and better feelings had found a place in her mind, and she had begun to entertain the hope of one day seeing him a changed man, and of being to him a true wife, and finding him a true husband. She did not again attempt to allude to the subject, that had induced the unkind remark; for she felt that it would be useless to do so. In a few minutes she left the parlor, and retired to her own room.

"I am ashamed of you, Gertrude! How could you talk so?" said Geneva, as soon as her sister had withdrawn.

"Let her mind her own business, then," replied Gertrude. "She's disgraced herself, and now wants to bring us all down to her level. I've no patience with her!"

"We may not find Genevieve so wrong in the end, in what she says, it kind of strikes me. Though I cannot approve of her taking sides with that forward minx, there is no doubt but that she is greatly changed, and is not half so irritable as she used to be. In this we might take from her a useful lesson. The time was, Gertrude, when she would not have taken from you so calmly what she did tonight."

"She's only mortified at the figure she cuts as a grass-widow; that's all the change I see about her. And I'm mortified to death about it, too."

"Well, if you are, Gertrude, I don't see that it has as good an effect upon you, as it has upon her."

"I don't want any of your preaching, miss, so just shut up your fly-trap!" and, with this lady-like speech, the elegant, and accomplished Miss Gertrude Hardamer swept out of the room in proud disdain.

CHAPTER VI.

MORE ABOUT ANNE EARNEST.

"AND can it be possible, Anne, that you were treated so unkindly?" said Mrs. Webster, while she sat sewing with Anne Earnest, about one week after she had taken her into her family as sempstress.

This remark was occasioned by a short sketch of the scene that occurred in Mrs. Hardamer's parlor, on the night Anne was taken so seriously to task by the mother and daughters; a sketch given at the request of Mrs. Webster, who had, from a word inadvertently dropped by Anne, suspected that she had not been rightly treated.

"It happened just as I have stated it, madam," said Anne.

"I have no doubt of it," replied Mrs. Webster. "My question was only indicative of surprise. But who was the young man, Anne?"

"His name, I believe, was Hlerton," "Hlerton?" said Mrs. Webster, in a tone of surprise. "Does he keep a dry goods store on Market Street?"

"Indeed, ma'am, I do not know anything about him. He seemed like a gentleman; and, my impression of him, derived from hearing him converse for half an hour, has made me wonder, more than once, how he could be interested in either Gertrude or Geneva."

Mrs. Webster was silent for some minutes, and then changed the subject. She was the widow of a rich merchant, who, in dying, had left a very large property entirely under her control. She had three children, all boys, the oldest only about twelve years of age. She was, in every respect, a lady—finely educated, and externally accomplished. But her external accomplishments were not the mere holiday garments of "made ladies"—they were the true expressions of internal graces. In Anne, she soon perceived the excellencies of a true and tried spirit; and her heart moved toward her with a pure, maternal tenderness. The more she saw of her, the more she perceived to admire and to love.

One evening, about a week after this conversation, while Anne was engaged in reading to Mrs. Webster and the children, a gentleman was announced by the servant as being in the parlor; and Mrs. Webster withdrew, leaving Anne with the children.

"Why, how do you do, Henry? I'm glad to see you," said Mrs. Webster, extending her hand to a fine-looking young man, who met her in the parlor. "You're really a stranger. I have not seen you for a month. You must not neglect your mother's old friend, Henry, or she will get jealous."

"Indeed, Mrs. Webster, I do owe an apology for my neglect. But I've been a little interested of late; and, you know, when a young man is interested in a certain way he is apt to neglect his old friends."

"You're quite ready with a confession, Henry; but I think I'm a little ahead of you. You consider Miss Hardamer quite an interesting young lady. Am I not right?"

"Not exactly," replied the young man, somewhat confused. "But how in the world did you know that I went there?"

"You see that I know, Henry, and you will have to be content with that, at present. But, seriously, Henry, if all I hear about the daughters of Mr. Hardamer be true, I cannot greatly admire your taste."

"Seriously, then, Mrs. Webster, I neither admire nor respect them."

"Then why do you go there?"

"I've got a little adventure to tell you, and when you hear that, you will understand why I have continued to go there. As far as the young ladies are concerned, I have not the least inclination to visit the house. But I called there one evening, shortly after I had been introduced to the girls, and they happened to be out. In their place I found one of the sweetest young creatures I have ever met—so beautiful, so graceful, so modest! I was so charmed with her, that, notwithstanding her evident uneasiness at being compelled to entertain a perfect stranger, I sat for half an hour in her company. On retiring, I was bold enough to ask her name, which she gave without hesitation."

"And what was it?" asked Mrs. Webster.

"Anne Earnest," replied the young man. "On the next evening I called again, in hopes of learning more about the interesting stranger. On asking for her, I was told, with a sneer, that she was only their hired sewing-girl; and they were in high disdain at the idea of her presuming to entertain their company. I have called several times since, in hopes of getting another glimpse of her, but in vain. Last night I ventured to mention her name, and to ask for her. 'We've turned her out of the house, the presuming hussy!' said one of the young ladies, with indignant warmth; 'for we had reason to suspect her of too much intimacy with improper persons.'"

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Mrs. Webster, in unfeigned astonishment, completely thrown off of her guard.

"It is true," responded the young man, looking a little surprised at the feeling exhibited by Mrs. Webster. "And I am sure that she has been thus treated on my account, and it distresses me exceedingly. How gladly would I search her out, if I could only get the clue. What would you advise me to do, Mrs. Webster—for really I am not able to decide for myself?"

"Why, my advice would be, Henry, for you to act with your usual caution and prudence in this matter. You don't know anything about this Miss Earnest, and might involve yourself in an improper acquaintance."

"But I could swear to her innocence, Mrs. Webster."

"You are really more romantic than I had thought you, Henry. Having withstood so many assaults from the little god, it is rather amusing to find you taken at last in the meshes of an obscure and unknown sewing-girl."

"You may laugh, if you choose, Mrs. Webster, but I know your impressions would have been as favorable as mine, if you had seen her. I wonder who she can be, and where she has found a home?"

"But, seriously, Henry, don't you see that you are running off a little wildly? What would your mother and sisters say to your bringing home a mere sewing-girl, of unknown or of obscure family, and presenting her as your wife?"

"My mother and sisters are sensible women, and know how to appreciate virtue, be it found in palace or cottage; among high-born ladies or humble maidens."

"Then you are really serious, Henry?"

"Of course I am."

"Thinking about marrying a girl you know nothing of, and have never seen but once!"

"Strange as it may seem, Mrs. Webster, that is the very direction my thoughts are taking. But I am sure that she is pure and good, as I am that she is prudent and intelligent. I cannot be deceived. I have seen too many young women in my time, and have known too many, not to be able to judge of any one after half an hour's acquaintance."

"Why, Henry!" said Mrs. Webster, "I never knew before that you were so vain of your discriminating powers. Most men are satisfied if they can find out a woman's real character after having lived with her some twenty years or more. But you can see quite through them in half an hour! You are really more of a novice in these affairs than I had thought you."

"No doubt I seem to you a little demented; but indeed I wish you could see this Miss Earnest. I'd be willing to leave the matter to your judgment, binding myself to abide the decision."

"Under these circumstances I might be willing to countenance your romantic love affair."

"But I cannot find out where she is. At Hardamer's I can, of course, learn nothing more about her," said the young man.

"Would you know her if you were to meet her anywhere?" said Mrs. Webster.

"Of course I would. Her sweet face is always before me, and her voice has been like music in my ears ever since."

"Really, Henry, I am concerned for you. I'm afraid Cupid has struck you in the eye, and partially blinded you."

"Perhaps he has, Mrs. Webster. But, if that be the case, it is not my fault if I see with a perverted vision."

"Well, Henry, I do not know how to advise you at present. But something may strike me, after I think about it; so I shall expect you to come and see me pretty often."

"I shall surely do that, Mrs. Webster; for there is no one else that I can talk to on the subject so near my heart."

"I was going to say that I was sorry that you had become so infatuated with this mysterious stranger; but, in this, perhaps, I would be wrong. I have, however, a young lady here, who is going to reside with me, I expect, for some time, and I did flatter myself that you would find her particularly interesting."

"Who is she, Mrs. Webster?" he asked, with an apparent interest.

"It's of no particular consequence—anything about another than the interesting stranger would have no particular interest for you," replied Mrs. Webster.

"Well, I can't say that it would," he said, indifferently.

"That is too bad, Henry! But I'll punish you for it, see if I don't."

"I'll trust to your tender mercies, madam," said the young man, smiling.

After her visitor had retired, Mrs. Webster returned to the sitting-room, and joined her family.

The reader has, of course, recognized in this visitor Mr. Illerton. Mrs. Webster now found herself placed in a new and responsible position. Although her impressions in reference to Anne were of the most favorable character possible, yet she was too prudent a woman to be governed altogether by first impressions. Anne's statement of her interview with Illerton had not caused her a serious thought, but her conversation with the latter had awakened in her mind a lively concern; more especially, as the fact of Anne's being in her family, rendered her responsibility very great. For the present she resolved to do nothing, but to keep Illerton, if possible, ignorant of the fact that Anne was in the house, and trust to the developments of time.

Every day Anne became more and more endeared to her, until she began to look upon her with the fond and partial eyes of a mother. Above all, did she love her for the deep and confiding religious principles, by which her whole life was governed.

"Do you never doubt the providence of God, Anne, when passing through the clouds and the shadows?" she said, during one of the interesting conversations she was in the habit of holding with her.

"I have rarely doubted of late, Mrs. Webster," she replied, "though weak human nature has often shrunk and trembled, even as the patient will shrink and tremble when the physician probes a dangerous ulcer."

"I cannot say, with you, that I do not sometimes doubt," said Mrs. Webster.

"When we remember," resumed Anne, "that the Lord has taught us, in addressing him, to say 'Our Father,' we will see that there is really no cause for despondency, be the circumstances ever so much shadowed. In many places in the Bible we are alluded to under the tender name of children. 'Even as a father pitieth his children,' is the Lord represented as regarding us."

"It is a little strange, Anne, that while conscious of the truth given to us that the Lord is our Father, we cannot feel the child-like confidence that we ought to feel," said Mrs. Webster.

"Until we so fully approve of all that our Heavenly Father does, as to accept it in cheerful submission to His will, we cannot but suffer painful doubts when the day of trial arrives," replied Anne. "To do the truth willingly, is to love it; and when we love to do anything, its performance is delightful to us."

"But it is very hard, Anne, to do what is opposed to our selfish feelings."

"No one knows that better than I do, madam. But, without effort, we can gain no victories. The evil of self love is too deeply implanted in our minds to be easily removed. It requires a whole lifetime of temptations and combats, entered into with unflinching resolution."

"A view of the case that might well discourage a stout heart," said Mrs. Webster.

"Yes, if there were no delights to cheer and invigorate at every step. But no one is permitted to see any more of the evils that are in one than just enough to encourage to activity against them."

The lower profound of evils is mercifully hidden, until, from victory to victory, strength and confidence is gained to enter into combat with everything that opposes the descent into the heart of divine love from the Lord. And, after every victory, comes a season of delights and repose—when we can lie down, as it were, by cool fountains, amid shady retreats, with birds and flowers filling the air with music and fragrance. There is no delight, Mrs. Webster, that can equal the delight arising from a willing performance of duty."

"That is true, Anne; and if all of us went simply about discharging every present duty, leaving the past and the future alone, how much happier would we be."

"In that simple fact of doing our present duties," replied Anne, "must come all of our real happiness that ever can come. It is the great secret of happiness. But the prevailing misery in the world shows how far the true principle of living for happiness is departed from." * * *

"There is a little boy in the passage, who wants to see Miss Earnest," said a servant, entering the room, and interrupting the conversation.

"Bring him in here, then, Nancy," said Anne, who conjectured that it was her little friend from Mrs. Hardamer's.

"Why, Jimmy!—how do you do? I'm glad to see you!" she said, in the next minute, as a pale, meagre-looking boy, poorly clad, came forward with a timid and hesitating step, looking earnestly, at the same time, into the face of Mrs. Webster, with an expression that asked, as plain as words—"Am I wrong in coming here?"

"This is the little boy, Mrs. Webster, of whom I have told you," said Anne.

"Why haven't you been to see Anne before, my little fellow?" said Mrs. Webster, kindly. "I thought she told me that you liked her very much; or, at least, that you were in the habit of saying so."

"And, indeed, I do," said the child, his eyes filling with tears, "but I didn't like to come."

"You found courage at last, it seems," she replied, with an encouraging smile.

"Yes, ma'am. I wanted to see her so bad, that I at last ventured to come here."

"Anne must have been good to you, you seem to like her so well."

"Indeed, indeed, she was then! And, now, she's the only friend I've got," the tears again starting to his eyes.

"Well, it would be a pity to intrude upon two such firm friends; and so I will retire," said Mrs. Webster, smiling.

"And how have matters and things gone on since I left you, Jimmy?" asked Anne, after Mrs. Webster had left the room.

"Not like they did when you was there, Miss Anne. Nobody cares for us as you did. But then, we are all so glad you've got a better place, and wouldn't have you back again, to be abused and insulted as you were, for the world. But Geneva and Gertrude have got nothing by it, for Mr. Illerton don't come there at all any more, and we know it's because he didn't find you there."

"Why, Jimmy! What are you talking about?" exclaimed Anne, taken by surprise, for she had never mentioned to any one in the house, the unpleasant interview between her and Mrs. Hardamer. "But who told you that I was abused and insulted?" she added.

"Why, Millie heard it all, and told us about it. It would have done your heart good to have heard how the boys went on. Ike, and the rest of 'em, say they'll make the house too hot to hold 'em all, now you, the only friend they ever had there, have been forced to go away."

"Indeed, Jimmy, I hope the boys won't do anything wrong on my account," she said, with much concern.

"They've got a standing grudge against the whole family, and are going to have it out, now you ain't there to hold 'em back, as you used to do," replied the little boy.

"But you are not going to have anything to do with it, Jimmy?"

"Oh, no, indeed, Miss Anne, that I ain't! I'm too little. And, anyhow, I shouldn't think it right to do it myself, though I'm glad when they cool 'em off a little, as they have, since you've been away."

"Did you say that Mr. Illerton had stopped going to see the young ladies?" asked Anne.

"Yes, indeed, he has. He asked for you one night, so Millie says, and they were quite hot about it; and so he just up and told 'em that you were worth a dozen such as them."

"That cannot be, I am sure. Mr. Illerton, certainly, did not talk in so ungentlemanly a manner!"

"I don't think it was anything more than the truth, and I'm sure I hope he did say it," replied Jimmy, warmly.

"You are wrong," said Anne to her little friend. "You must not desire to have any injured, or wounded in their feelings, because they do not treat you well. You know that such desires spring from revenge, and revenge is murder in disguise."

"So you used to tell me; but I didn't think about that," said the boy.

"I hope things go on pretty smoothly with you now, Jimmy?"

"I can't say that they do, Miss Anne," replied the child, in a desponding tone. "Yesterday, Mr. Hardamer beat me, until I am sore all over. I'd been to market with him, and had the great market-basket, which he piled almost full. There was half a peck of potatoes, a quarter of veal and half a peck of apples; besides a good many other things. On top were put a dozen eggs, and then the butter kettle, full of butter, was fitted in one end among the apples. I could hardly get round the market, it was so heavy, and when Mr. Hardamer put it on my head and told me to go home, I thought I should have sunk right down. I'd 'a' said something, but I was afraid. I started up Market Street, and went on as fast as I could. When I got to the first water-plug, I felt just as if was going to fall, and I could hardly see. I asked two or three men to help me down with the basket, but they looked at me and passed on. Just as I thought I should have to give up, a black man lifted the basket off my head, and set it on the plug for me. I stood there about five minutes, and then got a boy to help me up with it again. It seemed heavier than ever, but I started off with it and kept right up the street. While trying to step down from the curbstone at Gay Street, I lost my balance, and fell, in spite of all I could do. Everything in the basket rolled out—butter, eggs and all. The eggs were all broken, and the butter tumbled into the dirt. I put them all back into the basket, except the eggs, and asked a boy, who was the only one that seemed to pity me—everybody else laughed—to help me along with the basket. He took hold of one side, and helped me clear home. We set the basket down in the shop, and Mr. Hard-amer saw, at once, that something was wrong.

"What's the matter, there?" he said, in an angry voice, coming from behind the counter.

"I fell down—it was so heavy," I said, trembling all over.

"Where's the eggs?" he said, more angrily.

"They're all broken, sir," said I.

"And here's the butter all covered with dirt!" he said, pulling off the lid of the butter-kettle. "You did it on purpose, you little scoundrel you!"

"And then he dragged me into the back shop, and made me pull off my jacket. Oh, how he did cut me with the stirrup!—cursing me all the while, and saying he'd kill me afore he was done with me. It seemed like he never would quit; and every stroke smarted and ached so, that I thought I couldn't stand it a minute longer. After awhile he threw the stirrup down, and drove me off into the cellar, and told me to saw wood there until he sent for me, and said if he heard the saw stop a minute at a time, he'd come down and give me ten times as much. I went down and sawed wood, until I ached so I thought I would have fallen over, but I was afraid to stop; and so I kept on, wishing I would drop down dead! After a long, long time, Millie came down to call me to dinner. I couldn't hardly eat anything, I felt so sick. But he didn't tell me to go into the cellar again, and I began to feel a little better by night. Oh, how I wanted to see you!—and that night, as I lay in bed, I determined that I would come and see you any how."

The tears started from Anne's eyes, and her heart ached for the poor, abused child. And ached the more, because she had no means of softening his hard lot. She did not reply to his painful story, but his eyes read her sympathizing countenance, and he understood how much she felt for him.

"But I'll try and bear it, Anne, it won't last forever," said the little fellow, endeavoring to rally. "I'll be a man one of these days, and then no one will beat or abuse me."

"That is right, Jimmy. When we can't help ourselves, it is always best to put a good face upon matters. A change for the better will come sooner or later."

"And right soon will it come for you, Miss Anne, I hope," he said, with animation.

"I could not ask for anything better than I now have," she replied.

"But, better will come, I am sure. Ike says he means to go this very night to see Mr. Illerton, and tell him where you are; and then he'll come and marry you; and he's so rich!"

This announcement brought Anne to her feet at once, utterly confounded.

"Run home, quick!" she said, "and tell Isaac, that, if he has the least regard for my feelings, he could not injure them more than by doing what you say."

"It's no use to go, Anne," said the little boy, "because Ike's gone long ago."

"Maybe not, Jimmy, so run home as fast as you can, and come again to-morrow night."

MAKE THE BEST OF THINGS.

IF all would do this, the world would be happier for most of us than it is. Some people seem to do everything in their power to make the worst, instead of the best, of what they have. The difference of conditions in those we meet lies, in most cases, just here.

It is one thing to earn money, and another thing to make the best use of it after it is earned. Good wages or bad wages make small difference in the comfort of some homes. The more a man, who has no idea of thrift or economy, earns, the more he spends uselessly. High wages are a hurt rather than a blessing to such a man, for they only increase his opportunities for self-indulgences that confirm bad habits.

Making the best of things is the art of all arts, without which no trade, profession or calling will ever insure success. It is the secret of order and comfort in our homes. The wife who makes the best of everything her husband's wages procure; becomes the helpmeet she promised to be; and the husband who makes the best of his opportunities, working faithfully, intelligently and skilfully, and so getting for his family the largest return for his labor, only fulfils the pledges he gave when taking upon himself the responsibilities of a married man.

More than half the grumbings and complainings of certain people would never be heard if they had always made the best of what came to them. The world is not half so bad to us as we are to ourselves. In our want of order, care, industry, economy and skill, lie most of our deprivations and our misfortunes.

True friends are the whole world to one another: and he that is a friend to himself, is also a friend to mankind. There is no relish in the possession of anything without a partner.

THE CATHEDRAL OF ST. MARK, VENICE.

IT is difficult to imagine a city full of life, without horses and without wheels, in which you may walk certainly, but only through narrow lanes of houses, where you may touch the walls on either side with outstretched arms; where you come to bridges or steps every few yards over the numerous canals; and where the turnings are so intricate and so much alike, that only by great care can you find your way back to your hotel, a city wholly devoid of verdure, where all the vegetables and fruit consumed have to be brought in barges from the mainland. In some of the court-yards, you see a few orange-trees in tubs; but with these exceptions there is no green thing in Venice, and the nearest approach to vegetation must be looked for on the Lido, that long, narrow tongue of land sheltering Venice from the waves of the Adriatic, which may be seen from the lagoon—where all is calm—tossing and raging as though vainly endeavoring to burst the slender barrier.

One of the most interesting sights in Venice is the glass manufactory on the island of Murano, where of late years the making of the famous Venetian glass, so prized by the antiquaries, has been revived and carried to great perfection. To our English eyes this glass may appear dull and imperfect in shape; but when we consider that all the beautiful vases, flowers, etc, we see are made without model, simply shaped by the eye and hand of the workmen; the marvel is that they are so true in form. A man will take a certain number of sticks of glass of equal length, and place them in a row on a sort of shovel; this he places in a furnace until the glass becomes partially fused. Then he takes another round iron implement, and twists the melted glass around it, and by turning it in various ways, and frequently placing it in the furnace for a few moments, it at last assumes whatever shape you please—either vase, goblet or plate. When finished in shape, he takes a small quantity of dark red glass, passes it lightly round the edge, and thus forms the border.

The preparation of the gold-stone glass, and of the opal that which is so much admired, is a secret recently rediscovered by Salvati, to whom we are indebted also for the modern mosaics, which from their beauty and durability will, ere long, be employed largely in wall decoration.

The bugle and bead-works are also curious. A man takes a piece of glass from the furnace, blows down an iron rod into it; another man seizes it, and the two walk backward from each other through a passage, till the glass is drawn to the size of a bead or bugle. It is then cut into lengths, and the beads are filled with saw-dust, again fused and rounded by friction, being shaken together in a sack by a peculiar motion.

The most wonderful and interesting sight of Venice, however, is the Cathedral of St. Mark, which is at once a noble temple and an historical museum of unsurpassed interest. Here you may read of the religion, the riches, the liberty, the conquests and progress made in the arts by that wonderful republic of the past. Here are treasures, war-spoils from Constantinople and from Greece.

The Church of San Marco, converted into a Cathedral in 1807, previous to which time it was the ducal chapel, was founded by the Doge Giustiniani Partecipazio in the year 829. In consequence of his death it was left unfinished. His heirs, however, finished it, and it was destroyed by a conflagration in 976. In 977 the present edifice was founded by Pietro Orseolo I., the successor of Candiano, whose life and reign terminated at the time of the conflagration. It was not completed, however, until the reign of Domenico Contarini, 1043. In 1071 the Doge Domenico Salvo added many precious ornaments, and mosaics in particular. It was designed by architects from Constantinople, and is a mixture of Grecian and Roman architecture. The nave is two hundred and forty-three feet in length, the transept two hundred. The centre dome is ninety-two feet in height, and the other four eight-one feet each. Nearly six hundred pillars support the decorations inside and outside of this building. They were brought from Greece and are of marble. The finishings are in the Italian-Gothic style of the fifteenth century, but are not light and graceful. The scarcity of windows gives the building a gloomy appearance.

In the lower part of the front are five arched doorways, each adorned with a double row of little columns. Over the central door stand gilded bronze horses placed there, it has been suggested, to show the Venetians what a horse is like, as they have no opportunity of studying the living animal. These horses are said to be the work of Phidias, carried to Constantinople by Theodosius, from whence they were removed by the Venetians in 1206, when they plundered the capital of the eastern empire. These horses were taken to Paris as trophies by the first Napoleon, and crowned the Triumphant Arch in the Place de Carrousel in Paris, from 1797 to 1815. After the Battle of Waterloo they were restored, to the great joy of the Venetians.

In the outer walls are inserted tablets of ancient sculpture of different nations and ages. One on the north side represents Proserpine in a chariot drawn by two dragons, and holding in either hand a torch. In the corner near the Ducal Palace, attractive from their color and position, is a group of four full-length figures in red porphyry, the origin of which is not exactly known.

Five large mosaics are placed over the doorways. The first on the right is a design by Pietro Vecchio, executed in 1650. The subject represented is the body of St. Mark being removed from the tomb at Alexandria. The Last Judgment occupies the central place. Then comes a design dated 1728, representing the Venetian magistrates venerating the body of St. Mark. The last, and probably most ancient of these mosaics, represents the church of St. Mark. Above these are four other mosaics, the subjects of which are the taking down from the cross, descent into Hades, the resurrection, and the ascension.

By the central portal as you enter the vestibule is a small piece of reddish marble, indicating the spot where Pope Alexander III. and the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa were, through the interposition of the Venetian republic, reconciled on the 23d of July, 1177. The vaulting and many portions of the wall are covered with rich marble and mosaics; the columns are of verd-antique and porphyry; the pavement is composed of small pieces of white and colored marble, agate, jasper, etc., and is beautifully arranged. Over the centre door of the church is a mosaic representing St. Mark in pontifical robes, executed by the brothers Zucconi in 1545; the crucifixion opposite by the same. They also executed the Eight Prophets, the Four Evangelists, the Resurrection of Lazarus, and the Annunciation.

The magnificent tomb of Cardinal Zeno, from the design of Alessandro Leopardi, is situated in the Zeno Chapel, on the right of the vestibule. In the north corridor is the ancient bas-relief of Christ surrounded by the twelve apostles, and the monument of the Doge Marino Morosini. The walls of the interior are of precious marble. A mosaic of the Virgin of St. Mark is over the central door. By the door on the right the basin for holy water is placed, composed of porphyry supported by a Greek altar. Farther on to the right is situated the Baptistery, executed in the fourteenth century. The granite slab upon which our Saviour is supposed to have stood when he preached to the inhabitants of Tyre—brought from that city in 1126—forms the altar table.

The monument of the last Doge, Andrea Dandolo, who died in 1384, and was interred in St. Mark's, stands against the wall. Near it is a Gothic tomb erected to the Doge Soranzo. The Chapel of the Holy Cross is by the north transept. One of the columns which support it is a rare specimen of black and white granite.

You may walk, from sunrise to sunset, to and fro, before the gateway of St. Mark's, and you will not see an eye lifted to it, nor a countenance brightened by it. Priests and layman, soldier and civilian, rich and poor, pass by it alike and regardless. Up to the very recesses of the porches the meanest tradesman of the city push their counters; nay, the foundations of its pillars are themselves the seats, not "of them that sell doves" for sacrifice, but of the vendors of toys and caricatures. Round the whole square in front of the church there is almost a continual line of cafés, where the idle Venetians of the middle class lounge and read. In the recesses of the porches, all day long, knots of men of the lowest classes, unemployed and listless, lie basking in the sun like lizards; and unregarded children—every heavy glance of their young eyes full of desperation and strong depravity, and their throats hoarse with cursing—gamble, and fight, and snarl, and sleep, hour after hour, clashing their bruised centesimi upon the marble ledges of the church porch. And the image of Christ and his angels look down upon it continually.

WHAT DO YOUR CHILDREN READ?

A BAD book, magazine, or newspaper, is a dangerous to your child as a vicious companion, and will as surely corrupt his morals and lead him away from the paths of safety. Every parent should set this thought clearly before his mind, and ponder it well. Look to what your children read, and especially to the kind of papers that get into their hands, for there are now published scores of weekly papers, with attractive and sensuous illustrations, that are as hurtful to young and innocent souls as poison to a healthful body.

Many of these papers have attained large circulations, and are sowing broadcast the seeds of vice and crime. Trenching on the very borders of indecency, they corrupt the morals, taint the imagination, and allure the weak and unguarded from the paths of innocence. The danger to young persons from this cause was never so great as at this time; and every father and mother should be on guard against an enemy that is sure to meet their child.

Our mental companions—the thoughts and feelings that dwell with us when alone, and influence our actions—these are what lift us up or drag us down. If your child has pure and good mental companions, he is safe; but if, through corrupt books and papers, evil thoughts and impure imaginings get into his mind, his danger is imminent.

Look to it, then, that your children are kept as free as possible from this taint. Never bring into your house a paper or periodical that is not strictly pure, and watch carefully lest any such get into the hands of your growing-up boys.

"NOT WORTH A STRAW."

PERHAPS a straw is not as worthless as you think. Let us see. Straws are the stems of wheat, rye, oats and barley. In order to wave to and fro in the wind, and yet bear up the heads of grain, they must be both light and strong. Let us see how lightness is secured. They are made hollow, you see, like quills; and yet not hollow through the whole length, for every now and then we find a knob, or joint, which helps to brace up the sides and make them strong. The straw outside is hard, and looks as shiny as if it had been polished. It is polished, and that keeps the weather and the insects from damaging it; besides adding to its strength. Polish! but where does it get polish? God gave these plants the power of drawing up, through their roots, this gummy sort of varnish from the earth. It is flint. There is nothing like it on the stem of the sweet-pea or the current-bush, because they do not need it.

HAPPINESS NOT THE END OF LIFE.

THE meaning of life is not joy. Our Father did not put us here for that, yet we hate to believe it. We cling to gladness, and turn our hearts toward it, as the flower to the sun. And when, instead, trouble falls upon us, we turn away and refuse to be comforted, and our days loom up before us in added bitterness. We are weary of the pilgrimage, and we long to make it only a happy journey, wandering where we will. We cannot abide the thought of a warfare, we are not brave enough and strong enough to contend with any foe. We love not hardship and self-denial and watching. We had rather whisper, O Soul, take thine ease and be merry; give not up a present comfort for a far-off, unseen good. Yet, there is much to satisfy us here, if it was only all our own, but the way is hedged about, and we cannot put out our hands to take the good things. The days are different from our longings, and we count them lost hours and look back upon them with an agony that is unavailing. We think of what we might have been, of the great work we might have done, if our prayers were not denied, and we weep over our barren harvest. Yet this is God's ordering. He would have us holy first, so he teaches us by humiliation and disappointment. He takes away what He sees will lead us from the highest place, and He gives us more than we ask for—better things. He removes not the thorn, but with the double burden comes the greater strength.

It is what we are, not what we possess, that shall make us grow like Him.

There is a verse which says, "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He will sustain thee," and in every word there is a gracious sweetness and a living power, that proves how true He is. We need not keep this weight, for there is One who has borne more than this, who now waiteth at the door, not far off, but by our side, ready to come in, if we ask Him, and take it all away; ready to stay with us, and whisper of the good cheer we are soon to find.—Good Tidings:

"IF YE LOVE ME, KEEP MY COMMANDMENTS."—Let the Church teach men that there is no religion except in keeping the Commandments, and let her teach it so plainly that there can be no mistake about her meaning, and her influence will be felt in social, civil and industrial affairs. Let her teach, with no uncertain sound, that no one can enter Heaven except in the degree that Heavenly principles are formed in the life, and her members will cease to delude themselves with the vain hope of getting to Heaven by thought or belief alone. The Church occupies the central place in human life, and the only effectual way to purify political life and make trading honest and labor noble, is to make the teaching of the Church true and her practice good. Purify the fountain, and the streams will be pure.

When the heart begins to go out in love to God, Heaven has commenced within it, and the certitude of an eternal Heaven is found in this, that it is toward an Infinite God that it goes out. Provision is at once made for endless activity and endless love.

NEARER.

BY RUTH.

When earthly shadows fall
Thick o'er my way;
When anxious fears appal,
Dark'ning my day;
When lonely, sad and drear,
Life seems to me,
Then comes my yearning cry—
"Nearer to Thee."

When with the eye of faith
Upward I gaze,
Where clouds of gloom are pierced
By heavenly rays;
Seeing Thy loving face
Bend down o'er me,
Then swells my joyous song—
"Nearer to Thee."

When to the river's brink
Gladly I come,
Waiting the angel-band
To bear me home;
When the bright City's gates
Opening I see,
Rapturous will be my cry—
"Nearer to Thee."

The Lord provides good for His obedient children. When we wilfully do evil, we pass from under the Divine Providence into the Divine permission.

Would'st thou die nobly, let thy vices die before thee.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

BE PATIENT WITH CHILDREN.

"YE have need of patience!" Nothing can be more true than this, and nothing is more applicable to those who have to do with boys and girls. There are so many provocations which demand endurance, so many faults which require correction, so much carelessness which provokes rebuke, and so much perverseness which calls for firmness and control, that "teachers of babes," if not of a temper absolutely angelic, need to have "line upon line—line upon line, precept upon precept—precept upon precept," to aid in the work which has fallen to their lot.

There are so many temptations and accessories to impatience, too. It is so easy and so natural for the strong to tyrannize over the weak! Absolute power is too frequently abused; and the power which a parent or a teacher exercises over the child, is so far absolute that immediate resistance can be rendered unavailing. True, the parent has parental tenderness and love to restrain the impetuosity of impatience, but the teacher has not; and if parents are often, in spite of natural barriers, impetuous, what wonder that teachers are so too.

It is less trouble, so far as the present time is concerned, to blame and scold, and punish a child for negligence, stupidity or misconduct, than to explain, reason and instruct. It takes less time to box a boy's ears for being mischievous, or to push a girl into a bedroom "all by herself," for being idle, or talkative, or troublesome, than it does to investigate intentions and motives, or to inquire into causes; and we do not wonder that the patience of the most patient sometimes gives way. But it is not the less to be deplored when it does give way. In one hour—in less time than this—in one minute, evil may be wrought which will undo the work of months, or which years of judicious treatment will not obliterate.

Do we say, then, that children should be indulged and pampered, and their faults overlooked? No: this again seems easier to the indulgent and self-indulgent teacher than the wearying work of constant watchfulness and wise circumspection. But patience is as much required in the avoidance of false indulgence as in the banishment of undue or injudicious severity. It is easier, for the moment, to yield to the wishes and dispositions of children, than to oppose or regulate them. But notwithstanding this, "Patience" should "have her perfect work." Oh, ye teachers of the young, "ye have need of patience."

And not patience only. In the proper exercises of discipline, discrimination and keen perception must be united with it, or even patience will fail. Perhaps no two children in any given number are precisely alike in formation of mind, disposition and general capacity. One will be timid, another bold; one sensitive, another obtuse; one quick, another slow. In different things, and at different times, the same boy or girl may exhibit almost contradictory qualities, and yet there shall be nothing in all this that ought to be construed into a fault, or that should call for even a rebuke. Patience here will be lost in a maze, to which discrimination alone can furnish the clue. And that not always, for we have the word of Inspiration to assure us that "the heart is deceitful above all things; but, in general, perhaps, the heart of a child may be pretty correctly read by those who do not, idly or contemptuously, neglect its study.

At all events, it is better to be credulous than incredulous—better that a child should ten times escape the just punishment of a fault through an excess of patience, than be once unjustly punished through want of discrimination. The memory of the injustice will rankle in the soul, and produce worse fruits there, tenfold, in after years, than will spring from the consciousness of having committed faults innumerable with impunity.

Teachers or parents never will or can deal wisely with a child, unless they dispense with impulse, and scrutinize, in every possible way, what appears worthy of condemnation; and the best way to follow out this scrutiny is mentally to change places with the offender—to be a child again—to divest one's self of all but a childish judgment and capacity—to throw back one's self upon childish views and feelings—and to submit to be guided by childish reasonings, and then after all, if there be a doubt, to give the child the benefit of that doubt.

But, oh, what a deal of trouble is all this!

Very well, —, we are not thinking about your trouble, but about the child's good. Though, as to trouble, the best way of doing anything is the least troublesome in the end. But by trouble you mean pains-taking, time and attention, and regard to the ultimate object. Now, can anything in the world, worth doing, be well and properly accomplished without these? Can a pudding be made, or a pig be fed, or a beard be shaven without these?

Trouble! Shame upon those who, under the selfish but vain plea of saving themselves trouble—present trouble—make trouble for others in after years! Let them do anything, be anything, rather than teachers of the young.

This is an inexhaustible subject—the right training of children—we have written about it before, and we may have occasion to revert to it again and again. Meanwhile, as illustrative of the foregoing remarks, we quote an instructive passage from a work on "Private Education."

"How can you be so stupid?" said a governess to her pupil; "why do you not do your sum properly? It is very easy, and you don't try to do it well."

"My sum was right at first, and now I have done it over so many times I really cannot understand it," replied the child.

"I shall make you finish it," said the governess, "and not allow you to have any recreation till it is correct."

The child burst into tears, saying she did not know how it was, but she felt so stupid. She, however, sat down, and once more began the sum; but this time every figure was wrong.

The governess grew very angry, and said the naughty girl should not only begin it again, but do two more as a punishment for such obstinacy.

The child made another attempt, and was desired to do it aloud.

"Four farthings make a shilling," said the child.

"What!" exclaimed the governess; "four farthings make a shilling! How dare you be so stupid? You do it on purpose. I shall certainly complain to your mamma."

"Indeed, indeed," sobbed the child, "I will try to do it properly; I see I am wrong, very wrong. I mean to say, twelve farthings make a penny."

The governess could bear it no longer; she rose, and was about to threaten some severe punishment, when the mother entered the room, and, seeing the child in tears, said: "What is the matter with my little Emma? Seven o'clock, and lessons not finished! I am going to dinner, and you will not be ready for dessert."

"I am not to go down-stairs this evening," replied the weeping child; "I cannot do my sum."

The governess, till then silent, confirmed this.

"I cannot allow Miss Emma any recreation," she said; and, drawing out her watch, added, "it is now seven o'clock; she has been five hours with a slate in her hand, and has not yet done her sum. I am sorry to say she is very obstinate, and persists in asserting that four farthings make a shilling, and that twelve farthings make a penny!"

The child stared vacantly, and did not contradict her governess, but looked as if not conscious of the mistake she had made. The mother, evidently suffering at seeing her child's swollen eyes, and convinced of the mismanagement, merely said: "I am sorry to find Emma has given cause for displeasure, and beg she may be sent to bed immediately; to-morrow, I trust she will endeavor to be more attentive."

The child obeyed, sobbing, "Good-night, mamma."

As soon as she was gone, Mrs. Y—, an excellent and judicious parent, pointed out, in gentle language, the error committed.

"You will probably think, Miss H—, that a mother's feelings misled me; and I must candidly say, I do not think Emma has been so much to blame. You have shown ill-judged severity in keeping her so long at the same lesson. I give you credit for your good intentions; but, believe me, you are mistaken. The attention fixed for such a length of time loses its power; and I am persuaded that Emma will do her sum right to-morrow morning, provided no threats are made; but if her thoughts be occupied with the punishment she has to dread, it is not probable she can give undivided attention to any study, much less to arithmetic, which admits of no error. I do not think Emma deserved to be punished; she had no power of doing better. It is evident from her saying that four farthings make a shilling, and twelve farthings make a penny, that she was much puzzled; and I beg that another time, under similar circumstances, she may be made to leave off her lesson. When I sent her to bed, and appeared displeased, it was to uphold your authority; I should not have had the courage to inflict any other punishment; but the child was so fatigued, I thought it could do her no harm, and hope she is already asleep, as I fear she has been over-exerted."

The governess made no reply; she felt the truth of the observations, and was grateful for the manner in which they had been conveyed.

The following morning the little girl, refreshed by sleep, and recovering the use of her faculties, did her sum without a single mistake, and begged, as a reward, that she might be allowed to go and show it to her mamma.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

ICEBERGS.

BY E. B. D.

ICEBERG means ice mountain. It is not a mountain covered with ice, but a mountain of solid ice. We do not find these mountains on dry land. They are in the ocean, far away to the Polar Regions.

The water of the ocean freezes in a solid mass over the surface. Then, when a thaw or a storm comes, this mass of ice cracks and breaks into great cakes. These cakes get jostled against, or piled upon one another, and in that way frozen together. This great piece, made out of a into the clear ocean, and they have been known to run against vessels and sink them.

When these icebergs get into a warmer region they slowly melt away. In the picture are several icebergs, which have been melting for some time; the water, formed by the melting ice, running down their sides into the ocean until the ice is left in sharp, jagged points at the top. The white objects are the icebergs. The black ones are rocks of some coast or island.

Icebergs are most beautiful to look at. When the sun shines upon them they are fairly dazzling with light, and shew all the colors of the rainbow. At night they gleam number of smaller ones frozen together, rests on the surface of the water and raises its top out of it, as ice naturally floats; and more ice is added to the sides and bottom. Then another storm, perhaps, throws more pieces upon or against it, which freeze to it. The larger it gets the higher it rises out of the water, until finally it becomes as large as a mountain.

Sometimes these great ice mountains, or bergs, will split in two, from top to bottom, with a noise like that of a cannon, and thus another iceberg will be formed. When this happens, there is a great commotion in the water. All the icebergs in the neighborhood shake and dance and move about as though they were alive.

The seas near the North and South Poles are filled with these icebergs, which are large enough to grind a ship to pieces, if one should chance to be between them when they come together. These great icebergs float around in the ocean, and ships which visit the regions where they are found, have to be careful and keep out of their tracks. Sometimes they wander away off, out of their usual course, in the moon or in the light of the aurora borealis, until the whole scene looks like fairy-land.

Don't tell me of to-morrow;
Give me the man who'll say,
That when a good deed's to be done,
Let's do the deed to-day!
We may command the present,
If we act and never wait;
But repentance is the phantom
Of the past, that comes too late.

NEVER give up, brother, never give up,
God has a blessing for those who work hard;
Why should you grumble, and murmur and fret,
And envy the pleasure from which you're debarred.
Work like a man,
Do the best you can,
This is the wisest and happiest plan.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

FOUND.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

INTO the forest, alone, I went,
And nothing to seek was my intent.

A little flower I found in the gloom;
Bright as an eye, or a star, its bloom.

But when I would pluck it, it said to me,
"Shall I, to my withering, broken be?"

Then flower and root I dug from the loam,
And tenderly took it with me home.

There, planted again in a worthy place,
It grows and blossoms with added grace.

LIZZIE.

BY FLORENCE PENNY.

DEAR little dark-eyed namosake!
The summers are all too few
Since she brightened with graceful wearing,
The name that my childhood knew—
I hoped it would crown her with sunshine
Fairer than ever smiled—
I said it should bring her a blessing—
Dear little dark-eyed child!

I said it should bring her a blessing—
Was I wiser than I guessed?
Was the blessing a long, sweet childhood,
And an early and happy rest?
For the loving circle that held her
Is robbed of its precious pearl;
The youngest, the fairest, the darling—
Dear little dark-eyed girl!

She stood where the path of childhood—
A lane through a flowery wood—
Led out to the wide, dim distance
Of perilous womanhood—
Woman or angel?—The future
Like a question before her lay;
What wonder she paused and faltered,
And chose the easier way?

Not for her are the crosses
And bonds of a woman's life,
Nor the burdens and costly blessings
Which cling to the name of wife;
Nor labor, nor doubt, nor anguish,
Nor the great world's dusty whirl;
Not one of them touched her garment—
Dear little dark-eyed girl!

Timidly leaning always
On the hearts which loved her best,
Sheltered from every sorrow,
She dwelt in the warm home nest;
Never a grief came near her,
Nor trial nor loss she bore—
And none in the home that holds her Shall find her for evermore!

Oh! fair and fetterless spirit!

The name that my childhood knew,
Though rarely I hear it spoken,
Is sweeter because of you—
What matter how little value
On earth to the name be given,
Since now it is worn by an angel,
'Tis tenderly breathed in Heaven?

THE PATCHWORK QUILT.

IN sheen of silken splendor,
With glinting threads of gold,
I've seen the waving marvels
That hung in halls of old,
When fair hands wrought the lily,
And brave hands held the lance,
And stately lords and ladies
Stepped through the courtly dance.

I've looked on rarer fabrics,
The wonders of the loom,
That caught the flowers of summer,
And captive held their bloom;
But not their wreathing beauty,
Though fit for queens to wear,
Can with one household treasure,
That's all mine own, compare.

It has no golden value,
The simple patchwork spread;
Its squares in homely fashion
Set in with green and red;
But in those faded pieces
For me are shining bright,
Ah! many a summer morning,
And many a winter night.

The dewy breath of clover,
The leaping light of flame,
Like spells my heart come over,
As one by one I name
These bits of old-time dresses—
Chints, cambric, calico—
That looked so fresh and dainty
On my darlings long ago.

This violet was mother's;
I seem to see her face,
That ever like a sunshine
Lit up the shadiest place.
This buff belonged to Susan;
That scarlet spot was mine;
And Fannie wore this pearly white,
Where purple pansies shine.

I turn my patchwork over—
A book with pictured leaves—
And I feel the lilac fragrance,
And the snow-fall on the eaves.
Of all my heart's possessions
I think it least could spare
The quilt we children pieced at home,
When mother dear was there.

FLORAL DEPARTMENT.

HOME ORNAMENTS.

WE received, some time since, a book from Mr. Dreer, of this city, published by Henry T. Williams, of New York, and entitled "Window Gardening." We gave a notice of the book at the time of its reception, and examination has proved it to be even more valuable than we then supposed. We will give a few extracts from its pages for the benefit of our readers. It contains some very useful suggestions on the subject of home floral ornamentation—useful because simple, inexpensive and practicable:

"This department would not be complete without a word for the little ones of the house, some hint to them of what they can do to bring forth some glowing spot or sprig of living greenery. So we tell them how to make some pretty little contrivances in grasses, etc.

"Plants with light, graceful foliage are every year becoming more popular; and as to complete a picture of the highest order one requires a great variety of colors and graceful pencillings, so in window gardening the culture of the grasses adds greatly to the whole effect.

"Far prettier than many a pretentious and costly ornament is a simple bowl of grasses planted in pine cones, set in sand, in moss or common soil. If grown in cones, procure them from the woods, and sprinkle in as much soil as their scales will retain. Then scatter the grass-seed over it, and sprinkle with water. Place the cones in sand or moss, and be sure that they do not become dry, but water them sparingly at first, once a day, and set in a moderately warm place. Soon the seeds will sprout, and the tiny spears protrude in every direction.

"Grass will sprout and grow in pine cones without any soil, but it serves to prevent the cone from closing too tightly when sprinkled, and also makes a more vigorous growth. The cones can be suspended in a window, either singly or in groups of three fastened together with thread wire. Or a rustic basket or stand can be procured, and filled with cones, with different kinds of grasses growing in each cone. There are three thousand different species of grasses in the world, and their study is a pleasing pursuit.

"A very charming effect can be produced by placing a wet sponge in a glass bowl, and sprinkling over it canary-seed, grasses and flaxseed. Soon it will be covered with a thick growth of fresh, bright green. It must be judiciously watered. If kept too dry it will wither away; if too wet it may damp off. Mustard-seed may also be used, and its tiny yellow blossoms will be to many a novelty as well as a delight.

"Common garden peas will make a lovely vine, although sweet peas are much prettier. But either can be grown in water. Fill a common tumbler with water. Tie over it a bit of coarse lace, such as milliners use, and cover it with peas, pressing it down into the water. Keep in a dark place for two or three days, then give light and warmth. In a few days the roots will be plainly seen piercing through the lace, and the vines can twine around the casements, or a bit of a hoop-skirt spring can be fastened about the tumbler with springs attached to it in form of a globe, and the vines twined about them. Keep the tumbler full of water, and add bits of charcoal to keep it fresh. Every week turn in two or three drops of aqua ammonia.

"A saucer garden can be made with fresh moss well wetted. In the centre place a pine cone filled with earth and common grass or canary-bird seed, and in a few days the tiny grass spears will appear, and soon you will have a verdurous cone of great beauty.

"If an acorn be suspended by a bit of thread tied around it within half an inch of the surface of water contained in a small vase or tumbler, and allowed to remain undisturbed for one or two weeks in a warm place, it will burst its shell and throw a root into the water, and shoot upward, its straight and tapering stem covered with glossy green leaves. A young oak tree growing in this way is an elegant object. The water should be kept clean with bits of charcoal, and if the leaves turn yellow add a little ammonia to it.

"The sweet potato would hardly be recognized by many who know it only to eat it, if they could see how pretty a parlor ornament it might be easily made. Take a large-sized sweet potato and drop it to the bottom of a vase or the bowl of a hanging basket. Cover the potato with water nearly to its top, leaving perhaps a half inch uncovered, and always keeping it about at this point. It will soon put forth roots, and the top will shoot out a vine which will grow after a while with great rapidity. A sunny position suits it best, and the tendrils will soon clasp the arms of the basket, or droop in long curls over the edge of the vase. Many visitors who have seen such a vine in the window of their friend, have inquired, with admiration, its name, thinking it must be some foreign plant.

"TO REVIVE FADED FLOWERS.—Hot water will frequently restore flowers to freshness, even when every petal is drooping. Place the stems into a cup of boiling hot water, leave them in it until each petal has become smoothed out, then cut off the coddled ends and put into milk-warm water. Colored flowers revive sooner than those that are of snowy whiteness, as the latter turn yellow. A cool room is best adapted to keeping flowers fresh. Take away each flower as it fades, else it will decay the others.

"The moisture furnished out flowers should be rain water, always of a moderate temperature, about blood warmth. The water should not be changed, but every morning its evaporation supplied with more of the same temperature; to which, after a few days, a little aqua ammonia—five drops to half a pint of water—may be added. It is well to place at the bottom of the dish or vase a layer of broken charcoal, about half an inch in depth—pieces about the size of small beans. In placing the flowers let them have as much room as they need to show themselves naturally. At the expiration of a week the stems should be examined, all decayed matter rubbed from them with a piece of flannel, and the tip of each end cleanly cut; and if any leaves or blossoms begin to look withered, these also should be cut away. Flowers decay much sooner when tied in bunches or bouquets than when arranged loosely. Too little air and too much water are the bane of most species. There ought to be a free current of the former around each spray or separate large flower, while the latter should not come above the calyx of any bloom—better be an inch or more below it, with most hardy plants, even if very long-stemmed, two inches immersion will give water enough if they have plenty of air. For short-stemmed flowers, a mixture of damp sand and powdered charcoal in equal proportions, answers very well; but care must be taken that the dish does not get too dry. So also do baskets of creeping moss, in which they may be potted with fine effect. Still, the moss gets dry so soon, that the flowers fare better if a saucer is hidden below, partly filled with water, which they can reach with the tips of their stems."

A PAGE OF VARIETIES.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

MAINTAIN dignity without the appearance of pride.

NEVER acquiesce in immoral or pernicious opinions.

THINK nothing in conduct unimportant or indifferent.

Be always resigned to the dispensations of Providence.

BISHOP HACKER'S motto: "Serve God, and be cheerful."

FINISH the work in hand before beginning anything else.

Be guarded in conversation, attentive, and slow to speak.

EVERY man has just as much vanity as he lacks understanding.

Be not forward to assign reason to those who have no right to ask.

A GREAT soul only finds its true existence in making others great.

RISE early, and be an economist of time. An hour lost is never gained.

FLOWERS are God's undertones of encouragement to the children of earth.

It is not always the dark place that hinders, but sometimes the dim eye.

He that never changes any of his opinions never corrects any of his mistakes.

MAN, being essentially active, must find in activity his joy, as well as his beauty and glory.

When life is ruined for the sake of money's preciousness, the ruined life cares naught for the money.

One of the most important rules of the science of manners is an almost absolute silence in regard to yourself.

It is the man who determines the dignity of the occupation, not the occupation which measures the dignity of the man.

Men are often capable of greater things than they perform; they are sent into the world with bills of credit, and seldom draw to their full extent.

The blossom cannot tell what becomes of its odor, and no man can tell what becomes of his influence and example, which go beyond his ken on their mission.

VIOLETS do not open once a day, and let out their little prayer of perfume. They exhale all the while, at some times more than at others, but always more or less.

Has it never occurred to us, when surrounded by sorrows, that they may be sent to us only for our instruction, as we darken the cages of birds when we wish to teach them to sing.

The tender words, the loving deeds which we scatter for the hearts which throb nearest to us, are immortal seed that will spring up in everlasting beauty, not only in our own lives, but in the lives of those born after us.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

In a Dublin newspaper appeared the following: "A number of deaths are unavoidably postponed."

THE latest instance afforded by a "fond mother" of her son's cleverness is said son's correcting her for saying he was all over dirt. He said the dirt was all over him.

An attorney, says an ingenious writer, is the same thing to a barrister than an apothecary is to a physician, with this difference, that your lawyer does not deal in scruples.

A poor literary man being about to marry a rich heiress, was asked how long he thought the honeymoon would last? He replied: "Don't tell me of the honey-moon; it is harvest-moon with me."

A student at college included in the list of expenses which he sent to his father the item, "Charity, thirty dollars." The father remarked, in reply, "I fear that charity covers a multitude of sins."

An Irishman, when he applied for a license to sell whisky, was asked by a magistrate if he was of a good moral character. He replied, "Faith, I don't see the necessity of a good moral character to sell whisky."

"BIDDY," said a lady, "step over and see how old Mrs. Jones is this morning." In a few minutes Biddy returned with the information that Mrs. Jones was seventy-two years, seven months and two days old, that morning.

A Scotch clergyman, preaching one day, quoted the passage: "And I said in my haste that all men are liars;" and added: "What's that, Mr. Palmist? Said it in your haste, did you? Had you lived in our day you would have said it at your leisure."

A CLERGYMAN being annoyed by some of his audience going out while he was preaching, took for his text, "Then art weighed and found wanting." Soon after commencing his discourse he said, "You will please pass out as fast as you are weighed."

"ARE you going to make a flower-bed here, Jenkins?" asked a young lady of the gardener. "Yes, miss; them's the orders," answered the gardener. "Why, it'll quite spoil our croquet ground!" "Can't help it, miss; them's your pe's orders. He says he'll have it laid out for horticulture, not for husbandry!"

EVIL SPIRITS.—Sir Astley Cooper, who had no superior as a British medical authority, said: "I never suffer ardent spirits in my house, thinking them evil spirits; and if the poor could witness the white livers, the dropsies, the shattered nervous systems, which I have seen, as the consequence of drinking, they would be aware that spirits and poisons are synonymous terms."

THE OLD MASTERS.—The wife of an up-town citizen, who has grown wealthy during the past few years by the advance of real estate, went abroad a few days ago. One of her acquaintances asked her what particular purpose she had in going, and what she expected to enjoy most. "Oh, I don't care much about Europe," she replied, "on my own account. The main object I have in making this trip is to have the portraits of these children," pointing to three homely girls of nine, eleven and thirteen, "painted by the old masters."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Cast Adrift. By T. S. Arthur. Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddart & Co. $2.00. In his preface to this new volume, the author says: "My book, apart from the thread of fiction that runs through its pages, is but a series of photographs from real life, and is less a work of imagination than a record of facts. If it stirs the hearts of American readers profoundly, and so awakes the people to a sense of their duty; if it helps to inaugurate more earnest and radical modes of reform for a state of society of which a distinguished author has said, 'There is not a country throughout the earth on which it would not bring a curse; there is no religion upon the earth that it would not deny; there is no people upon the earth that it would not put to shame,' then will not my work be in vain."

"Sitting in our comfortable homes, with well-fed, well-clothed and happy-hearted children about us—children who have our tenderest care, and whose cry of pain from a pin-prick or a fall upon the floor hurts us like a blow—how few of us know or care anything about the homes in which some other children dwell, or of the hard and cruel battle for life they are doomed to fight from the very beginning!"

"To get out from these comfortable homes, and from the midst of tenderly cared-for little ones, and stand face to face with squalor and hunger, with suffering, debasement and crime—to look upon the starved faces of little children, and hear their helpless cries, is what scarcely one in a thousand will do. It is too much for our sensibilities. And so we stand aloof, and the sorrow and suffering, the debasement, the wrong and the crime go on, and because we heed it not we vainly imagine that no responsibility lies at our door; and yet, there is no man or woman who is not, according to the measure of his or her influence, responsible for the human debasement and suffering I have portrayed."

"The task I set for myself has not been a pleasant one. It has hurt my sensibilities and sickened my heart many times, as I stood face to face with the sad and awful degradation that exists in certain regions of our larger cities; and now, that my work is done, I take a deep breath of relief. The result is in your hand, good citizen, Christian reader, earnest philanthropist! If it stirs your heart in the reading as it stirred mine in the writing, it will not die fruitless."

This book is sold only by agents; but a copy will be mailed to any one by the publishers of this magazine on the receipt of the price, $2.00.

Above Tempest and Tide. After the German of Sophie Verena. By Auber Forestier. Philadelphia: H. N. McKinney & Co. One takes up translations of foreign books with fear and trembling. There is so much in European literature—especially in French and German—out of harmony with American ideas, that it is the exception, rather than the rule, that a book can receive unqualified recommendation at our hands. In the book before us we find this desirable exception. It is a German story, possessing all the better characteristics of German literature—earnest thought, and careful finish in style—added to and embellishing a charming story, the tendency of which is to elevate the feelings and strengthen the soul against temptations. The story loses nothing at the hands of the translator, as is too frequently the case. The English style is as perfect as the German must have been.

Her Majesty the Queen. A Novel. By John Esten Cooke, author of "Dr. Vandyke," etc. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. To our mind, a well-written historical novel is among the pleasantest of all reading. It so blends instruction with pleasure, that any qualms of conscience over mispent time are lulled, and the mind left to perfect enjoyment of the story. "Her Majesty the Queen" is the wife of the unfortunate Charles I. of England, and many of the characters figuring in the pages of the book are historical ones. A charming love-story runs through the pages, and somewhat brightens the sombre tone of the story.

The Payson, Dutton & Scribner Manual of Penmanship. P., D. & S., authors. J. W. Payson, S. Dutton, W. M. Scribner, G. H. Shattuck, A. S. Manson. New York: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co. This is a valuable work. It reduces penmanship to a science, and simplifies and illustrates it in a most desirable manner. There are illustrations of different styles of penmanship, and full directions to both teacher and student.

Questions of the Day. By the Rev. John Hall, D.D., Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York. New York: Dodd & Mead. This clergyman discusses various religious topics in an able manner, and satisfactorily sustains his side of the argument. His first sermon is on the question, "Is the Human Race One?" the second, "How Far has Man Fallen?" Most of his points are aimed directly at the claims of modern scientists, which to many minds seem directly opposed to theological teachings. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The Glass Cable. By Margaret E. Wilmer. New York: National Temperance Society.

John Bentley's Mistake. By Mrs. M. A. Holt. New York: National Temperance Society.

Fred's Hard Fight. By Marion Howard. New York: National Temperance Society.

Nothing to Drink. A Temperance Sea Story. By Julia McNair Wright. New York: National Temperance Society.

We have received the four volumes, whose titles are given above, from the National Temperance Society and Publication House. They are all pleasantly-written stories, and calculated to awake and keep alive interest in the Temperance reform. For sale in Philadelphia by J. C. Garrigues & Co.

May. By Mrs. Oliphant. New York; Scribner, Armstrong & Co. Mrs. Oliphant's tales are always welcome. Though not as sensational a writer as some, she ranks among the best English novelists, while she takes precedence of many for the elevated tone and purity of her writings. "May," her latest production, sustains all her previously-acquired reputation, and we cheerfully recommend it to the attention of our readers. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Ferdinand De Soto. The Discoverer of the Mississippi. By John S. C. Abbott. Illustrated. New York: Dodd & Mead. Mr. Abbott has made a careful and conscientious study of his subject, and has presented his readers with a record of De Soto's life and adventures as nearly authentic as it has been in his power to make it. It is needless to say that the book is interesting, reading more like a romance than veritable history. The volume belongs to the library of "American Patriots and Pioneers," now being issued by Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Try and Trust. By Horatio Alger. Boston: Loring, Publisher. An excellent book for boys, teaching them, in a manner to gain their attention and interest, lessons of true manliness. It belongs, we believe, to a series of books more or less connected in their plots and characters. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The Mystery of Holly Tavern. A Story of Nine Travellers. By Lauriston Collis. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. An entertaining story of travel, and, as its name implies, mystery. It will serve to while away an idle hour.

Work. A Story of Trial and Experience. By Louisa M. Alcott, author of "Little Women," etc. Boston: Roberts Brothers. Miss Alcott has dared to touch that troublesome theme—What shall women do?—and has illumined it with the brightness of her own strong sense. The story is a pleasing one, and a suggestive one as well, and ought to be productive of many good results. It ought to encourage young girls to "be up and doing with a heart for any fate," instead of remaining idly at home, frittering away their time in frivolous, or at least, insignificant employments; or, perhaps, what is quite as bad, weakly lamenting that they are women, and consequently, are forbidden to do. It ought to teach those who have the charge of girls that they should not seek to fetter them down to a narrow field of endeavor if they show desires and capabilities for a wider sphere—that is, to punish them for their womanhood—for, energy suppressed and forbidden a right channel, will force its way into wrong ones. Miss Alcott has, in the writing of this book, done a good work for women. For sale in Philadelphia by Sower, Potts & Co.

The Year. By D. C. Colesworthy. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Mr. D. C. Colesworthy, a poet who is already known as the author of "Don't Kill the Birds," "A Little Word in Kindness Spoken," "Do not Falter," and many others equally popular and equally excellent in sentiment, has sent forth a little book containing seventeen poems, one in honor of each month and each season, and one upon Christmas. These poems, although not aspiring to anything original or remarkable in either sentiment or expression, are pleasing contributions to our poetic literature, and will add to their author's fame. We welcome the volume to our library.

NEW MUSIC.

We have received from W. W. Whitney, Publisher, Toledo, Ohio, the following new Music:

Village Bells. By W. A. Ogden. This four-part Glee is a very fine piece for a quartette of voices. It is bright and cheery, and the chorus, which may be sung by several voices, or as a quartette, has a tasteful piano accompaniment. Price fifty cents.

Glide, Gently Glide. By Charles H. Carroll. This will be found not only a pleasing composition, but one showing much study and skill. Each part carries a distinct beautiful melody woven together in a neat, artistic manner. The music is exuberant with life, but smooth and flowing as the streamlet o'er which they glide. There is a separate piano accompaniment, which is a great convenience to the player. Price seventy-five cents.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

HONOR AND SAFETY.

A RECENT writer, referring to the many exposures of fraud and corruption among men in charge of public trusts, forcibly remarks: "No money was ever won by treachery to trust that did not harm the winner. No power was ever achieved by bribery or retained by falsehood that did not scorch the palm of him who held it. The consciousness of ill-desert, the loss of self-respect, the fear of exposure and the self-commitment to a life of deception, which go always with possessions unworthily won, are poison in the blood, and the exposure, sooner or later, is as sure to come as death."

Truer words were never spoken. There is no safety, no peace, no real success, except in a life of honor and integrity. It cannot be too deeply impressed on the minds of young men, that in all gain coming through fraud or wrong, lies concealed a curse that will consume as surely as hidden fire; that money so obtained loses its power to give happiness—changes from a good to an evil—ceases to be a friend, and becomes an enemy. A thousand dollars, honestly gained by an honest man will give the possessor a thousand times more real pleasure than a million can possibly afford the dishonest man, who, in acquiring his million treads ruthlessly upon the rights of others.

We may depend upon it, that in all we acquire, there is a blessing or a curse, just in the degree that we regard or disregard our fellow-men. "A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." So saith Holy Writ, and every day man's experience proves it to be true.

Read the faces of men who have acquired wealth or position through hard, unplying selfishness, or through fraud and wrong—such men are known in all communities—and what sad and painful things do you find. Not peace nor moral beauty, nor the sweetness of content! No satisfaction in life is written there. All is hard, cold, cruel often, sinister, dissatisfied. For all that makes life worth living for, you see that life with them has been a failure. And it must be so in the very nature of things; for a life of utter selfishness and wrong takes a man out of the true order of his being, and whatever is out of order, is jarred with every movement, and works steadily to sure disaster.

GEORGE MACDONALD IN THE PULPIT.

REV. HENRY W. BELLOWES gives, from memory, a report of a sermon recently preached by George MacDonald, in the Church of All Souls, in New York city. We copy his description of the preacher's manner in the pulpit, which is very striking:

"The preacher was in a very exalted state, and poured himself out in a rhapsodical manner, which made us think of the accounts of Edward Irving. Not that anything but sound sense and solemn truth, in language admirably chosen, was uttered. But a sort of prophetic fury in the tones shook the nerves and made the ear shrink from the message. We should not like often to be called to listen to such a discourse, preached in that way. It was as if the man's hands were clutching our physical heart-strings or squeezing our brains. Never in the whole course of listening to public speakers have we heard anything of such mingled power and painfulness, such intensity, vehemence, demoniac and angelic fury mixed. How that delicate frame, inviolate and exhausted with labor, could for an hour pour out such a flood of passionate tones, at such a pitch of voice, and every word intensified with purpose, we cannot understand. We looked to see Macdonald faint at the close of his sermon; but he paused, and uttered a prayer so much like one of David Elginbrod's, that we felt that the power by which he spoke was not his own, and that he was drawing from an inexhaustible fountain.

"The poet, the novelist appear in Macdonald's preaching—not intentionally or artificially, but by the irrepressible genius of the man's personality. He shapes his discourse with a broad plan, excludes what is irrelevant, forgets nothing truly pertinent, and hurries toward his conclusion with inevitable power. His whole face and figure preach. His dainty fingers drip with feeling in every gesture. He writhes and tosses himself about as if struggling with thoughts too big for utterance. His voice is somewhat husky, his articulation Scotch, and his slides of tone a little extravagant in the swing he allows himself. But unmistakable wealth of thought and depth of feeling and power of passion and directness of spiritual vision betray themselves in his preaching, as in all his poems and writings; and it is a memorable thing to have heard him, roused as he was, on Sunday evening. Nobody will ever forget that occasion who shared in it. Many will not like his manner, and miss his meaning, and criticise his words; but we doubt not he reached some hearts that were never touched before, and gave all a sense of spiritual realities to which they will date back as to high-water mark in their spiritual experiences."

ATLANTIC CITY.

EVERY year this "City by the Sea" becomes more and more the favorite summer resort for Philadelphians. Every year new hotels go up, elegant cottages are built, new improvements are made, and increasing attractions offered to visitors. The bathing is unsurpassed, and the hotel accommodations excellent. For merchants and others who wish to get their families out of town during the hot months, but cannot themselves break entirely away from business, the ease and quickness of access by the Camden and Atlantic Railroad renders it especially desirable, and thousands avail themselves of this great facility, spending a portion of their time at the seashore with their families, and yet not losing a hold of their business. If to the admirable railroad facilities were added a little more enterprise and public spirit by the authorities of Atlantic City, the place could be made far more attractive and desirable than it is. The long spaces between the houses and the sea, instead of presenting only unsightly sand-heaps, as they now do, glaring in the sun, should be levelled and sown with grass-seed, so as to give a beautiful green sward. The streets should be watered, and made as clean and neat as possible. All this would cost comparatively little, but it would give an attractiveness to the place that would draw hundreds there who now go to Long Branch or other summer resorts.

KINDNESS TO ANIMALS.

A WRITER in Our Dumb Animals, a monthly paper issued in Boston, by the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," relates this little incident, which we pass along: "As I was looking out of my window the other day, I saw a nice red apple roll into the gutter. As I looked to see who would pick it up, a wagon came along, marked, 'United States and Canada Express Co.' I observed the horse had no check-rein, and seemed to be quite happy. The driver, a young man of seventeen or eighteen years, saw the apple, and, throwing the reins on the horse's back, jumped off and picked it up, as I supposed, for himself, for it was a beauty; but, no, the kind young man, after showing it to the horse, broke it in small pieces, and gave them all to him, waiting patiently for him to eat them; then smoothed his ears and nose, and drove slowly away. I do not know the name of the young man; but I am sure he has a kind heart, and is fit to be trusted with a horse out of his employer's sight; and if the horse could only have spoken, he would have thanked him for this little treat."

FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

AN old friend and correspondent writes: "The HOME MAGAZINE I think very much improved this year—ininitely better than any other periodical of its price that I know. I like Miss Townsend's articles beyond anything she has published." Speaking of "CAST ADRIAT," Mr. Arthur's last book, the same correspondent says: "I have just finished reading 'CAST ADRIAT,' and it inspires those who are able to do something with the desire and longing that it kindles in me, who can do nothing but desire and long to do, then I am sure the book will accomplish a work the precious result of which can never be measured in time, but must spread in ever-widening circles through all eternity. Ah, my soul is sick to think that on this beautiful earth there can be anything like what you describe: that Christian men and women can sit at ease in temples they have builded to the service of God, praying and preaching, while just outside souls are perishing for the lack of the help that they could give. It makes me feel as if I must hurl myself into the ranks with those who go down with the living spirit of the Gospel into these pits of hell."

An invalid, writing from a sick-room, where she has been long confined, says: "I am so grateful for your Magazine every month, and for the beautiful pictures, that I cannot be at ease until I thank you once more. And, yet, words of mine cannot tell you how much comfort they all give me. Everything about the Magazine is so pure and tasty, so truthful and good in every way, that I take it to my heart as a dear friend. I wish you were going to give us other chapters from 'CAST ADRIAT.' That one you gave in the Magazine touched my heart even to tears. Oh, I wish at times that I had the power to scatter with one stroke such wickedness from the world. It fills my heart with bitter sorrow that I am so powerless for work for the poor and tempted around me. Yet I believe I do trust God enough to say, 'His will be done.' I am sure those are blessed who only stand and wait; and in a hundred ways I can do something."

TWO GAMES FOR THE PRICE OF ONE.

MESSRS. D. B. BROOKS & CO., of Boston, Mass., offer the new game of Le Cercle to the public. Le Cercle is similar in character to Croquet, and is spoken of by all who have tried it as superior to the latter game. It is, in fact pronounced, on authority, as "the best game out." Those ordering the game can, if they desire, have Croquet implements included, so that either game can be played at pleasure, and thus they will obtain two desirable games in the place of one. See advertisement in another part of the Magazine.

MAKE THE BEST OF YOURSELVES.

READER, are you making the best of yourself? Are you using to the best advantage the natural powers of the body and mind given by your Creator?—or are you drowning through life in half efforts, and steadily drifting behind men of less ability than your own; men who, with even fewer talents than you possess, are making the best of themselves?

Think of this. Put the question to yourself as we put it to you—and do it honestly. Look the matter right in the face. Are you making the best of yourself? If not, begin a new life at once. Do your best in everything. In your thinking and in your doing. Be a man in self-compulsion. Rise out of indolence and self-indulgence. And not only will the world be better for your having lived in it, but you will be better for having lived in the world.

"Every process in nature is the going forth of the Everlasting on His messages of love; and any event in our experience is a message of love fulfilled."

PHANTOMS.

BACK, ye Phantoms of the Past,
In your dreary caves remain;
What have I to do with memories
Of a long-forgotten pain?

For my Present is all peaceful,
And my Future nobly planned—
Long ago Time's mighty billows
Swept your footstaps from the sand.

Back into your caves, nor haunt me
With your voices, full of woe;
I have buried grief and sorrow
In the depths of Long-ago.

See the glorious clouds of morning
Roll away, and clear and bright
Shine the rays of cloudless daylight—
Wherefore will ye moan of night?

Never shall my heart be burdened
With its ancient woe and fears;
I can drive them from my presence,
I can check these foolish tears.

Back, ye Phantoms! leave, oh, leave me
To a new and happy lot!
Speak no more of things departed;
Leave me, for I know you not.

Can it be that 'mid my gladness
I must ever hear you wail,
Of the grief that wrung my spirit,
And that made my cheek so pale.

Joy is mine—but your sad voices
Murmur ever in my ear;
Vain is all the Future's promise,
While the dreary Past is here.

Vain, oh, worse than vain! the Visions
That my heart, my life would fill!
If the Past's relentless phantoms
Call upon me still!

ADELAIDE A. PROCTOR.

THE COCHINEAL INSECT.

IN 1518, twenty-six years after the discovery of America, the Spanish settlers in Mexico began the exportation to Europe of a new dye of a brilliant scarlet, which proved a great acquisition in the manufacturing and artistic world, and eventually brought its exporters immense revenues. This dye was used in the coloring of fabrics, and from it was made carmine, a brilliant red, invaluable to painters. It presented the appearance of a shrivelled grain, or seed of some sort, of a dark, purplish hue, covered with a white bloom. What it actually was its exporters refused to tell, and those whose curiosity was excited about it, were fain to satisfy it by guess-work alone. However, after two centuries had passed, and the Spanish-Mexicans had during all this time preserved their secret, some one had the wit to subject these curious-looking seeds to the test of the microscope, when, behold, they were found to be no vegetable production at all, but a species of insect, killed and dried. The observation of travellers soon added further information, and cochineal was no longer a mystery.

The secret once discovered, efforts were made to introduce the industry into other countries. In 1700 a Frenchman carried several cases of living insects to St. Domingo. But a revolution having broken out in that island, the cochineals were neglected, and died. A century later a Frenchman succeeded in bringing some live specimens of the insect to France, and gave them to the Professor of Botany at Toulon. But the efforts at naturalisation were unsuccessful. The attempt also failed in Corsica. In 1827 they were carried to the Canary Islands, and after the inhabitants had been taught to recognize their value—they first having regarded them as noxious insects, and destroyed them accordingly—their propagation became an important branch of industry. In Algiers, also, the experiment of cultivating them has proved successful, and promises to become profitable. Still, the principal supply of cochineal yet comes from Mexico.

In that country they have regular cochineal plantations. A piece of land is chosen, an acre or two in extent, and protected from the west winds. Around this is planted a hedge of reeds, and within the inclosure, at distances of about two feet each way are set out the common cactus, or prickly-pear, as it is upon this plant that the cochineal insects prefer to feed. When the cactus-gardens, or nopaleries, as they are called, are ready, then nests made of cocoa-nut fibres, or little baskets of the braided leaves of the dwarf palm, are hung upon the prickles of the cactus. Female cochineals, of the Coccus cacti species, gathered from the woods or from plants specially preserved for their use, are placed in large numbers in these baskets. These female cochineals make their way out of the baskets, and fasten themselves upon the plants. Here they remain motionless, living upon the juices of the plants, and finally die. After death the body of the insect dries, the skin becomes horny, the sides curve upward, making a sort of cavity within. In this cavity, or cradle, the eggs, which have remained attached to the under part of the body of the mother, are hatched, and sheltered. The plants, with their valuable inhabitants, must now be protected from wind and rain until the insects reach their perfect state. The larvæ soon change to perfect insects, which attach themselves permanently to the branches of the cacti, and are thus easily gathered.

When the time for the cochineal harvest comes, the insects are carefully brushed off the cacti by the means of squirrels' or stags' tails, or scraped off with a blunt-bladed knife. Indian women are usually employed in this harvesting. The time the insects are gathered is when the females are about to lay, as that is the time their bodies contain the greatest amount of coloring matter. If the season is favorable, three harvests may be had from the same plantation in the course of a year. The insects are killed by dipping them in boiling water, or by being put into an oven, or upon a plate of hot iron. They are then dried in the sun, afterward in the shade, and finally exposed to the air. When they are scalded they lose the white powder which covers them, and are, in that condition, called ronagridas. When they have been subjected to the heat of an oven, they are ashy-gray in color, and are then called jaspadas. Those torrefied upon hot iron are black, and are known as negras. The cochineal produced in these cactus-gardens are more valuable than those gathered from wild cacti.

There is a remarkable difference in the appearance of the male and female cochineal. So great is this difference that one might easily mistake them as belonging to totally different families. The male is dark-red in color, with a long body, and with transparent wings, which cross each other on the back. The abdomen is terminated by two fine hairs nearly twice the length of the body. On its head are two long feathery antennæ, and it has only a rudimentary beak. Its legs are short, but owing to its wings, it is tolerably lively and active.

The female is larger than the male, oval in form, convex above and flat below. Its body is formed of twelve segments, and is covered with a glaucous dust. Its beak is more fully developed than that of the male; but its antennæ is shorter, and with fewer joints, and the two anal hairs are much shorter. It is very inactive. Its legs are very short, and are apparently made only to serve the purpose of clinging to the plant from which it derives its food.

Before the Mexican cochineal, or Coccus cacti, was discovered, inferior species were known in other parts of the world. One species is found in Poland and Russia—Coccus polonicus—and another in India, Coccus lacca. From the latter is obtained a coloring matter known as the lac dye. Resinous lac is found in commerce under four forms—the stick-lac, which bark; or, as some naturalists declare, it is a secretion of the insect itself, though this is probably a mistake, its red tint being probably acquired by the dead bodies which become imbedded in it.

Besides the species already mentioned, there is the Coccus ilicis, which lives by preference upon the ever-green oak; and the Coccus manipurus, which lives on the shrubs of Mount Sinai, and which causes a sort of manna to exude from the branches it has

is still unseparated from the twigs upon which it is found; the seed-lac, picked off the branches and pounded; the shell-lac, which is the same melted and run in scales; and the thread-lac, resembling reddish threads, prepared thus in India. This lac is originally found upon the trees and plants which have been the homes of the cochineal (Coccus lacca). These insects gather together in great numbers, and the bodies of the females are often united together by the gum which exudes where they have pierced the pierced. The Coccus sinensis is found in China, and produces a sort of wax, which is used in the manufacture of candles.

THE foundation of content must spring up in a man's own mind; and he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition, will waste his life in fruitless efforts, and multiply the griefs which he purposes to remove.

SNAKE-CHARMERS.

OUR readers have all heard of the snake-charmers of India. Scarcely a traveller in that country who has not met with them, and told us something about them. They seem to form a class of people by themselves, and to have made the charming of snakes a profession or trade. They are often hired by the people of India to rid their houses of snakes. This they do by playing on a kind of pipe or flageolet, the music of which charms the reptiles from their holes, when they are at once killed.

The snakes most commonly used by these "jugglers" are called hooded snakes, a kind of viper met with in Eastern countries. In these snakes the skin about the neck is loose, and can be raised at will by the serpent into something resembling a hood. There are several varieties of these snakes. That most common is the Cobra di Capello—that is, Adder of the Hood, a name given to it by the Portuguese. The French call it Serpent à lunettes, or Spectacle-snake, from its being marked on the back of the neck with a figure resembling a pair of spectacles. It is a lively, active snake, and its bite is very poisonous. The Hindoos have many superstitious notions about this serpent, and even believe that God sometimes takes on its form. In some of the temples they worship it, the priests feeding it carefully with milk and sugar.

A French traveller says: "Madras is famous throughout all India for its jugglers and serpent-charmers. I had been there but a few hours when several troops came to me to show off their skill. Those who did nothing but feats of strength I took no interest in. The sleight-of-hand performers were a little more attractive. These men, almost naked, with a plain strip of linen cloth about their bodies, were really very adroit. Some of their tricks were wonderful. In one of the most curious they took the seed of a plant and put it in a little pot of earth, right in plain view of the spectators. After a few moments the seed seemed to take life, shooting up stalks and putting on leaves in proper order. A few minutes later we had under our eyes a perfect plant more than a foot high.

"These people always have with them a few cobras, with which they amuse the curious. The bite of these serpents is fatal in nearly every instance. It has been said that the jugglers take out their poison-fangs, but this is not so. When well fed these reptiles are timid and sluggish, and rarely make use of their murderous weapons. The boldness with which the jugglers handle them I think to be based upon a knowledge of this fact. Any one who has handled living serpents knows that light passes made along the body easily subdue them. They seem as if magnetized, and no longer try to bite or to escape. The first passes only are dangerous.

"I have frequently played with cobras, and no accident has ever happened to me.

"There are some Hindoos who amuse themselves by domesticating these serpents, suffering them to range at will in their gardens, where they serve as scare-crows in keeping away the birds. I have never heard of their doing any harm to their owners.

"The serpent-charmers, to render themselves proof against the fangs of the cobras, make use of the roots of a species of plant, the common birthwort, with which they describe circles around the head of the reptile, in the belief that they thus take away from it the power of hurting. Of course, this is a mere superstitious notion. There are some who, to cure the bite itself, use a blackish stone of a very porous texture, which, on being laid upon the wound, adheres there strongly and absorbs the poisonous fluid."

If you would not be thought a fool in others' conceit, be not wise in your own; he that trusts to his own wisdom, proclaims his own folly; he is truly wise that shall appear so, that hath folly enough to be thought not worldly wise, or wisdom enough to see his own folly.

THE ASWAIL, OR SLOTH BEAR.

FROM REV. J. G. WOOD'S "ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY."

UNWIELDY in its movements, and grotesque in its form, the Aswail, or Sloth Bear is one of the most curious members of this group of animals. It is found in the mountainous parts of India, and is equally dreaded and admired by the natives of the same country.

Although a sufficiently harmless creature, if permitted to roam unmolested among the congenial scenery of mountain and precipice, it is at the same time an extremely dangerous foe if its slumbering passions are aroused by wounds or bodily pain of any kind. It needs, however, that the wound be tolerably severe to induce the animal to turn upon the person that inflicted the injury; for should it be only slightly wounded it runs forward in a straight line, as if it were actuated by the one idea of getting as far as possible away from the object which had caused it so much bodily suffering, and can seldom be finally captured.

As a general rule, the Aswail remains within its sheltered den during the hot hours of the day, as its feet seem to be extremely sensitive to heat and suffer greatly from the bare rocks and stones which have been subjected to the burning rays of that glowing India sun.

On one or two occasions, however, where the wounded bear had been successfully tracked and killed, the soles of the poor animal's feet were found to be horribly scorched and blistered, by the effects of the heated rocks, over which the creature had recklessly passed in its haste to escape from its enemies. On account of this extreme sensitiveness of the Aswail's foot it is very seldom seen by daylight, and is generally captured or killed by hunters who track it to its sleeping place, and then attack their drowsy prey.

The Aswail is said never to eat vertebrate animals except on very rare occasions when it is severely pressed by hunger. Its usual diet consists of various roots, bees' nests, together with their honey, and young bees, grubs, snails, slugs and ants, of which insects it is extremely fond and which it eats in very great numbers. Probably on account of its mode of feeding, its flesh is in much favor as an article of diet, and though rather coarse in texture, it is said by those who have practical experience of its qualities to be extremely good.

The fat of this bear is very highly valued among the natives and the European residents, being used chiefly for the lubrication of the delicate steelwork, that is employed in the interior of gunlocks. For this purpose the fat is prepared in a similar manner to that of the tiger, being cut into long strips, forced into closely-stoppered bottles, and placed during the entire day in the blazing ray of the sun. The powerful sunbeams soon melt the fat into a homogeneous mass, and when the evening begins to draw on, the contents of the bottle are found to settle into a firm and white substance, which has the property of remaining untainted even in that heated climate, where, if no such precaution were taken, it would become a mass of putrescent abomination.

The prepared fat is especially valuable for gunlocks, as it preserves the bright steel from rust, and does not clog by constant service, as is the case with most other animal oil.

Very little is known of the habits of this bear, while in its wild state, but it would appear from the conduct of two young animals that inhabited the same cage in the Zoological Garden, that it must be a gentle and affectionate creature. It is, at all events, known that the maternal Aswail is in the habit of carrying on her back those of her offspring that are not able to make use of their own means of progression. The two animals that were kept in the Zoological Gardens were accustomed to lie close to each other, and while in that position used to suck their paws after the usual ursine fashion, uttering at the same time a kind of bearish purr, as an expression of contentment. This sound, although it partakes of the nature of a whine mixed with a purr, is not without a musical intonation, and may be heard at some little distance. Indeed, it has not unfrequently happened that the bear has been betrayed to its pursuers by the continuous sound it utters while lying half asleep within its den.

The hair which covers the body and limbs is of singular length, especially upon the back of the neck and the head, imparting a strange and grotesque appearance to the animal. The color of the fur is a deep black, interspersed here and there with hair of a brownish hue. Upon the breast a forked patch of whitish hairs is distinctly visible. When it walks, its fore-feet cross over each other like those of an accomplished skater when accomplishing the cross-roll, but when it remains in a standing attitude its feet are planted at some distance from each other.

These bears seem to be very liable to the loss of their incisor teeth, and even in the skulls of very young animals the teeth have been so long missing that their sockets have been filled up by nature as if no teeth had ever grown there. On account of this curious deficiency, the first specimen which was brought to England was thought to be a gigantic sloth, and was classed among those animals under the name of Bradypus Ursinus, or Ursine Sloth. In one work it was candidly described as the Anonymous Animal. Other names by which it is known are the Jungle Bear and the Labiated or Lipped Bear.

This last-mentioned title has been given to the animal in consequence of the extreme mobility of its long and flexible lips, which it can protrude or retract in a very singular manner, and with which it contorts its countenance into the strangest imaginable grimaces, especially when excited by the exhibition of a piece of bun, an apple or other similar dainty. It is fond of sitting in a semi-erect position and twisting its nose and lips about in a peculiarly rapid manner, in order to attract the attention of the bystanders, and ever and anon, when it fails to attract the eyes of its visitors, it slaps the lips smartly together, in hope to strike their sense of hearing. When captured young, it is easily tamed, and can be taught to perform many curious antics at the bid of ciations with these wandering exhibitors, it has been called by the French naturalist "Ours Jongleur." Whether owing to the natural docility of the animal, or to the superior powers of its instructor, it per-its master. For this purpose it is often caught by the native mountebanks, who earn an easy subsistence by leading their shaggy pupil through the country, and demanding small sums of money for the exhibition of its qualities. On account of its asso-forms feats which are more curious and remarkable than the ordinary run of performance that are achieved by the learned bear of our streets.

In either case it is always a saddening sight, for however ingenious may be the instructor or however docile the pupil, the unnatural performances of the poor animal always seem to be out of place. We have no right to attempt to humanise a bear, or any other animal; for in so doing we are preventing it from working the task which it was placed in the world to fulfil. The bear—as may be said of every animal—is the result of a divine idea in the mind of the Creator, and it ought to be our business to aid the creature in developing that idea as far as possible, and not to check its development by substituting some other idea of our own, which, with all we can do, must necessarily be a false one. Even the imprisoned bears which mount a tall pole for the purpose of obtaining cakes and fruit from their visitors, are performing their mission much more truly than the most accomplished bear that ever traversed the country, and are in consequence much more agreeable to the eye of any one who values the animal creation on account of the moral qualities

CURIOS THINGS IN THE SEA.

AMONG the innumerable forms of animal life encountered in the waters of the sea, there are few more curious than those presented by the sea-snail and the sea-butterfly, a very correct idea of which is given in our engraving. There are several species of ocean shell-fish bearing the name of sea-snail—the one here represented belonging to the family of the Ianthinidae. It is a carnivorous animal, and lives only in the ocean. Its shell is almost exactly like those of the land-snail. It is met with in vast numbers in the Atlantic Ocean, and myriads of this species are sometimes driven by storms upon the British coasts. The same happens also on our own shores, vast numbers of them having been washed upon the beach of Nantucket during a severe tempest in 1839. A French traveller says of the sea-snail :

“The mollusk resembles, as its common name indicates, a floating snail. Two long tentacles, per-which are implanted in them from their birth, for us to develop to their highest extent, and in which we may read an ever-living word proceeding from the ever-creating hand of God.

Moreover, all those who in studying natural history, desire to look deeper than the surface, and direct their attention rather to the inward being of the various animals, than to their outward forms, will find that every creature in which is the breath of life, has a physical, moral, and sometimes a spiritual analogy, with the most expanded organisms of humanity, and owes its position among created things to that very analogy. In every human being are comprised all the mental characteristics that are outwardly embodied in the various members of the animal kingdom, and it is impossible to mark any attribute of the lower animals which does not find a further and a higher development in the human existence in one or other of its manifestations.

forming the office of horns, arm it in front. The body is a fleshy disk, covered with a spiral-shaped shell of a transparent, glassy substance, colored a most beautiful violet. But what renders this animal curious, is that it floats on the surface of the water by means of a vesicle filled with air, and appended to its body. This vesicle, or bladder, too bulky to admit of the animal's dragging it along, seems to reduce it to helplessness, and to condemn it to become, without any chance of escape, the prey of fish and of aquatic birds. But Providence, as admirable in the protection given to infinitely small things, as in the organization of man and the superior animals, has furnished this humble mollusk with an apparatus, by means of which it secretes in the water, on the approach of an enemy, a violet-colored liquid of a penetrating odor, which conceals it for some moments, while it cuts off with the horny plates of its mouth the threads attaching the vesicle to its body

It then sinks to the bottom, thus escaping the threatened destruction.

"Curious to see the manner in which the sea-snails secrete this fluid, I put a score of them in a cask, where I was keeping some fish alive. Touching them one after another with a rod, I remarked that at the expiration of some moments the entire twenty were lying in a heap on the bottom of the cask, separated from their bladders, which floated on the surface; but, most marvellous of all, on the next morning I found them every one floating again. During the night they had secreted new bladders, to replace those of which they had voluntarily deprived themselves."

The sea-butterfly belongs to a class of small animals, called Pteropoda, from the Greek pteron, wing, and pous, foot, in allusion to the pair of broad, flat, tened fins at the sides of the head, by means of which they are enabled to swim with tolerable rapidity through the open sea, which is their favorite abode. They seldom approach the shore, unless driven thither by the winds. They often crowd the sea in such inconceivable numbers as to color the surface for many miles.

There are two orders of pteropoda, characterized by the presence or absence of a shell. It is to the first of these orders that the sea butterfly belongs. Great flocks of them are met with among the floating sea-weeds, where they pursue the microscopic larvae feeding upon this vegetation.

They are very active, and extremely difficult to catch, at the slightest strange noises folding up their wings and dropping to the bottom. This curious little mollusk is divided into parts by a deep notch or furrow. The posterior part or abdomen is covered by a globular, transparent shell; the anterior part comprises the thorax, the head, and two tentacles. The wings and fins are placed tolerably near together on each side of the mouth. Along with the sea-snails, they are favorite bait for anglers, being greedily sought after by fish. The student of natural history in search of novelties and curiosities will find in Wallace's "Malay Archipelago" a volume that will richly repay examination.

ALMOST DESPAIR.

O H, God! Thou seest—Thou knowest the anguish that I feel;

Why then delay so long, so long to heal?

Why hidest Thou Thy face?

My load grows heavier day by day;

In vain (it seems) I stretch my hands and pray

For comfort from Thy grace.

Ah! sore and bitter is my need,

And wilt Thou break a bruised reed,

Trembling 'neath Thy rod?

I try in vain to lift my eyes

Up to the ever-frowning skies.

Have pity, oh, my God!

In mercy, grant a balm to heal

And ease my aching breast;

And make me see and know and feel,

That what Thou deest is best.

MARAH.

VIENNA.

THE present exhibition of art and industry, which will probably surpass all former ones in splendor, and in the number and character of its visitors, is now the great centre of attraction at this ancient capital. Vienna, on the banks of the Danube, is the resort of emperors and princes, of the rich, the learned and the industrious, of the lovers of pleasure, of improvement and of travel—all assemble there to participate in the splendid show. There the skill of the artisan and the mechanic will excite emulation, and the influence of the industrious classes will increase in the esteem of all the advocates of progress, and give to the nations lessons in the labors of peace. This meeting of people from all civilized countries has the sympathy and best wishes of all the friends of industry and advancement.

There are few places that stand connected with a train of more interesting associations than Vienna. It is situated about two miles from the main stream of the Danube, though a branch of that river extends to the city. It is the capital of the Austrian Empire, and is a celebrated city of Europe. With the exception of two suburbs, all the buildings are on the right bank of this branch of the Danube; they rise from it on terraces, so that many of the streets have a considerable declivity. Vienna stands near the centre of a basin, which is rich in fossil shells. It consists of the town proper and more than thirty suburbs. Its whole circuit is about sixteen miles, and it is almost surrounded by walls, which are twelve feet high, with twelve gates; it is also provided with a ditch. The Innere-Stadt, as it is called, which was the original town, forms a circle near its centre, and except on the side of the river, is surrounded by ramparts from thirty to fifty feet high, and has eleven regular bastions; it is separated from the suburbs by an esplanade about six hundred yards wide, which furnishes space for extensive walks. This inner town contains about one-tenth of the city lands, and one-seventh of the people. The population of Vienna is about 500,000. The social aspect is different from other large cities, where the nobility shun the confined, old-fashioned streets; for here the old town is the court-end and centre of gayety and fashion. Near the centre of the inner town is the Graben, a street five hundred and forty feet long, and one hundred and sixty wide, which contains some of the finest and best stores. The dwellings are usually four or five stories high, and very large, being occupied by a number of families. There are many palaces, churches and monuments, remarkable for their beauty and magnificence; also, museums, picture-galleries and libraries, that are all that could be desired for amusement and instruction. The things that are well worth seeing are numerous, and would require much time to describe.

Vienna is one of the most salubrious cities in Europe; the atmosphere is remarkably pure and healthy; the inhabitants enjoy robust health, and spend much time in the open air.

DUNELLEN, NEW JERSEY.

TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF.

TURNING OVER A NEW LEAF.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MOTHER AND SON."

"IT'S a shame!" said Mrs. Fogg, as she hurried away, after the funeral of Mrs. Grant, escaping from the poor, desolate room where two children, almost babes, were sleeping, unconscious that they were motherless. "It's a shame that nobody'll take them."

"Yes—a bitter shame!" replied a neighbor, who was also getting off as fast as she could, so as to shift responsibility on some other shoulders.

"There's Mrs. Grove; she might take them as well as not. But they'll go to the poor-house, for all she cares."

"Well, somebody'll have to answer for it," said Mrs. Fogg. "As for me, I've got young ones enough of my own."

"We left Mrs. Cole in the room. She has only one child, and her husband is well-to-do. I can't believe she'll have the heart to turn away from them."

"She's got the heart for anything. But we'll see."

Mrs. Cole did turn away from the sleeping babes, sighing aloud, with a forced sigh that others might hear, and give her credit for a sympathy and concern she did not feel.

At last all were gone—all but a man named Wheaton, and a poor woman, not able to take care of herself.

"What's to become of these children?" said Wheaton.

"Don't know. Poor-house, I s'pose," answered the woman.

"Poor-house!"

"Yes. Nobody wants 'em, and there's no place else for 'em."

"Mamma, mamma!" cried a plaintive voice, and a flaxen-haired child, not much over a year old, rose up in the bed, and looked piteously about the room. "I want mamma."

A great, choking sob came into the man's throat.

Then the other child awoke, and said, "Don't cry, sissy. Mamma's gone away."

At this the little one began crying bitterly.

"I can't stand this, nohow," said the man, speaking in a kind of desperate way; and, going to the bed, he gathered the two children in his arms, hushing and comforting them with soothing words.

"What on earth have you got there?" exclaimed Mrs. Wheaton, as her husband came striding into the room, where she sat mending one of his well-worn garments.

"Two babies!" he answered, in a voice so unusual that Mrs. Wheaton dropped her work on the floor, and rose up in amazement.

"What?"

"Mrs. Cole's two babies. I've been over to the funeral; and I tell you, Jane, it wasn't in me to see these little things carted off to the almshouse. There wasn't a woman to look after them—no, not one. Every soul sneaked off but Polly Jones, and she's of no account, you know. Just look at their dear little faces!" And he held them up in his arms, and let their tender, tearful, half-frightened, half-wondering eyes plead their cause with his wife, and they did not plead in vain.

Surprised as she was, and with an instant protest in her heart, Mrs. Wheaton could not, in the presence of these motherless little ones, utter a word of remonstrance. She took the youngest one from the arms of her husband, and spoke to it tenderly. The child sobbed two or three times, and then laid its head against her bosom. There was an influx of mother-love into the heart of this woman, who had never been a mother, the instant her breast felt the pressure of the baby's head, and the arm that drew it closer with an involuntary impulse was moved by this new love.

Not many words passed between the husband and wife—at least, not then, though thought was very busy with both of them. Mrs. Wheaton's manner toward the children was kind even to tenderness, and this manner won their confidence, and drew from them such looks and ways and little expressions of satisfaction as touched her heart, and filled it with a loving interest.

After nightfall, when supper was over, and the children asleep, Mr. and Mrs. Wheaton sat down together, each showing a little reserve and embarrassment. Mrs. Wheaton was the first to speak.

"What were you thinkin' about, John?" said she, almost sharply. "I can't have these children."

Wheaton did not lift his eyes, nor answer, but there was a certain dogged and resolute air about him that his wife noticed as unusual.

"Somebody else must take them," she said.

"The county will do it," Wheaton replied.

"The county!"

"Yes. There's room for them at the almshouse, and nowhere else, that I know of, unless they stay here."

"Unless they stay here!" Mrs. Wheaton's voice rose a little. "It's easy enough to say that—but who's to take the care of them?"

"It's a great undertaking, I know," answered the husband, meekly, yet with a new quality in his voice that did not escape the quick ear of his wife, "and the burden must fall on you."

"I wouldn't mind that so much, but—"

She kept back the sentence that was on her tongue.

"But what?" asked her husband.

"John," said Mrs. Wheaton, drawing herself up in a resolute manner, and looking steadily into her husband's face, "as things are going on—"

"Things shall go on differently," interrupted Wheaton. "I've thought that all over."

"How differently, John?"

"Oh! in every way. I'll turn over a new leaf."

Wheaton saw a light flash into his wife's face.

"First and foremost, I'm not going to lose any more days. Last month I had six days docked from my wages."

"Why, John?"

"It's true—more's the shame for me. That was eighteen dollars, you see, not counting the money I fooled away in idle company—enough to pay for all these babies would eat and wear twice over."

"Oh, John!" There was something eager and hopeful in his wife's face as she leaned toward him.

"I'm in downright earnest, Jane," he answered. "If you'll take the babies, I'll do my part. I'll turn over a new leaf. There shall be no more lost days; no more foolish wasting of money; no spending of evenings at McBride's."

"Oh, John!" In her surprise and delight, she could only repeat the exclamation. As she did so this time, she rose, and putting her hands on his shoulders, bent and kissed him on the forehead.

"You'll take the babies?" said he.

"Yes, and twenty more, if you keep to this and say so," answered Jane, laughing through tears.

"All right, then. It's a bargain." And Wheaton caught his wife's hand and shook it by way of confirmation.

From that time Wheaton turned over a new leaf. Neighbors expressed surprise when it was told that Jane Wheaton had adopted the two orphan children. Fellow-workmen taunted John, calling him soft-hearted, and a fool, for "taking other men's brats."

One said to him: "Are four mouths easier to fill than two?"

Another: "You'll be sick of all this before the year's out."

And another: "I'll see you sold out by the constable in less than six months."

But John had little to say in reply—only maintaining an air of quiet good humor, and exhibiting more interest in his work.

For three weeks John Wheaton had not lost a day—something very unusual; and not one evening during that time had he spent at McBride's drinking-saloon. His poor little home, which had come to have a neglected look, was putting on a new appearance. The gate that for months had hobbled on one hinge, now swung smoothly, and the mended latch held it shut. Rank weeds no longer filled the door-yard; the broken steps were mended, and clean panes of glass filled many a place in the sashes where had been unsightly rags and sheets of paper. A neglected running rose was trimmed, and trained to its proper place over the doorway, and was now pushing out young green leaves and buds.

Within, pleasant changes were also apparent. Various new but inexpensive articles of furniture were to be found. Old things were mended, polished up and wonderfully improved. With all this, marvellous to relate, Wheaton's earnings had not only been equal to the increased expenditure, but there was an actual surplus of ten dollars in hand.

"I never would have believed it," said John, as he and his wife sat one evening talking over their improved condition after the babies—loved now almost as if their own—were asleep. "It's just as old Brown used to say—'Waste takes more than want.' I declare I've got heart in me again. I thought we should have to let the place go; that I'd never be able to pay off the mortgage. But here we are, ten dollars ahead in less than a month; and going on at this rate, we'll have all clear in eighteen months."

Next day a fellow-workman said to Wheaton, half in banter: "Didn't I see the constable down your way yesterday?"

"I shouldn't wonder," replied Wheaton, with more gravity of manner than his questioner had expected.

"I thought I saw him looking around after things, and counting his fees on his fingers."

"Likely as not," said Wheaton. "I know of a good many rents not paid up last quarter. Money gone to McBride's, instead of to the landlord—eh?"

The man winced a little.

"How are the babies?" he asked.

"First-rate," Wheaton answered, and with a smile so real that his fellow-workman could not pursue his banter.

Time went on, and, to the surprise of all, Wheaton's circumstances kept improving. The babies had brought a blessing to his house. In less than eighteen months he had paid off the light mortgage that for years rested on his little home; and not only this, had improved it in various ways, even to the putting up of a small addition, so as to give them a neat breakfast-room.

The children grew finely—there were three of them now, for their hearts and home had opened to another orphan baby—and, being carefully trained by Mrs. Wheaton, were a light and joy to the house.

At the end of five years we will introduce them briefly to the reader. Wheaton is a master workman, and employs ten men. He has enlarged his house, and made it one of the neatest in the village. Among his men is the very one who bantered him most about the children, and prophesied that he would soon be sold out by the constable. Poor man! it was not long before the constable had him in charge. He had wasted his money at McBride's, instead of paying it to the landlord.

Walking homeward, one evening after work was over, Wheaton and his journeyman took the same way. They were silent until they came near the former's pretty dwelling, when the journeyman said, half in jest, yet with undignified bitterness: "I guess we'll have to take a baby or two."

"Why?" asked Wheaton, not perceiving what was in the man's thought.

"For good luck," said the journeyman.

"Oh!"

"You've had nothing but good luck since you took poor Mrs. Grant's orphan children."

"Only such good luck as every one may have if he will," answered Wheaton.

"I can't see it," returned the man. "Your wages were no better than mine. I had one child, and you saddled yourself with two, and not long after added a third. And how is it to day? You have a nice house, and your wife and children are well dressed, while I have never been able to make both ends meet, and my boy looks like a ragamuffin half the time."

"Do you see that house over there—the largest and the handsomest in the place?" said Wheaton.

"Yes."

"Who owns it?"

"Jimmy McBride."

"How much did you pay toward building it?"

"Me?"—in surprise.

"Yes, you! How much did you pay toward building it?"

"Why, nothing. Why should I help pay for his house?"

"Sure enough! Why should your hard earnings go to build and furnish an elegant house for a man who would rather sell liquor, and so ruin his neighbors, body and soul, than support himself in a useful calling, as you and I are trying to do?"

"I can't see what you're driving at," said the journeyman.

"How much a week do you spend at McBride's saloon?"

The man stood still, with a blank look on his face.

"A dollar a week?" asked Wheaton.

"Yes."

"Say a dollar and a half."

"Well, say as much."

"Do you know what that amounts to in a year?"

"Never counted it up."

"Seventy-eight dollars."

"No!"

"Yes, to a dollar. So, in five years, at this rate, you have contributed nearly four hundred dollars toward McBride's handsome house, without getting anything but harm in return, and haven't a shingle over your head that you can call your own. Now, it's my advice, in a friendly way, that you stop helping McBride, and begin to help yourself. He's comfortable enough, and can do without your dollar and a half a week. Take a baby, if you will, for good luck. You'll find one over at the poor-house; it won't cost you half as much as helping McBride, and I don't think he needs your aid any longer. But here we are at home, and I see wife and children waiting for me. Come in, won't you?"

"No, thank you. I'll go home and talk to Ellen about taking a baby for good luck." And he tried to smile, but it was in anything but a cheerful way. He passed onward, but called back after going a few steps, "If you see anything of my Jack about your place, just send him home, will you?"

Jack was there, meanly dressed and dirty, and in striking contrast with Wheaton's three adopted children, who, with the only mother they knew, gave the happy man a joyful welcome home.

"I've turned over a new leaf," said the journeyman, when he came to work on the next morning.

"Indeed! I'm glad to hear it," returned Wheaton.

"Ellen and I talked it over last night. I'm done helping saloon-keepers build fine houses. Glad you put it to me just in that way. Never looked at it so before. But it's just the hard truth. What fools we are!"

"Going to take a baby?" said Wheaton, smiling.

"Well, we haven't just settled that. But Ellen heard, yesterday, of a poor little thing that'll have to go on the county if some one don't take it; and I shouldn't wonder, now, if she opened her heart, for she's a motherly body."

"Where is it?" asked Mr. Wheaton.

"Down at the Woodbury Mills."

Wheaton reflected a few moments, and then said: "Look here, Frank; take my advice, and put this baby between you and McBride's—between you and lost days—between you and idle thriftlessness, and, my word for it, in less than two years you'll have your own roof over your head."

Only for a little while did the man hesitate, then, with an emphatic manner, he exclaimed—"I'll do it."

"Do it at once, then," said Wheaton. "Put on your coat, and go over to the Mills and get the baby. It will be an angel in your house, that will help and bless you in every hour of temptation. Go at once. God has opened for you this way of safety, and if you walk therein all will be well."

He did walk therein, and all was well. Wheaton's prophecy was fulfilled. In less than two years the journeyman had his own roof over his head, and it covered a happy home.

WHAT DO YOUR CHILDREN READ?

A BAD book, magazine or newspaper, is as dangerous to your child as a vicious companion, and will as surely corrupt his morals and lead him away from the paths of safety. Every parent should set this thought clearly before his mind, and ponder it well. Look to what your children read, and especially to the kind of papers that get into their hands, for there are now published scores of weekly papers, with attractive and sensuous illustrations, that are as hurtful to young and innocent souls as poison to a healthful body.

Many of these papers have attained large circulations, and are sowing broadcast the seeds of vice and crime. Trenching on the very borders of indecency, they corrupt the morals, taint the imagination and allure the weak and unguarded from the paths of innocence. The danger to young persons from this cause was never so great as at this time; and every father and mother should be on guard against an enemy that is sure to meet their child.

Our mental companions—the thoughts and feelings that dwell with us when alone, and influence our actions—these are what lift us up or drag us down. If your child has pure and good mental companions, he is safe; but if, through corrupt books and papers, evil thoughts and impure imaginings get into his mind, his danger is imminent.

Look to it, then, that your children are kept as free as possible from this taint. Never bring into your house a paper or periodical that is not strictly pure, and watch carefully lest any such get into the hands of your growing-up boys.

OH, flowers, but ye are wonderful!
 I speak not of your dyes;
 Not for your beauty now I cull
 Your bright varieties.
 'Tis at your scents I marvel more,
 So manifold and true;
 More separate their fragrant store
 Than hue distinct from hue.

Though in each kind the color change,
 One odor still is there;
 The tints through all the scale may range,
 Each tint than each more fair;
 But violet blue and violet white,
 And lilac dark or pale,
 The same sweet breath for our delight
 With constant truth exhale.

The stock and wall-flower side by side
 On garden-bed shall grow;
 From the same soil their sap supplied,
 In the same air they blow;
 But whence, that perfume all its own
 Does each loved flower obtain?
 Scents, to my earliest childhood known,
 Ye bring those hours again!

Sweet pea, sweet-briar, and mignonette,
 Words cannot tell your power
 My thoughts in some dim scene to set,
 In some far-distant hour,
 Beyond the baffled memory's reach,
 In life's just dawning day,
 When not as yet I lisped in speech,
 And Heaven about me lay!

Yet not your hue nor form, methinks,
 Thus in my heart remain;
 Your matchless odors are the links
 Which weave the pleasing chain.

These take me back I know not where,
 Revive the infant dream,
 And wake the thought of climes more fair,
 And light of purer beam.

And then I marvel not that He
 Who made us, flowers and men,
 Proclaimed that who His Heaven would see,
 Must be as babes again;
 Must from the heights of pride return,
 From self's and passion's sway,
 And at his feet in meekness learn
 To love Him and obey!

Awake, oh, North Wind! come, thou South!
 And on my garden blow;
 Come, rain and dew! and break the drouth,
 And bid the spices flow;
 And bring, oh, Sharon's Rose Divine!
 Thy peerless fragrance pure;
 Though sweets of all the earth were mine, Thy royal right is sure!

"Relics of Eden!" types ye are
 Of better things to come;
 Pledges of joys His hands prepare
 For our eternal home;
 Alas! the reek of flame and death
 Our earthly breezes fills;
 Oh, for the air the blessed breathe
 On yon celestial hills!

But we shall breathe it soon; and while
 We wait that crowning day,
 Your fragrance shall our toil beguile,
 Your beauty cheer our way;
 'Twas sweetly sung—"We might have had
 For every want of ours
 Enough, enough"—to make us glad,
 Our Father gave us flowers!

HENRY DOWNTON.

A DAY OF DAYS.

BY MRS. E. E. DUFFY.

He was here but a moment ago;
 I yet, in the tree-shaded path, hear the tread of his feet;
 He left me a rose in whose heart is a deep crimson glow;
 Ah, the rose is so sweet!
 His words they were few,
 But he said to me wonderful, wonderful things with his eyes—
 His eyes, that are like the skies over us, cloudless and blue;
 Ah, how I love the skies!
 Must I tell what they said—
 Those soft, azure eyes of his? No! 'tis a secret I'll keep,

Keep close in the heart of my heart, be I living or dead,
 Awake or asleep.

Oh, how bright is the day!
 There never dawned one so bright since the long ago have run—
 Never one half so bright since the earth took her dreary way

Round her lover, the sun.
 I could worship the sun
 As he beams on his mistress, the earth, in the fulness of love;
 For love is so worshipful! Tell me, sweet rose, am I one
 All its blessings to prove?

OUR CLUB.

PECULIARITIES AND PROPENSITIES.

JEANNETTE had just been reading in the Atlantic for March, James's mournful but exquisitely-told story of "The Madonna of the Future," and a silence had fallen upon our little group—a silence in which the soul of each, withdrawn into the vast solitude of the Divine presence, looked in upon itself with regrets and longings that could not be uttered.

It was the Professor who spoke first.

"Well, well. It is no fanciful creation," he said, with a sigh. "Could we look into the heart of this great surging sea of humanity, moaning and toiling, and toiling about us, we should find many a poor Theobald wearing out his days in fruitless worship of a fair, gracious ideal which he is always meaning to catch and fix in visible and enduring form, planning enthusiastically, and always getting ready to do some grand, glorious, marvellous thing that shall astonish and bless the unbelieving world; but while he works, and dreams, and waits, and waits, and dreams, and works in his slow, careful, cautious, conscientious way, the years go over him, one by one, in noiseless, unnoticed flight, and, shocked and startled by the rude friendliness that would strip away his delusions, death strikes him at last, cowering in the awful desolation of despair before the blank, cracked, discolored and decaying canvas of his life, which he had thought to make glow and radiate with a wonderful, divine, immortal beauty and significance, but which his palsied hand may never more touch with the power that, dumb and unexpressed, racks his lone, lost, feverish, suffering, sinking soul."

"And it is enough to make one curse the world," burst forth Jeannette, with that stormy vehemence of hers, born of her keen sense of wrong and injustice; "the world so fitly represented in Mrs. Coventry at the cemetery gate with her knowing smirk and cunning leer, asking maliciously: 'And the great Madonna—have you seen her after all?' No tender thought of the struggles, the aspirations, the impassioned yearnings and reachings after the beautiful ideal—no soft veil of pity dropping over the blighted powers, the lost opportunities, the sad failures, which, if spoken of at all, should be treated at least with sympathy and compassion. More sweet, human and wholesome is the charity of the Signora Serafina for her blind adorer, and one forgets her coarseness, her age, her total unlikeness to the divine creature that he worshipped and devoutly studied in the kindly appreciation with which she regards him. Even the faith that exhales in her full, rich sigh, 'He was a magnificent genius!' is better and closer to the truth of things than the cold, carping skepticism that vents itself in sneers and ridicule over a fate so mournfully sad and tragic."

"But, Jean, my dear friend, we don't really want to encourage this sort of genius, if you will suffer us to confess it," said Templeton, soothingly. "The world calls for genius, power, talent—whatever you name it—that is bold, active, forceful, aggressive, persevering, if it is not so fine, and with the dreams, fancies, visions, yearnings and fruitless strivings of the cloudy-brained idealist it has very little sympathy and less patience. It demands something real and tangible, something it can see, and touch, and utilize, to sustain its faith, and without such material support its favor will most certainly be withdrawn."

"That is just enough, I suppose," Jeannette returned. "Undeserved favor is not what I would urge or ask in behalf of these unfortunate souls who never arrive at the results at which they aim. But it is the unfair, unreasonable, unwise and utterly childish way in which professedly sensible people regard the failures and mistakes of this irregular and ill-balanced order of minds that excites my indignation, as if the condition from which spring these errors so ridiculed were any more under their control than would be the abnormal action of a diseased organ of the body for which no one would think of holding them responsible. Here is the injustice of which I complain. If anybody happens to come into the world—if anybody ever does 'happen' to come, which I question—with any physical infirmity or deficiency whatsoever, there is a wide-spread sympathy for the unhappy victim, a universal outcry and clamor of condolence for the victim's friends, and no human means are left untried that promise a removal, or even a mitigation, of the lamented evil. To ridicule one so afflicted is accounted rightly the mark of a vulgar mind, and an ostentatious pity is considerably avoided, lest it should wound the sensitive and possibly morbid nature of the sufferer. But for the dwarfed, misformed and unequally-developed spirits tempted in bodies symmetrical and beautiful, who has any charity or compassion? A character thrown out of balance by an exaggerated or a missing faculty, excites less interest and less sympathy than the lucky possessor of a hand with an excess or deficiency of fingers. An inherited mental or moral defect, for which one is no more responsible than for a deformed foot, a distorted shape, a disfiguring feature, is treated as though it were a punishable offence. Even those who, if not in the same, are in other virtues equally lacking, adding their disdainful breath to the storm of censure and condemnation, beating on the luckless individual doomed to suffer for faults—sins, if you please—not strictly his own; a born criminal, if there can be such. There seems no pity, no charity, no fellowship, no generous, kindly oversight of unloveliness, no tender, fraternal hand outstretched to help, but, like the lower orders of creation, we turn savagely upon the weak and unfortunate, and worry and persecute and hound them to the death."

"I'm afraid there is too much truth in your observations, Miss Mariott," said Dr. Osgood, gravely. "I have remarked the same irrational propensity of human nature very often, and not always with the entire equanimity and composure becoming a philosopher. My profession ostensibly deals with these outward and physical forms of disease, but my practice must go back to anterior causes, finding them frequently hidden in the mental peculiarities for which the world has so little charity, while it overflows with pity and tenderness for the effects, casting about in its blind, foolish fashion for means to mitigate the evil of these, with that curious wisdom which pegs away at the outmost branches of a poisonous tree and leaves the root undisturbed. When our pathology goes deeper, and can more properly be called a science, it will teach us that all diseases are spiritual in their origin, and that our remedial measures instead of being directed to the mere outward phases of a morbid and disordered condition, should apply at the outset to the hidden, interior sources of the ills we aim to remove."

"In that day, Doctor, we shall not find you with a case of potent and magical vials in your pocket," said Templeton, dubiously. "Gone will be the business of the pharmacy, vain all its laboriously-acquired wisdom, for what will avail its purgatives, and resolvents, and soporifics, and pain-killers, and counter-irritants in ministering 'to a mind diseased'?"

"What, indeed?" echoed the Doctor. "Their inefficacy in the case of bodies diseased might well suggest a doubt as to their power in reaching down to the heart of the difficulty at which we tinker superficially."

Dell Falconer, who had apparently dropped into a profound study over the Doctor's philosophy, here glanced up at him with a serio-comic expression. "Dr. Osgood," she said, in a spirit of railleury, "I have been trying to make out to what spiritual source I may attribute the incipient bunion on my right foot."

"Why, to laziness and vanity, beyond question, Miss Dell," retorted the Doctor, quick to repel this needle thrust at his theory. "Mortify the one by proper attention to the bath, and crucify the other by putting your foot into a covering adjusted to its form and proportioned to its size, and you will be in a fair way to annihilate cause and effect together."

Dell lifted her hands and opened her eyes and mouth in affectation of wonder. "I am astonished—dumbfounded at such profundity of knowledge," said she, after a moment's breathless silence.

"But, Doc," struck in Roy Sherwood, unwarned by the discomfiture of his bright and not easily daunted coadjutrix, "how will you account for the excruciating and distracting pain I am suffering from the irritated and inflamed nerve of a decaying tooth?"

"Easiest thing in the world, you cynical dog," returned the un baffled Doctor. "You are always snarling and snapping and striking your spiteful fangs into the weak, tender places of other people, and it is simple justice that the penalty should work out in the corresponding externals of your natural man."

"But," reminded Jeannette, who was too deeply in earnest to relish these side sallies, "we were speaking of those involuntary sufferers, those misjudged and unhappy souls who walk the whole dreary length of their mortal days—God knows how far beyond—under the burden and shadow of spiritual infirmities which they had no share in incurring, which were thrust upon them with the life that they had no choice to accept or refuse—a weary, wretched heritage that they have no more power to throw off than the leopard to change his spots, the Ethiopian his skin."

There was one who had come into our midst—a still, gentle-mannered, thoughtful-browed woman, of whom we knew nothing beyond her name and calling—Mara Dunbar, a teacher of drawing in the young ladies' seminary, which had sprung up airily under the frowning shadow, and dauntlessly facing the haughty front of the college buildings.

She drew a quick breath and turned about at the touch of Jeannette's words with a look in her face which bore eloquent witness of sympathy, possibly kinship with the class to whose woes the speaker's pathetic voice gave a new and thrilling interest; but, as if fearful of attracting attention, or of betraying, perhaps, a hidden pain, she settled back in her seat again, drooped her expressive eyes, and went on in her quiet, repressed way with the sketch which somebody had laughingly asked her to make of the Professor and Jeannette, in the felicitous character of Darby and Joan.

Dr. Osgood studied her intently—in fact, the Doctor was always studying Miss Dunbar, explaining, when some of us playfully rallied him upon the habit, that she was the first woman he had ever seen who talked, and talked eloquently, with her face instead of her tongue, and defending himself on the ground of scientific interest in all natural phenomena.

"Yes, ah, yes?" he said, slowly, with a deep-drawn sigh, breaking at last the silence that had followed Jean's pitying observation. "There are many fine spirits that struggle in perpetual eclipse with the nature to which they were linked in mortal birth—fine, high, generous, heroic, sensitive souls, goaded and tortured to the last point of endurance, and crippled in every movement by the galling fetter of an inherited vice or failing; and not the least of their sufferings is the consciousness that they are judged by the alien quality, that all their aspirations, their strivings, their sacrifices and martyrdoms count for nothing with their careless on-looking fellows, who measure but the surface, and leave the deeper treasures of life unexplored. I know a man of splendid mental gifts, of grand moral virtues, of high social endowments, who, if free to live out his beautiful conceptions, and develop the rich, native resources of his character, would command the reverent attention and loving admiration of the world. But the rust and canker of self-distrust palsies all his powers, holding him in hopeless bondage; while his soul burns within him for action—action; and all his being cries and faints for possession of the faculties, which are like a fair heritage, into the use and enjoyment of which he may not enter. What, think you, were the sufferings and torments of Tantalus compared to his? Moved by warm, generous impulses; by sweet, human charities; by great aspirations and noble resolves, he reaches forth his hand instinctively to appropriate and diffuse his own, but the sharp, responding goad of the forgotten shackle brings him shuddering and sickening to the dust again, and the graces and triumphs of a life that is his, and yet not his, lie ever beyond his grasp. He cannot tell how it is. His kindred are a free people; they run their chosen ways unfettered, and have no sympathy with or understanding of his bonds. To them he is simply 'peculiar'—and he smiles bitterly at the sad significance of the word when he hears it, knowing the crucifixion it is to bear it. What so distinguished him from his fellows whether some ante-natal influence, or some fatal bent in the impressionable days of childhood—it does not matter; his life, so far as he can see, so far, perhaps, as any of us can see, is an utter failure, and his only comfort is in the hope, the faith that, somehow, in the wide sweep of the eternities the wise God, the good Father will make all right at last.

"I know a woman, with heart alive and thrilling with love for all human kind, with brain ever busy in devising schemes for conferring pleasure and happiness on others, and hands always occupied in carrying out benevolent designs; yet she is subject, at times, to furious outbursts of temper, that, like the eruptions of a volcano, lay in waste all the beautiful life that had budded and blossomed as the rose in her palmy days of peace. No words can describe her anguish, when the storm is spent and she sees, realizes the evil she has wrought, the good she has undone, knowing, from bitter experience, that all her passionate resolves will not save her from the shock of the recurring tempest, for she is powerless as a babe in the relentless grasp of this alien force of her nature, which, like those sins that are visited unto the third and fourth generations, is her wretched birth-right, or, more properly, her birth-wrong. I can think of nothing when I see her but a soft, white dove struggling hopelessly with a ruthless kite, which does but loose its clutch only to bury its cruel talons more torturously in the quivering flesh again.

"I recall another, who is a ceaseless prey to the green-eyed monster jealousy—(one may not speak of jealousy, you know, without reference to the 'green-eyed monster'). And yet another, who carries about with her the grievous thorn of a peevish, rasping, impatient disposition, keenly sensitive to little irritations, which a more equable temper would never perceive. And still another, who, from earliest recollection, has been overshadowed by passing clouds of inexplicable sadness, gloom and melancholy that chill and darken all the atmosphere about the unhappy victim of inherited and uncomprehended sorrows.

"And so we might go on, each of us, enumerating and multiplying instances more marked and more lamentable than these, of people who, through no fault of their own, are miserable and sinful and offensive—wretched heirs of vices, that fill the earth with moral pestilence—poor, shackled slaves of moods, of tempers, of frensies, of greeds and weaknesses and sensual appetites, that sweep them onward and downward like a swollen, mad-rushing current, which we make no effort to help them stem; on the contrary, standing coldly aside to watch them whirling, sinking, to criticise them, to condemn them, to point the finger of scorn at them, to hold them up to derision and abhorrence, to hurl obloquy and reproach at them, forgetful of our own soul-sicknesses, our own moral deformities, which, at least, should make us humble, if not helpful."

"But, my dear Doctor," said Templeton, after a thoughtful pause, wherein each, it is probable, had been meditating on his or her guiltiness of the matter charged, "are evils any less evils because they are transmitted and not acquired? Are we to wink at a man's sins because they were his father's or his father's father's, or because he was the passive subject of unhappy pre-natal impressions? Is he any the less to be judged by the law because he was born with a propensity to break it?"

The Doctor had risen from his seat and gone over to Miss Dunbar, standing behind her chair with the pretence, or, perhaps, with the real desire—one could never riddle the Doctor—of inspecting the sketch that lay before her, but which her trembling fingers for some minutes had not essayed to touch. Seeming not to note her agitation, and again, perhaps, not actually perceiving it—who could tell?—he made a laughing suggestion regarding the turn of the Professor's eyes, complimented the sidewise droop of Jeannette's head, recommended a wilder rumpling of the Professor's stormy hair, and having set the faltering pencil again at work, turned and walked two or three times in silence up and down the floor.

"First of all," he said, in acknowledgment of Templeton's remarks, "we should consider that we deal with a man spiritually diseased and deformed, and try to do for him what we try to do for the physically sick and infirm—restore him to right conditions. But, of remedies for the evils discussed, my duties will not give me space to talk to-night. Another time—to-morrow, if I chance to come in—we will bring what light we have to bear on this dark subject."

And, with a parting look at Mara Dunbar, he passed out in his abrupt, unceremonious fashion.

"IN THE BEGINNING."

BY MRS. E. E. DUFFY.

(See Engraving.)

GEOLOGISTS divide the ages of the world before the creation of man into four periods or epochs, which, for convenience, they denominate Primary, Secondary, Tertiary and Quaternary Epochs.

Proceeding the Primary period was a time of chaos, so to speak, "when the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep." During this time there were sublime and mysterious convulsions of nature. The earth may even, at the beginning, according to some philosophers, have been an immense gaseous mass existing at an excessively high temperature. As it slowly cooled, it assumed its flattened spheroidal shape, and beds of concrete substances were formed, the heaviest necessarily sinking lowest, only, perhaps, to be forced to the surface again by the boiling and bubbling up of the burning mass within. We see even yet slight exhibitions of this phenomena in the earthquakes and volcanoes which shake the solid ground, and send up fire and sulphurous vapor from the depths of the earth.

Says a writer, describing this early period in the world's existence: "The first terrestrial crust formed would be incapable of resisting the waves of the ocean of internal fire, which would be depressed and raised up at its daily flux and reflux in obedience to the attraction of the sun and moon. Who can trace, even in imagination, the fearful rendings, the gigantic inundations, which would result from these movements? Who would dare to paint the sublime horrors of these first mysterious convulsions of the globe? Amid torrents of molten matter, mixed with gases, upheaving and piercing the scarcely consolidated crust, large crevices would be opened, and through these gaping cracks waves of liquid granite would be ejected, and there left to cool and consolidate on the surface. In this manner would the first mountains be formed. In this way, also, might some metallic veins be ejected through the smaller openings, true injections of the irruptive matter produced from the interior of the globe, traversing the primitive rocks and constituting the precious depository of metals, such as copper, zinc, antimony and lead."

When the active warring of the elements had ceased; when land and water had each been assigned their especial localities; when the atmosphere which enveloped the globe had become sufficiently solidified to transmit the rays of the sun, and thus God's mandate, "Let there be light!" obeyed; then for the first time was organic life possible. Now began the primary period of which geologists speak. It must ever remain a mystery how that first life originated, and theologians and scientists will probably find it a fruitful theme for dispute to the end of time. Again, at this day it seems impossible to decide whether animal or vegetable life had the precedence in the order of creation. Darwinians will maintain that vegetation, as representing the lowest order of life, came first, in accordance with their theory of development, which demands a beginning at the very lowest and crudest forms, but a single remove from inanimate objects. We can only judge from the evidences of geology that the two orders of existence—the vegetable and the animal—were nearly or quite coeval, with perhaps a slight balance of testimony in favor of the Darwinians.

The Primary epoch is divided by geologists into a number of periods. The first of these, the Cambrian period, is so named from the rocks in which occur the traces of the earliest life. These rocks are found specially in England, Wales and Ireland. They have markings of a peculiar character, and abound in fossils. They are filled with worm-tracks or burrows, and the fossils represent the earliest inhabitants of the ocean.

Next in order comes the Silurian period, indicated by a system of rocks overspreading the whole earth. The name Silurian is given from a large tract of country in England and Wales formed of this system of rocks, and formerly peopled by the Silures, a Celtic race.

The characteristics of the Silurian period are supposed to have been shallow seas, with barren reefs and rocks rising out of the water. The fossil remains of this period indicate various mollusca and articulated animals, and a class of flowerless plants, called Alga, which bore a strong resemblance in their form to sea-weed of the present time. The Algae were succeeded by the Lycopodeaceae, displaying a little higher order of development. The seeds of these plants are found sparingly in the Silurian rocks.

The animal life of the Silurian seas was predacious in its habits. Their organisms were in some respects, rudimentary. The Trilobites, a remarkable group of Crustacea, possessed simple and reticulated compound eyes. Of these Crustacea there were nearly two thousand species. Nearly ten thousand species of fossil remains of the Silurian period have been discovered and noted, while probably ten times as much still lies buried in the rocks. The Crustaceans predominated at that day; but they differed much in appearance from the lobsters and crabs which represent that order in our day. The Trilobites became extinct at the end of the Carboniferous epoch. The head was protected by an oval buckler, and the covering of the body was jointed or articulated, sometimes in rings and sometimes in plates.

The Silurian system of rocks is the one the most disturbed, showing that immediately following this age the crust of the globe was subject to numerous violent changes and upheavals. Beds of rock originally horizontal were turned up, contorted, folded over and sometimes even set vertical. The bottom of the sea was frequently upheaved and left a mountain side or top.

The Old Red Sandstone or Devonian period is the name given to the third division of the Primary epoch. The rocks of the Devonian period exhibit fossils and plants of a more complex order than those of the subsequent period. Vertebrated animals, represented by numerous fishes, succeeded the Zoophytes, Trilobites and Mollusks. The ocean still vastly predominated over the land, though here and there were islands covered with plants which resembled mosses. There were yet no trees, though certain plants rose to a considerable height on tall and slender stems. Cryptogams, to which the mushrooms of the present day bear the nearest resemblance, were plentiful.

The fishes of the Old Red Sandstone period were more or less encased in armor, and some of them were beautiful and curious in form.

The Carboniferous period succeeds the Devonian, and this period is subdivided into the coal-measures, and the carboniferous limestone. The first gave rise to great deposits of coal, and the second to marine deposits frequently underlying the coal-fields.

The limestone mountains which form the base of the whole system, attain to a great thickness, and are of marine origin, being composed of the remains and filled with the fossils of Zoophytes, Radiata, Cephalopoda and fishes. The thickness of this limestone formation is in some places 2,500 feet, and attests to an almost inconceivable amount of animal life during the previous period.

Now, for the first time, do we find indications of forests. The vegetation of this period must have been profuse and luxuriant. The Sigillaria and Stigmara, and other fern-like plants, grew to the altitude of trees, and were left undisturbed; for there yet seemed no terrestrial life. The Carboniferous period was one of vast duration, as it has been estimated that it would require 122,400 years to produce only sixty feet of coal. Coal is composed of the mineralized remains of vegetation which flourished in some remote age of the world—the age which we are describing as the Carboniferous period. The duration of this period and the vast amount of vegetation which sprung into life and then fell into decay can be perceived by the apparently inexhaustible supplies of coal which exist in all portions of the world. These coal deposits are buried underneath immense rocks and thick layers of earth, indicating violent convulsions of nature and a great lapse of time since their deposit.

When we regard this lapse of time, it makes the present and the narrow period of the world's history covered by record and tradition, sink into contemptible nothingness. It is impossible to compute the time that has elapsed since these coal deposits were made. It is still less possible to measure the time of the growth and decay of vegetation which caused them. Then, stretching far back of that age are two succeeding periods, each of, undoubtedly, immense duration; and we are not yet at the beginning of creation. Beyond that we have no data upon which to build up our theories. All is vague surmise; except that we begin to comprehend that time, even as we trace it backward, may be eternal.

Two characteristics of the Carboniferous period were excessive heat and excessive humidity of the atmosphere; and the fossils of vegetation remaining to us from that period prove that plants then attained enormous dimensions. The temperature of the whole globe seems to have been nearly the same in all latitudes. The same remains of plant life are found from Spitzbergen to Central Africa.

The Lycopodiaceæ of to-day are humble plants scarcely a yard in height; those of the ancient world measured eighty or ninety feet in height, and there were forests of Lepidodendrons. With all this wealth of verdure, there were yet seen no flowers, and the species of plants were few, all belonging to the lower types of vegetation. There were no terrestrial animals as yet. There may have been a few winged insects; and a few land-snails might have found their homes on the damp earth. Some of the forms of vegetable life then existing are now completely extinct; others still exist in greatly diminished proportions.

During the Carboniferous period, coral began to be formed in the sea, and the waters were alive with strange fish, though the Crustaceans seem rare in the Carboniferous limestone strata. During this period vegetation seemed to reach its maximum, while the animal kingdom was poorly represented.

In the picture is given an ideal view of a marshy forest during the Carboniferous period. On the right are seen the naked trunks of a Lepidodendron and a Sigillaria, an arborescent fern rising between the two trunks. At the foot of these great trees an herbaceous fern and a Stigmara appear, whose long ramification of roots, provided with reproductive spores, extend to the water. On the left is the naked trunk of another Sigillaria, a tree whose foliage is altogether unknown, a Sphenophyllum and a Conifer. It is difficult to describe with precision the species of this last family, the impressions of which are, nevertheless, very abundant in the coal measures. In front of this group we see two trunks broken and overthrown. These are a Lepidodendron and a Sigillaria, mingling with a heap of vegetable debris in course of decomposition. Some herbaceous ferns and buds of Calamites rise out of the waters of the marsh. A few fishes belonging to the period swim on the surface of the water, and the aquatic reptile Achegeosaurus shows its long and pointed head. A Stigmara extends its roots into the water, and the pretty Asterophyllites, with its finely-cut stems, rises above it in the foreground. A forest composed of Lepidodendra and Calamites forms the background to the picture.

Sir Roderick I. Murchison gave the name of "Permian" to certain peculiar deposits of rock found in the province of Perm in Russia; and from these rocks the next period takes its name. "The Permian rocks," says a modern English geologist, "have of late years assumed great interest, particularly in England, in consequence of the evidence their correct determination affords with regard to the probable extent beneath them of the coal-bearing strata which they overlies and conceal, thus tending to throw a light upon the duration of our coal-fields, one of the most important questions of the day in connection with our industrial resources and national prosperity."

Although the climate during the Permian period was undoubtedly similar to that which prevailed during the Carboniferous period, there are yet strong indications of the existence of glaciers and icebergs. The flora and fauna of this period do not seem to differ greatly from those of the period which preceded it, though there are some new and more developed species of each. But vegetable and animal remains are both somewhat scarce in the Permian formation. The absence of these remains is accounted for by the probable fact that the deposition of the formation was in a great measure by solution. The ocean still claimed a large portion of the surface of the earth. Much of the Europe of to-day was then a vast sea, with here and there an island rising out of its depths.

The Permian period constituted the last of the divisions of the Primary epoch. In reviewing the epoch, we have seen the earth take shape and become divided into land and water. We have beheld the appearance of vegetable and animal life in inferior forms.

At the close of this epoch, fishes were the highest order of beings in the organic world. There were no birds, and no mammals of any sort. The only living creatures we find upon land are a few marsh-frequenting reptiles of small size. There were then probably no seasons, no varieties of and no zones of temperature.

Hundreds of thousands and possibly millions of years have passed, as one period of the epoch has given place to another; and yet we are only at the beginning. Three more epochs, each equally great in duration, must pass away before we come to times whose history is written on other material than the rocks. The processes of creation form an interesting and a wonderful study, and the geologist revels amid the discovery of truths far more wonderful than fiction.

INSUBORDINATION;

OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER VII.

A SERENADE.

WHEN Anne retired to her bed that night, it was with a new feeling about her heart. The information which her little friend had conveyed to her respecting Mr. Illerton was unexpected, and yet pleasant in a degree that she could not account for. She had passed but half an hour with him, and had only been led to think of him since that time, it seemed to her, in consequence of her interview resulting in a serious rupture with Mrs. Hardamer and two of her daughters. But now to hear that he had expressed an interest in her, was strangely pleasing. The more she thought about the matter, the more confused became her perceptions, and the more excited her feelings.

"This is not right," she at length murmured to herself, and, with an effort, endeavored to throw her thoughts off of the too absorbing subject. But, like the needle to the pole, they would return, and continued to return, in spite of every effort, as often as she attempted to force them away. Sleep finally stole over her senses; but in slumber she thought of him still, and awoke more than once during the night from pleasant dreams, in which his presence had made the chief delight.

On the next evening Illerton again called. He had dropped in regularly almost every evening for over a week. Through a little management, Mrs.

Webster had thus far succeeded in preventing him from meeting with Anne, though she felt her desire to see them together daily increasing. She was fully satisfied of Anne's pure and noble character, and esteemed Illerton as one of the few in society who are above reproach.

"You said there was a very nice young lady here, I believe; did you not, Mrs. Webster?" he asked, soon after he came in.

"Indeed, Henry! Have you just remembered it?"

"I must confess a great want of gallantry on my part; but I suppose extra attentions to her will atone for past neglect," he replied, smiling.

"You've grown tired, then, in your chase after an unknown charmer? Well, that is encouraging. I shall soon expect to see you as rational as ever."

"No more tired, and twice as ardent as I was a week ago," he said, with animation. "But tell me the name of this young lady, with a sight of whom I have not yet been favored."

"You must promise first not to fall in love with her."

"I promise."

"Quite willing to commit yourself, I declare!"

"Now tell me her name, Mrs. Webster."

"Don't be so impatient, Henry. Why, what's the matter with you? You have grown very suddenly and very strangely interested in this unknown lady."

You don't think, surely, that she is your pretty sewing girl?"

"Well, I do think so—and I know so!" said Illerton, in a positive tone.

This was more than Mrs. Webster had expected, and she looked surprised and confused.

Illerton continued: "How could you hold me in suspense so long, Mrs. Webster, when you knew that I was half crazy to find her? But is she not all I have described her?"

"Yes, Henry; and more, too. You know not half her worth." Mrs. Webster spoke with feeling.

"Heaven bless you for saying so!" exclaimed the young man, seizing the hand of his maternal friend. "But I am impatient to see her. In mercy relieve my suspense."

"Be calm, Henry," returned Mrs. Webster, seriously. "Remember that all this enthusiasm is on one side. She has not been so much interested as you have; and, if I have read her aright, thinks rarely of you, and with no feeling. You were to her an intruding stranger, and caused her much pain of mind. Except for this pain, I am inclined to think that she would hardly have thought of you again. You have got to win her, if you would wear her."

"And win her I will!" said the young man, with enthusiasm.

"Be not so sure, Henry. Unless she can see in you the beauty of moral excellence, she will never yield you her hand."

"Do you think I have anything to hope, then, Mrs. Webster?" he said, in a more serious and concerned tone of voice.

"There is no one I would rather see the husband of Miss Earnest than yourself, Henry; and no one whom I think so worthy of her. Even already I love her as a daughter, and if you win her, and your mother approves the choice, I shall have a double claim on your regard."

"You make me too happy, Mrs. Webster. But does she know of my visit here? Is she aware that I am now in the house?"

"She has not the least suspicion of it, Henry. I have carefully concealed from her, for good reasons, the fact that I knew you."

"Well, this need be no longer," he said. "I am impatient to see her face again, and end more to hear the music of her voice."

Mrs. Webster rung the bell, and, to the servant who entered, said: "Tell Anne that I would like to see her in the parlor."

In a brief space Anne entered.

"Let me introduce you to Mr. Illerton, the son of one of my best and oldest friends," said Mrs. Webster, taking her hand and advancing with her.

Anne started a little when she heard the name, and there was a slight exhibition of internal agitation; but in a moment she was calm, and received him with the easy politeness that was so natural to her.

It is needless to detail the particulars of this interview. Illerton, of course, continued to be a constant visitor, and soon awoke a deep and trembling interest in the heart of Anne Earnest. She no longer held toward Mrs. Webster the relation of one whose services were given for hire. That lady had dissolved this connection, and had elevated her to the position of a daughter and a companion. Anne attended her when she went into company, and was thus introduced into a select and valued circle of friends, whose rank in society was fixed upon the basis of real worth. And she soon became known as the choice of Illerton, a young man universally esteemed for his high moral principles. He was the only male representative of an old and wealthy family.

"Who do you think I met in Market Street today?" said Genevra Hardamer to her sister, coming in from an idle stroll, with an expression of astonishment upon her countenance.

"How should I know, I wonder?" said Gertrude, moodily; for, as usual, she was in no very amiable humor.

"Well, you'd like to know, I'm thinking."

"Who was it, then?" asked Gertrude, brightening up a little. "Was it Mr. Illerton?"

"Yes. But there was somebody else with him."

"And who was it?" asked Gertrude, with an expression of lively interest.

"You wouldn't guess in a dog's age, and so I'll tell you. It was Anne Earnest."

"Who?" exclaimed Gertrude, jumping up from her chair.

"Why, that trollop we sent off for not knowing how to keep her place," said Genevra, indignantly.

"You must be mistaken, surely."

"Indeed, and then I am not, Gertrude. The insolent thing looked at me with an impudent grin, and made a motion as if she were going to speak, but I turned up my nose at her, the forward minx!"

"But what in the world is the meaning of her being in the street with Mr. Illerton?" asked Gertrude, greatly disconcerted.

"I've got my own thoughts about that," said Genevra. "I never had much opinion of him, and as for her, I don't believe she's too good for anything."

But this insinuation by no means quieted the feelings of Gertrude. A cloud settled upon her brow, and she sat, for some time, in gloomy silence.

"He needn't think to come here again, after having been seen in Market Street with a hired girl! I'll insist him if ever he sets his foot in this house, or speaks to me! I vow I will!" This last elegant expression for a lady's tongue was stimulated by Genevra with peculiar energy, while her face warmed with accumulating passion.

"Don't make yourself a fool about it, Genevra," responded Gertrude, testily, for she could not make up her mind to relinquish all hope of Illerton.

This direct thrust called into active play the unruly member of each of the young ladies, which continued for half an hour or more, until one of them was driven from the field.

There happened to be some unusual attraction at Peale's Museum, in Holiday Street, on that same evening, and Gertrude and Geneva attended, accompanied by a couple of young storekeepers. The museum was well filled. Gertrude and Geneva were quite conspicuous by their loud laughing and talking, and their excessive show of finery. Excepting themselves, there were few who were not plainly attired, and few whose manners and carriage did not stamp them as superior.

"I declare, I never saw such a company of common people together in my life," remarked Geneva to her spruce attendant. "I should really think there were none here but journeymen mechanics' wives, if some of the men did not look so elegant. Now ain't that too common a looking body to be allowed admission here?" she continued, half aloud, indicating with a toss of her reticule a very plain but neatly-dressed lady, who was gracefully leaning upon the arm of a gentleman, and examining with him some beautiful entomological specimens.

"That lady?" replied her attendant, in a tone of surprise. "Why that is the accomplished Mrs. H——!"

"It can't be possible!" responded Geneva, incredulously.

"It is certainly none other, Miss Hardamer, for she is frequently in our store, and is every inch a lady. If pleasant manners, a perfect freedom from all affected airs, and a gentle and amiable disposition, are any indications of a lady, then is she one. I never see her in the store that I do not find my admiration of her character increasing."

The young man spoke with warmth, and Geneva was silent for a short time, and seemed offended.

"If there ain't Mr. Illerton, with that sweet girl on his arm again!" exclaimed Gertrude's young companion, thrown off his guard in his admiration of the face and form of Anne Earnest. "I wonder who she can be? As I live, the other lady on his arm is the rich and accomplished widow of the late Mr. Webster!"

While yet addressing his companion, Illerton, with the two ladies, advanced toward the lady and gentleman, Mr. and Mrs. H——, just mentioned as examining a case of entomological preparations, and, after a friendly greeting between them, Anne was introduced, and received with a cordial smile from Mr. H——, and a warm pressure of the hand and a welcome word from his lady.

Upon all this both Gertrude and Geneva looked with the liveliest astonishment and chagrin. The former was, however, speedily aroused from her state of surprise by her companion, who again said: "I wonder who she can be?"

"I can tell you," said Gertrude, with a sneer upon her lip.

"Who is she, then?—for I should like of all things to know."

"Why, she is no other than our cast-off hired girl," replied Gertrude, maliciously.

"Impossible!" said the young man.

"I tell you it is possible," said Gertrude, in a low but excited tone; "and her name is Anne Earnest. We turned her out of the house for improper conduct. She's an artful, insinuating piece of goods, and has no doubt imposed upon Mrs. Webster, who will get herself into trouble with her." All this was uttered in a tone expressive of the strongest dislike and enmity toward Anne.

Just at this moment Anne turned her face toward them, and the young man read its pure and lovely expression.

"You must be in error, surely," he said. "An evil mind could never give so innocent an expression as that now beaming upon her face!"

"Let me show you some of these beautiful specimens, Miss Earnest," said Mrs. H—— at this moment, in a voice distinctly heard by both Gertrude and her companion; and placing the arm she had disengaged from that of her husband at the moment of introduction within that of Anne, she drew her toward the case of insects, and was soon busy in pointing out to her the rarest and most beautiful.

"So you see that I know her!" said Gertrude, with an expression of contempt.

The young man was silent, for he could not understand it. From that moment, it so happened that neither Gertrude nor Geneva could go in any direction without being thrown near Illerton and Anne, and finding the latter in familiar association with those in the best society. Mortified and irritated, they left the museum at an early hour, and returned home.

"I shall go crazy!" exclaimed Ike, bounding into the garret on the same night, and turning three or four summersaults on and off of his bed. "I've seen enough to last me for a year!—ha! ha! ha!—whoop! hold me, Tom, or I shall die!"

"You're crazy already, I believe! But what in the name of old Clats is the matter, Ike? Come, out with it!" said Tom.

"Give me half an hour to breathe in, Tom!"

"Nonsense! What is in the wind?"

"I'm afraid it will kill me!" exclaimed Ike, again giving way to a loud explosion of laughter, and rolling from side to side of the bed upon which he had thrown himself.

"Don't be a fool, Ike!" broke in Bill, impatiently. "Let us hear what all this is about."

"Well, I'll try and tell you," said Ike, rising up, and endeavoring to command himself; "but you must let me laugh every now and then, or I shall burst. I went to the museum to-night, and lo! and behold! our beauties down stairs were there, all dressed up to kill, with a couple of counter jumpers dangling at their elbows. Didn't they cut a swath, though? They couldn't see me, no how. But there was somebody else there, too; and who do you think it was? Why, Anne Earnest, with her sweet face, looking more beautiful than ever; and she was hanging on the arm of Mr. Illerton, who was all attention to her!"

"You must be joking, Ike," said Tom, incredulously.

"No, I'm not, though I'm in dead earnest!"

"And did our living beauties see them?"

"See them! Of course they did!"

"And how did they take it? Do say, Ike!"

"Just wait a bit, till I get that far, will you? And there was somebody else along with them, too—Mrs. Webster, the rich lady that she lives with; and she would lean forward toward Anne, every now and then, so kind; and look her in the face when she was speaking, with an expression that said, as plain as words, 'But you are a dear, good girl, Anne, and I love you!'"

"The devil!" ejaculated Bill.

"It's all as true as death, boys! And that ain't all! Mrs. Webster, you know, is tip-top here, and she would every now and then introduce Anne to some lady or gentleman as much above our girls, as the sun is above the moon; and they would treat her as polite, and seem so glad to make her acquaintance!"

"Oh, but that is good!" exclaimed Tom.

"If you'd only seen the grand Mrs. H——," continued Ike, "draw her arm through Anne's, and walk about the museum with her, showing her all the pretty things; and then 'a' seen how struck down in the mouth Gertrude was, and how mad Geneva looked, it would have been something to remember as long as you live. I wouldn't have begrudged five dollars to have seen the show."

"That is elegant!" said Bill.

"I never saw anybody so out," continued Ike. "They were all down in the mouth. And wasn't I glad to see it!"

"Did Anne see you?" asked Tom.

"Once—but I kept out of her way."

"Did she speak to you?" said Bill.

"I wasn't very near; but when she saw me she nodded her head, and smiled so sweetly. It wasn't a sneaking nod and stolen smile, but all earnest and above board."

"It is the best thing that has ever happened!" said Tom. "Our old Queen of Sheba, you know, boys, goes her death on people's finding their level, and keeping it," remarked Ike. "Anne's found her level at last, and I should like to know how many miles it is above the platform upon which she and her young jay-birds stand!"

"It's so high that they'll never reach it, that's certain," said Bill.

So excited were the boys that they sat up until after one o'clock talking over the matter. About this time they were attracted by a sudden burst of music in the street.

"Somebody's serenading our girls, as sure as I'm alive!" said Ike, jumping up and going to the window.

"It seems that all the fools ain't dead yet," quietly remarked Tom, rising more slowly, and taking his station alongside of Ike.

"It's as free for us as for anybody, that's one consolation," added Bill, crowding in between his two worthy associates.

"That's too good music for them," said Ike, after they had all listened, in silence, to a well-played air on three or four instruments; "too good, by half! I could do the business in the right style for them."

"You? Why, you can't play?" said Bill.

"Can't I?" responded Ike. "You've forgotten the sweet music I discoursed for them one night on the lapstone."

"True, true! I had forgotten that," said Bill. "Suppose, Ike, we give 'em a touch one of these dark nights, any how. We could do it, couldn't we?"

"To a charm!" replied Ike, slapping the last speaker upon the shoulder. "That's a grand idea, Bill. Why didn't we think of it before?"

"What instrument can you play on, Ike?" asked Bill.

"Me! Why, I'm hard to beat with the brush and scraper. I used to practise with the chimney-sweeps when I was only knee-high to a dock. I got so I could play almost any tune. Dick, up the alley, will lend me his instruments; and then I'll do my part in all sorts of style. Bet what can you play on, Bill?"

"I've no particular skill in this way; but I think I could manage to do a little on the old saw, with a good new file."

"Capital! But what are you worth, Tom?—are you at all musical?"

In answer to this, the garret was filled with the gruntings of a hog and the squealing of pigs in swinish accompaniment.

"You see I can do a little in the line," remarked Tom, quietly, as the discordant, ear-piercing noise subsided.

"So I should think. You shall lead the orchestra, Tom. But three of us won't make a full band. How shall we fill the vacancies? We want, at least, double our number."

"Leave that to me," said Bill. "I am acquainted with several amateurs, who will cheerfully lend us their valuable aid. For instance, there is Tom Dunn, who is quite catagorical, as they say; and Sandy Patterson, who, as a living trombone, is superior to any bloody-noun I ever heard in Stricker's dam. John Neal is a dabster on the conch; and, if others are wanted, I can count three or four more."

"The fuller the band, the better," responded Ike.

"If a good large bull-dog would add anything to the harmony of the music, Sam Miller can bark to any tune."

"Prime, now ain't it?" said Ike, warmly. "When shall we do the thing?"

"The sooner the better," replied Tom.

"Let it be some dark night, about one o'clock, then," said Ike.

"Agreed!" responded the two associates.

The serenade being arranged, the boys retired to bed; but it was a long time before their senses were locked in sleep, for their minds were too actively occupied with their intended exhibition of musical skill.

In about a week they had everything ready to begin. The night was dark and cloudy, and in every way favorable for the new serenade. They had found four boys besides themselves, as ripe for fun and frolic as they were. To avoid suspicion, our three chaps went up-stairs, talking loud enough to be heard, at ten o'clock, the usual hour of retiring. In the garret they made a clatter of shoes, etc., and then threw themselves upon the beds and rolled about there, that the noise of the rickety bedsteads might be distinctly heard below. It was twelve before they thought it safe to descend from their attic, which was accomplished in a way peculiar to themselves. A long back building was connected with the main building, and from this they could descend to a lower range, connecting with the house below; and from this again to a high wall shutting in the yard of that house from an alley that ran immediately in the rear. In this way they could readily get out and in, without any suspicion being excited in the family, and in this way the three companions in mischief escaped from the house.

Joining their four associates, all armed with their several instruments of music, they held a consultation, and after arranging all preliminaries, and being certain, from his warning cry to all equester and mischief plotters, that the watchman was making the best of his way to the other end of his beat, and would not pass there again for the next hour, they stole quietly around in front, and arranged themselves before the house. It was by this time nigh on to one o'clock, and as it was a very dark and cloudy night, there were no persons in the street.

"One at a time, to prepare for the full chorus of instruments," said Ike. "Strike up, Tom!"

Instantly the air was filled with a combination of grunting and squealing, that seemed to come from half a dozen alarmed swinish mothers and their hungry offspring. Then came half a dozen musical sounds from Ike's brush and straper, clear and distinct.

"Now, Bill!" said the leader.

And Bill's saw and file set every dog's teeth in the whole neighborhood on edge, and waked them up just enough to answer promptly Sam Miller's real bull-dog bark, that was responded to by Tom Dunn in a caterwaul, that seemed like the dying confession of some old roof-scrambler.

"Bloody now! bloody now! bloody now! chip!" rose clear and fall, as the last note of feline distress died away in the distance. This was succeeded by three or four blasts from John Neal's conch shell.

Bill's new-fangled violin, as he called it, startled every sleeper in the house, and before the final blast on the conch, preparatory to the full chorus, several windows were thrown open, and half a dozen old and young Hardamers were straining their eyes into the darkness.

"Now give it to 'em, free and easy, boys!" said Ike, and away they went, making a most diabolical combination of sounds. Clear and distinct above the whole, and at regular intervals, would come in "bloody now! bloody now!" always accompanied with the deep-toned bull-dog bark, and winding off with a most ear-piercing feline scream. Steadily, and with a most unmusical, nerve-thrilling screech, did Bill work away upon his old saw, but by all his efforts he could not drown the ringing noise of Ike's brush and straper. For full ten minutes they continued their serenade, without a moment's cessation. At the end of that time, Hardamer sallied out of his front door, armed with an old musket. This apparition brought on the finale, and then there was a separation, in different ways, of the whole band of serenaders, who scampered off in double quick time.

Hurrying around the square and up the alley, as fast as they could, our three young rebels scrambled up the roofs of the different houses, in their way to their garret, and made an entrance there in three minutes from the time Hardamer had dispersed the band. Rapidly disrobing themselves, they beat a quick retreat to bed, and were, to all appearances, sound asleep, when their master, whose suspicions had been aroused, came up into the garret. His finding them all stowed snugly away puzzled him a good deal, but their presence there was conclusive of their innocence, and so he withdrew without a word. "Old Lignumvite was just too late," whispered Ike.

"We've made a narrow escape, I'm thinking," said Tom.

"Wouldn't we have had a tea-party, though, if old Lignumvite'd got here before us?" added Bill. "He'd never forgiven that. But I wonder how the Misses Hardamer were pleased? I hope they didn't faint under the operation."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE CHANGES OF A YEAR.

WE change the scene now to a farm-house in Virginia. It is small and neat, and stands on a slight eminence, overlooking on either side a well-cultivated farm of some five hundred acres. A negro quarter stands at the distance of about a hundred yards, in and about which are a dozen blacks—men, women and children. An elderly man is walking backward and forward before the door of the dwelling, in the cool of the evening, and by his side is a young man, in earnest conversation with him. Sometimes the elder of the two walks forward rapidly, and sometimes pauses and looks into the face of his companion with an expression of painful surprise. Both are dressed in the ordinary, coarse, everyday clothing of working farmers. Let us approach them. The old man is speaking.

"How could you keep this so long from me, William?"

"I have not had the heart to mention it, father. My wrong-doings so distressed you, that I dared not mention them, with an oppressive sense of duty forced from me the unwilling confession."

"And you have not heard from her during all the past year?"

"Never once. I left her without even an intimation of my intention to go away. She knows not whether I am dead or alive. And I am as ignorant of her condition."

"Oh, my soul! how could you find it in your heart to act thus?"

"No one knows, father, how far from right principles he may be led, until he begins to allow his feet to diverge from the ways of rectitude. I wasted the money your labor procured for me; became involved in debt, and married to obtain money to extricate myself from my difficulties. The father of my wife, displeased with our marriage, which was a secret one, would have nothing to do with us; and, heartily disliking the woman I had married, I left her to her fate. No doubt her father received her as soon as he was sure I had left the city."

"Merciful Heaven!" ejaculated the old man, clasping his hands, and lifting his eyes upward.

"It was a wicked thing, father," responded the young man, in a subdued tone; "but, if not too late, I would gladly retrace some of my steps."

"It is never too late, my son, to make the effort to repair our wrong-doings. You must go at once to Baltimore, and bring home your wife."

"That is just what I wish to do. I cannot say that I ever had any affection for her; but duty, now, must take the place of love."

"Under any circumstances, we must do our duty," said the father. "I'm afraid this will almost break your mother's heart. In all your wandering from right, she never thought you capable of such an act. But I must break it to her this evening, for to-morrow you must leave for Baltimore. Not a day should be lost, for no one can tell what a day may bring forth."

Both now entered the house, and the mother met them at the door. Her eye had often turned toward them from the window, with an expression of concern, while they walked before she; hence, for she saw that they were conversing on some subject of painful interest; and now she looked into each face with a glance of earnest inquiry. The young man could not withstand that look, for the tears filled his eyes, and he passed her hurriedly.

"Let me know all, John," said the mother, looking into her husband's face with an appealing expression. "It is better that I should know all."

"Perhaps it is," said the old man. "Our William married more than a year ago, and deserted his young wife in a few weeks."

"Father of mercy!" she ejaculated, in a low, subdued tone of voice, lifting upward her aged eyes, and clasping her hands together. The young man saw the movement from the adjoining room, and understood its meaning too well. Covering his face with his hands, he leaned against the wall and groaned aloud. That groan of deep and heart-aching distress reached the mother's ears, and turned the tide of her feelings. Instantly she went in to him, and, taking his hand, said, in a broken voice, while the tears rained down her time-furrowed cheeks, "My son, the past cannot be recalled; but the present, must do all that can be done to atone for the past. Who, or what is the woman you have married?"

"Not such a woman as I ought to have made the daughter of so good a mother. But, she is respectable, moves in good society, and her father is rich."

"Then, William, how could you desert her?"

"Because I married her like a villain—only for her money. Failing to get that from her prudent old father, who was displeased at the marriage, I left her."

"Oh, my son!" replied his mother, greatly moved, "what a world of trouble have you brought upon yourself. But, I trust it is not yet too late to repair, in some degree, the injury you have done. You must go for her, and bring her home, if she will return with you."

"That is just what I wish to do. But you will not find her, I fear, all that you could wish. She is the eldest of three grown-up sisters, who have been raised in idleness, are poorly educated in anything substantial, and full of false notions. They are proud and egotistical, and, of course, weak-minded."

"Let us hope that a year of painful disappointment may have greatly changed her. Troubles do wonders for us sometimes."

"True, mother, for I am a living witness of their efficacy."

"I think your father should go with you. You have deceived the family once, and her father would not wisely to put no further confidence in you," said the mother.

"She is right," responded the father. "But I cannot be ready for several days."

"Then I had better wait, father, for I fear to go alone, lest she refuses to return with me."

The reader, of course, recognizes in this family that of Anderson, who married Genevieve Hardamer. He had gone off to the South, and his money very soon becoming exhausted, he joined a club of gamblers, and lived upon the dishonest gains of his craft, for six or seven months, when he was taken down with a Southern fever. From this he recovered after great and protracted suffering, a changed man; at least, so far as intention was concerned. He immediately returned home, and joined his father in the honest toil of a farmer. Gradually his better feelings gained strength, and he continued to bring out into action what he saw to be right, at the same time steadily resisting his strong desires. Finally, he saw it to be his duty to return to his wife, and, acting out the principle of obedience, he made known to his father the painful secret that was weighing upon his mind.

A single year will often work wonderful changes. We have advanced the reader a full twelvemonth in the history of Anderson—let us go back and bring up the rest of our characters.

The novel astraddle which had been given for the benefit of Misses Gertrude and Geneva did not fall upon their ears alone. The knowledge of the circumstance spread, and soon became known far and near as an excellent piece of fun. Nor did they escape the annoyance of its being known, for there are always in society those who delight in telling unpleasant news, and several of these individuals were among the young ladies' acquaintances, and took especial pains to let them know all that was said about it in connection with their names. The mortification was to them a terrible one.

Gertrude insisted upon it that Tom was one of the company, for it was a well-known fact, she urged, that he could imitate the squealing of pigs to perfection.

"That may all be true enough," her father would reply, who had his own suspicions and his own reasons for not wishing them confirmed; "but I found Tom in bed when I went up into the garret directly after. How could he have been there and in the street at the same time?"

"But Millie says," she replied, one day, after this oft-repeated answer, "that Tom and the other boys are out until twelve o'clock almost every night, and that they climb up on the roof of the back building, and get into the garret-window when they come home. I have no doubt but that he came in that way after his outrageous conduct, and got into bed before you thought of going into the garret."

"Does Milly say that?" asked her father, quickly.

"Yes, indeed, she does."

"Call her up!" he said.

Millie soon made her appearance.

"Did you say that the boys were out almost every night until twelve and one o'clock, and that they get in by climbing up over the back building?" said Hardamer, sternly.

Millie looked at Gertrude and hesitated.

"Do you hear, you black wench?" he said, angrily.

"I believe or did say so," replied Millie.

"You believe you did! Don't you know that you did, he?"

"Perhaps I did. But I only thought so," said Millie, who had no wish to become an informer against the boys.

"What right had you to think so, he?" said her master.

"I don't, sir," responded Millie, with a most milly expression and tone.

"Clear out into the kitchen, you stupid hussy, you!" said Hardamer, in a loud, passionate voice, assuming, at the same time, a threatening attitude.

Millie retreated in confusion to her own part of the house.

"I don't make anything out of this," resumed Hardamer; "but I'll catch 'em at their capture, if they cut any."

And so saying, he went down stairs into the shop. It was just about half-past three o'clock, and as he entered the back door another entered the front door of his shop, and presented him with a protest. It was a note of five thousand dollars, which he had indorsed for a large shoe-dealer up town, and was the first of five, all of which would mature in the course of the next sixty days.

"Have you heard the news?" asked a neighbor, stepping in at the moment. "Mr. —, the large shoe-dealer, has failed; and it is said to be a desperate bad one, too. He won't be able to pay over fifty cents in the dollar."

"Then I'm a ruined man!" exclaimed Hardamer, sinking back upon a chair.

The rumor was too true. Within the next two months Hardamer's property was thrown into market, and forced sales effected at ruinous prices. His credit was saved, but it was at the expense of nearly all he was worth. Common estimation had named his property far above its real value. His daughters had looked upon it as almost inexhaustible. But a loss of twenty-five thousand dollars, or rather, a sacrifice of property, valued at forty thousand dollars, took nearly everything he was worth.

To be thrown back thus, at his age, with a large family, tended in no degree to soothe a temper naturally overbearing and irritable. All he now had left was the house in which was his shop and dwelling, his stock of boots, shoes, leather, etc., and about one thousand dollars in turnpike-road stock, twenty per cent. below par. To this scrip he had been holding on for the last three years, in hopes that it would rise to par, but now a pressing demand for money in his business required him to sell, just as there was some indication of an improvement—and eight hundred dollars were received for what originally cost him one thousand.

Before selling, however, he made an effort to raise a few hundred dollars, in hopes that the stock would go up speedily. Waiting upon an old friend, between whom and himself had passed numerous business favors during the ten years previous, he asked him for the loan of a note of five hundred dollars.

"H-h-ham, Mr. Hardamer! What sec—" and the old friend paused as if unwilling to utter the word.

"Security, did you mean to say, sir?" asked Hardamer, his face flushed and his eyes sparkling.

"Ye-ye-yes, Mr. Hardamer, that is what I meant to say. Things have changed a little of late. We have to be cautious, you know."

"I want to know, sir, if you mean to say, that because I am unfortunate, I am no longer honest?" said Hardamer, placing himself before his old friend, and looking him squarely in the face.

"No, I did not mean to say any such thing," he replied, much embarrassed. "But you are too sensitive; you cannot, reasonably, expect to get favors, now you are reduced, such as were readily extended to you before the failure that stripped you of nearly everything."

Hardamer looked him a moment in the face with a strong expression of contempt, and turning upon his heel, left the store without uttering a word in reply.

Returning to his shop, he determined to sell his scrip at once. But the necessity for losing two hundred dollars on it, was by no means a pleasant idea, and he finally concluded to wait upon a certain individual who could always procure a loan, on good security, for a consideration.

"I want five hundred dollars," said Hardamer, entering the office of this certain individual, in the neighborhood of the Exchange.

"I don't know what to say, Mr. Hardamer; money's dreadful tight just now," replied the broker, who knew the real strength of every business man in town.

"Well, what if it is tight?" said the applicant, pettishly; "I've good security to offer."

"Whose note is it?" asked the broker, in an indifferent tone.

"It's to be my own note, with collateral in the shape of ten shares of — Turnpike Road Stock."

"That stock's poor stuff!" remarked the broker, in a calm, indifferent tone.

"It is worth eighty dollars now, and is rising," said Hardamer.

"You couldn't force a sale at seventy," replied the broker.

"Why, it's quoted at eighty-one this morning."

The broker compressed his lips, turned up his nasal protuberance a little, and gave his head a knowing toss.

"What do you mean by that?" asked Hardamer, a little irritated.

"It's all a gull!" said the broker. "There isn't a particle of rise—in fact, the market has a downward tendency."

"Well, up or down, Mr. Centum, will you lend me five hundred dollars for sixty days on this security?" said Hardamer, decidedly.

"I'm afraid of it," replied Mr. Centum.

"Then I must bid you good-morning," said Hardamer, rising.

As he was about leaving the door, the broker, who had walked out with him, remarked, in a quiet, careless tone, that he knew a man who might, probably, loan on it; and that if he was particularly in want of the money, he would try and make the negotiation for him as a personal favor.

The bait took. Hardamer expressed his gratitude for the kind offer, and promised to call in an hour. In an hour he was again at the office of Mr. Centum.

"Well, what was the result of your application?" he asked, with evident anxiety.

"He didn't seem much inclined," replied the broker, coldly. "Has no confidence in the security."

"Why, I am sure the security is safe and ample."

"You may think so, but he don't," replied Mr. Centum. "However, I saw an old chap who does things in this line whenever he can make a good operation. He's willing to make the loan, but I'm afraid the terms are too hard. The old fellow hasn't much conscience left."

"Well, what does he ask?" inquired Hardamer, with nervous impatience.

"I almost hate to name it," said the broker. "He offers to let you have four hundred and fifty dollars for sixty days, for your note of five hundred dollars, secured by a provisional transfer of the stock."

"That's five per cent. a month! You are not in earnest, certainly!" exclaimed Hardamer, in indignant astonishment.

"Yes, I am, I do assure you. That is the best I can do for you; but it is a ruinous discount," said Mr. Centum, sympathisingly.

"I'll sell my stock first!" responded Hardamer, warmly. "I'm not going to be swindled in that way!"

"Perhaps, in the course of to-morrow, I might be able to do something better for you," said the broker, who found that he had attempted to go rather too deep into his customer.

On the next day Hardamer called on him again.

"Do things look any brighter to-day?" he said, putting on as cheerful a countenance as possible.

"I've seen several persons since yesterday," replied Mr. Centum, "and the best I can do for you is four per cent. a month, besides my commissions."

Hardamer turned on his heel and left the office. That day he sold his stock for eight hundred dollars. The money realized on this sale was soon exhausted in the payment of sundry regular business notes. Others were still out. To meet these now became a serious matter; for, although his business continued good, his expenses were very heavy, causing a constant and large drain of money. His ledger showed a fair balance of "good accounts;" but every tradesman knows how much to calculate upon "good accounts" in a time of need.

It was about two months from the time of his first interview with the broker, that Hardamer found the due-day of a note drawn for three hundred dollars approaching with unwelcome rapidity. All that he could do in the way of pushing collections among his numerous good customers, availed but little in making up the desired amount. His attempt to borrow a note from an old business friend had convinced him that his fair reputation had departed with his money, and his proud spirit turned from the idea of again asking a favor of any one, and running the risk of refusal and insult. But time rolled on, even until the day of payment, and he was still short about one hundred and fifty dollars. All attempts to force collections farther for that day were abandoned about twelve o'clock, and still the amount wanted was no less. Having always managed his business with great prudence, he had rarely been required to raise funds when a note fell due, and in the few instances that it had occurred he was at no loss to find plenty of persons to accommodate him. Of course he was now in a state of great uneasiness. Restless and excited, he paced the narrow avenue behind his counter, backward and forward, laboring in thought for some expedient by which he could rescue his note from its threatened danger. Suddenly passing, he leaned upon the counter, with his head between his hands, and remained in that position for nearly ten minutes.

"It must be done!" he said, in a low, sad voice; and turning to his desk, he drew a check for one hundred and seventy dollars, dated fifteen days ahead, and putting it into his pocket-book, went out, and proceeded to the office of Mr. Centum.

That individual he found sitting in his office, with his legs upon the table, and a newspaper held before his face, as if reading; but his eyes were with his thoughts, and they had more to do with the omnipotent dollar than with the news of the day.

"How are you to-day, Hardamer?" he said, with an air of importance, not even rising from his chair, or changing his position.

"Pretty well, I thank you," replied Hardamer, somewhat meekly. "Can you do anything with this for me?" presenting his check.

The broker looked at it a moment, and shook his head.

"I'm afraid not," he said, indifferently. "If it was a good business note, I could get it done for you easily, at the rate of two per cent. a month. But people are afraid of checks. Besides, you know, your credit is not what it used to be. There was a time when anything with your name on it was as good as gold; but now it is very different. Do you want the money badly?"

"Indeed, I do!" replied Hardamer, earnestly. "If I don't get it before three it'll be all over with me."

This communication was particularly gratifying to the broker.

"Don't you think you can get it for me?" asked Hardamer, appealingly. "You don't know how much you will oblige me!"

"Nothing would give me greater pleasure," replied Mr. Centum. "But I am somewhat doubtful. I am willing to try, however, and will do my best. Leave me the check, and call at half-past one."

"I will be here to the minute," said Hardamer, handing over the check. "Do your very best to get it for me, Mr. Centum."

"I will, most certainly. Good-morning, Mr. Hardamer."

As soon as his intended victim had departed, the broker took from the drawer a long, narrow piece of paper, dated upon that day, upon which were two columns of figures and a column of names. The names indicated the drawers or indorsers of notes; the first column the "face" of the notes, and the last column the amount of "share" or surplus interest, obtained upon them. Without hesitation, he added the name of Hardamer, entered the check, one hundred and seventy dollars, fifteen days, and in the last column extended ten dollars. Then, scanning up this last column rapidly, he ascertained its amount to be fifty dollars.

"Pretty fair, that, by twelve o'clock!" he soliloquized; "forty of it in hand, and old Hardamer's as sure as if I had it in my fingers. Let me see how my bank account holds out!"

Turning to his check-book, he entered the last check on the margin, and subtracting it from the preceding amount, closed the book with a smile of satisfaction.

"Twenty thousand all safe!" he said, meaningly, "and five thousand sure to be paid in before three o'clock. I shall be flush to-morrow. Old Hardamer's getting into trouble; but he's honest to the back-bone, and owns the property he occupies, all in fee simple. He'd sell his coat before he'd wrong any one out of a dollar. I must keep my eye on him. If I manage him rightly, he'll be worth to me a cool thousand, before he's all done for. I must turn him round gently until I get him completely into my power, and then go it on him strong. It takes me to do the thing neatly!" and he laughed to himself, with a low, peculiar, chuckling laugh.

At half-past one precisely, Hardamer entered the broker's office. Just five minutes before that time Mr. Centum stepped out, and circling the square at a quick pace, returned as Hardamer entered.

"Well, what's the word?" asked Hardamer, affecting an air of indifference, while his heart beat violently, and he felt a slight tremor all over.

"I've been running about ever since for you," said the broker, panting as naturally, and wiping off the perspiration as earnestly as if he were in a great heat from over-exertion and fatigue, "and found a man at last who has a little money by him. He says he will do it for you. He was somewhat fearful at first, but I told him you were as good as gold, and he got to the back-bone!"

"Thank you! thank you!" responded Hardamer, warmly. "How much did he charge?"

"Ten dollars. It's a good deal, I know; but the man who took it never will enter into any operation for less than ten dollars. I can't charge my commission on this—it would be too hard upon you."

"I can do no better now, of course," said Hardamer, who gladly accepted of one hundred and sixty dollars for his check, although the rate of discount was over one hundred per cent. per annum. Still, it was only a single transaction, and the loss was but ten dollars. "And who wouldn't sacrifice ten dollars," he said to himself, as he walked toward the bank, "to have his note safely out, and his mind at ease."

OCCUPATION.—What a glorious thing for the human heart! Those who work hard seldom yield to fancied or real sorrow. When grief sits down, folds its hands, and mournfully feeds upon its own fears, wearing the thin shadow that a little exertion might sweep away into a funeral pall, the strong spirit is shorn of its might, and sorrow becomes our master. When trouble flows upon you, dark and heavy, toil not with the waves, and wrestle not with the torrent, rather seek by occupation to divert the dark waters that threatened to overwhelm you with a thousand channels, which the duties of life always present. Before you dream of it, those waters will fertilize the present, and give birth to fresh flowers, that will become pure and holy in the sunshine which penetrates to the path of duty, in spite of every obstacle. Grief, after all, is but a selfish feeling; and most selfish is the man who yields himself to the indulgence of any passion which brings no joy to his fellow-man.

THE POLICY DRUNKARD.

FROM "CAST ADRIET," BY T. S. ARTHUR.

ON leaving the room of this professional receiver of stolen goods, Pinky and her friend descended to the second story, and by a door which had been cut through into the adjoining property passed to the rear building of the house next door. They found themselves on a landing, or little square hall, with a stairway passing down to the lower story and another leading to the room above. A number of persons were going up and coming down—a forlorn set, for the most part, of all sexes, ages and colors. Those who were going up appeared eager and hopeful, while those who were coming down looked disappointed, sorrowful, angry or desperate. There was a "policy-shop" in one of the rooms above, and these were some of its miserable customers. It was the hour when the morning drawings of the lotteries were received at the office, or "shop," and the poor infatuated dupes who had bet on their favorite "rows" were crowding in to learn the result.

Poor old men and women in scant or wretched clothing, young girls with faces marred by evil, blotched and bloated creatures of both sexes, with little that was human in their countenances, except the bare features, boys and girls not yet in their teens, but old in vice and crime, and drunkards with shaking nerves,—all these were going up in hope and coming down in disappointment. Here and there was one of a different quality, a scantily-dressed woman with a thin, wasted face and hollow eyes, who had been fighting the wolf and keeping fast hold of her integrity, or a tender, innocent-looking girl, the messenger of a weak and shiftless mother, or a pale, bright-eyed boy whose much-worn but clean and well-kept garments gave sad evidence of a home out of which prop and stay had been removed. The strong and the weak, the pure and the defiled, were there. A poor washerwoman who in a moment of weakness has pawned the garments entrusted to her care, that she might venture upon a "row" of which she had dreamed, comes shrinking down with a pale, frightened face, and the bitterness of despair in her heart. She has lost. What then? She has no friend from whom she can borrow enough money to redeem the clothing, and if it is not taken home, she may be arrested as a thief and sent to prison. She goes away, and temptation lies close at her feet. It is her extremity and the evil one's opportunity. So far she has kept herself pure, but the disgrace of a public prosecution and a sentence to prison are terrible things to contemplate. She is in peril of her soul. God help her!

Who is this dressed in rusty black garments and closely veiled, who comes up from the restaurant, one of the convenient and unsuspected entrances to this robber's den?—for a "policy-shop" is simply a robbery shop, and is so regarded by the law, which sets a penalty upon the "writer" and the "backer" as upon other criminals. But who is this veiled woman in faded mourning garments who comes gliding as noiselessly as a ghost out from one of the rooms of the restaurant, and along the narrow entry leading to the stairway, now so thronged with visitors? Every day she comes and goes, no one seeing her face, and every day, with rare exceptions, her steps are slower and her form visibly more shrunken when she goes out than when she comes in. She is a broken-down gentlewoman, the widow of an officer, who left her at his death a moderate fortune, and quite sufficient for the comfortable maintenance of herself and two nearly grown-up daughters. But she had lived at the South, and there acquired a taste for lottery gambling. During her husband's lifetime she wasted considerable money in lottery tickets, once or twice drawing small prizes, but like all lottery dupes spending a hundred dollars for one gained. The thing had become a sort of mania with her. She thought so much of prizes and drawn numbers through the day that she dreamed of them all night. She had a memorandum-book in which were all the combinations she had ever heard of as taking prizes. It contained page after page of lucky numbers and fancy "rows," and was oftener in her hand than any other book.

There being no public sale of lottery tickets in Northern cities, this weak and infatuated woman found out where some of the "policy-shops" were kept, and instead of buying tickets, as before, risked her money on numbers that might or might not come out of the wheel in lotteries said to be drawn in certain Southern States, but chiefly in Kentucky. The numbers rarely if ever came out. The chances were too remote. After her husband's death she began fretting over the smallness of her income. It was not sufficient to give her daughters the advantages she desired them to have, and she knew of but one way to increase it. That way was through the policy-shops. So she gave her whole mind to this business, with as much earnestness and self-absorption as a merchant gives himself to trade. She had a dream-book, gotten up especially for policy buyers, and consulted it as regularly as a merchant does his price-current or a broker the sales of stock. Every day she bet on some "row" or series of "rows," rarely venturing less than five dollars, and sometimes, when she felt more than usually confident, laying down a twenty-dollar bill, for the "hit" when made gave from fifty to two hundred dollars for each dollar put down, varying according to the nature of the combinations. So the more faith a policy buyer had in his "row," the larger the venture he would feel inclined to make.

Usually it went all one way with the infatuated lady. Day after day she ventured, and day after day she lost, until from hundreds the sums she was spending had aggregated themselves into thousands. She changed from one policy-shop to another, hoping for better luck. It was her business to find them out, and this she was able to do by questioning some of those whom she met at the shops. One of these was in a building on a principal street, the second story of which was occupied by a milliner. It was visited mostly by ladies, who could pass in from the street, no one suspecting their errand. Another was in the attic of a house in which were many offices and places of business, with people going in and coming out all the while, none but the initiated being in the secret; while another was to be found in the rear of a photograph gallery. Every day and often twice a day, as punctually as any man of business, did this lady make her calls at one and another of these policy-offices to get the drawings or make new ventures. At remote intervals she would make a "hit"; once she drew twenty dollars, and once fifty. But for these small gains she had paid thousands of dollars.

After a "hit" the betting on numbers would be bolder. Once she selected what was known as a "lucky row," and determined to double on it until it came out a prize. She began by putting down fifty cents. On the next day she put down a dollar upon the same combination, losing, of course. Two dollars were ventured on the next day; and so she went on doubling, until, in her desperate infatuation, she doubled for the ninth time, putting down two hundred and fifty-six dollars.

If successful now, she would draw over twenty-five thousand dollars. There was no sleep for the poor lady during the night that followed. She walked the floor of her chamber in a state of intense nervous excitement, sometimes in a condition of high hope and confidence and sometimes haunted by demons of despair. She sold five shares of stock on which she had been receiving an annual dividend of ten per cent., in order to get funds for this desperate gambling venture, in which over five hundred dollars had now been absorbed.

Pale and nervous, she made her appearance at the breakfast-table on the next morning, unable to take a mouthful of food. It was in vain that her anxious daughters urged her to eat.

A little after twelve o'clock she was at the policy-office. The drawn numbers for the morning were already in. Her combination was 4, 10, 40. With an eagerness that could not be repressed, she caught up the slip of paper containing the thirteen numbers out of seventy-five, which purported to have been drawn that morning somewhere in "Kentucky," and reported by telegraph—caught it up with hands that shook so violently that she could not read the figures. She had to lay the piece of paper down upon the little counter before which she stood, in order that it might be still, so that she could read her fate.

The first drawn number was 4. What a wild leap her heart gave! The next was 24; the next 8; the next 70; the next 41, and the next 39. Her heart grew almost still; the pressure as of a great hand was on her bosom. 10 came next. Two numbers of her row were out. A quiver of excitement ran through her frame. She caught up the paper, but it shook as before, so that she could not see the figures. Dashing it back upon the counter, and holding it down almost violently, she bent over, with eyes starting from their sockets, and read the line of figures to the end, then sank over upon the counter with a groan, and lay there half fainting and too weak to lift herself up. If the 40 had been there, she would have made a hit of twenty-five thousand dollars. But the 40 was not there, and this made all the difference.

"Once more," said the policy-dealer, in a tone of encouragement, as he bent over the miserable woman. "Yesterday, 4 came out; to-day, 4, 10; to-morrow will be the lucky chance; 4, 10, 40 will surely be drawn. I never knew this order to fail. If it had been 10 first, and then 4, 10, or 10, 4, I would not advise you to go on. But 4, 10, 40 will be drawn to-morrow as sure as fate."

"What numbers did you say? 4, 10, 40?" asked an old man, ragged and bloated, who came shuffling in as the last remark was made.

"Yes," answered the dealer. "This lady has been doubling, and as the chances go, her row is certain to make a hit to-morrow."

"Ha! What's the row? 4, 10, 40?"

"Yes."

The old man fumbled in his pocket, and brought out ten cents.

"I'll go that on the row. Give me a piece."

The dealer took a narrow slip of paper and wrote on it the date, the sum risked and the combination of figures, and handed it to the old man, saying, "Come here to-morrow; and if the bottom of the world doesn't drop out, you'll find ten dollars waiting for you."

Two or three others were in by this time, eager to look over the list of drawn numbers and to make new bets.

"Glory!" cried one of them, a vile-looking young woman, and she commenced dancing about the room.

All was excitement now. "A hit! a hit!" was cried. "How much? how much?" and they gathered to the little counter and desk of the policy-dealer.

"1, 2, 3," cried the girl, dancing about and waving her little slip of paper over her head. "I knew it would come—dreamed of them numbers three nights hand running! Hand over the money, old chap! Fifteen dollars for fifteen cents! That's the go!"

The policy-dealer took the girl's "piece," and after comparing it with the record of drawn numbers, said, in a pleased voice, "All right! A hit, sure enough. You're in luck to-day."

The girl took the money, that was promptly paid down, and as she counted it over, the dealer remarked, "There's a doubling game going on, and it's to be up to-morrow, sure."

"What's the row?" inquired the girl.

"4, 10, 40," said the dealer.

"Then count me in," and she laid down five dollars on the counter.

"Take my advice and go ten," urged the policy-dealer.

"No, thank you! I shouldn't know what to do with more than five hundred dollars. I'll only go five dollars this time."

The "writer," as a policy-seller is called, took the money and gave the usual written slip of paper containing the selected numbers; loudly proclaiming her good luck, the girl then went away. She was an accomplice to whom a "piece" had been secretly given after the drawn numbers were in.

Of course this hit was the sensation of the day among the policy-buyers at that office, and brought in large gains.

The wretched woman who had just seen five hundred dollars vanish into nothing instead of becoming as under the wand of an enchanter, a great heap of gold, listened in a kind of maze to what passed around her—listened and let the tempter get to her ear again. She went away, stooping in her gait as one bearing a heavy burden. Before an hour had passed hope had lifted her again into confidence. She had to make but one venture more, to double on the risk of the day previous, and secure a fortune that would make both herself and her daughters independent for life.

Another sale of good stocks, another gambling venture and another loss, swelling the aggregate in this wild and hopeless "doubling" experiment to over a thousand dollars.

But she was not cured. As regularly as a drunkard goes to the bar went she to the policy-shops, every day her fortune growing less. Poverty began to pinch. The house in which she lived with her daughters was sold, and the unhappy family shrunk into a single room in a third-rate boarding-house. But their income soon became insufficient to meet the weekly demand for board. Long before this the daughters had sought for something to do by which to earn a little money. Pride struggled hard with them, but necessity was stronger than pride.

We finish the story in a few words. In a moment of weakness, with want and hard work staring her in the face, one of the daughters married a man who broke her heart and buried her in less than two years. The other, a weak and sickly girl, got a situation as day governess in the family of an old friend of her father's, where she was kindly treated, but she lived only a short time after her sister's death.

And still there was no abatement of the mother's infatuation. She was more than half insane on the subject of policy gambling, and confident of yet retrieving her fortunes.

At the time Pinky Swett and her friend in evil saw her come gliding up from the restaurant in faded mourning garments and closely veiled, she was living alone in a small, meagrely-furnished room, and cooking her own food. Everything left to her at her husband's death was gone. She earned a dollar or two each week by making shirts and drawers for the slop-shops, spending every cent of this in policies. A few old friends who pitied her, but did not know of the vice in which she indulged, paid her rent and made occasional contributions for her support. All of these contributions, beyond the amount required for a very limited supply of food, went to the policy-shops. It was a mystery to her friends how she had managed to waste the handsome property left by her husband, but no one suspected the truth.

"Who's that, I wonder?" asked Nell Peter as the dark, closely-veiled figure glided past them on the stairs.

"Oh, she's a policy-drunkard," answered Pinky, loud enough to be heard by the woman, who, as if surprised or alarmed, stopped and turned her head, her veil falling partly away, and disclosing features so pale and wasted that she looked more like a ghost than living flesh and blood. There was a strange gleam in her eyes. She paused only for an instant, but her steps were slower as she went on climbing the steep and narrow stairs that led to the policy-office.

"Good gracious, Pinky! did you ever see such a face?" exclaimed Nell Peter. "It's a walking ghost, I should say, and no woman at all."

"Oh, I've seen lots of 'em," answered Pinky. "She's a policy-drunkard. Bad as drinking when it once gets hold of 'em. They tiddle all the time, sell anything, beg, borrow, steal or starve themselves to get money to buy policies. She's one of 'em that's starving."

By this time they had reached the policy-office. It was in a small room on the third floor of the back building, yet as well known to the police of the district as if had been on the front street. One of these public guardians soon after his appointment through political influence, and while some wholesome sense of duty and moral responsibility yet remained, caused the "writer" in this particular office to be arrested. He thought that he had done a good thing, and looked for approval and encouragement. But to his surprise and chagrin he found that he had blundered. The case got no farther than the alderman's. Just how it was managed he did not know, but it was managed, and the business of the office went on as before.

A little light came to him soon after, on meeting a prominent politician to whom he was chiefly indebted for his appointment. Said this individual, with a look of warning and a threat in his voice, "See here, my good fellow; I'm told that you've been going out of your way and meddling with the policy-dealers. Take my advice, and mind your own business. If you don't, it will be all day with you. There isn't a man in town strong enough to fight this thing, so you'd better let it alone."

And he did let it alone. He had a wife and three little children, and couldn't afford to lose his place. So he minded his own business, and let it alone.

Pinky and her friend entered this small third-story back room. Behind a narrow, unpainted counter, having a desk at one end, stood a middle-aged man, with dark, restless eyes that rarely looked you in the face. He wore a thick but rather closely-cut beard and mustache. The police knew him very well; so did the criminal lawyers, when he happened to come in their way; so did the officials of two or three State prisons in which he had served out partial sentences. He was too valuable to political "rings" and associations antagonistic to moral and social well-being to be left idle in the cell of a penitentiary for the whole term of a commitment. Politicians have great influence, and governors are human.

On the walls of the room were pasted a few pictures cut from the illustrated papers, some of them portraits of leading politicians, and some of them portraits of noted pugilists and sporting-men. The picture of a certain judge, who had made himself obnoxious to the fraternity of criminals by his severe sentences, was turned upside down. There was neither table nor chair in the room.

The woman in black had passed in just before the girls, and was waiting her turn to examine the drawn numbers. She had not tasted food since the day before, having ventured her only dime on a policy, and was feeling strangely faint and bewildered. She did not have to wait long. It was the old story. Her combination had not come out, and she was starving. As she moved back toward the door she staggered a little. Pinky, who had become curious about her, noticed this, and watched her as she went out.

"It's about up with the old lady, I guess," she said to her companion, with an unfeeling laugh.

And she was right. On the next morning the poor old woman was found dead in her room, and those who prepared her for burial said that she was wasted to a skeleton. She had, in fact, starved herself in her infatuation, spending day after day in policies what she should have spent for food. Pinky's strange remark was but too true. She had become a policy-drunkard—a vice almost as disastrous in its effects as its kindred vice, intemperance, though less brutalizing and less openly indulged.

THE TURKISH BATH.

WE have always had a latent suspicion that a Turkish bath was not all that it pretends to be, and our impression gains some strength from the testimony of two modern travellers who have given their personal experiences in relation thereto; the late Rev. Norman Macleod, in his charming book of travels, "Eastward;" and Mark Twain, in his "Innocents Abroad." There is a singular agreement in the two narratives. First, Mr. Macleod:

A Turkish bath seems to me to be a most fitting conclusion to sight-seeing like this, in such hot weather, too. I know not, as yet, what that institution may be in London, but having endeavored to enjoy the luxury in three places—Moscow, Cairo and Damascus—and all of them being much alike in their essential features, I frankly confess that I had no wish to try the experiment again in "foreign lands." The description of one—though I cannot quite separate in my memory some of the details of the Cairo and Damascus hot-water-and-soap establishments—will serve for all.

We inquired for the best bath in the city; and our intelligent guide, Hassan, the sheik of all donkey-boys about Shepherd's Hotel—a man who, from his intercourse with the English, is assumed to have some knowledge of Western civilisation—assured us, as we were about to enter one of those boiler-houses, that it was the best in Cairo, where "all de lords Ingleso go." We bowed and entered. The outside looked very shabby. The first room was a large apartment with an uneven floor, flagged with stone-marble, of a sort, I believe. It wore a singularly liquid look, and had about it a general air of hazy, foggy damp. Hanging from the roof were innumerable long sheets drying. One end of the room was elevated, and was reached by a few steps; and on this upper floor were a series of couches, seemingly very clean, on which the half-bottled bathers reclined, smoking narghiles, and radiating forth their heat into space, thereby producing dew. To this dais we were led, and requested to undress. The genius of the place appeared in the form of an old man, evaporated into skin and bone, with a solitary tuft of hair on his head, a wet towel round his loins, and his whole body dripping. I started when I saw him—I did not know why, unless I recognized in him the image of Father Time, as pictured in tracts and almanacs, but fortunately wanting the scythe. Delivering our valuables to a patriarchal individual who sat cross-legged in a corner, we were wrapped in a sheet and led out by Time, accompanied by Leap Year. We put on wooden shoes, and passed over heated, slippery stones into another apartment, which was so hot that one felt a tendency to become browned like a toast, or to bubble over the skin. This sensation subsided gradually into a pleasing, dewy evaporation. We were then conducted to a large open vat full of water, which to us had two objections: one was that it was intolerably hot, the other that it seemed already full of donkey-boys and their friends—the head of Hassan in their midst, grinning above the surface. But, inspired by a determination to go through all the horrors of this sudoriferous dew, we clenched our teeth, tried to imagine ourselves chimney-sweeps, and jumped in.

In due time, when sufficiently saturated, we were (though, perhaps, this happened at Damascus) put in a hot chamber and laid on the floor, with cock-reaches, or what the Scotch call "clocks," crawling over it in dozens. There we lay, like turbot or eel about to be dressed for dinner.

By and by we were soaped from toe to head, lathered with soft palm-tree fibre, then had tepid, and afterward cold water poured over us, and then a monster began to crack our joints and shampoo us! He succeeded with my companion, who yelled, as the Egyptian, in fits of laughter, seemed to put every limb out of joint, and to dislocate his neck.

But when the same Pharaoh tried me, his arms fortunately could not meet around me, so after a violent struggle, in which I fought desperately and tumbled about on the floor like a salmon which a fisher tries in vain to seize around the body, he gave it up in despair, and, for the first time, probably, in his life, wiped his forehead from fatigue, as he exclaimed "Mushallah!" After sundry other minor appliances, having the same end in view—that of opening the pores of the skin—we returned to the apartment from whence we had originally started, and were there gently dried by a series of warm sheets being laid upon us. Hassan spread his carpet and said his prayers.

The sensation, after bathing, was very pleasant, no doubt, but not more so, nor calculated to do more good than what most cleanly-disposed people experience daily from the application of hot and then cold water, accompanied by the well-known substance, soap, in their quiet bath-room at home.

Doubtless I felt light and elevated when I got out, but as pleasant feelings can surely be produced without being scrubbed like a pig, rubbed down like a horse, boiled like a turkey, exhibited like a newborn infant to the curious, and without having a donkey-driver for your C. B.—all this with no other consolation than the assurance that the pores of your skin are open, forsooth—like the doors of a public institution! For my part, I prefer them closed—or, at least, ajar.

And now MARK TWAIN:

For years and years I have dreamed of the wonders of the Turkish bath; for years and years I have promised myself that I would yet enjoy one. Many and many a time, in fancy, I have lain in the marble bath, and breathed the alumberous fragrance of Eastern spices that filled the air; then passed through a weird and complicated system of pulling and hauling, and drenching and scrubbing, by a gang of naked savages who loomed vast and vaguely through the steaming mists, like demons; then rested for a while on a divan fit for a king; then passed through another complex ordeal, and one more fearful than the first; and, finally, swathed in soft fabrics, being conveyed to a princely saloon and laid on a bed of eider down, where eunuchs, gorgeous of costume, fanned me while I drowsed and dreamed, or contentedly gazed at the rich hangings of the apartment, the soft carpets, the sumptuous furniture, the pictures, and drank delicious coffee, smoked the soothing narghile, and dropped, at the last, in a tranquil repose, lulled by sensuous odors from unseen censers, by the gentle influence of the narghile's Persian tobacco, and by the music of fountains that counterfeited the pattering of summer rain.

That was the picture, just as I got it from incendiary books of travel. It was a poor, miserable imposture. The reality is no more like it than the Five Points are like the Garden of Eden.

They received me in a great court, paved with marble slabs; around it were broad galleries, one above another, carpeted with seedy matting, railed with unpainted balustrades, and furnished with huge rickety chairs, cushioned with rusty old mattresses, indented with the impressions left by the forms of nine successive generations of men who had reposed upon them. The place was vast, naked, dreary; its court a barn, its galleries stalls for human horses. The cadaverous, half-nude varlets that served in the establishment had nothing of poetry in their appearance, nothing of romance, nothing of Oriental splendor. They shed no entrancing odors—just the contrary. Their hungry eyes and their lank forms continually suggested one glaring, unsentimental fact—they wanted what they term in California "a square meal."

I went into one of the racks and undressed. An unclean starveling wrapped a gaudy table-cloth about his loins, and hung a white rag over my shoulders. If I had had a tub then, it would have come naturally to me to take in washing. I was then conducted down-stairs into the wet, slippery court, and the first thing that attracted my attention were my heels. My fall excited no comment. They expected it, no doubt. It belonged in the list of softening, sensuous influences peculiar to this home of Eastern luxury. It was softening enough, certainly, but its application was not happy. They now gave me a pair of wooden clogs—benches in miniature, with leather straps over them to confine my feet (which they would have done, only I do not wear No. 13s.) These things dangled uncomfortably by the straps when I lifted up my feet, and came down in awkward and unexpected places when I put them on the floor again, and sometimes turned sideways and wrenched my ankles out of joint. However, it was all Oriental luxury, and I did what I could to enjoy it.

They put me in another part of the barn and laid me on a stuffy sort of pallet, which was not made of cloth of gold, or Persian shawls, but was merely the unpretending sort of thing I have seen in the negro quarters of Arkansas.

There was nothing whatever in this dim marble prison but five more of these biers. It was a very solemn place. I expected that the spiced odors of Araby were going to steal over my senses now, but they did not. A copper-colored skeleton, with a rag around him, brought me a glass decanter of water with a lighted tobacco-pipe in the top of it, and a pliant stem a yard long, with a brass mouth-piece to it. It was the famous "narghile" of the East—the thing the Grand Turk smokes in the pictures. This began to look like luxury. I took one blast at it, and it was sufficient; the smoke went in a great volume down into my stomach, my lungs, even into the uttermost parts of my frame. I exploded one mighty cough, and it was as if Vesuvius had let go. For the next five minutes I smoked at every pore, like a frame house that is on fire on the inside. Not any more narghile for me. The smoke had a vile taste, and the taste of a thousand infidel tongues that remained on that brass mouth-piece was viler still. I was getting discouraged. Whenever, hereafter, I see the cross-legged Grand Turk smoking his narghile, in pretended bliss, on the outside of a paper of Connecticut tobacco, I shall know him for the shameless humbug he is.

This prison was filled with hot air. When I had got warmed up sufficiently to prepare me for a still warmer temperature, they took me where it was—into a marble room, wet, slippery and steamy, and laid me out on a raised platform in the centre. It was very warm. Presently my man set me down by a tank of hot water, drenched me well, gloved his hand with a coarse mitten, and began to polish me all over with it. I began to smell disagreeably. The more he polished the worse I smelt. It was alarming. I said to him: "I perceive that I am pretty far gone. It is plain that I ought to be buried without any unnecessary delay. Perhaps you had better go after my friends at once, because the weather is warm, and I cannot 'keep long.'"

He went on scrubbing, and paid no attention. I soon saw that he was reducing my size. He bore hard on his mitten, and from under it rolled little cylinders, like macaroni. It could not be dirt, for it was too white. He pared me down in this way for a long time. Finally I said: "It is a tedious process. It will take hours to trim me to the size you want me; I will wait; go and borrow a jack-plane."

He paid no attention at all.

After awhile he brought a basin, some soap and something that seemed to be the tail of a horse.

He made up a prodigious quantity of soap-suds, deluged me with them from head to foot, without warning me to shut my eyes, and then swabbed me viciously with the horse-tail. Then he left me there, a snowy statue of lather, and went away. When I got tired of waiting I went and hunted him up. He was propped against the wall, in another room, asleep. I woke him. He was not disconcerted. He took me back and flooded me with hot water, then turbaned my head, swathed me with dry table-cloths and conducted me to a latticed chicken-coop in one of the galleries, and pointed to one of those Arkansas beds. I mounted it, and vaguely expected the odors of Araby again. They did not come.

The blank, unornamented coop had nothing about it of that Oriental voluptuousness one reads of so much. It was more suggestive of the county hospital than anything else. The skinny servitor brought a narghile, and I got him to take it out again without wasting any time about it. Then he brought the world-renowned Turkish coffee that poets have sung so rapturously for many generations, and I seized upon it as the last hope that was left of my old dreams of Eastern luxury. It was another fraud. Of all the unchristian beverages that ever passed my lips, Turkish coffee is the worst. The cup is small, it is smeared with grounds; the coffee is black, thick, unsavory of smell and execrable in taste. The bottom of the cup has a muddy sediment in it half an inch deep. This goes down your throat, and portions of it lodge by the way, and produce a tickling aggravation that keeps you barking and coughing for an hour.

Here endeth my experience of the celebrated Turkish bath, and here also endeth my dream of the bliss the mortal revels in who passes through it. It is a magnificent swindle. The man who enjoys it is qualified to enjoy anything that is repulsive to sight or sense, and he that can invest it with a charm of poetry is able to do the same with anything else in the world that is tedious, and wretched, dismal, and nasty.

If the reader is not satisfied with the testimony above given, he had better try the bath for himself, when opportunity offers.

BESSETTING SINS.—The good man daily acquires a delicacy of moral perception and feeling, before whose penetrating gaze his inmost imperfections are laid bare. His outward blemishes, his grosser faults, may be amended. But the sins which cling closest, which wind themselves subtly through the fibres of his nature—his pride, vanity, self-conceit, self-indulgence and, above all, the disloyalty of his self will to the will of the All-Good—these grow only more apparent. He finds that to purify the fountain-head of emotion in the soul, to cleanse its depths from all that defiles it, to drive out lurking ill from its recesses and to untwine the serpent coils of selfishness from his purposes and plans, his aims and interests, is a vastly harder work than building fair walls of outer decorum. Some powerful excitement, some unwonted trial, will rouse into action lawless impulses, over whose subjection he had sung songs of triumph. Long dormant evils, awakened by adverse temptations, by a rush of prosperity or a shock of adversity, by flattery and favor, or by persecution and peril, will burst forth from their hiding-places, with such violence as almost to make him doubt the reality of his religious life. At such trying seasons, a secret ejaculation, a cry of the soul for God's grace to rescue, brings home to the good man his instant dependence. With what grateful joy does he then hold fast to the assurance, that he is never alone, for the Father is with him, that the Living Source of all good is near to him as his own life, and ready to renew him with light and strength from Heaven.—Channing's "Perfect Life."

PART IV.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER XVII.—THE DAY OF RECKONING.

WHEN Fergus reached the Harveys' cottage, he asked to speak with Miss Millicent alone. As the family were seated in the dining-room, he was shown into the little drawing-room, the same apartment, not much changed in character or detail, which had been "the parlor" of his first call years and years ago—the room which he had yearned to make the home of his heart. Nowadays, the value of one of Robina's brooches could have purchased the moneyworth of nearly all its simple decorations. But Fergus was still conscious of the old charm, albeit he now saw it with a qualification. "If there was only a Turkey carpet on the floor, and a little oak carving, and a few bits of rare china, I should wish nothing better than this." And then it flashed into his mind that, after all, he might stay in London, and might even come to live here. There could be a very feasible excuse for such a descent from the magnificence of Acre Hall, in "that Millicent was the last daughter at home, and wished to keep her mother with her, and Mrs. Harvey could not be induced to leave her old quiet way of life." It was not ignorance of the world that made Fergus ready to believe that people would accept the subterfuge—it was only an egotism which made him feel that if he himself could "make believe" to believe it, other people might surely do the same! Sitting in the quiet, shadowy room, as the fever of misery cooled down in poor Fergus's heart, the miserable old vanity and ambition rose again—no brave determination to face the worst, and make the best of it, but a cowardly resolve not to look at the worst, not to believe in it, nay, to stoutly deny it. So there have been commanders who have thought to turn defeat into victory by calling it such. Probably they have won very few real victories afterward.

Millicent did not keep him waiting long. Nay, the moment she heard his voice in the hall, she rose from the table where she was drawing. Yet she lingered in the dining-room to allow the servant to retire to the kitchen, before she crossed the hall. Nor did she go straight into the dining-room, but paused at the little hall window, and looked up at the darkening sky where the stars were just coming out. Her heart was leaping within her. Think not that it leaped with any sweet, wild fancies. She knew what he was come about, and why he wished to speak with her alone. But this friendship had been the very soul of her life, and the merest stirring among its drooped leaves was more to her than the budding of any other flower. Millicent was not a woman to magnify trifles and flutter over small interests. But what is a trifle? Some faces that would not brighten at news of a fortune, would quiver and break into mingled smiles and tears over a found letter in a dead hand's writing. Some hearts that would bear with equanimity the smashing of old china, or the loss of gems and gold, would burn and break at the accidental destruction of some worn baby's shoe or old faded book. Ah, the veriest rag is priceless if a life is wrought into it! There was no thought of wooing between herself and Fergus Laurie, and Millicent never dreamed that the old friendship could ever again be more than a friendly way of doing business together. But in that very doing business, in curtest note, or driest transaction, would be concentrated the essence, not of what there was, or ever had been, but of that mighty "might have been" which lies around most lives as vaguely and as grandly as astronomical possibilities surround our little terra firma.

Then she went into the drawing-room, and the two sat down opposite each other. And Fergus asked after Mrs. Harvey and each member of the family, remarked on the weather, and commented on the public news, till Milly began to feel restless, and to say within herself that they need not sit there, elle-dit-elle, to say things which might have been shouted through a speaking-trumpet in the street. At last, with her old frankness, she herself led up to the subject in hand, by asking directly: "Did you get a letter from me this afternoon, Mr. Laurie?"

"Yes, I did," Fergus answered quickly, and gave her one swift glance, and let his eyes drop on the carpet. There was only a moment's pause, then he spoke again. "As to the matter it mentioned, I cannot accept the loan you offer. You see the sum is but small, and it would involve our firm in as much responsibility and obligation as if it was ever so large. You might want it back at junctures when it might be inconvenient to return it promptly. You would feel harassed and nervous when you heard of the fluctuations of business. Altogether, there are a hundred reasons, some not easy to put into words, why it would not be right or wise of me to accept the loan of a sum which, while very important to you, is too small for commercial uses."

"Be it as you please. I had no wish that it should be a trouble to you." Millicent's voice was cold, and it was not every ear that could detect its repressed pain.

"And so you manage all your affairs yourself," Fergus went on, feverishly. "I think that is too much, for however small one's affairs may be, they are still one's affairs, and a great burden and responsibility. I wonder your brother does not insist upon relieving you."

"He knows me too well; he knows it would not matter if he did," said Millicent. "He has his own wife and boy to look after, and mother, too, would come upon him altogether in some events. I don't approve of single women hanging like millstones about their men-folk, and what I don't approve, I try not to do, Mr. Laurie."

There was no malice in her words. Only strong pride. She had no thought of Robina; nay, in such a case, she would have freely granted that a sister who was fulfilling some of a wife's duties had a just claim to some of a wife's rights.

"But the more you speak thus, and the more I think of your life, and feel how noble you are, the more I think how much better and happier it would be for you if there was some one whose right to love and care for you, you would not even wish to gain-say."

Millicent writhed too much under the implied pity of these words to reflect on any other possible meaning. She felt the color rush to her cheek, in no womanly flush, but in a hot spot on each cheek. But she had her ready answer.

"Almost every fact in life has its better. But it has also its worse; and the two chances often lie very near together."

"But the strong heart in all its strength craves love and care as much as the weakest," said Fergus Laurie, "and it values them far more, because it gets them so seldom. It values themselves. The weaker value them for what they get. I knew many a woman who thinks she loves a man because she loves the ease and shelter he gives her."

Millicent sat silent. She heard his words, but she scarcely connected them with him who spoke. They were like an echo, mocking through her emptied heart. Ah, so true! But she could love, Love. Ay, though it took from her such leisure and luxury as she had earned for herself, and made her a moiled, driven woman like this one or that one, whose prematurely old faces and bent gray heads rose before her mind's eye. But there remained a secret about this which Millicent did not know yet, and could not guess, or her eyes might have been as content, and her heart as full and satisfied, as are the eyes and heart of many a lonely woman.

Oh, Fergus—poor Fergus! there is another chance in life for you yet! Young reader, fearful lest there be no bright possibilities in your own path, take this fact from one who has seen much. For one life that is dwarfed for want of "a chance," a thousand are ruined by the waste of scores of chances. Shakespeare himself tells us of the tide in the affairs of men, and of the disastrous consequence of losing it. Is it presumption for me to add that the tide seldom fails to return again and again, only that the loss of it is likely to be repeated? If pride, or indolence, or anger, kept us prisoner ashore when the last flood of fortune came in, we may lament its ebb how we like, but unless we set about building our harbor, we shall be no better off next tide.

Few of us poor, short-sighted creatures ever really blame ourselves. We sigh over our past—the domineering parent regrets his undutiful childhood, the lazy matron censures her gadding girlhood, the money-making man blames his money-spending youth. But the old tree of wilful selfishness is left still growing, be it in blossom or in fruit. We might all of us be very wise and good if the old events happened again. But they never do. In moral, as in intellectual schools, the habits are worth more than the lessons.

An over-weening vanity, an egotism that could be cold and cruel in its own assumed interest, had been the bane of Fergus Laurie's life. Looking back as he had looked back in the early part of this very evening, he had detected the wrong turns his career had taken. But the man who had put himself first in everything, who would be king before he had fought, and master before he had served, had not put himself in a way to be favored with a grand self-revelation which should show him that "before honor goeth humility."

He wanted Millicent to love him and to help him—to be friend and counsellor—to give his downfall a glory which his prosperity had never had; he wanted her to give him courage—to bear him up on the strong pinions of her independent spirit. It may not sound very noble or heroic. But it was human. And it was the plain truth. And it has an appeal to the chivalry of womanhood. Many "a ladye" has tended her knight through suffering not encountered in her cause, and then walked contentedly by his limping steps afterward. But Fergus Laurie shrank from this truth as he had shrank from many truths. There is a species of cowardice which hides itself in haunted chambers.

"Millicent," he said, using her unprefix name almost for the first time during all these years, "I don't want you to go on working for me as you have done; I don't want you to continue burdening yourself with money matters. I want you to have no more work and no more care but the happy work and cares of a sheltered wife. I want you to be my own wife, Millicent. Won't you trust me to take care of you?"

For Millicent had sprung up, and crossed the room away from him. Perhaps he had tried to take her hand. Perhaps he had not. She did not know, and she never knew. Only her heart was ablaze with what seemed to her the bitterest insult she could undergo. Had she been left free, through her bright youth, to be asked in marriage out of pity, in the mellow days of maturity? Was it to this that her honest desire of friendly independence had brought her? Could he only construe her offer of business-like service as a forlorn feeler of a life craving his munificent support and protection? Was it possible that he could even imagine that she had made it as a sort of appeal? Robina might have suggested this to him. Robina was just the woman to do so. Was she not always imagining that every lady was angling for the glory of being the great manufacturer's wife, and hankering after the splendors of Acre Hall? But, never mind that! The bitterness, after all, lay between their two selves—Fergus and Millicent. It was quite impossible for him to regard her as anything but a mere lay figure on which to drape his bounties! And suddenly, in that moment of silence, it flashed upon her that this man was a vain and paltry man—a mere gilt image which only her own imagination had set up and hall-marked. Perhaps, in her pain she was scarcely just to him, and became too bitterly skeptical of all the possibilities of a nature that had so grievously disappointed her. We are all apt to rush to this extreme. The strongest faith in physiognomy can scarcely credit that all absconding parties are as ugly as they are described, else it must have been only fools who ever trusted them!

The end had come to Millicent's dream. It had held but half sway over her for a long time. She had been, as it were, in the hour between darkness and dawn, that state when we wonder which is true, our dream or our awakening. But now her eyes were quite open. And she knew that though the man Fergus Laurie was still alive, and that his life was nearer hers than it had ever been before, still her hero was lost and gone, sunk forever in that dark, silent sea of bitter waters which never gives up its dead.

Then she remembered that he sat gazing at her, and awaiting her answer.

"Mr. Laurie," she said, slowly and quietly, "I have no doubt you mean to be very kind. But as you are so candid in your kindness, you will let me be candid in return. I have tried the work and the care, and the struggle for which you pity me. And I know by experience that at their best they may be very happy, and at their worst they are very bearable. The only real sting I have ever had came from none of these things. It came from a professed kindness. There are kindnesses which are like a couch of nettles, whoever has once rested on such will rather sit upright for the rest of his days, than risk more of such repose! Do not mention marriage to me again, Mr. Laurie," she added, her manner softening a little. "Forget that you have ever mentioned it. As for our relations to each other, I have long felt that I was not giving you satisfaction, or, at least, that something was wrong. I am sorry you did not say so plainly to me, I am sure I could have borne it, and it would have relieved you and myself from a great deal of uneasiness. Your silence did not prevent me from feeling that I was burdensome, and though it may be ungracious for me to say this now, it was only a desire to be in some little way useful and business-like which prompted my unfortunate offer of my money. For I do not yet trouble myself much about the income from my savings. So long as I have something stored against a rainy day, I hope to earn—in one way if not another—all I need for many years yet to come. Your old firm renewed their many offers of work, oddly enough, this morning. I have not answered their note yet. I shall answer it favorably now. It will be best for both of us, Mr. Laurie," and she smiled sadly. "You see, there is a prosaic time when an offer of work is more acceptable than an offer of marriage."

"Ah, you will find it a very different thing to work for them," said Fergus, drearily.

"Shall I?" asked Millicent, with the chill returning to her voice. "On the contrary, had I been working for them for the last ten years, at the terms they offered me then, and which they renew and improve now, I might have had savings better worth your investing in your business—sixteen hundred pounds instead of eight hundred."

Fergus sprang up and walked hastily toward the door.

"I do not want to say these things," cried poor Milly. "I want to be friends—as much as we can!" (pathetic qualification). "I like to be grateful. It was awfully bitter when I began to doubt and wonder why I was so. Why should you want to set up your own self-respect on the ruins of other people's, Mr. Laurie? You have a great commercial name, and Acre Hall, and a grand circle of friends; will not all these content you without saying that even my wage is the dole of your charity?"

Fergus stood still. He wondered mistily how it would be if he threw himself at her feet, and owned that his prosperity had been but a gigantic sham, and that he was really a homeless, friendless, ruined man—far poorer than she herself was, not only in habit and courage, but even in purity—thrown upon her pitiful woman's heart for forgiveness and comfort and upholding. He might have done this an hour ago. But he said to himself that he could not do this now. It was too late.

Too late! And he turned and looked at Milly—one look, which she never forgot, though she did not understand it till afterward. And without a word, without a good-night, he went away.

Millicent went back to the family room for a moment, and excused herself on the score of a headache, and crept away to her own chamber. She lay down in the darkness, but she did not think. People never do think when their hearts are bruised by the fall of an idol, or broken up by the digging of a grave. Only picture after picture arose before her mind.

The first picture that rose was that sunny road where she had walked with David Maxwell that morning when he found she was something nearer to Fergus than he was himself. But memory repeated that picture as copies are made—somehow the faces were turned the other way.

Then she saw the great chestnut trees that overhung the walls of Acre Hall, and she seemed to look through the great gates and see the cool green lawn, and the fresh hyacinths and primulas planted out in the flower beds. But it did not seem to rise before her as Fergus Laurie's home—as a house where she had been a familiar guest. Rather it was invested with the sleepy, scented mystery that it had for her in the days when she first came to Hackney, when it was inhabited by two old maiden ladies, whose peacocks she used to feed through the railings on Saturday afternoons.

Then her brother's figure came. But not as the well-to-do author, with a beautiful wife and a tall son of his own. The successful books and the wife and the son, all floated dimly round, like the phantasmagoria of a half-developed dream. The reality seemed those old, old days, when they all had to plan so cleverly to make him look nice for his evening parties and when they watched so sharply for reviews and were so indignant over the naughty ones! Ah me, ah me, while we sleep we blend real sounds with the music of our dreams, and when we awake all seem alike unreal.

And through each of the strange disjointed pictures, there seemed to walk a shadowy, nameless figure, whose face she never saw.

The mind has its fevers apart from the body.

Millicent did not pray that night. Unless there was a prayer in the words, which she caught herself repeating, half aloud, again and again,—“God knows—but I could not help it—God knows.”

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE DAY OF REVEALING.

THE common daylight brought back the simple prose of life. Millicent had to take her accustomed place at the breakfast-table, to profess enjoyment of the omelet which was their little servant's latest and highest work of culinary art, and to feign interest in the royal marriage of which the newspaper was full. Nay, heedless and indifferent in her self-absorption, she had often done these things less carefully than she did them to-day. We all of us forget and fail in our duties sometimes, but it is at bottom a sound heart which remembers them in the day of its calamity, and takes the broken spars of its wrecked hope to build up the household fire.

Only Millicent could not settle to any work. She went away to her studio, and toyed with paper and pencils. She wrote a note in answer of the old firm's offer, saying that she would call at their office in a few days and enter into negotiations. Then she sat down in what she called her “resting chair,” and folded her hands and wondered, “Was it all over, or was it not? And what would come next? Was it really true?” She hardly believed anything yet. She would scarcely have wondered if she had woken up and found it was all only a dream; that she was a girl still, and Fergus a poor clerk as he used to be. It was like the first day after a death.

A knock at the street door roused her. It was a knock she knew, and yet it was strange. With haste and earnestness, she went to the stair-head, and listened to the voices in the hall.

It was she who was wanted again, asked for almost in the same words that had been used the night before. “Is Miss Harvey within? Can I speak to her alone? Tell her I will not detain her long, but my business is very urgent.”

This time it was David Maxwell's voice, and Millicent having heard his request, made no pretence of awaiting a summons, but went straight down-stairs, and followed David into the drawing-room. She did not give herself time to wonder what had brought him. Looking back afterward upon the stunned bewilderment of that morning, she compared it to the pause between the first rumble of an earthquake, and the final crash.

She held out her hand to Mr. Maxwell, and he took it, but instead of the usual commonplace words of greeting, he said, eagerly: “Has Fergus Laurie been here?”

“Yes,” said Millicent, amazed; “he was here last evening.”

“Ah, last evening, according to the arrangement he made before he left the counting-house. About what time was he here, Miss Milly?”

“He was not here more than half an hour. It must have been nearly nine when he went away,” answered the bewildered Millicent, with that judicial precision which is natural to all of us when replying to questions whose drift we do not understand. “But why? what is the matter?”

“He has not been home all night; he has not come to the office this morning,” David explained. “His visit to you is the last trace we have of him, unless, indeed, you can give us a clue.”

Millicent was silent. And her womanly heart stood still. Had there been real love masked in Fergus's fantastic vanity, and had she wounded it to the quick by her sharp, stern words? A woman does not hate a man whose honest suit she has refused. Nay, often after her fiat has gone forth, there comes a spell of relenting and self-distrust, when a renewed appeal would be very dangerous to her firmness. And even when this could not be the case, when there stands between them a something which cannot be set aside, there will always be a latent tenderness in even her bitterest censure.

“No doubt he felt very deeply the necessity for speaking to you on such a subject,” said David. “But he was quite calm when he talked it over with me. Did he show any excitement to you?”

Millicent looked up blankly into David's face. What could it all mean? Had he actually confided to his coadjutor that he was going to make her an offer of marriage to console her for the loss of the work he considered she was no longer fit for? Or had he only consulted about the loan she had proffered? Perhaps it was David who had advised him not to accept it. But there could be no particular cause for excitement over anything relating to that.

David thought he understood her silence. That she did not know how far Fergus had spoken to him in confidence, and was anxious to keep his counsel.

“I only ask you what his manner was, and whether he gave any hint as to where he was going?”

he asked, gently. "I will not ask what he said about his affairs. I know all that is urgent on that point. But these other questions I must press for his sake. They concern his well-being—perhaps his very life!"

"His life!" Millicent echoed, and sat down on the nearest chair.

"Will you not tell me what he said to you?" pleaded David.

"No, I cannot," she answered. "It would not be right for me to do so. But you can tell what you expected he would say, and I will tell you if you are wrong."

"Yesterday afternoon," said David, "we agreed that he was to call upon you, and tell you that in the present precarious condition of the firm, it would be to your advantage to seek an engagement elsewhere, and that you should be immediately paid up the sum that is owing to you. The firm cannot be carried on any longer under its present management. You should not have had such a sudden notice, but that Fergus has struggled on and hoped against hope. But he felt it would be all taken out of his hands by his creditors, after one of them had gone so far as to put a man in possession of Acre Hall. But Fergus seemed at once to take it calmly, and I thought he would find it rather a comfort than otherwise to talk it over to a tried old friend like you."

Millicent's face had grown gray while he spoke.

"He spoke to me as a prosperous man," she cried, "and I answered him as such. I thought no other. Fergus Laurie is a dishonorable man!"

David sat silent for a few minutes, and then he asked softly, "Did he say nothing to you of what I have related? Nothing about the money?"

"Only that he would not take it. He said it was not worth while," said Millicent.

"Would not take it—not worth while!" David repeated, astonished in his turn. "What money is this?"

"The eight hundred pounds I offered to lend him yesterday," Millicent answered, helplessly.

She did not feel like a middle-aged, responsible woman—a woman who had done piles of work, who had saved money. She felt like a girl again, in the pitiful sense of the phrase, with a girlish sense of outsideness, a girlish belief that men must be different, after all, and nearer to each other, much as she had fancied on that old day, that if she, a nobody, knew something, David, friend and fellow-man, must know so much more.

"I knew nothing of that," David said, gravely. "The only money mentioned between us was the sum the firm owes you. As you did not call for it this morning, I have brought it with me now," and he laid upon the table, not a check, but notes for the full amount.

"He said nothing of that," Millicent replied. "He spoke of my not doing any more work. I thought nothing of the debt, I knew it would be paid sooner or later. And then the subject was changed, and not a word was said about anything you have mentioned to-day. Only it was quite settled I was not to work for him any more."

"Did you press the loan of your money?" David asked.

"No; he said it was too small a sum to be troubled with. I had thought that perhaps it might be serviceable using money, for I knew the firm must have great expenses, though I never dreamed it was not splendidly prosperous. I never did! If I had, I should not have chosen this time to speak as I did. But Fergus Laurie is a dishonorable man!"

David Maxwell sat before her with a secret and sorrowful guess as to what else his friend had said to her, and as to how she had answered. He thought of her patient, laborious life—of her many brave responsibilities, but though he thought within himself that he was glad she had not offered her money till it was too late for Fergus to hope anything by grasping it, what he said, was, "I am glad, at least, that he did not accept your loan."

"Do you think I care so much for that?" she cried, scornfully. "I would freely give all that I have that this should never have happened."

"God forgive him, and keep all of us," said David, sadly. "Think what his sin is costing him. Poor Fergus! How different he might have been!"

"I doubt it," she laughed bitterly.

But at that moment there rose before her that first evening with the Lauries, and her outburst of girlish heat, and Fergus's quiet remark, "I can believe you would." And she covered her face with her hands, and two hot tears came, hard, as if drawn heavily up from the depths of her whole nature.

"Does anybody else know anything of last evening's interview?" David pleaded again. "I must ask, for we must find him."

"Nobody knows anything," she said, drearily. "I supposed he was going straight home. He was quite cool. But I thought he looked at me strangely; and now I remember, he did not say good-night."

"Then, in fact, the simplest truth does not require that I should alter anything that I have already told Miss Robina, namely, that I believed her brother had arranged to come here on business—in fact, to tell you that your connection with his firm had better cease."

Millicent's face colored hotly.

"That is all that is to be told," she said. "If you like, you can add that I spoke rather sharply—about business!"

David drew a long breath, and rose from his seat.

"What are you going to do?" Millicent asked, rising also. "What does Robina think? What does his mother say?"

"They are both excited," David answered. "And they speak so. It is hard for them now, with this terror and suspense added to the misery of the man in possession, and the ruin of everything."

"They have brought most of it upon themselves," said Millicent, sharply.

"Does not that add to the agony?" asked David, gently. "Ay, whether they own it to themselves or no. Isn't that all the difference between the crown of martyrdom and the blot of capital punishment? As for your inquiry, what am I going to do? I scarcely know. Every moment may bring us some clue that we cannot dream of now. We must deal as gently with him as we can, we must leave him hope that there is a way up again even yet, poor fellow!"

Softer tears were gathering in Milly's eyes. She did not dream that it was the patient face and holy words of the man before her that were touching the sweeter springs of her nature. She had not yet had leisure so utterly to abolish her old idol worship; she only thought the gentler mood came from the old tender memories, even from a little remorse for the righteous judgment that she had dealt out at so unsuitable a time.

"I spoke to him last night as I should never have spoken to a failed and chagrined man," she said. "If I can do anything to help you, I am ready. Do you think it would be any comfort to the Lauries to see me, as I was the last person who saw him?"

She asked it humbly, for Milly was a magnanimous woman, who would humiliate herself an ell for every inch that she sinned, and who wanted to do this so much that she would even do it at the peril of laying herself open to the old sore accusation of coming to spy out the barrenness of the land. Perhaps she was more magnanimous than wise. If one does chance to tread on a serpent, that is no reason why one should take it up and warm it in one's bosom.

David stood thoughtful. He knew that Mrs. and Miss Laurie had been ready to say hard things of Millicent during his interview with them that morning. But he thought that was because they believed her cold and calculating in this their day of adversity. He thought of his own hard time of anguish, long years ago now, and how Christian's note of invitation had come to him like a burst of sunshine. He forgot that he rose from his knees to see that burst of sunshine. He thought that it would do those two poor desolate women good to see a familiar face that had some share of its own in their trouble. It would surely soften them and save them from that spirit of hard defiance which is the deadly mortification of sorrow. They might writhe and cry out, and be petulant and reproachful; he could fancy that, but he could trust Millicent's patience now; it would never be fallen pride that she would humble, it would not be stung hands that she would smite. He had rather she had gone without asking his advice, but as this was done, he would give what seemed to him right for her and for them. If, as he half feared, Fergus already lay a dead man somewhere among the rushes by the river side, it would be a comfort for her to know that she had laid the bitterness in her heart, and forgiven him and his before she knew it. Therefore he said: "I think you could be a great comfort to them. I cannot quite understand them. They are much excited in one way, but in another they are strangely cool. That is often one feature in great excitement. Of course, they will know that you know, and you will speak with them as knowing all. I can understand their wishing to keep everything as quiet as possible, but they are making such efforts to set forth that everything is quite right. I suppose the very servants imagine that their master has gone away about business. Miss Robina went with the cook to market this morning, and I heard her tell the parlor-maid which flower they will have for their table decoration to-day. It is like setting up one's will to keep out the coming ocean-tide. It must be a terrible state of mind. But a little friendly sympathy will bring about a more natural feeling. I tell you all this, only that you may be prepared. If you will get ready now, I will take you with me as I go back."

Millicent made no delay. She went into the parlor and told her mother and Miss Brook that there was great trouble in Acre Hall, adding frankly that she was not at liberty to tell them any more then, and that they need not mention even this meagre fact to anybody else. The two ladies asked questions in a breath.

"Is anybody ill?" inquired Mrs. Harvey. "Because, if so, I ought to go instead of you. You are not strong enough for nursing or sitting up, and you will not lay by when you are done, but will go straight back to your work."

"Is he in difficulties at last?" asked Miss Brook. "I always knew you'd gain a loss by him some day, but he need not have failed when he was owing you so much, as I feel certain he does just now."

"Nobody is ill," said Millicent; "and as for any money due to me, it is sent to me in full this morning; and as I am not to do any more work for the firm, your evil prophecies are not true, Miss Brook?"

"Then you've come off better than some folk will," were the parting words which Miss Brook threw behind her as Millicent left the room. But her mother followed her up-stairs and sat down opposite her as she hastily put on her bonnet and wraps.

"I wish you could say something else to me, Milly," she pleaded, wistfully.

Millicent put her arms round her mother's neck. She had not done so for years and years. "Oh, mother, mother!" she wailed, "don't you remember you didn't love your mother less when you couldn't tell her everything?"

"God be with you, my darling!" said Mrs. Harvey. "There's many a meaning to the text, 'When father and mother forsake, then the Lord taketh us up.'" And she let her go.

David and Millicent did not speak much to each other as they walked to Acre Hall. David opened the great gates himself, and as they went up to the carriage sweep he said to Millicent: "I will send in word that you are here, and then Miss Laurie can choose which room she will receive you in, as she prefers to keep all out of hearing of the servants."

The parlor-maid admitted them—a smart, saucy girl, who had caught the habit of the house, and had one manner for grand strange visitors, and another for familiar connected comers, especially such as Miss Harvey, whose dresses did not cost so much as her own Sunday best.

• Millicent sat down wearily while the girl scornfully took in their message. The great, fair house, with its rich scents and its soft coloring, seemed so like a haunted palace—ay, haunted for her, not yet with disembodied ghosts astray from their spiritual homes, however soon that, too, was to be—but with wailing ghosts that had never found bodies, and had no abiding place above earth, or below it.

She was so shocked and stunned that she did not notice how long the girl was away, till she heard her mincing steps returning along the corridor. She had a conscious simper on her face.

"Please, ma'am, but Miss Laurie is very sorry that, as it is not yet visiting hours, she happens to be engaged and unprepared to receive visitors, and so cannot have the pleasure of seeing you to-day, as she could not think of asking you to wait. But if Mr. Maxwell will step into the library, she says she will see him in a few minutes, as she knows he is on business, and that mustn't be trifled with."

"Very well, I will return presently," responded David, offering his arm to Millicent, who said not one word, but rose up, white and stony, and followed him.

The servant shut the door behind them, and went back to the kitchen, where she put her own version on the incident.

"I shouldn't wonder but master is keeping that Miss Harvey out of her money, as well as other people, and that missis knows it. Lawks, but here's the new damask drawing-room curtains been put down in damp, and all stained. Well, how can anybody think of everything with a strange man about, and such a deal of changing and worry? I'm a doing my best, an' as for character, I reckon I'll have to go back on my old-school certificate, and my aunt's good word, for a character from this house won't be worth much, I'm thinking."

Whether or not David believed that Robina, behind all her subterfuge, was anxiously waiting for news of her brother—he did not return to her till he had seen Millicent safe back in her own home.

He spoke to her as they went along.

"Never mind," he said, "you don't need any pity. She does, poor thing, most of all for this."

"What is the use of forgiving, if the forgiveness is rejected?" cried Millicent; "why need we make a missile to be flung back at ourselves?"

"Hush, hush," he pleaded. "The forgiveness is our part, the other is not. If people will not have our loving-kindness, I think God takes care of it. He looks after all wasted things."

"Why doesn't He look after them before they are wasted?" said Millicent, hardly. "Is not a full heart and life better worthy Him than empty ones?"

"Not always," David answered, quietly. "For perhaps there is something in them which will not let Him wholly in, and He empties them that He may fill them better."

"But can affection—can friendship keep out God?" asked Millicent. "Are not all good things of Him?"

"Yes," said David. "All good things. But nothing ever takes those away. We can no more be separated from them than we can from the love of God itself."

"Was not your love for Fergus a good thing?" she asked. "And have you got it still?" she added, bitterly.

David drew a long sigh. "Yes, I think I have," he said. "A great deal of something has gone away from it. God can't endure mistakes or falsities of any kind. They must go; they are not the love."

"Can anybody love a creature from whom they can expect nothing that is good?" Millicent asked again.

"Thank God, yes! God does. Christ knew the evil that was in human nature, and yet loved it well enough to die for it. And He did not say, 'I am willing to die for men, but not by their hands.' We could all of us make sacrifices in our own way—the burnt-offerings that God does not delight in, but we have to make them in God's way, even though they be but our own troubled spirit and broken heart."

Millicent walked silent till she came to her own door, and then she turned to him and said: "If you think again that I can be of any use anyhow, do not fail to let me know. I will be ready. I can but try, and I will."

"I know it," he answered. "Do not imagine for a moment that I doubt it."

And she disappeared in her mother's cottage, and he went back to Acre Hall.

CHAPTER XIX.

D. M. AND M. H.

IN less than two hours David returned to Millicent.

He had news. An "Eastern Counties" railway porter had brought a letter to Robina. It had been given him by a gentleman in the station early that morning. The man described the gentleman as "a short gentleman, quiet enough in manner, but snappy-like. Didn't know what train he went by, or whether he went by any. Guessed he did though, as it was the Harwich train guard that called him to wait upon him. Reckoned the guard would know all about that."

Robina had shown David the letter, which said nothing more than this:—

"The creditors may do their worst; it won't hurt me now. I will not see D. M. or M. H. again. It is too bad."

David only hastened to follow up the railway porter's information. The morning's train to Harwich must be just about its destination. So David telegraphed to the guard, if possible to detain the traveller who had called for the porter, and, if not possible, to telegraph at what station he got out, and what he did.

The answer had come speedily: "Passengers had all cleared off before message arrived. Gentleman got out at Harwich, and called a boy to carry his great-coat. Don't know which way he went. Don't know the boy; but have seen him at the station before."

David had rapidly come to the conclusion that he must go down to Harwich and pursue the search himself. It did not matter in the least that he felt he was the "D. M.," whom the poor wanderer did not wish to meet again; nay, that was the more reason that such meeting should be swiftly made an accomplished fact, will he, nill he. He could understand and pity Fergus, in his physical and moral humiliation, hiding away from the two pairs of eyes that had been used to regard him with such proud trustfulness. But in this state of cowering misery, repentance was likely to be only useless remorse—a stone about his soul to sink it, not a staff to help it up. Therefore Fergus must be brought to stand upright in his altered position, and to bear to see affectionate faces with forgiveness and patience in them instead of pride.

This was what he came to say to Millicent Harvey, and this was what she said to him:

"Go at once; and in case I could be of any use in reassuring him—in case it would be well for me to soften some of the hard things I said last night, I will follow you in the course of the evening, if possible; if not, I will be there early to-morrow morning. I will invite one of my nephews to come with me, and then my sudden absence at the seaside will not provoke any comment out of my own family circle."

"I could not have asked you to do so much," said David, warmly. "But the very fact that you, who, I am quite sure, know so much more than I know, will do this, will surely be his salvation, for earth and for Heaven."

It was characteristic of Millicent that she instructed David. "Do not take rooms for us; we will take them when we arrive. I could not stay at any hotel. Let me choose my own place."

Millicent knew what was due to her mother. Though she was a middle-aged, independent, and somewhat unconfiding spinster, she would not take a step like this, leaving Mrs. Harvey wholly in the dark. Her sense of justice and mercy, too, revolted from the over-common practice of treading down the feelings of a dozen true hearts, to spare those of a perverted one, which is a species of humanity that might possibly prescribe a bath of innocent blood to refresh the weariness of a satiated debauchee. Millicent had felt, though she had scarcely noticed, this same consideration in David Maxwell. In all his eager pity for the Lauries, he had never in one iota attempted to sacrifice her feelings or comfort for theirs. He had asked her to do nothing; he had left all to her own free will. If we have a right in this world, it is the right to sacrifice ourselves. But so many people think their right is rather to sacrifice others!

While she hastily packed up her clothes, Millicent told her mother about it all. She did not tell her all about it. She told of Fergus's gradual fall, of their conversation on the previous night, and of her own severity and his flight. She did not tell of the offer of marriage. But reading between the lines, Mrs. Harvey felt it was there, though she could not tell where—no, not whether it was years ago or only yesterday.

Millicent's proposed escort did not fail her. "Grandmamma" went to invite him, and it must have been a strange request of "grandmamma's" that George and Christian did not instantly grant. The boy himself was glad of the holiday, and the glimpse of the ocean, without much thought of his companion; but when grandmamma, who herself went to the station to see them off, drew him aside and told him to take particular care of "Aunt Millicent," then the boy felt that she was in some way a charge of his, and tried to fulfil his duties by carefully adjusting the railway carriage windows, by pressing her to eat biscuits, and pointing out the noticeable houses and churches on the road.

There could not have been a more unromantic-seeming pair of travellers. Of the two, superficial eyes would have seen more possibilities of pathos in the bright-looking lad with his merry chatter, than in the prim woman, who looked quite elderly as the deepening twilight made shadows on her face. Though she answered him cheerily, Robert Harvey soon felt that she wanted to be undisturbed, and let her sit in silence, watching the sunset, one of those sad spring sunsets, which seem like the last good-bye of a young life, that yet has lasted long enough for its own happiness.

They reached Harwich at last, and found David on the platform, having come there for the chance of meeting them. Though he had obeyed Millicent's orders not to take rooms for her, he had reconnoitred the place, and discovered two or three houses that he could particularly recommend to her notice. And while young Robert Harvey started a British boy's eager talk to the briny lad who volunteered to carry their luggage, David and Millicent dropped behind to hear and to tell the latest news.

"He cannot be far off," David informed her. "I have found the boy that he employed at the railway station, and he took him to the principal hotel here, where he lunched. He left soon after. No steamer has left Harwich to-day, since the hour when he came in, and nobody of his description has gone away in any coach. From his coming here, I fancy he must mean to leave by the German boat, and will probably stay in some quiet lodging till its time for starting. Very likely he will wander about after dark. I mean to wander too. There are not so many ways here, that we are very likely to miss each other. And I shall take care to see all the passengers go on board the steamer. You see, Miss Harvey, the question is not merely one of finding him, but of finding him quietly, and bringing him to a calm state of mind. Therefore we must resort to no means likely to defeat this end."

Millicent assented, but her heart felt sick within her, and her face looked so gray and worn that David was glad that she was satisfied with the first lodging to which he conducted her. So, with an assurance that he would see her early in the morning, he committed her to the care of the motherly landlady whose neatness and cheerfulness had attracted his attention to her very humble house.

"Now, you're just dead tired, miss," the good woman chattered; "an' if you'll take my advice you'll go straight off to your own room and stay there, an' I'll bring you up a cup o' tea and a bite of nice fish. Don't you trouble about the young gentleman, miss, I'll lay you my best china pot, he'll soon find his way into the kitchen to my old man, and then he won't want for yarning. They'll make up to each other, easy, miss, for our dog Gill has got her pups down under the dresser, and dogs, and pups especial, is a fine subject to begin talk upon."

Millicent was too tired in heart and limbs to rebel. Nay, she felt it a pleasure to be ordered—a gratification which, like most strong-willed people, she was little likely to get from those who knew her best.

Nor had she any occasion to regret exchanging the little tawdry parlor for the sleeping apartment. This was a long, low room running the whole length of the old house. It did not look like a room carelessly furnished for shifting inmates. There were two or three really good prints on the walls, and a lounging chair stood between the window and the fire-place, with an occasional table, and a bracket with books placed near it. Millicent noted all this half unconsciously. This would be her home for a piece of her life that could never fail to be memorable.

"Ah, it's a nice room, isn't it?" said the chatty landlady, going to a cupboard in the wall, and rattling out a little tea service. "These cups go with this room, and I always keep them and wash 'em up on the shelf outside—they never go into the kitchen to be knocked up against the pewters and willow-patterns. This was my dear lady's room, and these were her cups, and this is how she left everything. Them's her books. Dear, dear, she were a blessed woman if ever were—though I didn't dare say so to her, it made her that sad. 'I'm no better than the worst of the girls in the town,' she would say to me, so softly, 'and there's few of those poor things that have had thoughts of murder as I had once,' she would say. 'It's a wonder I didn't rush before God with my hands red with my fellow-sinner's blood.' I never knew the story rightly, miss, only she'd gone wrong in her young days—most likely been awfully deceived—for, anyhow, something cast up that made her hate the man she'd loved too well—maybe she found out he'd been married all along, and she started off on a long journey, with a knife in her pocket to stab him. And then she said, 'God met her.' You should have seen her face, miss, when she said that! It was kind as if she saw Him before her. She never said a word more about it, no more than Moses talked much o' whatever he saw on the top o' the mountain. She turned off on her journey and came here. She was a fine-brought-up lady that could paint, and sing, and speak the languages, but there was no work to be had for the likes of her but a common servant's place at a little eating-house. And there she lived, and slaved, and by and by, she took to going among them poor bad girls that is always about where there's sailors, and many a good word she spoke, and many a good deed she did, unbeknown, while she was earning her bread—cooking and washing up. At last, a minister heard of her, and got her a little salary to give her more time for doing good. She didn't have it very long, but in the meantime she got into the way of getting the fine sorts of needlework, and she did as much, and earned as much as if she'd done nothing else, but every evening she was out, and many an one she's saved, and many an one she's snatched out the fire. She lived in this room, and she died in it; and whoever she was, and whatever she'd been, a saint went to glory when she was taken. She was mighty fond of her books, and I hope you'll amuse yourself with them, miss, for they used to sound very grand when she read bits to me, being as I don't know an A from a B myself."

Millicent turned to the "bracket" as the landlady retired. She had not given much heed to her story, though she would have been interested enough by it at another time. Nor did it even interest her very much to find among that slender store of books an old worn copy of her brother's early work, "Talks and Meditations." She saw that book often enough in many places. The terrible review had not laughed it down to nothing, and George's only pleasant regret was that in those guileless days he had parted wholly with its copyright.

Millicent had never heard of the incident of her sister-in-law Christian's long-ago journey to London. It is a way of breaking in halves that stories have in this world. And so Christian missed a happy satisfaction, and George lost a solemn delight. Only for a little while. Every kindly doer, and every faithful worker will find many such satisfactions and delights in Heaven.

"What is that noise?" Millicent asked, listening, as her landlady returned with the tea and toast.

"It's the rain agen the windows, miss. You've got safe under shelter none too soon. It's blowing great guns from the nor'-east, and the skipper says it'll be an awful night," replied the sailor's wife.

ARGUE not with a man whom you knew to be of an obstinate temper; for when he is once contradicted, his mind is barred up against all light and information: arguments, though never so well grounded, do but provoke him, and make even him afraid to be convinced of the truth.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE LATE HIRAM POWERS.

HIRAM POWERS, the eminent American sculptor, whose recent death in Florence has caused deep regret to all lovers of art, was born in Woodstock, Vermont, in 1805. The son of a farmer, and far removed from influences calculated to foster his artistic tastes, he yet early developed the bent of his genius. Removing with his father's family, while yet a child, to Ohio, he turned his hand to a great variety of employments in Cincinnati, showing in all shrewd sense and inventive faculty. He was at various times a clock-maker, a manufacturer of reed organs and a director of a wax-work show. He invented a jew's-harp with two tongues, and later in life constructed machinery to facilitate the process of modelling his works. If he had not been an artist, he might have achieved success as an engineer and mechanic.

The Cincinnati Commercial gives the following interesting reminiscences in regard to the great sculptor:

"In 1819, Hiram obtained employment in the clock and organ factory of Lowan Watson, on Seventh Street, between Main and Sycamore Streets, in Cincinnati. He was at first employed as collector for the establishment, but, acquiring a taste for mechanics, turned his attention to learning the trade, and made such rapid progress that in the course of a year he was regarded as an expert at the trade, and finished an organ for Dorfeuille's Museum, at the corner of Main and Pearl Streets, doing nearly all the work himself. This organ gave so much satisfaction that another order was given by some connections of the museum people, and Hiram did the designing and much of the work on the new instrument. The organ played twenty-six set tunes, and was arranged with twelve juvenile figures, six little boys with trumpets on one side, and six little girls with bells on the other, the trumpets blowing and the bells ringing at certain intervals during the performance, for air. While at the clock factory, Hiram became acquainted with a Mr. Eckstein, a Prussian artist and sculptor, who conceived a strong liking for him, and gave him lessons in modelling and casting busts. He remained at the clock factory, working on organs and making wax figures, which, it seems, was an important feature of the trade, until 1827, when the progress he had made in modelling, under his friend Eckstein's tuition, gained him more remunerative occupation in the museum. He made a number of figures of noted divines, celebrated philosophers, statesmen and historical criminals, for exhibition at the museum, and also constructed the 'Infernal Regions,' which formed the chief attraction of that place of entertainment for many years. While at the museum he also modelled busts of Dr. Bishop, President of the Oxford, Ohio, College, Nicholas Longworth and Amor Combs, who was then deceased, and whose features Mr. Powers reproduced chiefly from memory. All of these busts were subsequently transferred to marble.

"Mr. Powers was engaged in the modelling of wax figures and plaster busts until 1835, when he went to Washington, D. C. His precision in reproducing forms and catching expression was remarkable even when he was struggling through the elementary stages of his profession. Old residents of the city will call to mind the wax figure he made of his old and fast friend, Aleck Drake, the actor. Aleck was running the old Columbia Street Theatre, was playing to the poorest of houses, had no new attractions in view, and was on bad terms with his banker. Powers, as an expedient for raising the wind, conceived the novel idea of putting two Aleck Drakes on the same stage at the same time, in the act of singing "Love and Sausages." In twelve days Powers executed a perfect image of Drake, which was dressed exactly like the great actor, at Platt Evans's tailor shop on Main Street, and on the appointed night the two Alecks appeared at opposite ends of the stage, grimoaced, saluted the audience, and sang "Love and Sausages" (to the best belief of the audience), like two Alecks indeed. Which was the real Aleck and which the counterfeit, nobody could tell, so exactly were they alike. One gentleman is remembered to have sung out from the gallery, pointing at one side of the stage, 'That's Drake over there; I saw him wink.' The real Aleck, from the other side, shouted out: 'No it ain't, I'm here,' however, when the audience was all at sea again. The two Alecks were a great success, and enjoyed a 'run' of eight or ten weeks, which restored Drake to a sound financial footing.

"On taking up his residence at Washington, Mr. Powers executed a bust of General Jackson, the general assigning him a room in the White House for a workshop. He also executed busts of Martin Van Buren, Alexander McComb, John C. Calhoun, Senator Preston, Chief Justice Marshall, Judge Burnett, Edward Everett, and a number of other distinguished statesmen and jurists.

"Returning to Cincinnati on a short visit, he left on August 29, 1837, for the East, expecting to proceed immediately to Italy. He received a commission for the execution of a bust of Daniel Webster, however, and remained at Marshfield long enough to complete his model. He arrived at Florence, Italy, some time in October of the year 1837.

"The first few years he passed in Italy were years of toil and discouragement, and it was fully four years before he could fairly regard his chisel as a trustworthy implement of defence against poverty. In the third year of his residence abroad he wrote to his brother here that his funds were nearly exhausted, and if he did not obtain temporary relief he would be compelled to return to his native country. The announcement of this intelligence to some of the merchants and bankers of this city and Boston resulted in the placing to his credit immediately of five thousand dollars, which, as he had in the meantime sold his original 'Greek Slave,' Mr. Powers never had occasion to use, though ever grateful for the generous offer.

"The 'Greek Slave' found a purchaser in Captain Grant, of Her Majesty's Navy, who paid one thousand guineas for it. It is Mr. Powers's most celebrated work. The Danish sculptor Thorwaldsen visited Mr. Powers's studio soon after its completion, and gave it the highest praise. Thorwaldsen was then past his eightieth year, and the President of the Artists' Association, which was meeting at Florence. 'Is this your first ideal statue?' he asked of Powers. Hiram replied that it was the first one that he had completed.

"Any sculptor,' returned Thorwaldsen, 'might be proud of it as his last.'"

The Portland Transcript, speaking of Mr. Powers, says:

"He was a man not only of strong native genius, but of great conversational powers, fresh and original in his talk and full of ingenious ideas. Unlike other sculptors, he made no clay models—except in portrait busts—but modelled directly in the plaster, and he had many ingenious devices and machines, among which was one for punching holes through iron. In exhibiting these he would say to his friends, 'You see I am a bit of a Yankee.' He was also a sort of natural doctor, great in the invention of empirical remedies. He invented an apparatus for the cure of chest complaints, by inhalation, yet died of consumption in the end.

"Hawthorne, in his Italian Notes, bears frequent testimony to Mr. Powers's conversational ability. He says, 'his talk is full of bone and muscle, and I enjoy him much.' Again he adds, 'I have hardly ever before felt an impulse to write down a man's conversation as I do that of Mr. Powers. He is a very instructive man, and sweeps one's empty and dead notions out of the way with exceeding vigor. I am always glad to encounter the millstream of his talk.'

"Mr. Powers had a full appreciation of his own abilities, and was not slow to criticise the works of other artists. He pronounced the head of the Venus di Medici to be that of an idiot, and declared that the grand and mysterious effect of Michael Angelo's statue of Lorenzo di Medici was due to a trick. Hawthorne alludes to this trait of character in the following note:

"Powers is a great man, and also a tender and delicate one, massive and rude of surface as he looks; and it is rather absurd to feel how he impressed his auditor, for the time being, with his own evident idea that nobody else is worthy to touch marble. Mr. B—— told me that Powers has had many difficulties on professional grounds, as I understood him, and with his brother artists. No wonder! He has said enough in my hearing to put him at swords' points with sculptors of every epoch and every degree between the two inclusive extremes of Phidias and Clarke Mills.'

"We remember an anecdote told us many years ago, illustrative of the ruling passion in Mr. Powers's mind. At the time of General Jackson's removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, he approached a group of merchants in New York, who were excitedly discussing the matter. One of them turned to him and said, 'Mr. Powers, what do you think of this high-handed act?' 'I think,' said the artist, who had been critically regarding the figure of his questioner, 'that your arms are too long for your body!'

"Hawthorne records an anecdote of Mr. Powers's early life:

"Mr. Powers gave some amusing anecdotes of his early life, when he was a clerk in a store in Cincinnati. There was a museum opposite, the proprietor of which had a peculiar physiognomy that struck Powers, inasmuch that he felt impelled to make continual caricatures of it. He used to draw them upon the door of the museum, and became so familiar with the face, that he could draw them in the dark; so that, every morning, here was this absurd profile of himself, greeting the museum-man when he came to open his establishment. Often, too, it would reappear within an hour after it was rubbed out. The man was infinitely annoyed, and made all possible efforts to discover the unknown artist, but in vain; and finally concluded, I suppose, that the likeness broke out upon the door of its own accord, like the nettle-rash. Some years afterward, the proprietor of the museum engaged Powers himself as an assistant; and one day Powers asked him if he remembered this mysterious profile. "Yes," said he, "did you know who drew them?" Powers took a piece of chalk, and touched off the very profile again, before the man's eyes. "Ah," said he, "if I had known it at the time, I would have broken every bone in your body!"

"In another place Hawthorne gives an account of an evening spent with Powers on the terrace at the top of the latter's house, in Florence. There the romancer and the artist sat in the calm summer evening, until the moon rose behind the trees, and reasoned high about other states of being, and the beautiful shapes inhabiting the planets in the heavens above them. Hawthorne closes his account of this delightful intercourse with these half-humorous words:

"The atmosphere of Florence, at least when we ascend a little way into it, suggests planetary speculations. Galileo found it so, and Mr. Powers and I pervaded the whole universe; but finally crept down his garret-stairs, and parted, with a friendly pressure of the hand.'

"That was fifteen years ago, and the two friends have now both passed on to those other states and scenes of which they held so high discourse, there, perhaps, to meet again, and renew the discussion of that pleasant evening hour."

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSESIWAY POTTS.

No. IX.

OUR stove has an elevated oven with two grates in it, but I never could bake very well on the lower one, because the loaves would rise and crowd against the upper one, and the top crust would be cracked, and broken, and disfigured. Rather than be annoyed thus, I always baked three loaves at a time on the upper grate. My men folks tried to fix it for me, but they never hit on a plan that was satisfactory, and so all these twelve years I have done bakings of from eight to twenty-one loaves a week, baking three loaves only at a time. We had an outdoor oven a few years ago, but the wrinkles would come in the men's noses every time they had to split oven-wood, and I was rejoiced one morning to find it a crumbled heap of brick and mortar. But in my eagerness to facilitate business in the kitchen this summer, I contrived how I could arrange the stove oven for baking six loaves instead of three.

I took four railroad spikes, and with soft copper wire fastened them securely to the four corners of the upper grate, on the under side. That lifted it up just high enough to be out of the way of touching the bread on the lower grate, and now I bake six loaves at a time with no trouble at all, only to change the upper loaves to the lower parts, and to be careful not to place one directly under the other.

Ida and Lily were away visiting yesterday in the afternoon, and that gave me a good opportunity to write. If they are at home, no matter how firmly we resolve not to speak to each other, and how determined they are not to hinder Pipsey, the first thing we know we are all firing away as earnestly as though we had not seen each other for a week. Father said he woke from his noon nap the other day and heard us talking, and for an instant he thought a clan of Irish had taken possession of our sitting-room—that perhaps Paddy and Mike had just come over from Cork and met with the Flannaghans and the McCartys. Heh! he didn't make us ashamed. I said: "Oh, that's better than to quarrel, or disagree, or sulk, and go moping about with no desire to talk at all;" and so it is.

I improved the time while the girls were gone yesterday. Before we went to bed last night, Ida complained of not feeling well; and knowing her general health was good, I immediately inquired what she ate at supper where she was visiting.

"I didn't mean to tell you at all, Pipsey," said she, looking ashamed; "but maybe if I confess I'll feel better in my mind, any how. We had cabbage for supper, and I knew I ought not to touch it, and that you didn't allow of it; but it looked so good, and was so nicely cooked, I took two spoonfuls of it. I do wish I hadn't tasted it! I'll not yield to temptation so weakly another time."

I was sorry she had partaken of the cabbage, but I knew there was a remedy, though I didn't tell her of it, for fear she would be tempted to take cabbage and remedy another time.

After she had gone to bed I put half a teaspoonful of soda in half a cup of water, stirred it until it was thoroughly dissolved, and gave her to drink, and made her curl up snugly in bed.

She felt no more the effects of her unwise supper. She said the cabbage was made into warm slaw, and was so nice she asked Cousin Laura for the recipe.

For one head of cabbage, chopped very fine; to make the dressing, put into a kettle about half a pint of vinegar—less if it is very strong—set it on the fire to boil, add one pint of rich cream, one table-spoonful of dry mustard, two well-beaten eggs, one even teaspoonful of pepper, two of salt; stir briskly, and as soon as it boils put in the cabbage; stir well with a large fork until the dressing is mixed through, then pour out as soon as possible, or it will make the dressing too thick. This is good either warm or cold.

Don't forget at this season of the year to make a few glasses of green grape jelly. It is very pretty, and is made like any other kind.

In gathering cucumbers to save for pickles, use small ones, they will make such firm, crisp pickles. Examine your vines once a day, and don't wait until you have gathered three or four times before you put them in the brine. They should not be allowed to wilt or have yellow specks come on them before they are cared for. Let everything be done in season.

Tomatoes should be canned the same day they are picked, and not be permitted to grow over-ripe; if they are stale, or too ripe, they will be found either insipid or having a bitter taste when the cans are opened. A friend of ours keeps tomatoes all winter. She dissolves about one teacupful of salt to every gallon of water, putting this weak brine in a small keg made for the purpose. She plucks the tomatoes as soon as they are barely ripe, and leaves a little of the stem on. They must be kept well covered with the brine, and a light weight on top. She keeps tomatoes thus until spring. It is a treat to eat them sliced in sweetened vinegar in the months of March and April.

Sometimes as I sit writing these things for my sister-women to read, I stop and think of all the requirements of a good housewife. One who will "look well to the ways of her household," who will manage and economize, and "take time by the forelock," who uses strategy, and shrewdness, and wisdom, why such a woman is more than a general!

And yet she'll pass through a long, toilsome life, and be laid in an out-of-the-way grave, and the briars will grow viciously over the neglected spot, and the heart-wounds will heal, and she will be to this work-a-day life what the hill-side plough or the worn-out sugar evaporator has been in its day—a useful tool that served its time, and has been left in the furrow, or outside a roofless shed, to the mercy of the sun and the storm and the rust.

These are sad thoughts that will come to us, struggle as we may against the unwelcome truth. They pain us, and we shrink from them as we would from the surgeon's knife or the merciless cauterizer, and our tears fall—wherefor? Sometimes the pen drops from my hand, and I lean my head on my desk, and in tears my thoughts go out, reaching for something to say to such women that will be to them like a tonic, something that will raise them up to a higher atmosphere, and give them clearer vision and a more permanent spiritual strength. I would say something that would abide with them. I would lift up their hands, and gladden their hearts, and do them good. But my own wings are broken, my vision clouded, and my poor thoughts earthy.

A day will dawn, too, which no night will succeed; then the weary hearts and the working hands and the aching heads will be at rest, and a "light that is not of sea or land," will make plain all those dark things over which we stumble now, and rising, fall again.

I saw a very pretty thing yesterday at a neighbor's—a long-trained vine of nasturtium, full of buds and flowers and young seed-clusters—broken close off down to the ground, and the stem set in water, in which were a few lumps of charcoal. It stood in a sunny sitting-room, between two windows, and was trained up to run around a picture, and up over the top of one of the windows, and hang down lavishly then. I clapped my hands over the sight. It had been rejoicing the inmates of the house nearly a fortnight, and was just as fresh and sweet as its other half, which was trained over a shrub in the door-yard.

Meadow lilies can be broken off and the stalks set in water, and they will open new flowers the same as though they were out in the life-giving atmosphere.

This is a good time to gather leaves and swamp-grasses, and all kinds of pretty things.

I have told you this before, but I so want your homes to be beautified in the winter with drooping bouquets and grasses, that I am tempted to remind you of it again. After gathering your material for bouquets, arrange them in small bunches to suit your taste, the tallest in the centre, then put them safely in a dark room to dry.

Some of you women who have leisure would be glad perhaps to know how to make frosted fruit. I think it is nice, and I would have told you long ago; only I was afraid the fathers and grandfathers wouldn't like me for it, and would say, "I r'a'y did think better o' Pipeey than that; I thought she had more sense than to be a foolin' 'round in that sort o' style, puttin' mischief in yer heads, an' leadin' ye into all sorts o' nonsense." That's the reason I didn't tell you long ago. The old men always liked me, ever since I was a little girl, and I don't want to lose their good-will, bless them! good old hard-handed, sunburnt fathers and grandfathers.

That was all I had to feel good over when I was young. Little girls would coax me to go home with them from school, and stay all night, by saying, "Papa, he likes you so! He never talks or reads to any other little girl but you!" or, "Do come, daddy says you're so stiddy an' old-fashioned, he likes you!" This long-ago praise has made me walk pretty straight. Sometimes it did me good, those homely terms of encouragement; and so, to this day, I care very materially for what the fathers and grandfathers think of me. I guess I do like them, too!

Well, we'll hold our heads down, and "speak low, good woman," while I tell you this thing that the kings might dub as frivolous.

To prepare frosted fruit, take ripe plums, grapes or cherries; leave part of the stem on; have in one dish some white of egg beaten, and in another some powdered loaf-sugar; take up the fruit, one at a time, and roll them first in the egg and then in the sugar, lay them on a sheet of white paper, in a sieve, and set it on top of a stove or near a fire till the icing is hard. To crystallize plums, take out the seeds and put one pound of plums to a half-pound of sugar, cook them to a pulp, then spread on broad dishes to dry; pack them away in glass jars. When wanted to serve, take a little and roll in powdered sugar, the shape of plums. Very nice, but trifling business, I think. (I add this latter clause to conciliate the dads.)

There is nothing hurts me worse than to see a child whipped—to hear the shrill "You little brat!" and the thud! thud! of an angry hand on the poor little writhing body. We have always held to the belief that though a small child, rebellious and wilful, does have to be punished sometimes, this warfare should end as soon as a child is old enough to understand, say at the age of two or three years.

The stubborn will should be subdued by that time, and if it has been judiciously trained—carefully and lovingly and wisely and prayerfully trained, from that time it can be easily managed.

At the very age that I, Pipeey Potts, would be breaking the will of a child, bending the pliant little twig, parents are generally hiding their mouths behind their hands, and grinning most egregiously over the pat sayings and doings, the awkward oaths, and the pert, irreverent answers of the "cute little darlings." That is the time the bad seed is sown. I have no patience with such foolish blindness.

I was visiting, a few years ago, at the pretty house of kind relatives, who had adopted a little boy. He waxed fat under the euphonious name of Elmer

Ellsworth. He sat at table between his proud parents, swigging his two cups of strong coffee, and issuing orders in a loud voice, to the right and the left, with all the pomp and dignity of a superior officer. No matter what we were conversing about, he paid no attention, but talked on, as though he must be heard, at least. His father would have to drop the conversation and turn to Ellsworth. He would make pert replies to his parents, and the weak mother would tell him what to say to his father; perhaps make a fist and say, "smell your master;" or, "you dry up;" or, "we've heard enough out o' you!"

I could hardly endure it. I took occasion to tell them that they were most surely "sowing the wind, and sometime, maybe when they were bent with age, they would reap the whirlwind."

They only laughed and said, "he'll get over that! he's so cute; he can't stand a cross word, it nearly kills him!"

Last summer those relatives paid us a visit. I said: "Does Elly make a manly little boy?"

"Manly! I think he is! See, he's goin' on twelve year old, now. He don't incline to study, though he'll be a real business man—money-making and sharp. I gave him a two-year-old colt last spring, and he rides it every where he goes. It's not much walkin' he does now. He rides off sometimes and will be gone all day, and comes galloping home in the evening, always in time to do up his chores."

And here the relative smiled, as though he thought that was a clincher in proving the boy's good character.

"Sometimes," said the mother, "he does give Jim (the father) the cutest answers. Now, the evening before we left home, Jim, he was sitting smoking after tea, and he asked Elly if he had fed the pigs. Elly said no. After while Jim said, 'come, you tend to the pigs, son.' I do wish you could have seen the look he gave his father as he answered, just as cute, 'why, you're not doing anything yourself, Jim.' I had to turn away and laugh, and it did take Jim down so. Any one who gets ahead of Elmer Ellsworth will have to rise before the lark, that's so." And the poor, blind, misguided man and woman shook themselves, like wet dogs, with real jolly laughter.

It did no good to talk to them of the peril that surely lies before them and theirs. Alas, for the whirlwind they must reap!

I am almost ashamed to tell it, but it is the truth, that I was so worried with their utter blindness, their stupidity on this momentous theme, that I became sick while they were here, and was not able to wait on them, or help make their visit a pleasant one. I had a spell of nervous headache, that for two days was as much as my physical system could endure.

When I see parents in the full possession of sound minds laying the foundation for the utter ruin of their innocent, God-given children, I feel like tearing away from all restraint and endeavoring, with the zeal of a monomaniac, to convince them of their great mistake. And yet, of all people who labor under a delusion, a blind, mistaken, over-loving parent is the most dogmatic and egotistical and absurd. They won't be convinced, they know you are in error and they are right. What a pity that such a reckoning must come as does.

One evening last summer I sat propped up in the rocking-chair, weak and debilitated, recovering from a severe attack of headache.

I was sitting alone in the twilight, when a hesitating step came up to the door. I coughed to let the visitor know that the room had an occupant, and said, "Come in; feel just at the left side of the door and you will find a chair. Never mind ceremony, who ever you may be, come in. I do not recognize your voice; I am Miss Potts."

"No; you don't know my voice—you never heard it but once; I was ten years old then, I am a man now;" said the strong, full voice, rich and musical.

Just then lights were brought in, and in the stranger I saw a fine-looking man, tall and bronzed and graceful. I was reassured, and said: "Tell me when we met, and where."

"Why, you were visiting at Julia Sherman's, in the little village of Lynde, twenty years ago; you stayed there three days. There were not more than six or eight houses in the village, and one sunny afternoon you and Julia were going to visit Cedar Falls and the Point, and you invited all the boys and girls in the village to join you. We little folks were made as happy as we could hold; invited by two young ladies to accompany them in an afternoon ramble, filled our cups full to the brim. I never spent a happier time; we didn't have to behave—one was just as good as another, and we all had the most perfect liberty to run and jump, and hallo, and 'cut up' as much as we wanted to. I remember how you fired up that afternoon, how you climbed from one rock to another, and crept into inaccessible places, and leaped from crag to crag like a wild cat. We all explored caves, and gathered specimens, and selected the finest mosses, and then in the pretty moonlight evening we all went to Centre Hall to a country singing-school. I have never forgotten that enjoyable adventure of my childhood, it often comes up before me, and I resolved, if I ever came to Pottsville, that I would call and look upon your face, and thank you for the pleasure of that long-ago afternoon and evening. I was a poor, ragged little boy, then," and his voice faltered. "I have always read your stories and your 'Windows,' and I seemed to see you as you were then. I couldn't think of you only as the plump, rosy, romping girl, not the thin, pale woman on whose brow the vicissitudes of twenty added years have set their seal."

I said, "Have the years dealt kindly with you?"

"I have been blest and prospered, and am happy," was his answer.

The next day I chanced to remark to an acquaintance that Mr. — had called here, and we were pleased with him.

The friend said, hesitatingly, "Yes, I used to attend school where he did," and here he puckered up his mouth wisely, as much as to say, "Oh, if you only knew what I do!"

Now I meant "to spike his gun" by pretending that I had not observed this ungentlemanly insinuation at all; that's the way to manage such people. But the deacon, the dear, unsophisticated old lamb, he didn't know, and he laid the way open immediately by saying, very unwisely: "Was he the right sort of a boy?"

"Perhaps he was, and perhaps he wasn't," said our immaculate friend, Mullethead, and he looked as sanctimonious as though he thought the heavens might open any minute, and a chariot come down to escort him up just as he was in the flesh.

Oh, that deacon! that deacon! I coughed, and hemmed, and touched his shank with the toe of my gaiter softly down under the table, but it was of no use. His poor human curiosity was excited, and he was in the pursuit of that knowledge which enlightens the darkened understanding, and he didn't mind a hint at all.

"Was he quarrelsome?" queried the deacon, leaning over and smiling.

"Well—no; he wasn't exactly quarrelsome, but he felt most mighty big. While was other boys would be out enjoying a good lively game, that fellow'd sit in the house and study, and study; he'd hardly allow himself time to eat his dinner. He was selfish, too, and carried his head up as though he thought he was made of better stuff than common boys."

"Did he use profane language, or had he any bad habits that made him unfit for an associate?" said I, warmly.

"Well, no, can't say that he had; none of us wanted to 'sociate with him, though—he felt too important."

"Was that all you had against the poor boy? If it was, it is very easy to account for that little peculiarity. You know they were very poor people, he had no advantages in his childhood, and his father was a man of intemperate habits. Now it is the easiest thing in the world for a poor boy, situated thus, to grow morbid. He stands well in good society to-day; he has fought his way up through adverse circumstances, little by little, step by step; he stands a brave, reliant, self-made man; his influence is felt in society; he is doing a good work. And now, Mr. Mullethead, don't you throw out any vague hints, don't you insinuate by word, or look, or a significant sniff of your nose, that you know something about the poor fellow that you could tell if you would. It is unkind; you are not doing as you would be done by. What you set down against his young manhood as a fault, an evil, really is the very opposite. Don't you know that conscious worth makes its possessor dignified? That he cannot help it? If he had no desire to play with you boys at school, if he felt that time was all too short for the work he had to do, the ends he had to attain, then he wouldn't feel like leaving his books for the recreation he didn't need. His aim was doubtless to acquire all the education he could before his trade was learned; he wanted to improve the fleeting moments."

It is so easy, by look, or word, or deed, to prejudice other minds, that we cannot be careful enough. See how much injury an idle insinuation may inflict upon a stranger, or one who comes into our vicinity with no predilections in his favor. Watch, and see and hear the idle hints thoughtlessly spoken, seed dropped by the wayside that will spring up and bear an hundred fold.

I remember two instances now that happened in a good family—a family who would scorn to wrong any one.

A young physician came to Pottsville; he was a stranger; no one knew aught against him. His deportment was gentlemanly; he attended church, and Sabbath-school, and the literary society, and seemed to be the very man to fill a niche that had long been vacant in Pottsville. At old Father Bell's anniversary party, the young doctor was discussed, or rather dissected.

"What did you say his name was?"

"Carpenter."

"Oh, I do wonder if he's any connection of old Jethro Carpenter, who was hung in the Illinois for horse-stealing?" said one of the good old busybodies.

"Why Jethro is this man's name," said another, dropping knife and fork, and rolling up his eyes horror-stricken.

"I'll bet it's a son o' hisen!"

"Well, I shouldn't wonder. Old Jethro had a very big Roman nose," said the first speaker.

"So has this 'un! Eh-heh!"

The story spread, it gained, it grew into wonderful proportions; people stared at the young doctor; they peeped round corners at him, they leered, they curled their lips after a wise fashion, they cast prying glances sideways; and at last the poor fellow, lacking the vim to stay and live down the aspersion, as a positive man would have done, yielded weakly, and bowed, and broken, and humiliated, returned to the place of his nativity, wounded for life.

And all this came of one idle word—a word induced by no provocation, no spite, just carelessly dropped in thoughtless, aimless conversation.

Another instance. A poor widow rented an out-of-the-way cabin, and took in spinning, and did washings, and worked bravely to keep her family of three from want. Her name was Maria Warner. After while a story was going the rounds. When Maria was first married, she had stolen a blue tea-cup from a sick neighbor; her own set was spoiled because one of the cups was broken, and she fretted about it; and this neighbor's set was just like her own. She couldn't stand the temptation that assailed her; she slipped the cup into her pocket in a weak moment, and took it home with her. But that night she couldn't sleep, nor the next night, her conscience troubled her so, and then she carried the cup back, and honestly confessed her fault to her injured neighbor.

This was the story—the truth—only the neighbor didn't keep the secret, as she was in sacred duty bound to do. She told it with sundry blinks, and winks and grimaces. Wherever the poor family moved the tale followed after. Oh, it was such a pity! We should all pray, saying—

"The mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

Ill-disposed children cast this pitiful thing into the faces of the widow's little ones at school; wealthy farmers' wives curled their lips, saying, "I want no one about my house whose coming shakes me and watch and count my teacups."

Many years ago, three young men, in daring bravado, and under the maddening influence of strong drink, waylaid and gagged a drover and tried to rob him. None of the young men were vicious, or really wicked or reckless. Under proper restraint, and a wise, humane, loving, Christian influence, each one would have made a good man, and been a blessing to the world. They were sorry, and essayed to live down the grave crime they had committed. Lately, when the name of one of them was mentioned at a dinner-table as being in the neighborhood, engaged in an honorable and lucrative employment, the father of the family said, "Carl Lanning! in our vicinity! Why, isn't that the name of one of the young would-be murderers of a few years ago? Surely, it is," and then followed a particular relation of the whole affair in the presence of a table full of men and women, who had never heard it before.

How wicked and wilful and uncalled for! Why should people, praying, peace-loving people, be so willing and anxious to retail gossip that blights, and sometimes kills another, and does no one any good.

Let us look well, then, to the idle words that fall heedlessly from our lips. Let us ponder before we speak, and see that we say nothing to injure another. Let us not deal in arrows tipped with poison; let us seal our lips in sacred silence, if we cannot speak well and kindly of others.

MARY STUART.

ACROSS THE SOLWAY, AND ON THE SCAFFOLD.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

THE battle of Langside was over. The beautiful Scotch May-day had been fouled with the smell of powder and darkened with solid lines of spears, and through the clear, sweet northern air had rung all day the sounds of the deadly encounter—the spears crossing and locking—the sharp, thick pistol-shots, the crash of the field-pieces, the clatter of cavalry, and the moans of the wounded and dying.

That battle had settled the fate of the young queen, Mary Stuart, and ended her reign in Scotland. She had watched it, with only three or four attendants, from a hill half a mile distant. She knew that crown and throne hung on the issue of that battle, in the soft spring day, on the long, straggling hill, which made the village of Langside. Only two miles off was old Glasgow, and the cool breezes from the banks of the Clyde must have wandered across the face of the beautiful woman, as, mounted on her horse, she watched the way the battle went; she knew that on it hung tremendous issues for herself. Yet she could not look up the next twenty years as we can, and see that they were to take their whole shape and coloring from that day at Langside.

Mary Stuart's half-brother, the regent, James Murray, was at the head of the enemy's forces. They were better armed and better appointed, and they outnumbered the queen's. It is true, that most of the nobility, "the chivalry, the sentiment of Scotland," were on her side. On Murray's were the Protestant lords, the middle classes, the farmers and yeomanry, the bold riders of the border, around whom Scott has thrown the spell of his genius.

When Murray's proclamation went ringing among the hills and along the banks of the Clyde, they had flown to arms. It took short warning for that. The stern Northern men had only to "buckle their sword-belts, put on their steel caps and breast-plates, strap a wallet, stuffed with cold meat and bread, behind their saddles," and they were ready for a week's fight.

Mary's army, composed chiefly of the nobility and their retainers, was full of the old national feuds, factions and ambitions. Each nobleman had his private schemes and animosities, and no single, passionate purpose fired them as one man, into a great unity of action on that day at Langside.

They fought like brave men, it is true; but they lacked a leader with those supreme qualities of head and heart, which would have commanded the obedience of the whole army. Every little while some old fierce jealousy flamed out among the proud Northern nobles. "The followers of one lord would not obey another."

So they had come up the long lane, which made the village street, "horse and foot together, a mere huddling crowd, till they were between the houses, when the arquebuse-men, at close quarters, poured in their fire from behind the walls. Still they struggled forward. The leading companies, though desperately cut up, forced their way at last through the village to the open ground above, where they were faced by Murray's solid lines—and there, for three-quarters of an hour, they stood and fought."

The fate of the battle, however, hung upon the squadron of horse which Lord Herries, the queen's protector, brought up the hill, sweeping round from the left.

For awhile he had carried all before him, but when Murray's warriors burst in suddenly to the rescue, the tide of battle was turned.

A panic seized the queen's lines. They broke up, scattered, and ran. The Highlanders, who had hovered on the outskirts of the fight, now burst with fierce cries upon the demoralized troops, and would have made short work of them if Murray's stern commands had not stayed the carnage.

And Mary Stuart, watching on the hill, in the pleasant May sunshine, knew that the battle of Langside was lost.

She was a woman brave as she was beautiful. Whatever were the faults of Mary Stuart, her splendid courage was unquestionable. It seemed as though no peril could shake the nerves of that delicate, graceful figure.

And all the courage, the tact, the prompt energies to meet the occasion, which she had inherited from Tudor and Guise and Stuart, were needed after that battle of Langside.

She turned swiftly—in all Scotland there was probably no finer horsewoman in that year, fifteen hundred and sixty-eight—what a musty scent seems to cling to the old syllables as we speak them—and galloped off, with the three or four followers who had watched with her on the hill, to see how the battle went at Langside.

Only a few days before she had escaped in the twilight from Lochleven. All the long, dreary months of her captivity in the round-tower of the Castle of Lochleven, with the long, narrow slits of windows, and the blue sky overhead and the blue waters below, must have risen up before the queen, who had just lost crown and throne, with a sickening dread.

She loved liberty, like the eagles of her Northern mountains; though the Scotch queen had come back to her native home with a foreign heart, and the prospect of a second imprisonment must have lent fresh speed for her flight, as she struck her spurs into her horse, and bore away straight for Dumbarton. She had been eager to reach it ever since that swift midnight-flight from Lochleven.

But the fates were against her. She had watched the tide of battle too long on the hill half a mile away.

"The country had risen, and all the roads were beset. Along the by-paths the peasants cut at her with reaping-hooks. The highway was occupied by Murray's horse," and Mary Stuart knew that if she fell this time into the hands of those stern Scottish lords, even her brother could not save her life.

At that moment, if ever, a throb of terror shook the heart of the woman. Perplexed and harassed, she turned her horse's head southward, and made for Galloway by the sea. The way of escape would be open there from the land of her birth, and the kingdom of which she had been crowned queen.

She had only six attendants in that wild flight across the country, and one was the little foundling page, who, in the dim twilight, had swept the keys from his master's plate at Lochleven, and unlocked the castle gates, out of which Mary Stuart went to her short-lived freedom, and to the long captivity, which was to end at last on the scaffold.

It was a long, terrible gallop across the wild Scotch country, over its fens and heathery moors, and through its wildernesses, green with the fresh beauty of the May—night and day she bore on, as if death was behind her. Ninety-two miles she rode, and when she slept at all, it was to stretch the delicate limbs, which had been used to the fine linens and the soft royal couches of France, on the bare ground. She had oatmeal and buttermilk for her food—she, whose dainty lips had sipped from golden goblets the choicest wines of the world.

On the third day after the battle the long, breathless race was over, and Mary Stuart drew rein at Dundrennan Abbey, on the banks of the Solway.

Let us stop a moment and look at her, as she stands there in the spring twilight. In all history there is hardly a more tragic figure than that of the young queen. She is only a little past the boundary of her twenty-third birthday. Born of a long line of Scotch kings, receiving with almost her first infant cry the crown which dropped from her dead father's brow, bred at the French court, and married in the earliest bloom of her girlhood to the Dauphin, she had mounted the throne, and for two years that young forehead had shone fair under the Scotch thistles and the lilies of France.

When her boy-husband died, she came in her fresh loveliness across the summer seas to the old Scotch home and the throne of her fathers.

Everybody knows what followed—the state marriage with the mean, miserable Darnley, and all the wretchedness that came of it, until all was ended in the awful tragedy at Kirk-a-Field. Then there was the birth of her child, and the swift marriage with Bothwell in the early sunrise, and all the scandal and shame and misery that came of it.

This is not the place to open the question of Mary Stuart's guilt or innocence. We all know that one class of historians lays to her charge the foulest of crimes, and that another, with passionate eloquence, draws her portrait as the saint, sweetest and most wronged of modern history. Through the centuries the battle has gone on over her memory, and it has not ceased with our own time.

But, however historians may differ as to the real character of the woman, none can fail to look at her with interest, as she stands on the Solway in the spring evening and listens to the stormy dash of the waves on the sands, and looks far across to the green banks on the other side, and thinks that there is England. Whether in that long, breathless gallop across the country, or whether in looking over the Solway to the pleasant English shores, the thought first entered Mary Stuart's soul that she would turn there for rescue and protection no historian, so far as I know, has ever told us. Perhaps she could not herself.

Yet, if we take into consideration for a moment her position at that time, and all the circumstances which surrounded her; remembering, too, the kind of woman she was herself, the dash, the romance, the impetuosity of her temperament, there will be nothing surprising that this course should have suggested itself to Mary Stuart's mind, and that the more she turned it over in her thoughts the more attractive it seemed to her.

Her fortunes in Scotland were at that moment at the lowest ebb. She had witnessed, three days before, the utter defeat of her army on the hill at Langside, and she knew that, broken and scattered as the royal forces were, it would be a long time before they could rally again under her banners.

Indeed, Mary Stuart may have received a new impression of Scotch character, and it may have dawned on her, for the first time, during that long flight from Langside that her case, without foreign aid, was hopeless in Scotland.

The discrowned, dethroned queen must have looked to the armies of France or of England to restore her to her place and state.

But in the meantime where was she to go? Look at her, standing there in the old gown, torn with her long scramble over bush and brier; remember that she was the daughter of one king, the widow of another, the great granddaughter of a third, and that she was so young still, only twenty-three, and held her own fate for the last time in her hands, as she stood on the banks of the Solway.

There was France. The widow of her dead king had claims on his mother and his brothers, which they could hardly ignore, when she, who had worn the crown, stood a beautiful suppliant at the foot of the throne; but Mary Stuart knew the dark, subtle, vindictive nature of her Italian mother-in-law, Catherine de Medici.

The two women had never loved each other. The queen-mother's deepest humiliations had come from the proud Guise race of whom Mary sprung.

The keen and crafty Italian woman might find her day of vengeance when her daughter-in-law, driven from her own kingdom, went to Catherine de Medici for protection and help.

There were cloisters in France, whence escape might not be so easy as Mary had found it from the thick castle walls of Lochleven. Yet the long confinement there must have given her a terrible dread of captivity.

Of the six uncles who had virtually governed France when, less than four years before, Mary Stuart came sailing, in her lovely young widowhood, over the summer seas to Scotland, three were dead now; and the boy-king on the French throne was governed by his crafty mother.

Mary Stuart was brave enough, but plainly, when the question came home to her, she did not quite dare to go to France.

Behind her was Scotland, stern, fierce and stormy with passions and vengeance.

It was Mary Stuart's misfortune that her French education and her own temperament both prevented her from seeing how the murder of Darnley and the marriage with Bothwell clung to her like a dark fate in the minds of the common people.

She had been bred in the most corrupt court atmosphere of Europe. The absolute irresponsibility of sovereigns had been the first article of her creed. She held it to her death. She was above all human tribunals. No outrage on right, justice or humanity authorized any mortal to pass judgment on the conduct of one who came to the royal line.

The most heinous charges might be brought against her, but when she denied them "on the word of a queen," no mortal voice must be raised in dissent. Sovereigns were only responsible to God for their deeds.

Monstrous as this doctrine is in the eighth decade of the nineteenth century, there was not a court in Europe where this creed was not held in the sixteenth.

Mary Stuart never comprehended the new movement of the age in which she was born, nor how the teachings of the Reformers had awakened a new sensitiveness in the national conscience. The murder of Darnley, the marriage with Bothwell—these were the plague spots which clung to her. With all her youth and beauty, with many generous and lovable qualities, these two acts had outraged the national instincts, and were at the bottom of her lost throne and crown, and of the defeat at Langside.

That Mary Stuart, when she stood that night on the banks of the Solway, had a large party still in Scotland, devoted to her cause, nobody familiar with the history of the times can doubt.

But the stern, rugged heart of the Scotch nation was not with her; and it was the common people, in their steel bonnets and breastplates, who decided matters when it came to the field of battle.

But Mary Stuart could not comprehend this. In France the people were little better than slaves or beasts of burden. That these should dare to pronounce a verdict on the conduct of their sovereign was, in her eyes, simply monstrous. She was a queen; she never forgot that; from her cradle to her scaffold.

She was a woman of no ordinary acuteness, however, and she must have seen the perils which awaited her if she remained in Scotland in the present condition of the national temper.

Her own party, as we have seen, was full of factions and rivalries. She must inevitably be more or less hampered and harassed by these, and the very air was full of treason. She could not be certain of many of her followers; nor what mine might spring up beneath her feet at any moment.

And there, just across the Solway, lay the green, English coast, of which Mary Stuart believed herself the rightful queen. From her cradle the grandchild of Margaret, the eldest of the daughters of Henry VII., had been taught that the English crown was her birthright.

It is true that Elizabeth Tudor sat on the throne and that the daughter of Anne Boleyn had many wrongs to complain of. Had not Mary Stuart usurped the English queen's title and her arms when wife of the Dauphin? Had not the French king prepared his army and navy to descend upon the English coast, harry the land with fire and sword, hurl the daughter of the king's mistress from her throne, and place on it the rightful heir, his own beautiful daughter-in-law?

And Elizabeth Tudor knew all this better than any other; "knew that her crown had been claimed, her policy thwarted, her subjects tampered with; and that the most passionate desire of Mary Stuart's heart had been to humble her rival into the dust."

Yet, with all the world before her to choose, Mary Stuart finally concluded to throw herself on the hospitality of her English kinswoman. There were many reasons which inclined her to this decision. She knew that she numbered her friends in England by thousands; that a large party of Elizabeth's subjects believed that the crown which rested on the brow of Anne Boleyn's daughter belonged of right to Mary Stuart.

The Scotch queen had naturally a very high estimate of her personal fascinations, and perhaps she did them no more than justice. She had always been desirous of showing herself at the English court, and throwing around the nobles the spell of her personal charms—fair daughter of the Guises, her education at the French court had not been in vain!—and she probably expected to exert a powerful influence over her kinswoman. And Elizabeth, with her constitutional vacillation, had not shone to good advantage in her relations with her cousin.

This bold movement was precisely what suited the ardent temper of Mary's genius.

"She saw herself, in imagination, kneeling at Elizabeth's feet before the assembled barons of England, an injured and beautiful suppliant flying for protection against her rebellious subjects. A few passionate words would dispel the calumnies which clouded her fame. A thousand swords would leap from their scabbards to avenge her, and she would return in triumph to Scotland, escorted by the English chivalry."

This seems to have been the picture which glowed in Mary's imagination. If her cooler judgment suggested that there might be another side to the picture, she must have thought it could not fail to be brighter than the dark, stormy, uncertain present. In England, at least, her life would not be in peril; and, at the worst, if Elizabeth would not receive her, she must allow her kinswoman to pass unmolested to the continent.

Then Mary Stuart could not probably quite shake herself free from the contempt with which she had been brought up to regard the younger daughter of Henry VIII.

Mary knew that she was an anointed queen, and she did not imagine that Elizabeth would dare, if she desired, to restrict her cousin's movements.

With Mary Stuart to decide was to act. Lord Herries, who had followed her on her long ride from Langside to the Solway, attempted to expostulate with her. He could hardly share Mary's security regarding her reception in England. He was uneasy about this sudden movement, and wanted her to consider the opposing possibilities.

But Mary was resolute. During the long captivity whose remembrance chafed and maddened her, Elizabeth had been her friend, espoused her cause, pitied her condition, and sent her the kindest messages and promises of protection; sincere enough at the time, no doubt. And Mary Stuart, rash and confident, was going now to prove them.

On Sunday morning she stood on the banks of the Solway. It was the sixteenth of May. She had given herself but a solitary night's rest after that long, terrible ride; but, despite her grace and luxurious habits, she could endure an amount of fatigue and excitement which would have strained the nerves of the stoutest border-trooper.

An open fishing-boat was rocking on the waves; and Mary stood on the sands in the very dress in which she had made her escape from Langside. Yet the beautiful face and the queenly air shone through all disguises. Her small train, about sixteen persons in all, stood around her. If she could have seen, if they could, to what she was going in that pleasant May morning, with the English shores smiling green in the distance! How the dark years and the darker end loom up before the woman, who stands there a moment on the sands in her youth and loveliness and rash confidence! Does she think of the pleasant home at Stirling, of the boy—poor Darnley's boy!—she is leaving behind? What dreams of ambition, what hopes of vengeance crowded the thoughts of the woman, as she stood there on the Solway sands, one of the fairest, saddest figures of history! But the signal is given, and she steps into the open fishing-boat, and Mary Stuart has stood for the last time on Scottish soil.

Her train follows, and the boat, with its royal freight, goes rocking over the Solway in the soft May day, and in the evening it lands at Workington, and Mary Stuart steps out for the first time on English soil. Nineteen years later she will leave it, not by the Solway, but by the harder way of the scaffold.

Yet, at the first, Mary Stuart's most sanguine expectations were realized. Her coming could not be kept a secret; and the northern counties went half wild with joyful excitement when the post-riders clattered in among the pleasant towns and villages with the marvellous tidings that the heiress of the crown, the true queen, as many of the Catholics regarded her, was in their midst.

She held a little court among the northern noblemen and squires during those first days when she remained in Carlisle, and all the country came pouring in to see the beautiful woman and listen to her story, and go away half-frenzied between wrath and pity over her wrongs.

The first shadow which fell upon Mary Stuart after her entrance into England must have been the news which came from court, taking her by surprise, that Elizabeth declined for the present to see her kinswoman.

We cannot follow the long story which has been told so often and so well—the story of disappointments, and hopes deferred, of broken promises, of plots and treasons which spread their meshes not over England alone but over all Europe.

Yet, in those long, dreary years of her captivity, nobody ever came to the help of the Scotch queen against the English one; not the son who grew to his young manhood, and sat on his mother's throne; not the slow Philip, in whose armies she fondly trusted to deliver her; not her own relatives, the proud Guises, who governed France, and bent the king and the crafty queen-mother, more or less, to their wills; not any of the royal house of Valois, among whose lilies she had twined the thistles of Scotland. Some of these, at least, burned to rescue Mary Stuart from her long captivity; but a spell, a mysterious evil fate, seemed to hang on every effort which was made in her behalf.

Many a gallant young knight, fired with enthusiasm, laid his head on the scaffold, branded with a traitor's name, for her sake.

All kinds of plans for her rescue were laid through those long nineteen years; but they all failed. No matter how secretly the threads were spun, the mine was laid, the plot was sure to miscarry at some fatal moment. In vain kings conspired for her sake, and nobles hazarded their lives for her deliverance.

The years went on, and no armies landed on English soil, and Mary Stuart still pined in captivity, though it was for the most part an easy and honorable one. And in all those years the two queens and kinswomen never looked in each other's face.

The end came at last. It was a dreary winter afternoon, February 16th, 1587, when Kent and Shrewsbury, two of Elizabeth's trusted nobles, rode down to old Fotheringay Castle, charged with their awful message to Mary Stuart. The next morning she was to die on the scaffold.

She tried to take the dreadful tidings like a queen, but once or twice her human heart gave way, and she broke down, and they left her with a "fear that the next morning it might be necessary to drag her to the scaffold by violence."

They did their work with stern thoroughness in those old, cruel days, three centuries ago.

But when the morning looked through the tall, high windows of old Fotheringay Hall, Mary Stuart was ready; and so was the fire blazing brightly in the big chimney; and so a little way beyond was the great scaffold draped with black; and so was the masked headman on one side.

About three hundred people of quality had assembled in the great hall to witness the execution; and Mary Stuart came in among them, calm and proudly, most like a queen. She walked up the long hall, in the breathless silence, in her robe of black satin and her veil of snowy lawn. Nineteen years had passed since she came in the pleasant May morning, with her young, high hopes and her glowing dreams, across the rough Solway. Yet the wonderful grace and charm of look and manner still clung to her as she laid down her head, in the prime of her womanhood, on the scaffold.

No tremor of fear shook her at the last. She said the prayers of the church with no tremble in her clear, solemn tones, and laid down, as though she were going to sleep, the head which had carried in its proud, beautiful youth the lilies of France and the thistles of Scotland.

And that was the end; and Mary Stuart, who came in the May morning over the Solway to England, went out of it in the winter one, nineteen years later, by the hard, swift way of the scaffold.

THE LORD OF THE LILIES.

BY MRS. L. M. BLINN.

A S I sit 'mid the bloom of lilies fair—
White lilies, given in trust to me—
A shadowy influence, strange and rare,
Floating and trembling along the air,
Sweet as the breath of the penitent's prayer,
Heralds the Lord of the lilies to see
If they thrive beneath my care!

Odors of sandal and spices fine,
Breathings from Lebanon's gardens sweet,
Rich as the breath of the dying vine
When its life is given to the ruddy wine;
And borne on the fragrance a voice divine:
"I come to my garden with hurrying feet;
Have ye cared for these sweets of mine?"

"Alas for my lilies, and woe to thee,
Faithless and blind to the holy trust!
In thy selfish love thou hast failed to see
How thy hot breath dimmed their purity—
Thou hast shut them away from the sunlight free,
And their whiteness is gathering mould and rust;
Could'st thou do no work for me?"

"Oh, faithless and blind! I take my own
Back to the gardens of spices fine!
In the cleansing waters of Lebanon
They shall put a beautiful freshness on,
And the light that shines from the Great White Throne
Shall gild their petals with bloom divine;
Henceforth they are mine alone!"

The floating fragrance and incense fine
Of sandal, and myrrh, and spices sweet,
Went softly on—and the voice divine
Melted, like echoes that rise and twine
With the zephyr's breath through the whispering pine,
As the Lord of the Lilies, with hurrying feet,
Took home what I thought was mine!

HE who refuses forgiveness, breaks the bridge over which he must himself pass.

OUR FRIENDS' CLOSETS.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

EVERY one's closet holds and hides a skeleton. Some are very repulsive, some hideous, while others are merely dead things and cold, closely covered away from the glare of day and the prying eyes of the over-curious.

Oh, I think of the hidden skeletons until my soul grows sick in pity for the keepers who hold the keys of the closets!

One incident of years ago comes up to me often.

A young graduate from a theological seminary was on his way to an appointment, on the shores of the Pacific, and he called to pay us a last visit. His trunks were not brought up from the depot, and several times he had occasion to unlock them. One morning he came up from the depot with some books under his arm, the choicest selections from his library.

He laid them down, flung himself on a sofa, and sighed, saying, "It is strange how selfish some people are! I tried to be courteous toward Mr. Wellington, the agent at the depot, but he paid no attention to me. His eyes seemed to be looking beyond me, and his thoughts—if he had any—were far away. He should not be forgetful of the courtesy one gentleman owes another, and especially a servant of the public, as he is. I nodded to him, but I might as well have bowed to the dummy in the paper-muslin polonaise. And when I asked him about the new time-table, he looked at me as blankly as a catfish. I don't like your agent very well."

"Yes you do like him, very much, and you pity him most sincerely," said I, divining the truth. "He bears a great sorrow—all the joy of this life is gone from him forever."

The young divine started, and the expression of his face was pained.

I continued: "Mr. Wellington's heart was all bound up in his children. He had three little boys, bright, beautiful boys; and the babies were twin girls. He was as happy as a father could be—he was prospered and beloved and trusted, and life was full of enjoyment to him and his.

"One day last spring his little boys were playing in the upper story of the warehouse. The men about the building were filling cars with grain—they were in the lower story. The children were playing in the large hopper, from the bottom of which was a spout that conducted the wheat into the cars.

While the grain was pouring into the hopper, it was slowly running out. They knew not of the danger, those two little ones—the eldest and the youngest—and in merry play they lay on the treacherous surface and slowly sank; and then, when they tried to escape, it was impossible. They flung up their arms and cried, and their playmates reached out their hands and drew them, but the effort was vain, they could not rise, and with upreached arms and stifled cries, they slowly sank, and were covered. The other children were all small, and did not realize the danger until it was too late. They called, but the noise of machinery deafened their cries. They ran down the stairs and made the men understand. They hurried up to the choking hopper; the little boys were buried out of sight, except a dear little white hand or two. There was no way of releasing them, except to throw out the grain with shovels, and that was a tedious work. They were taken out, and every effort made to restore them, but the beautiful little boys, whom we all loved so tenderly, would never meet us any more with their sweet, frank faces, and their brave, bright ways.

"This sorrow fell upon the proud young father crushingly—it was a terrible blow, and time never healed the wound or brought happiness to him afterward. They were buried in one grave, and in that dark grave all the hopes of his life went down, and the same green sod that covered the cold, white faces of his beloved dead shut out from him all the sunshine this earth held henceforth. He walks as if in a maze, a dream—his eyes scarcely see the things that greet our earthly vision; the sounds of trade and speculation, and the bustle and hurry of business seem to fall upon deaf ears.

"Do you wonder, now, that he hardly saw you—that he scarcely heard your voice?"

"I am sorry that I judged the poor man so unkindly," said my friend; "but we cannot see the skeletons that are hidden from our sight. Our words may often fall into breaking hearts like drops of acrid poison, when we would be glad to speak the sentence that would soothe and help and heal. I am very, very sorry that I tossed my head and treated the poor father so indifferently. With that love drawing him from earth, like a magnet of threefold power, he cannot long wear the shackles that fetter the earth-born."

We two sat in the summer twilight alone, and our thoughts went out to the stricken father, and the terrible death that robbed him of his treasures. The mournful song of the night-bird—the trill of the frogs in the pond, among the willows—the whirring of insect wings on the balmy air of the even—the piping music in the pines and cedars about the door, and the plaintive song of the whippoorwill on the gray eaves of the old house, all added a sadness to the memory of the story, and followed it like a mournful interlude.

This incident reminded the young divine of a similar one.

He said: "I filled an appointment once for a minister of my acquaintance. It was a dozen miles away from home, and I spent one night and a part of the day with one of the wealthiest and most influential families in the church. They were very kind people, but I could see that there was something wrong—there seemed to be a painful degree of restraint—their thoughts were not with their words.

"The lady would sigh and look away, and start at every noise, and her hands would jerk and twitch nervously.

"I went from there feeling that I had been an unwelcome visitor in the deacon's family.

"But the cause of this strange trepidation was known to me in less than a week. There was a horrible skeleton hidden in their closet, and in trembling, and with the most abject fear they had been striving to keep it covered away from the prying gaze of the world.

"It would have been a luscious morsel for the whetted appetite of the curious public.

"Their son, a promising young man in the full flush and pride of his young years, had fallen a victim to the allurements of the wine cup and the gaming-table. He had gone down low before his fond parents awoke to the truth. The delusion was no delusion to them until the whole reality was upon them with crushing weight.

"The night before I stayed there the poor victim had writhed and fought with that demoniac power, delirium tremens. No wonder the mother had started at every sound, and that her voice was weak and broken, and her eyes staring and sunken. It was as if she stood on a thin incrustation that might break through any instant and precipitate her into liquid fire.

"In a few days the wretched young man died. The cause and manner of his death were known only to a few tried friends.

"I was grieved when I heard of this. I had thought the family cold and selfish and meanly aristocratic at the time of my visit.

"This sad story of yours revives the half-forgotten circumstance.

"What a pity it is that we associate day after day with those who carry keys of skeleton closets, and we know it not, we know not the weight of the word or hint or insinuation that we drop carelessly—we may uncover wounds long hidden, or tear them open afresh, or probe them pitilessly."

Since the above incidents were written the last one of the three little brothers died; he grew strangely quiet and seemed to walk alone, then he pined slowly and grew pale and shadowy and fell asleep in the peace of death. A few months after, and the father of three little ones, "gone before," joined them, we trust, in a land of immortal freshness and beauty.

He never recovered from the terrible blow of seeing his darlings lying side by side, plump, and rosy, and dimpled, in that sleep that knows no waking.

While he lived he bore his sorrow weakly. At times it overwhelmed him, and he was as feeble as a child. Though he walked in our midst, and mingled in our plans, and gave us strong words of good cheer, there were no words of cheer for him, the arrow had entered his heart, and his steps were going down into the valley of death.

We cannot be careful enough in our judgment of those with whom we meet. We know not the thorns that beset the hidden path—the broken wings that are concealed, the wounded sides that are covered, the tears that bedew the midnight pillow, or the light words of mockery that disguise the wails of hopeless sorrow and agony.

Alas, for the calm, white faces that wear the mask of content, and only lay it aside in the closet that holds the sacred grief and the skeleton!

THE SCHOOL OF EXPERIENCE.

BY MARIE S. LADD.

"YOU remember Mrs. Weaver, who was so much admired, a few years ago, in Bristol; it was said she had made such a splendid match—she has separated from her husband. I have just returned from Brunswick, from a visit to the Gordons; they, too, live apart, though residing in the same house; neither of them are willing to bear the stigma of an open separation. Our friends, the Forsyths, middle-aged people though they are, have decided, within the past year, that they cannot live longer together. So it is. Complicated and delicate in its relations, you often find examples of the marriage state where all does not work smoothly. What wonder! Two people decide to live together in the closest relation all the years of their lives, without taking into account their separate individuality, which, unless remembered, will keep up continual friction, in one way or other, stirring up antagonism and separateness of existence.

"It is not true marriage. Bating exceptional cases of real affinity and consequent harmony, I am convinced that the people who get along well together, either lack sensitiveness, or they must have taken the difficulties into consideration, and met them with real wisdom."

These quotations are from Aunt Cinda's letter, in answer to a troubled one from her niece.

Two years before Lucy Reyne had entered into marriage with Paul Dean, in some respects as one would form a business copartnership. She was to have all her rights, she premised. It is true, she said this with a pretty toss of her head, that looked very charming to Paul—but she meant every bit of it. She had always had her way, and that was what she called having her rights. It was easy enough promising to such a bright-faced woman as Lucy, not understanding all the promise must cover, so Paul said that none of her rights should be infringed upon.

Well, they were married, and went to housekeeping in the cosiest way, and for the first few months were as happy as happy could be. But, at last, something went wrong.

One Friday night Lucy told her husband she was going home to Bristol, and asked him to come down Saturday night, and they would return together Monday on the morning train. He promised in good faith, but Saturday night he thought himself unusually tired, and without considering that his wife would be anxiously watching for him, he concluded not to go. Sunday was a blue day with him. He felt punished, and thought he would tell Lucy so when she came home.

He met her at the station, glad to see her; but when she learned that nothing of a serious nature had detained him, and that she had suffered unnecessary alarm, she was filled with indignation.

This was the first infringement of Lucy's rights. It obtruded itself on all occasions. She could not surmount that mountain, consequently other elevations continually succeeded. A single peep into the loom would have been sufficient. The carpet was certainly wrong side out.

Some tradition says that the thread which drew the angels from Paradise into evil, was, at first, as fine as a cobweb, but they did not resist it, and it grew as strong as a cable.

These were not bad-hearted young people, but they had entered into a compact which they thought was to be carried out on a sunshiny and always pleasant road. They had made no allowance for clouds, or an occasional shower, so each fastened themselves to a rigid platform, which their uncompromising natures had built under them.

In her dilemma, Lucy wrote to Aunt Cinda for advice. How she replied, I have already told you; but it was all Hebrew to Lucy. "It might be very fine in theory, but, dear me, how was a mortal to put it into practice, especially with injustice and injured feelings to contend with?"

They had begun wrong. Neither could concede that the other was injured, and so the tangle could not be made straight. Paul proposed separation, he thought it sinful to go on in the way they were living. Lucy had to suffer a great deal before she could consent to this. She waited to see if matters would not get into a better state. But they were to come into this improved condition, without any yielding on either part. "A little endured, a little tolerated as a foible; and, lo, the jagged atoms fit like smooth mosaic." But there was no concession here.

Lucy, at last, went home, feeling that there was no chance for happiness now in the wide world. She had been defrauded. Paul was the ruthless man who had taken her daily bread from her lips, and left her starving.

Paul felt dissatisfied. At night inexpressible weariness came over him, and he often longed for the light, soft fingers at his temples to soothe it away. Men never bear such stings patiently; they must find some means to dissipate the thoughts of them.

Paul went to Europe.

Lucy stayed at home with an eating fire at her heart, consuming her.

Wandering over the storied lands of the East Paul Dean was led to much thought—he became a reflecting man. He never for an hour forgot Lucy. His affections were not of the transferable order, and he had truly loved his wife.

He stayed away a whole year, and when he returned, it was with the intention of seeking her and proposing an alliance on a new basis—that of mutual forbearance and tolerance.

In the meantime, Lucy, of the two, had changed most. She had secluded herself from society, and literally went about doing good. It was the only thing that brought her alleviation.

"Oh, if she had been less exacting," was the burden of her cry. If Paul would only come for her again she would be different, but she knew he never would. She had not once heard from him, nor did she ever expect to.

Paul Dean arrived at Bristol in the night. Morning found him on his way to the house of Lucy's father. It was a long walk, but he thought he needed it to fortify him for the coming interview, for he feared that he might find Lucy still unforgiving. Walking toward that point, hoping and fearing, he saw a span of bays running in his direction, at the top of their speed. The driver's seat was vacant. The carriage was occupied by a lady. Paul was, by nature, a manly man. The lady must be saved. He was no mean athlete; nature and practice had made him powerful in strength, and now he meant to test it. He fixed himself, and sprang forward, caught the horses by the bits and shouted. They reared and plunged, but they were arrested, and other help was at hand. He turned to the carriage, then; the lady was lying back, white and helpless. He took her out and carried her to the nearest dwelling, it was Aunt Cinda's, and laying her on a couch he still had her enfolded in his arms.

"My wife!" he breathed—then there was a long silence.

"Are you come for me, Paul?"

"Yes."

Another moment of quiet.

"We will live together all the years of our lives, will we not, Paul, forgiving and loving?"

"Yes, darling, we belong to each other now, we will try to forget self, entirely."

Long suffering had worked them good. A life of harmony lay open before them. The domestic loom they would, now, look well to, and the carpet be kept right side out.

SOCRATES, passing through the market, cried out, How much is here I do not need! Nature is content with little—grace with less: poverty lies in opinion; what is needful is soon provided, and enough is as good as a feast; we are worth what we do not want; our occasions being supplied, what would we do with more?

RELIGIOUS READING.

[The following selections are made from a new volume by Rev. Henry B. Browning, a minister of the Church of England, just published by J. B. Lippincott & Co. It is entitled "The New Theology; or, Advanced Truths on Spiritual Subjects."]

RIGHT VIEWS OF GOD.

THE very first and most important of all things for our spiritual welfare is that we should get and keep just and right views of God. Many, not only in heathen lands, but even in this country of Christian light, live under entire delusion as to what God is, and as to how God feels toward us, His poor sinful creatures—delusion which affects all their views, all their conduct, all their life. Oh! then how precious an attainment, how great a blessing it will be if we are enabled, by the light of God's Word and by the teachings of His Spirit savingly to know God.

"If ye, then, being evil," said our Lord, "knew how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father in Heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" What is the great principle that is involved in these words? It is this: that the way to judge of God, and of God's feelings toward us, and of what God will do for us, is to look at the best, and purest, and kindest feelings of human parents, and to think that God is like all that; only that He is infinitely purer, kinder and better. That is the way to arrive at some faint notion of what God is, and of how God feels.

Such is the picture we should have in our minds of the Christian's God! Not the grim tyrant, not the rigorous and inflexible punisher, that some misguided and gloomy religionists worship and terrify their children with; not a being all severity, and wrath, and cursing, and woe; not a being hard and cold; not a being that damns little children, and then asks us to thank Him for doing it; not a being that made millions for sin and misery, and looks on in gloomy satisfaction as His poor creatures are consigned to hell, all for His glory. Call that black vision, conjured up by heartless logicians, as though they longed to drive man away from his Maker—call it Moloch or Juggernaut, if you will—but never dream that in that you see the Christian's God—the God revealed to our love and hope in the blessed Gospel of Jesus Christ. No: our God is one who, while hating the sin, pities and loves the sinner; one who wills not that any should perish; one who would that His glory should be vindicated by our bliss and salvation; who "sent His Son into the world that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

NEARNESS OF THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

Every man has spiritual senses by virtue of being born an immortal spirit. They are the senses which come into operation the moment the physical body is laid aside and man enters the spiritual world. They are the senses by which he then holds intercourse with his fellow-beings, by which he sees, hears, touches and converses with spirits in the world, as he formerly held intercourse and conversed with men in the world. They are the eyes, the ears and the hands of his spiritual body; which spiritual body is within the mortal body while he lives on the earth.

Now these inward senses, which every one possesses, are capable of being opened or brought into conscious exercise whenever it pleases the Lord that they shall be; whenever any heavenly or divine purpose can be accomplished by it. And whenever they are thus brought into exercise in any one, then the spiritual world around us immediately becomes visible to that individual; he sees some of its inhabitants and hears them speak.

In early ages this open intercourse with the spiritual world was common. Such is the state that all the prophets of the Old Testament were in when they had their visions. They were said to be in holy vision. They conversed with angels and had many heavenly things shewn to them. A vision, as applied to them, and in its real sense, means something that is distinctly seen. A vision is not a mere dream, as some may be apt to fancy, but a visible reality actually seen; as we are told concerning the women at the sepulchre, that they had seen a vision of angels who had told them that the Lord had risen from the dead. And John, in the Revelation, declares over and over again, in relation to the things there described, that he saw and heard them: "I, John, saw these things and heard them"—a declaration which is repeated many times in this book and in other parts of the Bible.

Hence, in ancient times, the prophets were called "seers," because there was opened in them the capacity of seeing what to other men is invisible—the spiritual world and its inhabitants.

In the 24th chapter of Numbers we read of Balaam, the Syrian prophet, who foretold the grandeur of Israel: "The man whose eyes were opened hath said."

Another striking instance is found in the 6th chapter of the 2d Kings, where the Syrian army had come down against Dothan, where the prophet Elias was, to take him prisoner: "And when the servant of the man of God had risen early and gone forth, behold a host encompassed the city, both with horses and chariots. And his servant said unto him, 'Alas, my master, how shall we do?' And he answered, 'Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.' And Elisha prayed, and said, 'Lord, I pray Thee, open his eyes that he may see.' And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man and he saw: and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots round about Elisha."

That was the angelic host encamped around about the man of God to deliver him. They were invisible at first to the young man; but when his spiritual eyes were opened, he saw what was before invisible to him in his ordinary state of vision. For a time he became a seer as Elisha was.

Elisha's young man did not have to be transported to a great distance through space to have those things shewn him; the ancient prophets did not have to be transported; nor did John, in the Isle of Patmos, have to be so carried, in order to have Heaven opened to him. They each remained in their place and saw all by the spiritual degree of vision being opened within themselves.

All these things show us that the spiritual world is not locally remote but spiritually near, and hidden from our sight only by the veil which hangs over our spiritual eyes.

GOD IN CHRIST.

If we would have clear, correct and comfortable views of God, we must view Him in Jesus. God was manifested in the manhood of Christ. In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Christ alone fully reveals the Father. What Jesus was, God is: what Jesus spake, God dictated: what Jesus did, God wrought. I am not to look on creation to find God, though to those who can read creation aright He is there revealed: I am not to go to Mount Sinai to learn what God is, though to those who can read the divine law aright, He is there, too, revealed: but I am to go to Jesus. Here are no terrors to make me afraid. Here is nothing to repel or keep me at a distance. But here is God, saying, "Come, weary one, I will give you rest; come, guilty one, I will pardon your sins; come, wandering one, I will receive you graciously; come, lost one, I will save you with an everlasting salvation." Sweet view of God this; how encouraging to the timid and the guilty! Precious view of Jesus this; how calculated to endear Him to the heart! If you are ever tempted to indulge harsh or hard thoughts of God, if you are ever prompted slavishly to fear Him, go direct to Jesus, and see God as He is revealed there, and you will behold that God is love.

FLORAL DEPARTMENT.

THE heat of the summer months obliges one to cease from any great amount of active work in the flower-garden. There may have been a little weeding before breakfast or after tea. Cuttings may have been taken and attended to in the proper season; and other necessary or desirable duties performed. But what the garden has been during the summer—whether it has displayed a rich succession of bloom, or been a wilderness of weeds and plants past their maturity—has depended upon how faithfully and well the spring work has been done.

But now the time for labor begins. Upon September depends the bloom of the succeeding May; and according as the labor is well or slightly done during this and the following month, will the operations of gardening be light or heavy in the spring.

The beds of autumn bloomers—Asters, Balsams, Zinnias, Marigolds, Cockscombs, Petunias, etc.—must be cleared of all weeds and flowers which are past blooming, and left to make the best display possible. The rubbish should be cleared from all the beds, and those found empty should be immediately spaded and prepared for the next year's blossoms. Many flowers can be sown to better advantage this month than in the spring. Phlox, Candytuft, Poppies, Larkspurs, Eschscholtzia, and many others, make an earlier and more profuse bloom by being sown in the fall, with the winter and early spring to grow in. Nearly all the Biennials and Perennials, such as Pinks of the different varieties, including all the Dianthus, Hollyhocks, etc., are better put in the ground now than in the spring.

The spring-blooming bulbs, including Tulips, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Crocus and Snowdrop, should be set out either this month or early in the next. The summer and autumn flowering bulbs, now in bloom, including Gladioluses and Tuberose, and others, must be kept tied to stakes, and when their blooming season is over the flower stalk must be cut off.

Let Dahlias be carefully staked to keep them from breaking, and as fast as a blossom is past its prime let it be removed. This will serve the double purpose of keeping the plant always in a neat condition, and of preserving all its strength and vigor toward sending out new blossoms, instead of wasting them in the perfection of seeds.

Those who wish to preserve their own flower seeds instead of depending on dealers for them, will have to look well to them now. Seed should be gathered and carefully labeled, in order to save trouble and confusion in the spring. My way has been to provide myself with a number of old letter envelopes which have been cut at the end instead of being torn open. With these, and a pencil in the pocket, such seeds as do not need drying, or too much clearing from husks or dried petals, can be at once put up and labeled. When the seeds are in the envelopes, the cut ends are turned over two or three times, and the seed is secure enough for practical purposes. Some seeds it is necessary to dry before they can be put away.

The lawn must be kept clear of weeds, and the grass still occasionally cut. If there are bare places in it, grass-seed may now be sown with advantage in time to receive the benefit from the autumn rains.

Chrysanthemums should now receive some attention, to make sure that they are in condition to give perfect bloom next month. A good variety of Chrysanthemums well cared for, and the different varieties not placed sufficiently near each other to allow them to mix, will secure beauty and attractiveness to a garden until nearly Christmas, unless one lives much nearer the north pole than the writer of this article.

It is well to decide in September, before the early frosts come, what plants it is desirable to save over for winter flowering. These plants should be potted at once, and their bloom checked. A Petunia cut down now will send out new shoots, and be in condition to bloom beautifully during the whole of the winter.

Callas may now be divided and re-potted, giving them a rich soil.

Cuttings from greenhouse plants, such as Geraniums, Heliotropes, etc., should now be taken in order to supply early bedding plants for next spring. All tender greenhouse bulbs, such as the Oxalis, Cyclamen, etc., must be potted so that they may be removed to the house before the nights get too cool. All plants which are standing out of doors in pots or tubs had better be removed to sheltered situations to avoid injury by unexpected frost.

It is too commonly the case that, even after a garden has presented an attractive appearance during the spring and summer, when fall comes it is allowed to fall into neglect, the near approach of winter seeming to render further care superfluous. But there is no reason why it should not retain its beauty to the last. Some of our shrubbery and trees are never so beautiful as in their autumn dress, and the autumn flowers are among the most brilliant. The prompt removal of dead and dying plants, an occasional raking of fallen leaves, and a little looking after plants in their prime, will insure such pleasing results as will well repay the gardener for her trouble.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

THE WHITE ROSE.

A WHITE rose that grew far up on a trellis felt very lonely, and sighed to be down in the garden where the children were at play.

"I am of no use away up here," she said. "Nobody sees me; and when I breathe out my sweet odors, the wind bears them off among the tree-tops, and they are lost.

But even as she sighed her complaint, a soft hand reached down from the window and took her gently from the stem that bore her, and she heard a voice say: "How pure and sweet!—pure as my patient lily."

Then the hand that held her tenderly bore her to an inner chamber, where a sick child lay upon a bed.

"This beautiful white rose," said the voice that had sounded so sweetly, "came up from the garden and grew close by the window. It has breathed the purest air and drank the warmest sunshine. Its heart is full of sweetness."

And the hand held her close to the sick child, who was refreshed by her beauty and fragrance.

Then the rose quivered with delight, and breathing out her very heart upon the air, filled the chamber with a rich perfume.

"I am content," said the rose, a little while afterward, as she lay on the pillow beside the sick child, her soft white leaves touching the cheek that was almost as soft and white as themselves.

"SUITED TO A T"

"HOW did your wristbands suit you, Frank?" said Fanny Grey to her brother Frank, a young man just home for his vacation. "I stitched them every bit myself, on the machine. Did they fit?"

"They were splendid, Fan. I told the fellows they were done by an old lady of seven years. Fit? I guess they did. Fit to a T. Thank you!"

And Frank Gordon pulled his coat-sleeve up a little and showed the shining linen, fitting his wrist, much to his little sister's admiration.

"Frank," said Fanny, a few moments after, "may I ask you something?"

"Of course you may, little one; I'll answer if I can."

And Frank clasped his hands over his head, tilted back his chair, and looked down into his sister's eyes that were saying just then, "As if there was anything you didn't know, you splendid fellow!"

"What do you mean by 'fitting to a T'?" she asked.

"Whew!" whistled the young man. "What do I mean, sure enough! Well, I mean suited exactly—fitted perfectly, I suppose."

"Yes," said the little girl; "I know that; but I thought, perhaps, it came from something. I don't see the sense of it, I'm sure. 'Suited to a T.' It meant something else in the first place, I know."

"Well, I suppose it did, pet," said Frank. "I'll look it up for you, sometime."

"He'll never think of it again," said Fanny to herself; "but I do wish I knew. 'Suited to a T.' It is so funny."

The next day Frank came in with a strange sort of ruler in his hand. It had a cross-piece at one end, which gave it the shape of a capital T.

"See here, Fanny," he said, "I've been to the carpenter's shop in your behalf. I hope I'll get you 'suited to a T' this time. I failed to satisfy you yesterday, you know."

So Frank placed the cross-piece against a perpendicular line which he had drawn, and laid the arm along a horizontal line that formed the right angle.

"You see," said he, "this ruler is called a T-square, and is often used to test the accuracy of lines and angles, as I have just tested mine. For a wonder, it fits exactly. I never did hit it so well before. And so you see it is fitted, or 'suited to a T.' And I suppose that 'suited to a T' came from the use of this kind of ruler."

"Oh, Frank, how much you do know! I'm so glad I asked you! I can see the sense of it now," said little Fan.

Frank looked as wise as an owl, but he didn't "let out" that he couldn't have told till he asked somebody else to explain it to him.

THE money you earn yourself is much brighter and sweeter than any you get out of dead men's coffers.

A SCANT breakfast in the morning of life whets the appetite for a feast later in the day.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

THE HERITAGE.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

THE rich man's son inherits lands,
 And piles of brick, and stone, and gold;
 And he inherits soft, white hands,
 And tender flesh that fears the cold,
 Nor dares to wear a garment old;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits cares;
 The bank may break, the factory burn,
 A breath may burst his bubble shares,
 And soft, white hand could hardly earn
 A living that would serve his turn;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits want;
 His stomach craves for dainty fare;
 With sated heart he hears the pant
 Of toiling hinds with brown arms bare,
 And wearies in his easy-chair;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
 Stout muscles and a sinewy heart;
 A hardy frame, a hardier spirit;
 King of two hands, he does his part
 In every useful toil and art;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
 Wishes o'erjoyed with humble things,
 A rank adjudged by toil-worn merit,
 Content that from employment springs
 A heart that in its labor sings;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
 A patience learned of being poor;
 Courage, if sorrow come, to bear it,
 A fellow-feeling that is sure
 To make the outcast bless his dear;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 A king might wish to hold in fee.

Oh, rich man's son! there is a toil,
 That with all others level stands;
 Large charity doth never soil,
 But only whiten soft, white hands—
 This is the best crop for thy lands;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 Worth being rich to hold in fee.

Oh, poor man's son! scorn not thy state;
 There is worse weariness than thine,
 In merely being rich and great;
 Toil only gives the soul to shine,
 And makes rest fragrant and benign;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 Worth being poor to hold in fee.

Both, heirs of some six feet of sod,
 Are equal in the earth at last;
 Both children of the same dear God,
 Prove title to your heirship vast,
 By record of a well-filled past;
 A heritage, it seems to me,
 Well worth a life to hold in fee.

AT THE GATE.

BY FLORENCE PERCY.

FAIN'T and trembling, tired and late,
 I approach the bolted gate;
 And with humbleness sincere,
 Knock, and crave admittance here—
 Worn with wanderings long and sore:
 Open the door!

Asking neither alms nor food,
 Only rest and quietude;
 Hear, I pray, my humble plaint—
 Never soul so tired and faint
 Craved compassion here before—
 Open the door!

Oh, how soft the couch will be!
 Folded down so peacefully;
 Pillows fair and dainty white,
 Shaded from the tiresome light,
 By dim angels hevering o'er;
 Open the door!

Never on an earthly bed
 Was so dainty drapery spread,
 Spangled bright with buds and bees,
 'Broidered with anemones;
 Hear me, angel, I implore:
 Open the door!

Once I longed for Wealth and Place,
 Happiness, and Love's sweet grace;
 Now there lives within my breast
 Only this one wish—for Rest—
 Only Rest—I ask no more:
 Open the door!

MY BABY.

BY HESTER A. BENEDIOT.

COME to my arms, my baby!
 My bonnie, beautiful girl!
 My little white lamb with the restless feet,
 My blossom of blossoms, dainty and sweet,
 My lily, my rose, my pearl!

Come to my arms, my baby!
 The dew is over the grass,
 That nod to the buttercups, gold as your hair,
 And the hands of the shadows, purple and bare,
 Are parted to let you pass.

Whither away, my baby!
 Kissing your wee white hand,
 And tossing it back like a flake of snow,
 Toward the roses, clustering low,
 By the terrace where I stand?

Whither away my baby!
 After the humble-bee,
 When the little brown bird that taught you to sing
 Is asleep with her bright head under her wing,
 High in the sycamore-tree?

Oh, your white feet over the grasses,
 My darling, are fleet as the fawn's,
 And your face is fairer than days in June,
 And your song is sweeter than any tune
 Of robins in roseate dawns.

Come to my arms, my baby!
 My bonnie, beautiful girl!
 For my lips are heavy with kisses sweet
 For your dimpled face and your dimpled feet,
 My lily, my rose, my pearl!

Ah, I have you! I have you, darling!
 Sweet shall your slumber be,
 The long, bright night, while the starbeams hold
 Their hands with mine in your locks of gold,
 And shadows are over the sea.

THE RUINED HOUSE.

"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

I KNOW a beauteous dwelling
 Of workmanship most rare,
 Adorned with all the graces
 That loveliness can wear.

'Twas a templed shrine of innocence
 Illumined from above,
 A palace rendered brilliant
 By Childhood's trusting love.

The windows were of crystal,
 Than diamonds more bright;
 Yet often softly shaded
 With a pensive, holy light—

Where images of mystery
 Entranced the gazer's view,
 Bright forms of love and beauty
 That Thought, the artist, drew.

Between the opening portals
 Bright pearls was just discerned,
 Where thin and snowy curtains
 Their rosy linings turned;

And forth came sounds of friendship,
 And laughter's merry din,
 And strains of choral music,
 From singing-birds within.

Oh, how you loved that dwelling
 As something most divine;
 The soul that dwelt within it
 Was closely linked with mine.

You gazed upon the windows
 And learned their mystic lore;
 You lingered round the portal;
 You kissed the pearly door.

But now, alas! it's ruined,
 The grass has o'er it grown;
 And she who dwelt within it
 On angel wings has flown.

She veiled the pictured windows,
 She shut the pearly door;
 She crossed the rapid river,
 And reached the shining shore.

Free from the earthly fetters,
 From earthly cares at rest,
 Another seraph's singing
 'Mid the regions of the blest—

Singing the song of triumph,
 Whose echo speaks to thee:
 "I've found a brighter dwelling-place,
 Father; come and see!"

WHERE DID YOU COME FROM?

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

WHERE did you come from, baby dear?
 Out of the everywhere into here.

Where did you get your eyes so blue?
 Out of the sky as I came through.

What makes the light in them sparkle and spin?
 Some of the starry spikes left in.

Where did you get that little tear?
 I found it waiting when I got here.

What makes your forehead so smooth and high?
 A soft hand stroked it as I went by.

What makes your cheek like a warm white rose?
 I saw something better than any one knows.

Whence that three-cornered smile of bliss?
 Three angels gave me at once a kiss.

Where did you get this pearly ear?
 God spoke, and it came out to hear.

Where did you get those arms and hands?
 Love made itself into hooks and bands.

Feet, whence did you come, you darling things?
 From the same box as the cherubs' wings.

How did they all just come to be you?
 God thought about me, and so I grew.

But how did you come to us, you dear?
 God thought about you, and so I am here.

WORDS AND TONES.

IT is not so much what you say,
 As the manner in which you say it;
 It is not so much the language you use,
 As the tones in which you convey it.

The words may be mild and fair,
 And the tones may pierce like a dart;
 The words may be soft as the summer air,
 And the tones may break the heart.

A PAGE OF VARIETIES.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

PULL up the moment you find you are out of the road, and take the nearest way back at once.

EVERY time the sheep bleats it loses a mouthful, and every time we complain we miss a blessing.

NEVER promise a child and then fail to perform, whether you promise him a bun or a beating.

He who does a base thing in seal for his friend, burns the golden thread that binds their hearts together.

It is not until we have passed through the furnace that we are made to know how much dross is in our composition.

"BLESSED are they that hear the Word of God and keep it." It is all in the keeping, so far as we are concerned.

It is of no advantage to have a lively mind if we are not just. The perfection of the pendulum is not to go fast, but to be regular.

NEVER chase a lie. Let it alone, and it will run itself to death. I can work out a good character much faster than any one can lie me out of it.

MANY lose the opportunity of saying a kind thing by waiting to weigh the matter too long. Our best impulses are too delicate to endure much handling.

DIOSGENES, being asked which beast's bite was the most dangerous, replied: "If you mean wild beasts, it's the slanderer's; if tame ones, the flatterer's."

DEBT is so degrading, that if I owed a man a penny I would walk twenty miles, in the depth of winter, to pay him, sooner than feel I was under an obligation.

THE truly beneficent man is the happiest man. He derives a purer and deeper joy from the luxury of giving to make others happy, than he does in receiving from others.

HONESTY is the best policy. If the lion's skin does not do, never try the fox's. Let your face and hands, like the church clock, always tell how your inner works are going.

LAY a substantial foundation for the character in noble, manly, generous principles, and your boy will not fail to succeed in life. Guide and counsel him wisely, but do not attempt to force him into a calling for which his tastes and talents totally unfit him.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS.

STRIPS of zinc, tin and magnesium foil will burn very prettily if lighted, the ash falling in fantastic coruscations.

CURIOUS FACT.—Smooth, clean surfaces will always adhere. Take a bullet and cut it fairly in two; the surfaces, if pressed together again, will be difficult to separate.

MAGNETIC EXPERIMENT.—Take a small magnet and cover it with a sheet of thin paper; strew upon this some fine iron filings; they will immediately be arranged in curves, showing the lines of magnetic force.

CHEMICAL EXPERIMENT.—Take a pennyworth of sulphate of copper and dissolve it in a little water; if the clean blade of a steel knife be immersed in the solution for a few minutes, it will be coated with copper when removed.

THE ELASTIC EGG.—Take a good sound egg and soak it in strong vinegar for twelve hours; it will then become soft and elastic; now introduce it into a bottle and fill up with lime water. The egg will become quite hard, and create some astonishment as to how it got in.

VOL. XII.—45.

PHILOSOPHER'S WOOL.—When oxide of zinc is heated, say on an iron spoon in a gas flame, it becomes canary yellow, the color fading as it cools; if the heating is continued, it sublimes in woolly flakes, which in olden times received the name of "Philosopher's Wool."

TO OBTAIN A SOLID BY MIXING TWO LIQUIDS.—Dissolve as much chloride of calcium as the water will take up in a small glass; and in another perform the same operation with carbonate of potash. These two clear liquids, mixed together in a larger glass, will produce a solid.

"INVISIBLE" WRITING.—A solution of cobalt nitrate may be used to write with upon unglazed paper, and the characters will be invisible. Hold it before a fire, and the characters will become distinct. A solution of sulphate of copper will also be invisible, if weak enough, and may be plainly seen if washed with a little ammonia.

CHLOROPHYLL.—If some grass or leaves of any description be taken and boiled with some spirits of wine in a test tube over a spirit-lamp or gas-burner, the color will be extracted and be imparted to the spirit. If this solution be held up to the light, it appears green; if looked at against the light, it appears red. This coloring matter is called leaf-green or chlorophyll.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

WHICH is of greater value, pray these, say
The bride or bridegroom? Must the truth be told?
Alas, it must! The bride is given away,
The bridegroom often regularly sold.

A YANKEE editor remarks that he has lately seen a couple of sisters who had to be told everything together, for they were so much alike that they could not be told apart.

A CHESTER county farmer sent an order to Boston lately for a clock. He said he should prefer one made by Tempus Fugit, as all the best clocks in his neighborhood had that name on the face.

"HAVEN'T you mistaken the pew, sir?" blandly asked a Sunday Chesterfield to a stranger as he entered it. "I beg your pardon," replied the individual, rising to go out, "I fear I have; I thought it was a Christian's."

A MAN out West has moved so often that it is said whenever a covered wagon comes near his house, his chickens all march up, and fall on their backs, and cross their legs, ready to be tied up and carried to the next stopping-place.

A GENTLEMAN inquired of a carpenter's boy: "My lad, when will this job you have on hand be done?" "I can't tell, sir," replied the honest boy, artlessly. "It's a day job, and it will depend upon how soon the governor has another order."

AN Irish gentleman, building a house, ordered a pit to be dug to contain the heaps of rubbish left by the workmen. His steward asked what they should do with the earth dug out of the pit. "Make it large enough to hold both the rubbish and the earth, to be sure," said he.

Two Hibernians were passing a stable which had a rooster on it for a weather-vane, when one addressed the other thus: "Pat, what's the reason they didn't put a hin up there instead of a rooster?" "An' sure," replied Pat, "that's say enough; don't ye see it would be inconvenient to go for the eggs?"

"You shouldn't be glutinous, Isaac," said Mrs. Partridge, as, with an anxious expression, she marked the strong, convulsive effort that young gentleman was making to bolt the last quarter of a mince pie. "You shouldn't be so glutinous, dear. You must be very careful or you will get something in your elementary canal or sarcoophagus, one of these days, that will kill you, Isaac."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The New Theology; or, Advanced Truths on Spiritual Subjects. Edited by Henry B. Browning, Rector of St. George with St. Paul, Stamford, England, Author of "Words in Season." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. As in science and philosophy, so in religion, men are questioning the old formulas and dogmas. The best and purest minds of the age are subjecting mediæval theology to the severest tests, and breaking away from that blind submission to mere man-made authority in spiritual things, which wrought, in the centuries past, such disasters in the church. From these advanced Christian thinkers, Mr. Browning, who is a clergyman of the Church of England, has gathered, in a compact volume of nearly two hundred pages, some of their best and clearest utterances on spiritual things. The "New Theology" of this volume is as old as the New Testament, and in harmony with its teachings. As a contribution to religious literature, it is timely and valuable.

Bachelor's Illustrated Tourist's Guide of the United States. By John B. Bachelor. Boston: John B. Bachelor, Publisher. More than half this volume is devoted to a description of Gettysburg, and to historical incidents which have given interest to various localities surrounding the town. The balance of the book describes the various localities frequented by tourists, and gives much useful information in regard to means of traveling, hotels, etc. The illustrations are numerous and exceedingly beautiful.

Fairmount Park. Sketches of its Scenery, Waters and History. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. Philadelphia has reason to be proud of her Park, and we are pleased to see that a Philadelphia publishing firm has seen fit to describe its beauties in a book. The Park has rare natural advantages of scenery, while many of its localities are rich in historic interest. This volume contains a map of the Park, and numerous beautiful engravings of views on the Schuylkill and Wissahickon, and of objects and places of interest. As it is in this Park that the approaching Centennial Exhibition is to be held, no doubt the people throughout the country who purpose visiting that exhibition will find this book attractive reading.

Must it Be? A Romance. Translated from the German of Carl Detlef. By M. S., Translator of "By His Own Might," etc. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. A pleasant story, which takes the reader into the midst of Russian life, and shows him the characters, manners and customs of the Russian people. The volume is handsomely illustrated.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

A NEW TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

WE take from a Vevay, Indiana, paper, the following account of a new temperance movement recently inaugurated in that town, which has so far been remarkably successful:

"The most formidable organization upon a temperance basis in this part of the country, is the 'Workingmen's Friendly Society,' headquarters at Vevay, with branches in other parts of the county. Its meetings are held weekly, open to the public, and its pledge simply requires its members to abstain from the use of liquors for one year, the penalty for violation being the publication of the names in the papers. The Vevay branch has a membership of over two hundred and fifty, all being men over twenty-one years of age. It was organized by drinking men, and hence it derives the name of 'Red Noses,' the title by which the society is generally known and recognized by the public. Repeated efforts have been made to allow females to unite with the society, but owing to the fact that many of the old drinkers have heretofore been ashamed to meet the women face to face, it has been deemed advisable not to enlarge the test of membership at present.

"Nearly every Sunday they hold a public meeting in the Court House, where they have vocal and instrumental music, and an address from public or amateur speakers. They have purchased an organ for their use on these occasions. Heretofore, the music has been by volunteers; but this method having failed to secure music on one or two occasions, the society have adopted the novel plan of inviting the Sunday-schools, and other organizations, to furnish music, alternating each week; each school, or other society, coming with their books, singers and organ players, and leading the exercises of the day. Last Sunday the M. E. School officiated, next Sunday the Presbyterian School will lead, and so on until every school and other organization has been invited to go through with the musical exercises.

"This plan succeeds admirably; there is just emulation enough to secure the best results—the public becomes more and more interested, and the whole meeting proves a grand success. Long may it wave!"

A subscriber to the HOME MAGAZINE writes us from Vevay, under date 4th of July, 1873:

"T. S. ARTHUR: As a friend of temperance, wish us 'God speed.' This day the wives, sisters and friends of two hundred and fifty men in this town thank God that they will return to their homes this evening free, sober men! Sixty mothers of sons from fifteen to twenty-one also add their voices to that 'Hymn of Thanksgiving.'"

"HOME'S SUBSCRIBER."

Is there a reader of our magazine whose heart does not give a quicker and warmer throb as he takes in the full meaning of this brief letter? "God speed" the good work, we say fervently! May "Workingmen's Friendly Societies" spring up everywhere over the land. We welcome with gladness all efforts and all agencies directed against the monster evil of our day.

THE CAPTURE OF KHIVA.

WE have received from the East the news of the capture of Khiva by the Russians. Concerned, as little as we are, with the affairs of the Russian Empire, it seems at the first glance as though this were a matter of small importance to us, or to the world at large, beyond the parties immediately concerned. We even read with indifference that Russia contemplates extending her possessions to the very foot of the Himalayas, and we reflect, as we read, that if she have an eye upon India itself, it concerns England rather than us. Nevertheless, the capture of this comparatively unimportant province of Western Asia has an important effect upon civilization. As a result attendant upon it, slavery has been abolished forever throughout the province. Despatches have been sent to Teheran, notifying the Persian Government to make preparations for the reception of ten thousand Persian slaves now liberated.

This is not the first time the present administration of Russia has declared itself in favor of freedom and civilization. One of its first acts upon coming into power was the abolishment of serfdom throughout the empire.

The abolition of slavery in the Khanate of Khiva is of more significance than was the abolition of slavery in the United States, although the number of slaves in the latter country far exceeded those in the former. In America slavery, bad as it was, was attended by certain mitigations. The slaves were often comfortable and happy, and frequently a degree of confidence and affection was felt between the masters and their servants. In Khiva slavery existed in its worst and most brutal forms. The slaves were frequently prisoners of war. Of these prisoners, the younger were preserved in a state of wretched servitude; the elder were put to death after being subjected to the most cruel tortures.

Vampyry, who travelled disguised as an Oriental all through Central Asia, gives most heartrending accounts of the treatment of the slaves at the hands of their masters. He mentions, in one instance, a Persian slave who implored him for a drop of water, "as, according to his tale, they had for two entire days given him dried salt fish instead of bread; and, although he had been forced to work the whole day in the melon fields, they had denied him even a drop of water. Luckily," says Vambéry, "I was alone in the tent; the sight of the bearded man bathed in tears made me forget all risks—I handed him my water-skin, and he satisfied his thirst while I kept watch at the door." It is considered the duty and privilege of every one to maltreat a slave.

The Persians were not the only sufferers from this terrible system of slavery. All strangers in the province upon whom they could lay their hands were liable to be seized and held for ransom; or, failing this, to be sent to Khiva, the capital, for public sale. Once sold in this manner, they were, in all probability, taken beyond reach of their friends, and generally soon succumbed under the terrible hardships of their lot.

Vambéry tells of two Russian sailors who were thus captured and condemned to slavery, they failing to obtain the high ransom demanded of the Russian Government. One had already died, and the other was likely soon to be freed in the same manner from his troubles. The Russian Government pleaded in extenuation of their conduct in the matter that they did not wish to accustom the Turkomans to such exorbitant ransoms; for that, with any encouragement, these bold robbers would devote themselves night and day to their profitable depredations.

We cannot wonder that Russia has desired to conquer this country; and, though war and bloodshed are always terrible things to contemplate, we cannot but rejoice that she has been successful in her undertaking, and that such good results have already sprung from this success.

SUNDAY LIQUOR-SELLING IN THE PARK.

THERE is a law of Pennsylvania which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, and makes the penalty of violation both fine and imprisonment. Our Park Commissioners cannot possibly be ignorant of the existence of this law; and yet, under their permission and sanction, liquor is dealt out openly to crowds of people at Belmont every Sunday! It is bad enough for them to sell to an individual the right to make a drinking centre of Belmont, one of the loveliest spots in our beautiful Park; but worse beyond measure to become a party with him in the Sunday desecration of the place, in violation of one of the plainest laws on our statute book.

The people should look to this matter. It concerns every good and true man in our community. If the Park Commissioners have no more regard for good citizenship than to become parties to so shameful a violation of law, they should be held up to public odium, and so be driven to some decent regard for the honor and well-being of the community.

It is amazing that men of such character, standing and influence as our Park Commissioners should have ranged themselves on the side of an enemy to the public weal, whose frightful desolations are cursing the land in length and breadth thereof. It would have been so easy for them to have taken the other side. They stand before the people without excuse.

ITALIAN SLAVES.

EVERY one in our larger cities must have noticed the great increase within a year or two of Italian street musicians, mostly boys, and many of them very young. These children are virtually slaves, their service having been bought from their parents in Italy. Agents go out from this country, and by false representation induce the miserably poor peasants to sell the services of their young children, who are brought over to the United States, where they are sent into the streets with harps, violins, etc., to get money honestly or dishonestly. Recent facts have come to light showing a system of cruelty and oppression, as practiced toward these children, frightful to think of. They are half-starved, and beaten if they do not make the required return of money every day. In New Haven, recently, an Italian named Gilone, who held four of these boys in servitude, was arrested and committed to prison, in default of four thousand dollars bail, and will be tried, and we hope severely punished.

The boys testified that they had been in this country for twenty-one months, and had been kept in the Crosby Street den in New York, until they were brought to New Haven; that they were beaten and kicked, unless they brought in a prescribed sum of money every night, and were told by Gilone to steal if they could not earn the money.

We trust that the authorities of all our larger towns and cities will take this matter promptly in hand, and at once stop the cruel slave trade now carried on between our country and Italy. The headquarters of this infamous traffic is in New York.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS.—Infection may come in false hair; and we think it not at all improbable that in occasional instances serious diseases have been contracted from hair which had been cut from the head of a person who died of a malignant disease. A great deal of the false hair worn in such mountain-heaps by American women, comes from Germany, and a large part of it is cut from the heads of peasant women after death. No matter from what cause a peasant woman dies—whether from small-pox, cholera or malignant fever—her hair is, in most cases, cut off before burial, and sold. How far any one is safe in attaching such hair to the head, and wearing it for hours at a time in close contact with the skin and its innumerable absorbents, is a question to be seriously considered. And no one who buys false hair can possibly know from whence it came.

D.S.—Paints and powders for the complexion are in nearly all cases hurtful to the skin, and often injurious to the health. In regard to "pearl powder," an authority says: "Of all cosmetics, pearl powder, though seemingly the most simple and harmless, is one of the most hurtful; and this, independently of its component parts, is owing to the large quantity used, and the extent of surface usually covered with it. The ingredients of pearl powder are the white oxide of bismuth reduced to an impalpable powder. French chalk, and a small proportion of carmine to take off the dead white of the powder and give a kind of bloom to the complexion."

L.—"The game not worth the candle," originated, we believe, in the West. In hunting for deer at night a candle would be lighted and set at the edge of a wood, or any other place selected, and the hunter would stand a little out of the illuminated circle. If there was a deer in the neighborhood, he would soon be attracted by the light, and on coming near the hunter would discover him by the reflection of the light from his eyes, at which he would direct his aim. Sometimes straying cattle were killed in this way, and sometimes wild animals of no use to the hunter. The game was said to be "Not worth the candle," in cases where it proved valueless.

MRS. MARY D. GIBBONS, of Quincy, Mass., a lady seventy years old, has used a Grover & Baker Machine for the last twelve years. Her daughter, who uses a Wilcox & Gibbs Machine, after every week's wash brings her work to be repaired on the Grover & Baker.

ADVERTISERS' DEPARTMENT.

WANAMAKER & BROWN, the popular clothiers at Sixth and Market Streets, Philadelphia, have at present an unusually large stock of summer garments for gentlemen and boys' wear. To speedily clear counters, they have reduced the prices on all their goods, and offer inducements to purchasers not to be met with elsewhere.

DREKA'S NEW "DICTIONARY BLOTTER."

—This is an ingenious and most useful device just introduced by Mr. Louis Dreka, the well-known stationer and engraver, No. 1033 Chestnut Street. It consists of a convenient portfolio, containing a number of blotting pads and the requisite pockets for paper, etc.; and in addition to this, in compact form, on pages of fine paper just the size of the pads, a complete dictionary of all the words in common use, so that a letter-writer need never misspell a word from the want of a ready help. And as in correspondence the prime essential—that, in fact, which renders it respectable or the reverse—is correct spelling, the sale of these blotting case dictionaries ought only to be limited by the necessity for their use on the part of the letter-writing world. The article is vastly more complete than the reader is likely to infer from this notice, and well deserves personal inspection.

"THE LADIES' FAVORITE."—The greatest of modern inventions for the purpose of lessening women's labor, is the Sewing Machine, and too much praise cannot be awarded to the truly great men who were the inventors and promoters. Prominent among these stands the name of Allen B. Wilson, the inventor of the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine, which is acknowledged by all those who are best able to judge of the merits of the different machines made, to be "The Ladies' Favorite." So perfect was Mr. Wilson's original conception, that, although twenty years have elapsed since its first general introduction, and all the talent of the world has been brought to bear in the improvement of these machines, but slight modifications have been made in its construction, and it stands to-day foremost in the ranks of popularity. This fact is attested by the fact that there are more of these machines in actual use to-day than of any other make. The construction is at once simple, and yet beautiful, and although in its work using threads almost as delicate as cobwebs, its durability is greater than any other. Much more can be said in its praise, but our space will not allow it. The thousands of ladies using them will bear us out as true witnesses.

WINTER AND EARLY SPRING FLOWERS.

—What more lovely than a stand of hyacinths, narcissus, early tulips and other flowers in full bloom in January, when all without is snow and ice? At a trifling outlay, you can all enjoy this luxury. Mr. Dreeb has just issued his new catalogue of bulbs for planting in the autumn—for house culture as well as planting out of doors. Doubtless many of our readers remember the gorgeous display of hyacinths, tulips, etc., at Fairmount Park last spring. These were all obtained from his establishment. Send at once for a catalogue. His address is 714 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. See advertisement.

BUTTERICK PATTERNS.

For the engravings illustrative of the fashions, as given in our present number, we are under obligations to the house of E. Butterick & Co., 555 Broadway, New York, whose various publications, including the Metropolitan Magazine, are confessedly the leaders of the mode.

From the well and clearly-written explanations which accompany all patterns of that enterprising firm, the fullest comprehension may be derived as to every detail of a garment, including the cutting and fitting, economical making-up, and amount of material that goes to its fabrication.

Those who may desire patterns or illustrations, should ascertain if the firm has an agency in their neighborhood; and failing to find one, they may address the principal office, as named above, assured that every application, however modest, will receive prompt and respectful attention.

The "Butterick" system, in its essential nature, is free from the objections urged against the old-time fashion-plates. Adopting as its standard an average human creature—man, woman or child, as might be exacted—it enlarged, diminished and adapted its patterns upon a principle so sound, and with the aid of machinery so ingenious, that perfection in its kind was inevitable. Each garment was reproduced in patterns with such endless variations as to insure a fit to every form presented. With each pattern is a working description, so minute that the veriest apprentice of a country dressmaker could not fail to understand it, and bring properly together the several parts thus carefully shaped to her hands. In brief, no suggestion taught by experience and realizable by ingenuity and skill, was omitted in making these patterns at once practical, simple and infallible; and hence the wonderful success of the system, which is now familiar to every household in the country, and has its agencies in almost every village, town and city.

In the history of invention there has been no such rapid triumph. Scores of designers, artists, engravers and printers, with an editorial corps equalling in ability and numbers that of any periodical in the country, constitute the army of experts which Messrs. Butterick & Co. have enlisted in the dissemination of their new evangel of fashion, which may be said to have taken possession of the New World.

To the stranger, who may be interested in the progress of national industry, and curious to examine the manifold appliances and resources which can be brought to the promotion of elevated taste in dress and personal adornment, no pleasure can be greater than to visit such portions of Messrs. Butterick & Co.'s establishments as are open to inspection. From the broad front doors, to the arches through which loads of closely-packed publications and patterns are daily shipped to every portion of America, and even to Europe and Asia, every department is an interesting and instructive study, admirably repaying the investigation.

A Word to our Old and New Friends.

The season for club-getting and subscribing to periodical literature for 1874 is fast approaching, and we would take this early opportunity of saying a word to our friends throughout the country, to remind them that those earliest in the field get the largest clubs; and those who send their subscriptions in first get the earliest impressions of our beautiful premium plate. We are having engraved for 1874 a magnificent picture, surpassing anything we have thus far published. It will also be much larger than any premium we have yet given.

Say a word in time to your friends and neighbors, and get their promise to take "ARTHUR'S ILLUSTRATED HOME MAGAZINE" for next year, so that when you go round to make up your clubs you will find the work easy.

Our great American Family Magazine will have new attractions next year. We intend to make it the best and most desirable of its class. Mr. Arthur is now at work on a new serial story, which will be commenced in the coming January number.

Important to Agents in New England!

No reliable agent, no matter what engaged in, should fail to know the chance now offered for immediate and permanent employment in New England, where we have taken a "new departure" in earnest.

T. S. ARTHUR & SON.

Address D. L. MILLIKEN, at our New England Office, 21 Bromfield Street, Boston.
Full particulars free.

Mr. Arthur's New Books by Mail.

ORANGE BLOSSOMS, FRESH AND FADED, $2.50.

THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP, $2.00.

CAST ADRIFF, $2.00.

We will send by mail any of the above new books by T. S. Arthur, on receipt of the price.

For $4.00 we will send "Orange Blossoms" and the "Man-Trap," or "Cast Adrift." For $3.50 the "Man-Trap" and "Cast Adrift." For $5.50, the three volumes will be sent.

To Club-Getters.

Some of our club-getters have written to ask if "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," "BED-TIME," or "THE WREATH OF IMMORTALITY" would be sent free to subscribers, in place of "THE CHRISTIAN GRACES," if desired. We answer yes. A choice of either of these pictures can be made.

IN THE HARVEST FIELD.

GLORY to Him who bids the field
Its blessing to our toil to yield,
Who giveth much, who giveth more,
Till store and basket runneth o'er;
Thus, ere the golden skies grow dim,
Come, let us sing our Harvest Hymn.

His finger on the land doth lay
Its beauty, stretching far away;
His breath doth fill the opal skies
With grandeur dread to mortal eyes;
He gives man harvest from the wild,
And drops the daisies for the child.

But, oh, how shall we dare draw near?
Such power is veiled in mists of fear.
What can we be to One who fills
The awful silence of the hills,
Who knows the secrets of the sea,
The wild beasts in the forests free?

But, Lord, we know Thee otherwise—
A slighted man, with loving eyes,
Tolling along, with weary feet,
Such paths as these among the wheat;
Come from the light of Heaven's throne
To call no home on earth thine own.

Oh, Lord, Thou givest bounteous spoil
To the poor measure of our toil,
For our few gray dank sowing days
The glow of August's evening blaze;
And what can we give for the pain
With which Thou sowed immortal grain?

Nothing—for all we have is Thine,
Who need'st not corn, nor oil, nor wine;
Nothing—unless Thou make us meet
To follow thee through tares and wheat,
And from the storm of woe and sin
To help Thee bring Thy harvest in.

SUDDEN DEATHS.

BY J. E. M'C.

WHEN a person dies suddenly, it is customary to attribute his death to some latent disease he may have had long in his system. Heart disease is very commonly settled upon as a convenient and satisfactory explanation. But little account is made of mental and moral influences, which may have greatly hastened the event.

Yet history gives us many examples of those who have died from sudden grief, or joy, or chagrin, or some similar emotion. And in common diseases any observer will see how greatly the mental state affects the patient's condition.

Few people are so devoted to science as the Arabian grammarian, Sibouyah, who died of grief, because, in a discussion with another scholar of his time, the caliph did not agree with him in a disputed point.

A Spanish theologian, named Valentia, was reproached by the pope for something unsatisfactory in his writings, and died of grief, or mortification, in consequence of it.

So, too, a great French historian was killed by a printer's blunders. It is well such particular people do not write for the press now-a-days. If all authors were as sensitive, they would be a short-lived class.

No doubt there have been young men ever since Absalom's day who have prided themselves on their fine hair or beard, but few have ever set their heart on it, as did a certain bishop of Clermont, named Guillaume Duprat. Never in France had such a beautiful beard been seen, and the young man cultivated it as assiduously as if he had no other business in life. But his closely-shaven clerical brethren looked with a stern eye on such an innovation. One Easter day, as he presented himself at his cathedral to take part in its services, he found three grim-faced brethren awaiting him, with scissors and razor, prepared to put him into better ecclesiastical trim. He cried out in dismay: "Spare my beard, and I will renounce my bishopric!" and fled from his pursuers to his own chateau. Afterward, however, he was induced to submit to the rigorous canons of the church, and allow himself to be shaved. But so repulsive did his shorn face look to him, and so deep was his regret at the sacrifice he had been compelled to make, that he took to his bed and soon died. It is not wise to make an idol of one's personal appearance, for a thousand accidents may mar it, and destroy the peace of its worshipper.

Disappointment has no doubt hurried thousands to their graves, who otherwise might have lived on for many years. An Italian writer, named Fonteguerri, had an appointment promised him, which he was very anxious to obtain. But when the time came it was given to another. The shock prostrated him, so that he never rallied from it.

A French architect died of grief because his royal master preferred the works of one Mansart to his own. If he was the author of our famous Mansard roofs, it might have consoled him some to hear the censures passed on the invention in our times.

Two famous painters are said to have died of jealousy, when they looked on the works of artists that surpassed their own. No doubt many an author, besides the youthful Keats, has had his days shortened by the sharp arrows of the critics.

Anger is a most wearing passion to indulge, and tears down the constitution like a fever. A woman who was subject to violent fits of this sort, was once beating a child in a most furious manner for neglecting her work. Pausing a moment to take breath, she dropped down dead. Happy release for the poor children of that household! But what of the mother thus summoned away?

Children, and sometimes older people, have died of sudden fright, where there was no just ground for fear. A young lady was met by a party of boys with a hideous "Jack-a-lantern" one evening, and was so terrified that she died a few minutes after she reached her home.

A celebrated French marshal was so superstitious that, when a saltcellar was once overturned in his lap at dinner, he was thrown into a frenzy of terror, exclaiming, "I am a dead man!" He never recovered from the fright, and his prediction was soon verified.

A sound mind and an even, quiet spirit have often enabled a feeble body to outlast many which had far greater prospects of a long life. When we are cultivating evil, selfish dispositions, when we are inordinately setting our hearts upon anything below the skies, we may know that we are sowing for ourselves the seeds of death.

A RECIPE for perpetual youth is to study God's book of nature. Never be idle. See the good in mankind, pass by the evil. Love yourself least. Strive to do some good every day of your life. Speak only kind words. Thus your heart will ever be young, and your friends will not notice the wrinkles of age.

If we are cheerful and contented, all nature smiles with us; the air seems more balmy, the sky clearer, the ground has a brighter green, the trees have a richer foliage, the flowers a more fragrant smell, the birds sing more sweetly, and the sun, moon and stars all appear more beautiful.

THE ARGUS PHEASANT.

THE Argus Pheasant of Sumatra and neighboring localities is the most imposing of this group of birds, although many others surpass it in brilliant colors. It is named in reference to the ill-fated Argus, whose hundred eyes never slept simultaneously until charmed by the magic lyre of Mercury.

This magnificent bird is remarkable for the very great length of its tail-feathers, and the extraordinary development of the secondary feathers of the wings. While walking on the ground, or sitting on a bough, the singular length of the feathers is not very striking, but when the bird spreads its wings they come out in all their beauty. The bird is not a of plumage, and would require many pages to describe them fully. Suffice it to say that the gradations of jetty black, deep rich brown, orange, fawn, olive and white, are so justly and boldly arranged as to form admirable studies for the artist, and totally to baffle description.

"In one feather now before me," says Rev. J. G. Wood, "there are seventeen large 'eyes' on the outer web, each being surrounded with a ring of jetty black, then with a dash of chocolate within the ring, then olive, with the least possible tinge of purple, and lastly with a spot of pure white near the tip, fading imperceptibly into the olive on one side and the chocolate on the other. Between these 'eyes' some leopard like mottlings diversify the rich fawn good flier, and when it takes to the air only goes for a short distance. In running, its wings are said to be efficient aids.

Although the Argus Pheasant is scarcely larger than an ordinary fowl, the plumage is so greatly developed that its total length is more than five feet. The head and back of the neck are covered with short brown feathers, and the neck and upper part of the breast are warm chestnut-brown, covered with spots of yellow and black, and similar tints are formed on the back. The tail is a deep chestnut, covered with white spots, each spot being surrounded with a black ring. When the bird chooses, it can raise the tail so that it stands boldly in the air between the wings, and is partly spread. The secondaries of the wings are most wonderful examples of the ground color, and outside of them four wavy bands of dark brown run along the feather toward the edge, breaking up into spots about an inch before they reach the edge. The inner web is pale fawn, covered with black spots, surrounded with buff, and the tip of the whole feather is deep brown, spotted profusely with white. The shaft is black at the base, and yellow toward its termination.

"In another feather both webs are marked just like a leopard, with dark spots on a fawn ground, only the spots are arranged in diagonal rows. But along the shaft runs a band, about three-quarters of an inch wide, of rich chocolate, profusely speckled with the tiniest white spots, also arranged in rows. This band does not quite extend to the end of the feather, which at its tip is pale fawn very sparingly studded with deep brown rosettes, surrounded with chestnut. These are but two feathers, and I might take twenty as wonderful. In the female, the secondary feathers, instead of measuring nearly a yard in length, are little more than a foot, and the eyes are much more obscure."

ONE DAY AT A TIME.

ONE neighbor dropped in upon another. "Are you sick, Mrs. Carson?" asked the friend, on meeting a pale, troubled face. "Sick at heart, Mary," was answered, gloomily. Not even the ghost of a smile became visible.

Mrs. Carson sighed heavily. There was a leaden weight on her bosom. Reason assented to her neighbor's suggestions, but oppressed feeling held her in painful bondage.

"What troubles you to-day? Why are you so much cast down?" asked the visitor. "But this may be an intrusion."

Mrs. Carson did not answer immediately. Her dreary eyes rested on the floor; her hands lay idly in her lap; she was the picture of despondency. At length she said: "Owing to changes in business, my husband must give up his situation. A dissolution in the firm throws him out. To-morrow he leaves his place, with no prospect of another. What are we

"Is that all?" The friend's countenance brightened. Mrs. Carson looked half-surprised and half-offended.

"I don't know any worse sickness," she said, rather fretfully.

"That depends on the origin and nature of the disease," was replied. "There is a heart-sickness, which is unto death; but I take it that yours is of a milder type, having its origin among life's petty annoyances, or it may be in its more sober disappointments; in things common to us all, yet borne in so many different ways."

to do? We've saved nothing. How could we, on so light an income."

"I'm sorry to hear that," answered the lady. "Very sorry."

"Could anything be more gloomy or discouraging? Can you wonder that I am in trouble?"

"I do not wonder that you are concerned about the future, Mrs. Carson. That is a natural result. But I cannot see, in the event, any reason why you should sit down with folded hands, and make yourself miserable. Mr. Carson is, of course, troubled?"

"You may well say that. He took scarcely a mouthful of breakfast this morning."

"On him rests the heaviest part of this burden. He must provide and maintain a home for his wife and children. I sympathise with him from my heart."

"It's seeing him so cast down that makes me so wretched" said Mrs. Carson. "If he were cheerful and hopeful, I could take heart."

"Perhaps, in thought, he is saying the same thing of you."

A flash of surprise came into Mrs. Carson's face. The suggestion of her friend went home.

"When did he tell you of this?"

"Last night. I saw that something was troubling him, and urged him to say what it was. Then he told me."

"How did you receive the announcement?"

Mrs. Carson was silent.

"Bravely, as a wife should, when she sees trouble approaching her husband, or in weakness and tears?"

"In weakness and tears. I make you this confession."

"Did that help him any? Did that make his trouble lighter?"

"No, no, my friend. While telling me of the change, he mingled hopeful words in his sentences. But, afterward, he sat silent and gloomy through all the evening."

"And you?"

"Cried myself almost sick."

"And sat opposite to him, at breakfast-time this morning, with a rueful visage. No wonder he had no appetite."

"No wonder," said Mrs. Carson, repeating the words to herself. "That was not well, at least."

"And should not be repeated."

"It shall not be repeated, Mary. Poor man! He has enough to bear, without the dead weight of my despondency."

"I'm glad to hear you say that, Mrs. Carson. Now you are coming toward the right way of thinking. We have only to-day, and in every to-day we shall find the elements of peace, if we will search for them; and the elements of disquietude as well. To accept the one, and reject the other, is to be wise. Last evening you cast aside your husband's hopeful words, and drew around both his heart and yours a pall of despondency. This morning your state was unchanged, and you let him go forth for the day doubly weighted. My friend, this was not well. Now, I pray you, limit thought and duty, as far as in you lies, to this one day which, in God's providence, is yours. You have a pleasant home, children, a husband. There is not a single external element, in all appertaining to your to-day, that is not favorable to peace of mind. When to-morrow becomes to-day, will the change be marked? I think not. You will still, I trust, have your home, food, raiment, your children and your husband, and God's promise to those who do their duty in singleness of heart. What if your husband's hands are idle for a short time? What if the way, looking weeks or months in advance, does not seem clear? Your to-day is all bright, if you will but have it so. The sun shines, the heart beats, God's providence is not hindered. You may be in peace, if you will do your best to secure peace."

The neighbor departed, leaving Mrs. Carson in a better frame of mind, and with her thoughts flowing in the right direction. "One day at a time. One day at a time," she said to herself, as her hands took hold upon the duties of the hour. "Ah! if we could so live, how tranquil all might be. Even in this feeble effort, my heart has a calmer beat. I did not believe in the possibility of a change such as I feel. One day at a time!"

She lingered on the suggestion drawing out more and more distinctly many of the things it involved, and seeing more and more clearly how it lay at the basis of all right living and true enjoyment.

Relieved, in a great measure, from its burden of despondency, the mind of Mrs. Carson lifted itself into a region of clearer light, and became busy with ways and means adapted to the change which had taken place in their circumstances. Instead of remaining with folded hands, in terror of approaching ill, or dwelling in vague apprehensions, she let hope gain entrance; and hope had good words to say.

Slowly, in the dimly-closing twilight, a man walked, with eyes upon the pavement—walks with bowed head and stooping shoulders; he was bending under a heavy weight. One week ago the same man walked in the twilight, with head erect, and quickly-falling footsteps, almost impatient to reach his home. Then he looked for a smiling welcome and loving words; now, as thought reached forward, he saw only clouds and tears. His heart was cheerful then, but heavy now. Suddenly his path had been crossed by a mountain range that looked impassable. For himself, he might gird his loins, and bravely move to the ascent; but, she who must walk by his side through smiling landscapes, or amid toilsome acclivities, had sunk down, overcome by weak terrors; and with this added, how was he to advance? Brave enough to face the mountain, with its sky-reaching cliffs and snowy summits, if his way must be over its barrier, and strong enough to support his companion, if she put forth what strength was given, he was not able to carry her as a dead-weight. And this it was that bowed his head and saddened his spirit, as he lingered, with slow steps, in the falling shadows, and dreaded the arrival at home.

Mr. Carson's hand rested for some moments on the door before he found heart to push it open. Night had fallen without; but a darker night seemed waiting for him within—a night, the blackness of which no lamp rays could penetrate. Usually he shut the door after him with a quick, strong hand, that announced his entrance in echoes from the farthest chambers, and made the stairs musical with the patter of little feet; now it was closed so noiselessly, that only the alert ears of Mrs. Carson noted his coming.

"There's your father," she said to three little ones who had gathered about the centre-table, under a gas lamp, one with her doll, and two with picture-books, and then there was a scampering down-stairs, and a jangling of young voices sweet if discordant. The mother heard only the sound of kisses in response. The father's voice, lately so full of glad welcomes, as he opened his arms for his babies, was silent now. What a change! And yet so far as every external element of happiness was concerned, no new condition existed. There was no evil in the present. Food and raiment, light and warmth, health—all that they could appropriate was in equal abundance now as before. It was the shadow of some imagined evil in the future, which might never come, that shut the sunlight from their hearts—which might never come, or, coming, change to good in the day of its advent.

Mr. Carson entered the room where his wife sat, bearing one child in his arms while two clung to him, in laughing efforts to impede his progress. The old welcoming smile was on her face, not so bright nor so happy, but fuller of tenderness. How like a flash its reflected rays drank up the shadows from his eyes and brow. He could not help stooping over and kissing her with unwonted fervor. She felt it, in a sweet thrill, down to her heart. They were drawing closer together.

"You have changed since morning," said Mr. Carson, soon after, as the children resumed their toys and picture books, laying his hand on his wife's head as he spoke, and looking into her calm eyes almost wonderingly.

"Have I?"

"Yes. What has brought this change?"

"Right thinking, perhaps."

"What have been your thoughts?"

"To-day is ours, and only to-day."

"Only to-day," said Mr. Carson, echoing the words of his wife.

"Is it wise to throw aside the good things of to-day, because in doubt as to the future? To shut our windows, and refuse to let to-day's sunshine enter our dwellings, because there are signs of a storm to-morrow?"

"No, it is not wise," answered the husband.

"So I have thought; and, so thinking, I have been striving to keep myself in the present, and amid the duties and blessings that crowd the passing hours. All is well with us to-day—all has been well with us so far in life; and if changes and trials are to come, will not strength as we need be given?"

"Surely it will, dear wife!" said Mr. Carson. "I cannot express the feeling of relief your language gives. Yes, yes. Let us take, in all our to-days, the good things God has provided. Hitherto they have been in full measure. If diminished from this time, as to what is external and material, may we not have an increase of our internal pleasures? I do not think we have been a great deal happier since a better income enabled us to rent this larger house, and to possess costlier furniture."

"Just the conclusion of my own mind," answered the wife. "I know we were as happy—sometimes I have thought, happier—in that cozy little house where the first six years of our wedded lives were spent. And now that you have alluded to this humble condition, I will say what further has been in my thoughts. Let us go back to the same condition, and thus reduce our expenses to the old rate. In a smaller house I can get along well enough with a single servant, and not have to work any harder than I do now. This will be acting right in the present—doing to-day what seemeth best—and I think we shall find the way before us growing smooth to our feet, though it looks so rough and so thorny in prospective."

"Comforter!—consoler!—strengtheners!" said Mr. Carson, giving way to a gush of feeling. His voice was half-choked and his eyes glistened. "One hour ago I was wretched. Now I am hopeful, resigned, peaceful. The high mountain across my path, that seemed impassable, has sunk to a little hill. When our feet begin the ascent, we shall not find the way so very difficult; and strength will come in the hour of need."

And it came as he had prophesied. The lesson and the experience of that day and evening to Mr. and Mrs. Carson were so full of instruction that they could not be forgotten. In present right thinking and acting—in taking each day as it came, and accepting the good it had to offer—they found tranquility of mind; but, in all variations from this rule of life—in all weak yieldings to doubt and fear—in all helpless broodings over coming ill—they were led into darkness, self-torments, wretchedness. One day at a time—taking and using the good it had to offer, and bearing patiently its ill—this was the better life they sought to live; and though, for some years afterward, their way in the world was through obscure places, where the humbler move, they found as sweet flowers to give the air perfume, and as soft and green a turf for their feet, as had ever delighted them in more prosperous seasons.

HOW LONG ANIMALS LIVE.

ACCORDING to some naturalists the length of the life of animals is as follows, though it is rather puzzling to see how they can know all this, especially about those that live a hundred years or more:

The rabbit lives from 6 to 7 years.

The squirrel from 7 to 8 years.

The fox from 14 to 15 years.

The cat from 15 to 16 years.

The dog from 16 to 18 years.

The bear and the wolf from 18 to 20 years.

The rhinoceros from 20 to 22 years.

The horse from 22 to 25 years.

The hen from 25 to 28 years.

The porpoise from 28 to 30 years.

The crow and the camel 100 years.

The tortoise 110 years.

The eagle 120 years.

The swan 140 years.

The elephant 400 years.

The whale, according to Cuvier, 1000 years.

MY FIRST LITERARY VENTURE.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

I HAD always wanted to do something to help my husband; he was poor, and his health was not good, and he had a family of four to provide for. I could churn and sell the butter for a good price, and I could raise chickens, and sell eggs; and the product of the garden was no small item, but I didn't like slavish toil, I didn't want a freckled face and sunburnt hands and a stout waist.

It was easy work to write stories, surely; anybody could do that; love stories were always read with a relish, and, judging from the abundance of them, they were marketable enough.

I consulted no one. I wanted to surprise my husband some day; I wanted he should find himself famous as the husband of the distinguished Mrs. —, the new star that had arisen in the literary horizon.

My children were very troublesome, the baby was teething; I found that I could not write love-stories and hear them crying, and fighting, and falling and bumping their heads. I baked a jar full of sugar cakes, and made some molasses taffy, and drove a spike in the joists overhead and put up a swing on it, and did everything I could one day that I might commence my literary career on the following morning. I likewise sent to a neighbor's to borrow her little poor house girl to tend the children and be company for them.

In the morning I went to my bedroom up-stairs to begin my work. I had laid the plot of my story in the night, while my husband was snoring obliviously by my side.

My plot was beautiful. Gustavus Le Claire, a runner for a city firm, was to fall in love with a lovely girl, an orphan, Melissa Melsina, the niece of the landlady at the village hotel, where Gustavus had stopped for a few days. His friends were to oppose the marriage, and use all their influence against the proposed union. She was to pine, and be sent away to her grandmother's; letters were to be intercepted; he was to cut his throat with a razor, and be discovered in time to be restored to life. A tobacco firm was to employ him as a runner on a new route that would carry him away in an opposite direction. In time he was to forget her and marry another, and, at the close of a long life, fall into abject poverty, and be assisted by his former sweetheart. He was to recognize her by a mark on her wrist, and she was to recognize him by a lock of red hair that grew on the side of his head. He was to die in her sheltering arms, murmuring: "Thine—thine only!"

I knew if I could grow inspired while writing, that this plot would work a thrilling tale, and my humble name would become a household word in my native land, and my fertile pen would be a resource of pleasure and of profit.

I wrote two days, stopping to cook the three meals, rising early, churning after the family were abed, baking biscuit to save baking bread, spreading up the beds instead of making them, sweeping in a temporary manner, and cuffing the children instead of coaxing them. All this I did with my brows drawn in a thoughtful mood, and my pencil sticking above my ear.

The third day I wrote, Harry, my baby fell down-stairs and struck his forehead on the rough stone wall, and cut a gash through to the skull. An Italian was in the kitchen with his little shoulder-stand full of gay nick-nacks, and Harry was hurrying down to see them. After he had cried himself to sleep, and I had recovered from my faint and my fright, I resumed the pen.

When he awoke he was unusually fretful, and I tried to keep him with me. I gave him my slippers, and my comb and brush, and a little silver bell, and everything that could possibly amuse him for even a minute at a time.

Just when my story was reaching its acme, the baby wearied of all things, and kicked and cried most piteously.

How could I come down from the delectable heights of fancy and tend a mortal child, when the children of my brain, my immortal darlings, clamored for my undivided attention? The thought was mortifying, aggravating—how could I soar with all these human ties tugging at my heart?

I looked all around me to devise a newer plaything. A small mirror seemed to recommend itself. I held it before the baby, and he laughed aloud, while the tears like dewdrops hung on his long lashes.

"See a baby!" I said, "see a baby!" I sat him down on the floor and placed the mirror before him, so he could bend forward and look into it. He shouted in his rare glee. I resumed my story, occasionally peeping over my shoulder and saying: "He sees a baby! sees a baby!"

After while I looked round, thankful I had found a plaything that pleased Harry, and I discovered him very deliberately sitting on it, peeping over first at one side then the other, to see how nearly it adapted itself to his ample proportions. The glass was broken into a thousand pieces, and he sat there as delighted as a boy who has mounted a fractious colt for the first time. He crowed, he tried to tip up his heels into the air, and he threw back his head as though he was tossing a flowing mane. I really believe the little human baby, with a touch of the bully spirit that often comes with mature growth, thought he had that other fellow down, and that after some fashion or manner he was a little man victorious.

At last, after much tribulation, my tender love-story was written, revised, copied, punctuated carefully, put into an envelope without rolling or folding and sent off. Because it was a first attempt, I affixed to it the modest price of fifteen dollars.

Elated by the success that I was sure would attend my first effort, I wrote another story, called "My Grandmother's Prophecy." The grandmother was a superstitious old lady, and, following the bent of her whims, she prophesied over every event that transpired. One of her granddaughters came suddenly upon a nest of eggs under the lilacs, and the old lady said that it was an infallible sign that she would receive an offer of marriage unexpectedly. The offer did come in a very droll, dry, business-like way from a renovated old widower in a blue silk cravat. I thought I made a splendid story of the incident.

Oh, I seemed to feel the cool chaplet of fame on my heated brow, and to hear the chink of the yellow twenty-dollar gold pieces in my humble little black velvet wallet.

Life was very sweet to me in those summer mornings and noons and nights. I waited patiently until I thought it was time for replies to come, and for the newspapers to shout out the name of the new star, already in the zenith.

Hadn't I for years felt the burning desire to write! Hadn't I felt that I was one of the anointed!—one of the few set apart!

I don't like to be laughed at, and yet I always enjoy a joke on myself as well as on others. I'll put my hands over my face while I tell it.

A peddler came along with a fine assortment of Irish poplins. Now, I always had a weakness for lustrous poplins. I am tall and slender. I knew a dress of dark-green poplin would fall in such magnificent folds from my waist down to my feet, that I would be the admiration of all Lenox and vicinity.

I had felt a desire to help my poor husband. Fudge! Wouldn't that be inverting the order of marriage?—wouldn't that be making of myself the strong oak, and of him the clinging vine? I, a free woman, able to earn my own living by my pen, would none of this.

I bought the beautiful pattern, and promised to pay for it as soon as I heard from "my publishers." I said this with a great deal of zest and satisfaction.

The dress was twenty dollars. I could pay for that easily, and have money left—and how nice that would be. Not another woman in Lenox could do such things as that, they were all burdens to their husbands. They leaned on them.

Well, well, no Italian sunsets were finer than ours in Lenox; no sunrise in the tropics softer, or mellower, or more delightful.

In a few weeks came a bulky envelope, accompanied by a letter. My beautiful love-story of "Augustus the Runner, and Melissa Melsina the Orphan" came back to me, and the letter read:

"MADAM: We shall not be able to use your story of 'Augustus the True Hero.' We return you the MSS., etc., etc."

Why wouldn't they use it? Perhaps an ill-disposed clerk had sent it back to me; or, maybe, they had organized rings, and favored no new contributors. I wrote back immediately, and asked why they refused it. I wanted they should point out the errors, and if it was not worth fifteen dollars, perhaps they would pay me twelve for it; and, rather than miss a sale, and because it was my first attempt, I was willing to sell it for ten dollars. I didn't mind making a little sacrifice. I could afford to be generous. I received no reply. I wrote again with a like result.

I hoped a better fate for the "Grandmother's Prophecy;" but though I waited long and patiently, I never heard a word from it. I presume it was consigned to the waste basket.

The days were not so beautiful then. My star of hope had gone down—the sunsets and sunrises were very common. I wondered wherein had ever lain the burnished glow and the tender shimmer on the hazy hill-tops, and the soft, caressing touch that seemed to come to my glad face in the twilight breeze that dallied on the billowy meadows, and shook the over-ripe roses until their pale petals fell like fragrant flakes at my feet.

I took up the burden of life again; it was a little heavy at first; its tasks were often performed in tears, that fell freely when I thought of my great mistake. Though I shrank from facing the truth, I could call my error by no other name.

How I hated the sight of my green poplin dress! It brought up such painful memories; and then it did not harmonize with my shawl or hat or veil. What a mountain loomed up before me when I tried to pay for it myself.

I sold butter and eggs, chickens and berries and cucumbers and radishes, and took in washings and boarded the music-teacher, but I couldn't pay for it all myself, and I couldn't trade it off. It haunted me like the dead body haunted Eugene Aram.

At last, in a fit of despair, I cried right out one night, and owned up to the whole thing. I was very miserable; I hid my face in Joey's bosom, and with sobs that shook me like an ague fit, I confessed the whole truth. It was very humiliating, but Joey said it only made me dearer to him than ever, and that I must never play the strong oak again, and keep secrets from him any more. He said the public should never have the opportunity of criticizing his dear wife's pretty stories, that they couldn't appreciate them; a greedy gourmand of a public never should tear from the sanctity of home her precious name, and flaunt it in the papers.

He paid for the ugly green dress willingly, and the tender love-light in his blue eyes, as he did it, was worth more to me than all the huzzas and noisy plaudits of a hollow-hearted public.

I never recovered from the humiliation. My soul is sick yet, when I think of the bright dreams that for a few months dazzled my eyes, and bewildered and biased my better judgment.

RICHES, honor, power and the like, which owe all their worth to our false opinion of them, are too apt to draw the heart from virtue. We know not how to prize them; they are not to be judged of by the common vogue, but by their own nature. They have nothing to attract our esteem, but that we are used to admire them; they are not cried up because they are things that ought to be desired, but they are desired because they are generally cried up.

THE FLOWERS OF THE SEA.

BY E. CHARDON.

THE dweller upon land is accustomed to regard the sea as a vast waste of waters, resting upon rocks and sand, and abounding, perhaps, with a numerous, curious and predacious animal life, with a flora of sea weeds and mosses, with perhaps beautiful shells and brilliant scaled fish. But, flowers! who would look for them in the sea? Nevertheless, they are there, as beautiful as those upon land, and far more wonderful in their structures and functions.

The flowers of the sea are living flowers, animated not with the passive life of vegetation, not with the active life that feels and moves and suffers hunger, and gratifies it sometimes voraciously.

These sea flowers are zoophytic in their character, being merely polypes. Among the polypes, the sea-anemone is the most beautiful and the most curious.

It seems, indeed, a strange compound of the animal and the vegetable kingdoms—bearing a striking resemblance to the latter in its appearance, while it is allied to the former in its functions.

The body of the sea-anemone is in the form of a column, of more or less thickness, which flattens out into a disc at the summit, around which are many rows of tentacles, resembling the narrow petals of a daisy. In the centre of this disc, in the midst of these tentacles or petals, is the creature's mouth. The tentacles vary in form and number greatly in the different species. Sometimes they are round, sometimes flat, and again they are pointed. As many as one hundred and fifty tentacles have been counted on a single anemone.

The sea-anemones present the most brilliant and varied colors. The stem, disc and tentacles are not always of the same color, but frequently display every combination of pink, gray green, white-purple, orange, lilac, yellow, blue, fawn and white.

The lower end of the column-like body is flattened at the will of the polype, and attached firmly to the rock upon which it takes up its abode. They are usually stationary, though they can make a slow progress when they wish to do so. When one of these creatures desires to change its place, it almost imperceptibly contracts one side of its base, and as imperceptibly expands or stretches forward the other side. Sometimes it will drag itself along by the aid of its tentacles.

When the season of winter approaches, the anemones who inhabit the ocean at a high latitude, relax their hold upon the rocks and allow themselves to be passively borne by the waves into deep water, out of the reach of the cold.

The appearance of the anemone, when it is open to the sunlight, has been likened to that of an English daisy. The petals or tentacles of this sea-flower are, however, endowed with life and motion. They move about, and expand and contract, and open and close themselves at the animal's pleasure. If they are touched, or if the water around it is agitated, they seem to shrivel up and draw themselves in. When the tentacles are closed naturally, they meet at a point above the mouth of the animal, and present the exact appearance of a bud of a flower just ready to bloom.

The sea-anemone is most voracious in its appetite, seizing anything that comes within its reach. Its tentacles emit a venomous fluid, by which means small fish, which fall within its clutches, are readily overcome, and fall an easy prey. The touch of a tentacle will produce a stinging smart, and for more than an hour afterward the hand will remain red and painful.

Having swallowed its dinner, it closes its tentacles and remains in a state of torpor during the process of digestion. It is not, however, always permitted to remain in quiet. Its digestive apparatus is exceedingly simple. Indeed, all there is of the animal beside its tentacles, are a stomach and a mouth. The latter opens directly upon the former, without any intermediate canal. In consequence of this, it sometimes happens that the animal which has been seized and swallowed alive and whole is able to force its way out again, and make its escape uninjured. Or a shrimp which has witnessed the wholesale devouring of the prey from a distance will throw himself upon the anemone, with his small feet prevent the closing of the tentacles, and, thrusting its claws into the creature's stomach, will draw the recently-swallowed food forth for his own use. Sometimes a battle takes place fuse. These embryo anemones attach themselves to some solid substance, soon throw out little rows of tentacles, and finally become miniature anemones.

The most curious trait of these wonderful sea-flowers is their tenacity of life. If a tentacle is amputated, another one speedily grows in its place. If an anemone is torn forcibly from the rock, leaving small fragments adhering, each one of these fragments will develop rows of tentacles, then a mouth and a stomach, and become in time a complete animal. If an anemone is cut in two, the lower half of the body throws out its fringe of tentacles, and develops a digestive apparatus. The upper half will go on catching and swallowing its prey, apparently entirely oblivious to the fact that the food passes out on these occasions, in which the shrimp gets the worst of it, and finds himself, when too late, on the wrong side of the creature's mouth.

As the anemone cannot go in quest of food, but must wait for it to come within his reach, nature has wisely ordered that he shall be enabled to endure a long fast without inconvenience. Thus anemones have been known to live for two or three years without food.

The germs and embryos of the anemones are borne within the arms or tentacles. The former are motionless, the latter exhibit a sort of rotary motion. From the tentacles they pass into the stomach, where they remain uninjured amid the digesting food, and are at last ejected through the mouth with the re-at once through the lower opening. This opening, however, gradually closes, a crown of tentacles appears, a new mouth is formed, and the creature has gained, rather than lost, by its mutilation, for it now possesses the faculty of double enjoyment in being able to eat with two mouths at once. This is not for long, however. In due time the double anemone separates in the middle, producing two single anemones; and thus three perfectly independent creatures have been formed from one.

If an anemone is cut in two lengthwise, each half will finally unite, and the result will be two anemones just like the original one, except of somewhat slimmer proportions. If one of these curious creatures is cut up into more than two fragments, the result is still the same—at least, one living anemone for each fragment.

The Abbé Dicoquemare, who experimented in various ways with these zoophytes, remarked: "Perhaps I may be accused of cruelty, but from what I have seen from my experiments, I believe that the happiness of the creatures was increased; for, not only did I augment the duration of their lives, but I renewed the term of their youth." He might have added that in multiplying their existences he multiplied their capacity for enjoyment.

The Lucernaria differ from the anemones in their form, and in the texture of their skin. They attach themselves to sea-weeds and other marine bodies. The tentacles, instead of proceeding in a regular fringe around the whole disc, appear in clusters from a number of hornlike protuberances.

The Bell Lucernaria is one of the most beautiful of the species. It is bell shaped, an inch in depth, of a uniform dark-brown, while each of the eight lobes of the corolla is terminated by a glandular rose colored bud. Its mouth is small and square, and in the centre.

The anemones are used for food in certain countries, and are even considered delicacies.

"IT'S NONE OF MY BUSINESS."

"IT'S none of my business," said Peter Martin, as he passed Farmer Hyde's orchard and saw one of his neighbor's sons stealing apples. "Let Ryder look after his own boys."

And he trudged on home, meeting Mr. Ryder by the way. His first impulse was to tell the neighbor about his son, but he checked the impulse, saying in his mind: "Let him find it out for himself; it's none of my business. I'd get his ill-will, instead of his thanks, most likely."

It so happened that this was Jim Ryder's first offence, and if Martin had told his father, the reproof or punishment that would have followed might have saved the boy from further crime. But, escaping detection and punishment, he was encouraged to go on in evil.

But it was Martin's business, even in the narrow and selfish sense in which he had expressed himself. He would have made it his business if some one had introduced a fever-breeding nuisance into the neighborhood, to the serious peril of his family.

On that very evening Jim Ryder met Martin's son Edward, a lad three years younger, and gave him a couple of nice red apples.

"Where did you get them?" asked Edward, as he ate the spicy fruit.

"You'll not tell?"

"Oh, no indeed."

"Well, then, I got them down at Mr. Hyde's orchard. I was going along there, and the apples looked so tempting I could not resist. Mr. Hyde's got bushels and bushels, and he'll never miss them."

The boys talked it over, and the older one persuaded the younger that there was no great harm in taking a few apples. The only thing was not to be found out. And they agreed to go round together, on the next afternoon, and help themselves to as many as they could carry.

Peter Martin was returning home on the next day, and just as he got near Farmer Hyde's orchard, he heard a great outcry and barking of dogs. And soon after he saw Jim Ryder leap over the fence and run swiftly down the road.

"Ah, you young rascal!" he said to himself. "Been stealing apples again."

He was moving on, when he heard himself called. Looking round he saw Farmer Hyde—and he saw something else that made his heart sink like lead in his bosom. He saw his little boy Edward in the tight grip of the angry farmer's hand.

"Been stealing my apples!" said the farmer.

At a single bound Peter Martin was over the fence, and, standing with pale lips before the farmer and his frightened boy, he cried: "Oh, Ned! Ned!" in sorrow and shame. "To think that you could have done a mean and wicked thing like this!"

"I wouldn't have thought of it, father," answered the trembling, white faced child, "if it hadn't been for Jim Ryder. He said he got some yesterday, and that it wasn't any harm."

"The greatest rogue has got off, as is usual in such cases," said Farmer Hyde, the anger going out of his heart at sight of the father's pain. "But there is harm, my boy," speaking gravely but kindly to Edward, "in taking what don't belong to you. It is stealing."

Peter Martin went home that day a wiser man; and with some clearer notions of his responsibility in the life around him.

It is an ill thing for a man not to know the gauge of his own stomach, nor to consider that men do many things in their drink that they are ashamed of when sober; drunkenness being nothing but a voluntary madness, it emboldens men to undertake all sorts of mischief; it both irritates wickedness and discovers it; it does not only make men vicious, but shows them to be so; and the end of it is either shame or repentance.

IN A THUNDER-CLOUD WITH A BALLOON.*

BY PROF. JOHN WISE.

THE first time I was ever swallowed up in a storm cloud, it happened to be in a suddenly generated hail-storm nimbus during an ascension from Carlisle, Pa. A hail storm is not a very large meteor, but it is very violent in its gyratory action; and when it sucks a balloon into its vortical air-hopper, the aeronaut may look out for a little rough usage, and not the least of his troubles will be a nausea similar to that of sea-sickness, following the distance it is by the course of the river, but thunder storms have a penchant to trail their watery drapery along river channels.

The ascension was made in the afternoon, between four and five o'clock, and right in the face of an approaching thunder-gust coming from the northwest. On attaining a height of three-quarters of a mile, I discovered a second thunder-gust coming along from the southwest. My balloon was situated on the apex of the two lines of the approaching storms, and already gave indications of being gobbled up in the

the swinging to and fro, compounded with gyrations, of the air-ship. I will, however, for the present, describe an experience of travelling inside of a thunder-gust for a distance of nearly a hundred miles along the Ohio River, in a balloon voyage from Portsmouth, Ohio, to Point Pleasant, about twelve miles below Gallipolis. Straight across the country from Portsmouth to Gallipolis is not much over half vortex of centralizing air incident to storm-clouds. I made up my mind to go into the whale's belly, not entirely regardless of consequences; but being well provided with gas and ballast, I was consoled with the knowledge that I could escape from this leviathan of the air by using the means of gravitation in letting out gas, or of levitation by disposing of ballast.

The two storms were now approaching, as it were, in grand battle array, with thundering explosions. The discharges of lightning came vivid, sharp and frequent; and when the two storms clashed, they became terrific. It was a scene of awful grandeur. I had a mind to escape by one or the other of the means just mentioned, but, like Lot's wife, I was curious enough to look back—not to be turned into a pillar of salt, but certainly to be well shaken—hurled round and round as it were by the nape of the neck.

* We are indebted to the publishers of To-Day for the fine illustration accompanying this article, as well as for the very interesting article itself, which appeared originally in that paper.

The intelligent reader may here be reminded that a thunder-storm is not an accidentally condensed, irregularly massed body of watery vapor, as viewed from the earth, but a geometrically formed and individualized meteor, and of mathematical precision in its motion and compensating balances. It is more or less governed in its onward progress by the undulations of the earth's surface—the channels of rivers, valleys and mountain gorges. These meteors often take short turns to pass into a deep valley. When they happen to plunge against a mountain-side that lies in their direct course, they often become tangled in the mountain-top, swaying to and fro like things of life, and this gives rise to those destructive mountain torrents known as "cloud bursts." The rain that would be otherwise spread over a great surface is by this stand-still of the meteor poured down against the immediately underneath surface of the mountain-side.

It requires no strained imagination to give interest to storm scenes as viewed from above them and in their midst; and when it is considered that a balloon is not in the predicament of a ship at sea as in a storm, the scene may be viewed with an assurance of safety that is never realized on the water. The sea-ship has two elements to contend with. The air whirling it around in the vortex of a storm, and the thousand times denser water holding it in its embrace, brings upon the sea-ship a leverage and strain that crashes and cracks it to pieces. The balloon has but one element to contend with, and it matters not whether the current is one mile an hour or one hundred miles; to the air-passenger it is all the same, for he knows not that he is moving at all unless he can see some landmarks to give him an idea of motion. In a thunder-cloud, however, there is a perceptible motion, not violent, but disagreeable. The motion is gyratory—a swinging to and fro and going round in a circle at the same time—and this motion produces nausea like sea-sickness. The huge black precipices of nimbi, or the brilliantly illuminated lava-looking cumuli, have not the terror-giving character to the air-passenger that the coral reefs and lee-shore rocks have to the sea-passenger. The reader is now better prepared to resume the thread of the narrative with composure, since dashing against an atmospheric boulder will not shock him.

These two storms merging into one having met at an angle in the course of the river where it trends off from a southwest to a northeast, direction of stream, it followed the course of the Ohio up to the mouth of the Kanawha River, and there it made a turn up that watercourse. Sailing in this meteor, I was constantly surrounded by electrical phenomena. While the discharges of lightning were almost incessant, thundering and crashing out of the thick vapor with livid, zigzag bolts darting down toward the earth, they never seemed to explode near to the balloon. Most of the time the balloon was sailing in clear atmosphere between the upper and lower cloud, though right in front of it, and within a few hundred yards, the upper and lower clouds were joined in the form of a waterspout, and from this conjoined mass the discharges were mainly taking place, though occasionally a more distant explosion would occur. The central explosions were so frequent and terrific that I dare not let the balloon rock into the vortex, and, in order to avoid this, I had to pay out ballast and gas, causing the balloon to rise and fall, and by that means be thrown outward in the upper cloud, whenever the lower cloud had rocked it too near the central uprising air-shower. This kind of manœuvring has been learned from former experience in these meteors.

One time the balloon got so far to the rear of the centre of the vortex between the upper and the lower cloud that it fell into the rays of the sun. This produced one of the rarest spectacles of rainbow light in the form of a parhelion, or aureola, as it is technically termed, that my eyes ever rested on. It threw upon this black central cloud matter a beautiful prismatic arch of vari-colored light, not circular as a rainbow, but in the form of a twisted ellipse, caused, no doubt, by the difference of density of the watery particles acting as the screen. I gazed upon it with admiration and amazement. All this time the celestial fireworks continued in full blast, banging and booming like great guns, and the hissing of electrical streams of fire were truly appalling. It seemed to me like the crack of doom; and while it made my hair bristle and my heart beat quick time, it seemed still to say, "Stand from under," because the thunderbolts were all hurled downward. So far as my reason could direct, I felt it safer to look at it from above than from below; besides, the country below was mainly forest and river, as seen from an occasional glimpse through an open chasm of the lower cloud.

Once the balloon was totally involved in a mass of orange-colored flame. This was evidently "sheet lightning" playing between the upper and the lower cloud. I was for a moment paralyzed, not by an electric shock, but by a shudder of fright, as it seemed for the moment that my air-bubble was in a blaze. In an instant more I felt easier in mind, seeing that the fire had not harmed the balloon. The thought now occurred, Am I not venturing too far upon my philosophy of safety in a thunder-cloud? Besides, my ballast was pretty well exhausted, and I had been riding in a storm for more than an hour, so that I must be many miles from the place of departure.

The beautiful grotto of fire would appear and disappear as the balloon happened to fall in and out of the sunbeams blazing in between the upper and the lower cloud. The balloon refracting the rays of light passing through it caused the prismatic arch. The rain was discharged from the lower cloud, and but seldom a few heavy drops would fall on to the balloon from the upper stratum. From the rushing noise of water, it was evident that the rain was descending to the earth in torrents, and this, with the heavy and constant discharges of thunderbolts and the remarkable beauty of the aureola illuminating the interior of the storm-cloud, gave it more the character of a scene of enchantment than one of reality. There was a fearful fascination in the grand phenomenon; and while it made one's heart beat with emotion and a feeling of awe, it still persisted in dragging one along as the soldier is dragged along in the thick smoke of the battle's cannon. It is impossible to fully and fairly portray with words the condition of mind and its surrounding phenomena when sailing in the midst of a good-sized thunder-storm. It is a sublimity not realizable on the surface of the earth, grand and majestic as these meteors present themselves to an observer on terra firma.

Having now sailed within the folds of this electrical meteor for over an hour, and for a distance of nearly a hundred miles by the course of the Ohio River, and viewed it from various positions, the limited amount of ballast remaining on hand admonished a preparation for descent. Before coming down, a dozen or more copies of the Portsmouth daily paper were thrown overboard, and they were soon drawn into the vortex of the storm. One of them fell into my hands again the next day, as will be explained in the conclusion of this narrative. I now commenced to descend slowly and cautiously, in order to look out for a safe landing-place. As this process was going on, the storm was moving forward and away from the balloon. On coming down through the lower cloud, I found the surface of Gallia County hereabouts covered with forest; but some distance ahead in my line of direction a log cabin peered out from a little "clearing," and I struck for this, and made a lodgment before the cabin door in the rain, greatly to the surprise of the family in the house. Seeing the suddenly-appearing apparition was nothing more than flesh and blood, the good housewife cautiously, with the door slightly ajar, ventured the question of, "Who are you?" In dripping garments and with the most gentle speech at my command, I answered, "A stranger, madam, in a strange land; will you please help me a little?" Still holding the door in her hand, she said, "What is that?" pointing at the air-craft as it was swaying over her head. "A balloon, madam, just come out of that cloud." The door immediately flew open, and at the same time she exclaimed, "Come out, Joe; here's a man in a balloon that you read about in the paper the other day."

The next morning I went to Small's Landing, a few miles off, to get on a Pittsburgh and Cincinnati packet to return to Portsmouth, and there I found one of the papers referred to above, and which they told me had fallen down from a black thunder-cloud that passed overhead the day before, much to their astonishment, until I had explained to them by what kind of an express it had been carried to the distance of ninety miles two hours after it came from the press.

There are scenes in our lives that seem to become as indelibly impressed upon the tablet of the brain as is the image on the photographer's albuminoid membrane, and these storm scenes are of that character. The secret majesty of Nature therein asserts its superior divinity, and makes man shrink into the insignificance of a microscopic monad, with all his boasted intellectual powers, when compared to the intelligence of the great Ruler of the universe.

RETROSPECT.

BY S. JENNIE JONES.

THE path of the day is trodden;
I sit by the milestone, night,
And backward glance at the winding road
As it gleams in the sunset light.

Over the hill and adown the plain
Where my feet were tired and sore,
But the thorns that wounded, the stones that bruised,
I see them again no more.

I see instead, by the highway side,
The flowers I might have strewn
For other feet more sorely tried,
In paths that were dark and lone.

I see instead the fountain cool,
With its rainbow-colored spray,
And the chalice I broke in my careless haste
As I turned from the water away,

Headless of those who waited there
For the draught I might have dipped,
Headless of blessings that had been mine,
From the weary and fever-lipped.

I see instead of the steep ascent
Where toiling, I wept and prayed,
The struggling, trembling ones, to whom
My hand vouchsafed no aid.

I see the light that crowned my road,
I see the dark unrest
That wrapped my soul as a murky cloud—
Father, Thou knowest best!

Oh, lead me in Thine own right paths,
Or smooth or rough the way,
And may I nearer walk to Thee,
To-morrow than to-day.

THE BEE.

BY L. S. HAGNER.

LANCER of the golden belt!
Errant knight in ladies' bower
I have caught thee fairly now,
Hid within this lotus flower.

Ivory prison meet for thee,
Boon companion of the light;
Drowned in nectar thou shalt be Tiny Clarence of delight!

Golden youth; beware! beware!
Touch not, taste not, lest ye die.
Let this wandersome of the air
Teach forbidden sweets to fly.

MIGRATORY LOCUSTS.

THE locust is one of the little insects that at times inflicts upon man an amount of inconvenience and mischief wholly inconsistent with its dimen-

Louis Figuier, the well known French naturalist, thus describes their journeyings:

"It is especially in warm climates that they become such fearful pests to agriculture. Wherever sions, and due principally to the power of its numbers. A swarm of locusts is one of the most fearful visitations to which the East is exposed, and is altogether extraordinary.

they alight, they change the most fertile country into an arid desert. They are seen coming in innumerable bands, which, from afar, have the appearance of stormy clouds, even hiding the sun. As far and as wide as the eye can reach, the sky is black, and the soil is inundated with them. The noise of these millions of wings may be compared to the sound of a cataract. When this fearful army alights upon the ground, the branches of the trees break, and in a few hours, and over an extent of many leagues, all vegetation has disappeared, the wheat is gnawed to its very roots, the trees are stripped of their leaves. Everything has been destroyed, gnawed down and devoured. When nothing more is left, the terrible host rises, as if in obedience to some given signal, and takes its departure, leaving behind it despair and famine. It goes to look for fresh food—seeking whom, or rather in this case what it may devour.

"During the year succeeding that in which a country has been devastated by showers of locusts, damage from these insects is the less to be feared; for it happens often that after having ravaged everything, they die of hunger before the laying season begins. But their death becomes the cause of a greater evil. Their innumerable carcasses, lying in heaps and heated by the sun, are not long in entering into a state of putrefaction; epidemic diseases, caused by the poisonous gases emanating from them, soon break out, and decimate the populations. These locusts are bred in the deserts of Arabia and Tartary, and the east winds carry them into Africa and Europe. Ships in the eastern part of the Mediterranean are sometimes covered with them at a great distance from the land."

Captain Hall, in his second series of "Fragments of Voyages and Travels," gives the following account of a vast locust swarm:

"Captain Beaufort, with whose interesting and delightful book on Caramania every reader of travel is familiar, told me that when he lay at Smyrna, in 1811, he had an opportunity of forming a rude estimate of the magnitude of a flight of locusts which was drifting past from south to north. The consul had occasion to send a messenger, in a due easterly direction, to the bashaws of Sardis, in Asia Minor, that is, in a course at right angles to the flight of the locusts. This person rode forty miles before he got clear of the moving column of these ravenous animals. It was inferred, from observations made with a pocket telescope, that the height of the column could not be less than three hundred yards, and the rate at which it passed not slower than seven miles an hour. This continued for three days and nights, apparently without intermission. As these insects succeeded one another at an average distance of not more than three feet, and were about one foot apart above one another, it was computed that the lowest number of locusts in this enormous swarm must have exceeded 168,608,563,200,200."

After remarking that the mind is incapable of appreciating such numbers unless compared with some standard, Captain Hall proceeds: "Captain Beaufort determined that the locusts he saw, if formed into a heap, would have exceeded in magnitude more than a thousand and thirty times the largest pyramid of Egypt; or if they had been placed on the ground close together, in a band of a mile and an eighth in width, it would have encircled the globe!"

The young locusts crawl until their wings are developed, and in their march they will overcome most obstacles. They climb over the roofs of the low houses, over fences and walls, march through the streets of towns and villages, not avoiding either man or beast, so that the wheels of a cart will at times sink several inches deep into a mass of locusts, while a pedestrian walking through them will often have them up above his ankle. A swarm of young locusts unable to fly is more dreaded than one of older insects, for it is in vain to think of driving them away by noise or smoke; whichever way they escape they must still go along the ground; and if a few hundred thousands of them be killed, this avails but little against the millions which form a swarm.

Various means have been taken to abate this plague. Sometimes the eggs are gathered and destroyed. At one time 3,000 quintals of eggs were buried or thrown into the Rhone. Counting 1,750,000 eggs per quintal, that will give us a total of 6,250,000,000 of locusts destroyed in the egg, which otherwise would have very soon renewed the ravages of which the country had so lately been the victim. Sometimes the locusts themselves are gathered and crushed. Again, all the inhabitants turn out, and by making a frightful din attempt to drive them off. It is said that smoke will disperse them. This expedient, however, is often a complete failure; for when one of these countless swarms has dropped upon the ground, and proceeds grazing along in the direction of the fire, the mere weight of the general mass forces the foremost ranks into the flames, where a few thousands of them perish perhaps, but their bodies extinguish the fire, and leave a free field for the advancing enemy. In their progress over the country they choke up the springs, the canals and the brooks—so that it is with a great deal of trouble that they are cleared—with their dead bodies, which, decaying in the water, produce infection.

The locust is not confined wholly to Asia and Africa. They frequently visit the countries of southern Europe. Pliny speaks of their frequent visits to Greece. In 1690, locusts arrived in Poland and Lithuania by three different ways, and, as it were, in three different bodies. "They were to be found in certain places where they had died," writes the Abbe Ussaria, an eye witness, "lying on one another in heaps of four feet in height. Those which were alive perched upon the trees, bending their branches to the ground, so great was their number. The people thought that they had Hebrew letters on their wings. A rabbi professed to be able to read on them words which signified God's wrath. The rains killed these insects; they infected the air; and the cattle which ate them in the grass died immediately."

In 1749, locusts stopped the army of Charles XII, King of Sweden, as it was retreating from Bessarabia, on its defeat at Pultowa. The king thought he was assailed by a hailstorm, when a host of these insects beat violently against his army. In 1763, Portugal was attacked by them. In 1780, in Transylvania, their ravages assumed such gigantic proportions that it was found necessary to call in the assistance of the army in the attempt to exterminate them. Locusts showed themselves at the same time in the empire of Morocco, causing a fearful famine. In the years 1613, 1805, 1820, 1822, 1824, 1825, 1832 and 1834, their visits to the south of France were most formidable. Locusts are always to be found in Algeria, but it is only occasionally that they make great ravages. In the years 1845 and 1866, their most terrible invasions took place.

"According to General Dumas," says Figuier, "locusts, fresh or preserved, are good food for both men and camels. They are eaten grilled or boiled, or prepared in the kous-koussou, after their legs, wings and heads have been taken off. Sometimes they are dried in the sun and reduced to powder, which is mixed with milk, and made into cakes with flour, dripping or butter and salt. Camels are very fond of them, and they are given to them after having been dried, or roasted between two layers of ashes. Dried and salted, they are in Asia and in Africa an article of commerce. At Bagdad they sometimes cause the price of meat to fall. The taste of their flesh may be compared to that of the crab. Eastern nations have eaten locusts from time immemorial. The Greek comic poet, Aristophanes, tells us that the Greeks sold them in the markets. Moses allowed to the Jews four species, which are mentioned in Leviticus. St. John the Baptist, following the example of the Prophet Amos, made them his food in the desert, where he found nothing but locusts and a little honey."

We frequently hear of the depredations of the seventeen-year locusts through the Western States, but these are not locusts proper. They are a species of grasshopper, which sometimes commit great havoc in crops, but the visitations of which will not compare with those of the Asiatic locusts.

CROOKED PLACES.

A STORY OF STRUGGLES AND HOPES.

BY EDWARD GARRETT,

Author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," "Premiums Paid to Experience," etc.

PART IV.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER XX.—ROUND AND LOST.

THERE was one who was out in the rain and the wind.

David Maxwell had not failed in his proposed twilight wandering about Harwich town. He had lingered in the principal street, he had haunted the quay. He had let the cheery fisher folk enter into talk with him, if happily some scrap of their chance information might give him a clue. He found what seemed one, at last. Standing in a shed, for shelter from the rain, when it was past midnight, his refuge happened to be shared by a man, who stated he had seen "a strange gentleman carrying a big coat, on the road far down below Dovercourt. The gentleman had stopped him, and asked whether there was any place near where he could stay for the night, and he had recommended the Stars Inn. The gentleman had remarked that he was a stranger, new in Harwich that morning."

David's further questions elicited that this Stars Inn was situate about seven miles out of Harwich.

There was no time to be wasted in an endeavor, almost sure to be fruitless, at such an hour and on such a night, to procure any conveyance. David knew himself to be a quick walker. There was just time for him to reach the Stars Inn on foot, see this gentleman, and if he were not his missing friend, get back to Harwich in time to watch the passengers go on board the early morning boat.

David was tired and wet, but the moment he got this clue he forgot all about that, or remembered it only to dismiss it with the thought, "There will be plenty of time to rest when I have found him, and as for the bad weather, surely I can bear for once, what sailors and shepherds endure every month of their lives."

He had a long and dreary tramp. The road lay between hedgerows, sometimes stretching long and unbroken, sometimes dotted by a few houses; but the lights in these were all out, save where just once or twice, all the dreary seven miles, a winking taper was set to watch in a chamber of birth or death. The road passed through one village, with its tavern-sign creaking in the blast, and its old church standing back among its graves. Once or twice, struggling beneath his umbrella, David struck lucifer matches, to read finger posts by their fleeting light. He had started with oilskin as well as umbrella, but both were presently unavailing, and there was nothing to do but to face the storm in dogged defencelessness. Once or twice in the earlier miles of his walk, David thought longingly of his snug parlor in Hackney, and of Phoebe's faithful ministrations. But when he was thoroughly wet through, it seemed easier to go on so. It even seemed to lay his anxieties,—nothing could be done for the next two or three hours, but walk straight on even as he was doing. Once or twice he sang, scarcely noticing what he sang, or even that he sang at all. But in one of the little houses, a young mother watching through her first night with her child upon her breast, laid it up as a good omen for "baby," that she heard a voice pass in the tempest, singing,—

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Immanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

The "Stars" was reached at last, and after many knocks and shouts, the landlord's head was lifted off its pillow and thrust out of the window. The host was rather grumpy, but he could hardly refuse answers to David's rapid questions, not put without ample apology for their untimeliness.

"Yes, there was in the house a gentleman who had come from Harwich that day."

"Did not know his business."

"Did not know his name."

"Is it a matter of life or death?"

"Just ask him to let me see him," David answered. "It may be life or death to whom I am seeking, and unless I see him, I cannot tell whether this be he or no. And delay may be of terrible consequence."

Up went another window: the stranger had evidently been listening at his casement to the alarm, and thus appealed to, he responded, in broad Scotch, and a gruff voice, unmistakably not Fergus Laurie's: "I am Donald Gordon, traveller for Flockhart & Co., of Glasgow. If you winna believe it without seeing me, I'll away to the door and answer whatever you may speir."

"Thank you, I won't trouble you, I am quite convinced," said David. "Pardon me for disturbing you all."

"There ain't another house for miles," interrupted mine host; "hadn't you better come in and put up till morning? It ain't a night for a dog to be out."

"Many thanks," said David; "but it will take me all my speed to get back to Harwich by the time I must be there." And so he swiftly retraced his steps, not at all disheartened by the failure, for he had prepared himself for disappointment, and kept up a strong faith in the German boat.

The rain ceased and the wind went down before the first peep of dawn. But the raw, yellow calm seemed colder and damper and more cruel than the tempest. There is all difference between the wrestle for life in the shipwreck and the dull waiting for rescue on a desert island. While nature struggles, man struggles, too, and the contest seems equal. But when she sits down and bides her time, his heart drops within him like lead. Her time is so long, his days are so short! David did not sing on his way into Harwich town.

He hurried down to the quay. The German boat lay alongside, and there were several people standing about. Nobody had gone on board yet, the sailors said. There were very few passengers, they informed him, and as the steamer would soon be off he would not have to wait long.

Presently the first instalment settled themselves on board—a young lady and gentleman, palpably "a honeymoon pair." The next party was a German family, whose father wore spectacles, and whose mother presently began to knit. After that, the passengers went on thick and fast—tourists, commercial travellers, "Herr Professors," and scholastic "Frauleins," navvies and seafaring men. Then the cries and shouts grew deafening, and moorings began to slacken, and one more spectacled Herr Professor rushed breathlessly on board, and returned the captain an innocent "thank you," for the curse he bestowed upon him. And then the other mooring was loosened, and last words were shouted, and handkerchiefs began to wave. And the Rhindland went on her ocean way.

But no Fergus Laurie.

This was when David's heart began to sink, and he began to think to himself that within easy distance of the little easy-going town there must be many and many a little creek which might keep any ghostly secret committed to its care, for many and many a month—nay, for many a year. And his heart ached for Millicent—for one so tried, so long patient, ay, and so ready to forgive, yet deceived and goaded into a wrath that might be a life-long pain to her soul.

All that he could do was to go about the town again, renewing his inquiries at all the hotels and livery stables. A desperate sense of the puerility and feebleness of his endeavors grew upon him. He was tired within an inch of his life, he was wet through, he was hungry and comfortless, and yet he was unsuccessful, where a London detective would doubtless have succeeded, without the expenditure of a tithe of his vital force. He could only reassure himself by the recollection that a detective's success would probably have been more fatal to their real wishes than even his own failure.

The town fully woke up at last, the shops were opened, and other people besides fishers and passengers by early boats began to move about. Presently coming out of a large house in one of the quiet, old-fashioned streets, David saw a figure which made his heart leap. It was at some little distance from the spot where he stood, yet he could have been quite sure that it was Fergus, but for the fact—which seemed to him to throw doubt on it—that he was not alone, but in the company of an old gentleman, and a young lady in a severely elegant morning-costume. David hastily followed them at a discreet distance, every moment growing more convinced that it was really his missing man. The three walked together down two or three streets, then the old gentleman and the young lady shook hands very cordially with their companion, and went off in another direction, while he very leisurely took the road to the railway station. Now was David's time. He overtook him, and laying his hand kindly on his shoulder, asked breathlessly: "Where have you been, Laurie? We have been searching for you. Where are you going?"

The other gave his shoulder a hasty shrug, which did not shake off David's touch, and stood quite still. He stared at David for a moment, and answered coolly: "I have been taking a breathing time and a blow of salt air. I am going back to London now."

The train does not start for half an hour, so you needn't be afraid of hindering me."

David put his arm through his. "Why have you done this, Fergus?" he pleaded. "You might have explained yourself clearly. You have given every one a fearful shock."

"It is quite refreshing to hear that anything one does can do that," said Fergus, with a sneer. "It is really quite worth while to withdraw one's-self for a time to find out how one is valued."

"I don't think there is anything remarkable in one's sudden and accounted absence alarming one's mother and sister," said David, plainly.

"I have always had to take care of myself, and of them, too, ever since I was a boy," Fergus returned. "I should think they might trust me perfectly by this time. Is Robina in a fit?"

"No, indeed; at least, not that I know of," said David. "I thought she took it very calmly, wonderfully calmly in one way, for she was most assiduous in keeping appearances all right. But, oh, Fergus, when you knew how things were, and how agitated we might naturally suppose you to be, how could you go away like this?"

"I don't wonder that you should suppose I would be agitated," said Fergus, "seeing you knew how you had badgered and deserted me in my day of difficulty; but I am thankful to say I can rise superior to such treatment, and build new hopes on the old disappointments. Go and tell Miss Harvey so, if you like. Was it a fearful shock to her? I dare say she was very much afraid that something would happen to make a public story of her insulting ingratitude. It would not have made a pretty chapter in her life."

"God knows what passed between you and Millicent Harvey," pleaded David, "I do not. I only know the message you promised to carry her, and that you could have only carried half of it, for that she thought you still a prosperous man, and stung and passionate, spoke sharp words to you. What you said, and what she said, I do not know. But I do know that she is here now, Fergus—in this very town—watching an opportunity to tell you that she would not have spoken so, had she known the truth, and to ask you to let us be your friends again, as we used to be."

They had wandered on to the esplanade while they talked, and just here Fergus stood still and gazed out to sea. Not all his defiant self-command could control the spasm that passed over his face. She knew—the woman whose high opinion his better nature had valued above all other—she knew what a base, weak, mean man he was! In the face of that crowning ignominy, it did not much matter to him how close she kept her secret—nay, he hated her for doing it. He could deny to himself that he was base, or weak, or mean, but the very screen her pitiful silence threw over his fall showed how low she felt it to be.

"It is too bad—too bad!" he cried, passionately, struggling in the net of humiliation, where his own sins had caught him. "Let her go her way, and leave me to go mine. I will not see her. I never wish to see her again."

"Oh, Fergus!" said David, "all these petty interests are so short and small, but Love and Life are forever and forever. Do not defile the immortal with the mire of a stormy hour."

"Love!" he said, with a sneer so false and bitter that David's face flushed as if he himself had uttered a lie. "What love was, is, or ever can be between me and Millicent Harvey? Let us go our different ways. I never want to see her again in this life or the next. Tell her so."

They were walking on again, and they were silent for awhile, then David said, "You are going back to town. What do you mean to do?"

"Oh, everything is settled very comfortably," Fergus answered, with a sudden return to that cool, light tone which made David's heart heavier even than the fiery outburst. "I am a man of too many resources to be easily ruined. I found that my chief creditor was staying down here, and I came away to consult him, and he is going to take everything off my hands. He sees quite well that by putting forth capital into my concern he will soon gain an immense return. He will pay everybody, and be his own sole creditor, and with his resources, that will soon be most profitable to him. We have never had an American agency—of course, with our means the idea was ridiculous—but I suggested it to him, and he grasped it eagerly. I am to be his agent out in New York. I can assure you I shall be very glad to get away from this worn-out old country, with its narrow ideas and sulky prejudices. You need not trouble yourself about me, Mr. Maxwell. I only hope that you may find yourself satisfied with the arrangements of your new masters. For the sake of old times, I have tried to forget your recent mistrustfulness, and have spoken up for you, and, I think, with some effect; still, it will be very different for you, from what it would have been if I had prospered. I am sorry for you. You will repent that you did not make your interests identical with mine, even in such a paltry matter as the money you preferred to pay to Miss Harvey."

"I did make my interests identical with yours," said David, quietly. "You will see it some day."

"It is time I went toward the station," Fergus remarked. "You need not come with me. I think we have nothing more to say to each other. Good-bye. I dare say we shall not meet again at the office, for I have business in all parts of London for the next day or two, and then I shall go to Liverpool. Of course, I shall take my household to America, but in the first instance I must go out and secure them a comfortable and suitable residence. I should not like them to be exposed to any hardship, or to have those wretched homeless feelings that any change brings to those who are not accustomed to it. So, I dare say I may not see you again. If you have any business communication to make, the best way will be to address a note to the firm formally, and then it will get attended to in due course. Good-bye. Give my compliments to Miss Harvey."

"Good-bye, Fergus," said David, simply. He could add no word of blessing or commendation to God. Such would have sounded so like a curse.

And Fergus went one way and David took the other. And as he went along he looked out over the sea, and said to himself, "Oh, God! the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, have pity on that poor soul! Whither can it go from Thy Spirit?—whither can it flee from Thy presence? Though it say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, yet the darkness hidest not from Thee. And Thou remainest holy, oh, Thou worship of Israel—the Rock that standeth steadfast while the tide comes in and out."

CHAPTER XXI.

UNDER THE CLEMATIS.

MILlicENT was no fiery young girl, ready to snatch a flash of excitement from her anxieties like a bright foxglove from a covert of thorns. That night she went to the window for a moment and saw the rain beating on the pane, and heard the wind roaring outside in the darkness. But though she sat a little later than she used at home, she did not dream of spending the night in pacing her chamber, or voluntarily listening to the storm. She might not be able to sleep, but she would go to bed. She had gone past the age when life concentrates itself on points, and we see nothing beyond. Let not youth in its hasty scorn imagine this means that the fine power of suffering is lost. It is when the fever is over that the wound is felt.

She had a little sleep before the morning. And she dreamed that she and Hatty and Hatty's old lover, Harry Westbrook, were walking somewhere in a wood, and that Hatty suddenly began to sing the Magnificat. It seemed as if the singing awoke her. She had to make a strong effort to remember where she was, and what had brought her there. The room looked a little different since the night before; she felt sure that somebody had entered and gone out again, without awaking her. She rose quickly and drew up the blind. The sea was still high with the fury of the late storm, but the wind was down, and the sky was clear and bright, with a tender, tearful lustre.

She had neglected to wind her watch on the previous day, so that she could not guess the hour; but the number of people stirring on the shore below convinced her that it was late. While she was hastily dressing, she heard somebody open the door very softly. It was only the landlady.

"You'll excuse my boldness, miss," she said, "but I've been in before, and you were sleeping, and the gentleman bade me not disturb you till you woke of yourself. It's only the gentleman that brought you last night, and he's not been waiting more than half an hour. The young gentleman's all right, bless ye, miss, you needn't trouble about him. He took his breakfast as ours was going in the kitchen, like the real gentleman he is, and went off with my master in the boat to the bathing. I've got your breakfast-tray outside, ready to bring in the minute you're ready, for the gentleman below said you were to take that before you were bothered about any business. He looks as if he had been sore worried himself, but as if it were kind of all over now."

Millicent felt that the best acknowledgment of David's thoughtfulness was to obey it, so hastily swallowed a cup of tea and a scrap of toast, and hurried down-stairs. David heard her step on the stairs, and came to the parlor door to meet her, and the moment she saw his eyes she knew that all was lost.

"He is not dead?" she cried.

"No, he is not dead; he is on his way back to London. We must give him up to God's patience, Miss Harvey."

"Why did he go away? Where has he been, and what has he been doing?" Millicent asked.

"He came here to make arrangements with his chief creditor, who is staying here. He spent last night in his house," said David.

"He is a selfish, heartless wretch!" cried Millicent.

"Ah, but you see he did not start for this till he had spent one dreadful unaccounted-for night," said David. "Good and bad angels fought over him that night, surely, and the wrong ones conquered."

"Because he was on their side," remarked Millicent, bitterly.

"If there had only been something to turn the scale!" said David; "such little things can do it. Such little things have done it for me sometimes."

"Did he speak of me?" Millicent forced herself to ask.

"Yes, he did; and he could not disguise that he felt very strongly about you. It was the only emotion he showed. I think it will be a witness within him which he will never silence. He knew you were here. Miss Milly, you were ready to forgive him. Forgive him still. He wants it more than ever. He wants it so much that he has gone past caring for it!"

"And what is to become of him?" Millicent asked without any response to David's pleading.

"He is going to America. His chief creditor seems to have consented to take the business with all its responsibilities and profits, and Fergus is to be his agent in the States. If he has only learned a few lessons, he may do well yet," said David.

"The better he does for this world, the worse he will do for the next," remarked Millicent. "If God means to let him alone, He will let him prosper."

"That is true so far; but we must not be too sure about outward prosperities," said David. "A life may lie in prosperity like a corpse in a cloth of gold. Men look at the money-bags, but God sees the heart. A man may prosper, and prosper, and prosper, till he reaches the summit, and sees all around but 'vanity of vanities,' and he may turn to God from it, Miss Millicent. Some go home to the Father after eating husks among the swine; but others go after sitting appetiteless among dainties. But I think the Father is always waiting at the gate for either. And I think the elder brothers should be waiting there, too."

There was something in his tone which made Millicent look up at him, not as a mere messenger from Fergus, a lay figure in this tableau of her life, but as himself, David Maxwell. And the moment she did so, she was conscious of a loosening of the tension at her heart—that kind of relief from a great pain or a great care that is afforded by a smaller pang or a petty anxiety. Somebody else had been wounded beside herself.

It was only likely that he should look worn and weary. A good meal and a night's sleep might put all that away. But Millicent saw something more than that—a strange, new youthfulness about a face that had never lost its youth, a spiritual life as of one who, still standing in the temple's outer court, catches a glimpse of the Holy of Holies, it may be as another's desecrating hand disturbs the awful veil. Millicent felt this even instantly, as we all feel it sometimes, though we can only say, as Millicent said: "Mr. Maxwell, you have worn yourself out. Are you quite sure you have had a good breakfast?"

David started; as if he had to travel a long way back to recollection of himself.

"Oh, I had supper quite late last night," he said; "and the morning is not very far on yet."

"That means that you have had none at all!" she answered. "Oh, Mr. Maxwell, it was really wrong of you."

"I forgot all about it till you spoke," he said, with a smile. It was thoroughly true. There was nobody's sake for whom he was bound to remember himself.

"And yet remembered to have my breakfast sent up to me before you would see me," said Millicent, reproachfully, as she went off to give orders that the strongest of tea, and the most savory of steaks, should be sent in immediately.

Young Robert Harvey came in fresh and ruddy from his sea bath, and not at all unprepared for a supplemental breakfast. The three sat down together. It was a charmed meal for David. To be sitting with Millicent, cared for by her. To know that the gentleness in her voice, and the solicitude of eyes were actually for him, was enough. It did not matter that he knew quite well that his aching head and dazed manner explained her attentive kindness. That only seemed to make it sweeter. He thought within himself that it was like passing through a beautiful country, with a light mist hanging over it. Odder fancy still, for one tasting a brief happiness out of an old sorrow and a present pain, he thought that he felt something like one looking down from Heaven upon the fulfilment of an old wish! Poor fellow, was he feverish?

They made their plans while they sat at table. David would go back to town instantly—Millicent and her nephew would follow later in the day. David suggested that they should stay awhile by the sea, and make holiday, and Robert Harvey was certain that would be an excellent plan. But Millicent would not hear of it.

"I want to be at home, and to settle to my work," she said. "I have lost so much time already." She spoke and thought of her wasted hours and days of late, but it was really with the weight of lost years that her heart was heavy.

Millicent could gather from such slight conversation as passed between her nephew and David Maxwell, that David had been out in the severe weather of the previous night, but that he had spent the whole night in the storm she did not guess. Still there was something about him which told of a severe strain—some mysterious hint of a coming change.

"Will you take a note from me to my sister-in-law?" she asked. "It is best to let her know that her boy will be home again to-day. You need not trouble to call on my mother. It is farther out of your way, and Christian will send her a message in her turn."

This was the note she wrote:—

"We shall be home this evening. We have done what we could, and our part has come to nothing, but all is right with Mr. Laurie. I am afraid Mr. Maxwell has nearly worn himself out. If he is ill, I shall know what caused it. I suppose somebody's wickedness is at the bottom of most illnesses."

And then David went away. And Millicent and Robert went out together, and had a walk on the esplanade, and about the town. They stayed there till evening. Robert did not find his aunt a dull companion. For Millicent had not now to learn how to be a brave woman and a proud one.

In the sunset, they again took their journey. And Millicent found that the change and the bitterness seemed harder to bear, when she passed out of sight of the broad, rich meadows and gray sea-line which had been the scene of the crisis, back into the rows of streets, and the reek of the great city where the old, easy, happy past had been lived. It grew harder and harder as the two walked into Hackney—past the end of Acre Way, past the old church—where it almost seemed as if the ghost of the old sweeper—her first model—was standing, so vividly did the old man's figure rise before her eye. Hardest of all, when she stood under her own clematis-covered porch, at just the same hour and in just the same light as on that evening when Fergus had stopped to tell her of the great discovery. The clock chimed half past nine as she stood there. It had chimed so then.

If Fergus Laurie's way of life had only gone apart from here, if he had died, nay, if having once loved him she could feel in her secret heart that she loved him still, Millicent knew that it would be better for her. Loss and pain are treasures, albeit they may strain the poor human hand that bears them. But what are waste and emptiness? Those who have a past have a future, too; the dullest lake reflects the hills that stand around it. But poor Millicent had walked through her mirage, and there seemed only sands beyond.

"It is hard for David, too," she thought to herself, and drained the refreshment of that drop of sympathy, as a thirsty traveller drains the bitter water which he has procured at the cost of his last camel. It had been but a mirage, poor Millicent, but henceforth there would be no friend for her like him, who had seen the mirage, too! Each would have tones and turns of thought which each other would understand. The secret of many friendships lies just there.

It was Mrs. Harvey herself who opened the door. And she put her hand on her grandson's arm, as with one hasty kiss he turned to run off to "his own home."

"You are to stay here to-night, my dear," she said, "while Mr. Maxwell was calling at your house to-day, he was taken very ill. He will have to stay there—till—he is better."

"I thought there was something the matter," said Millicent. "Is he really very ill."

"Very ill," answered the old lady. "The doctors say—well, they told the truth, because they thought there was nobody who cared much, as he is a lonely man. It is a return of the old complaint he had when he was a teacher in his youth. They say they do not think he has enough strength to get over it now."

Like the doctors, Mrs. Harvey spoke plainly, because she thought he was a dearer friend to all the family than to Millicent.

"Fergus Laurie has killed him," said Millicent. And then her mother, looking into her face, knew that her daughter was desolate with a desolation beyond that of her own uncomfortable widowhood.

CHAPTER XXII.

A SECRET.

AND so it came to pass that David Maxwell laid him down to die, not—according to the sorrowful vision which had sometimes crossed even his cheerfulness—in his lonely house, with nobody near but his poor old faithful Phoebe. Nay, Phoebe was not even the watcher in his dying chamber. She could come in and smile brightly, and speak cheerfully, but then she had to rush out and hide her face in her apron and weep. She could not keep a serene countenance, as Christian Harvey could. Therefore, it was Christian who was the watcher.

Miss Brook was there to render what help she could. Old as she was, she was still a strong, spirited woman, one of those who are never "put out," and who hold that "what one's got to do one can do." She presided at George's table in his wife's absence, and guided the ticklish invalid-cooking ostensibly in Phoebe's eager but not too skilful hands. Christian knew that the secret of a peaceful, well-managed sick-room is efficient help from outside.

"One nurse within and two without," she said.

And so the queer old maid and the strong-tempered widow sat together over their peatles and pannikins. One called her companion "Ma'am," and the other addressed her as "Phoebe"—but the two were on that genuine equality where all sound hearts meet at such sacred times. And they talked and talked—yes, reader, as somebody will some day sit and talk about me and about you. Well, indeed, for us if they are such kindly talkers, and if they only have such kindly things to say!

"Says the chip of a milk gal to me this morning," Phoebe narrated, aggrieved, "'This about your master is a bad job for you. I don't wonder you're cut up—you are not very young for a new service.' I was cryin' when she said it, but that dried me up at onc't. You've no right to cry unless you've got your 'tificate of relationship."

"Ah," said Miss Brook, "it's my belief that in Heaven we'll be related according to how we love. The good Samaritan will be the fellow-countryman of the wounded Jew instead of the priest and the Levite."

"Well, there's likely to be a many things more wonderful than that," assented Phoebe. "And if so be, then-master David, that's belonged to nobody, as one may say, in this world, will be one in a rare large family there. Master David has been one of the quiet ones—nobody ever knew what he gave away and done, and he didn't know himself, an' he let it seem such a pleasure to him, that there were those that were not backward in coming forward to give him that same. There's some people that, I b'lieve, it's kindness when you give 'em a trifle, to make a mow, and tell 'em not to come again. Anyway, that was my mite toward Mr. David's charities, often an' often. There's some things I can't stand. I can't stand a great fat woman tellin' one she has't tasted a bite for two days, or that she's lived on three shillings a-week reg'lar for the last six months. Many an one that's told me that, I've answered that if they've thrived so well on it, I'd advise 'em to go on, an' I'd be glad o' their receipt myself. I know what clemming is. Many an' many a time I've set down to a dry bit o' pudding with two or three raisins in it, calling out to each other, 'Where are you? here am I.' I've had to save my appetite till I got my money a deal oftener than to save my money till I got my appetite; but there's folks in the world that can't save anything. I've lived on the fat o' the land these many years, now, and not been allowed to save anything 'cept my clothes; an' I've had to keep my hand in wi' them! Whenever Mr. David didn't dine at home, he always asked me what I'd had, for fear I'd put off with cheese or eggs. An' there never was a puddin' that a share didn't come back for me; an' if a visitor came unexpected, Mr. David 'ud leave his own. It wasn't the way in Blenheim House, where butter was always running short, an' me to finish up wi' dripping. 'It's as good as you get in any home of your own,' the missus would say, drat her! 'It's as good as I'd wish there,' I'd throw her back; 'but I ain't a-grumblin'—if I choices to make you a present of half my keep, that's my own affair!"

"Phoebe, I think old servants could be as saucy as any young ones," said Miss Brook.

"I wasn't her servant; I'd engaged wi' the master, when she worn't in the bargain," Phoebe rejoined, triumphantly. "Of course you know she wasn't Mr. David's own mother. Reckon she won't be even his stepmother in the next world—if she gets there at all. She'd an immortal soul, I s'pose, but I dunno know what she'll do with it, where there's no eating or drinking or dress. Why, that woman would ha' been quite enough excuse for any other boy a-going straight to the bad. He's been a miracle, has Master David. What mightn't he ha' been, if he'd took after his father or his poor mother, too, for that matter."

"Ah, God's grace is not hereditary," said Miss Brook. "It's some little time since Esekial taught us that. And if it's a law of nature that we should take after somebody of our race, there are a few families that haven't a good wide pick of fools and sages, and saints and sinners. Did you know anything of Mr. David's own mother, Phoebe?"

"Well, yes," said Phoebe, almost evasively. "But I know nothing that it's much use saying, after the way she went off wi' that man. When a girl does that sort o' thing, it's poor talk, and seems half wicked, to say she were pretty, and lively, and obliging. She'd no mother, poor thing, an' she'd a sister that maybe wasn't the best kind of sister for her. She meant well but she were that foolish fond of July's pretty face and ways, that she'd be wiled into going without a good shawl for herself, that July might have a good bonnet; and yet she were half afraid for her, an' if she let her too loose at one time, she pulled her up real hard at others, and she'd a sharp, biting tongue. But July knowed her sister, good and bad. She knowed she might come back to her when she was sorry for the wrong she'd done. There was nobody to give her a nay, for her sister was a widow by that time, not that her husband would have had a hard word for poor July when once the sin was away and the sorrow left. And July come back—come through a snow-storm in an open wagon, though she were that far gone when she got there that she could only say, 'I'd have come long before, but for the boy.' And says her sister to her, 'July, I'll stick by your boy through thick and thin.' And, in her sister's arms, she looked up an' smiled. She knowed she could trust her old Phoebe! An' she died that night!"

Miss Brook looked up sharply as the secret of Phoebe's life dropped out. But Phoebe noticed neither her own slip nor her companion's glance. She was crying too bitterly.

"Well, I suppose Master David got a better bringing up, one way, than his poor mother's son had any right to," she went on. "But it wasn't his father that giv' him any start in life. He had to feel that out for himself, an' got some hard knocks while he was a-doing it. An' he might ha' had a nice profession of his own, and bin a doctor, an' a good one, for he's often near cured my toothache by just looking at me, if his father had been an ordinary decent man, and not put a nasty idea into people's heads, that shut his poor son out of the small beginnings that people has to make at first. It wasn't likely that doctors would take up wi' a lad whose father had evened himself with resurrection men. There isn't a secret thing that isn't laid open, that I do believe now, for if I thought anything was secret that was, and poor old Mr. Maxwell himself, he thought so, too, for he was always dreadful frightened of its coming out, as people as ain't frightened of doing things generally is."

"Then you knew it before his death, Phoebe?" asked Miss Brook.

"Yes, I knew it. That was how it was I could say my say in his house, an' no fear o' being turned out. I knew it years an' years before, but I thought he were done with it. He was an awful man, ma'am. I could tell you things that would make your hair stand up."

And poor old Phoebe, standing in that comfortable kitchen, carefully skimming beef-tea, had in her memory a scene tragic enough for poem or picture. A dimly moonlit church-yard and two men stealthily digging at a new-made grave, with a young surgeon who had directed their attention to the death and burial of one of his own patients standing by, out of his sheer, brutal inclination for wickedness, soiling the still night air with low, vile laughter and miserable jest. The poem of the tragedy lay in another figure—a woman's—her own—watching the dreadful scene, restraining her own boiling indignation, all that she might have a power over this degraded man—a power that should enable her to serve and save his infant son—her own sister's nameless orphan.

"You should have spoken out, Phoebe," said Miss Brook; "there's no kindness in hiding a sin that isn't repented of."

"Ay, ma'am, an' Master David said just so, though he didn't know the rights of what he was talking about, poor boy. I'm sure I did it for his own self's sake, God bless him, an' he did own he was a bit the better for me."

"Why, he could have been only a baby when you entered the Maxwell's service," Miss Brook observed, with interest, and not without intent to develop the knowledge she had acquired so accidentally.

"And can't you do ought for a baby's sake, ma'am?" said Phoebe. "Ah, you've never been married, miss, more's the pity for the man that's missed you. You've never had no baby crowing in your arms. No more ain't I, ma'am. But me and my husband, we had to bury a bit o' a wee wax angel that had never looked up at either of us. It was a rare cuttin' up for my poor man; and he laid it that it happened through some sore troubles I'd had. He seemed to feel it more than me at first. But it's queer—I've never seen a baby since that hasn't seemed as if my still-born beauty were somehow in it. They may be fatter or thinner, or fairer or darker, but I always feel to myself, if it wasn't just for that difference, they would be her very picture! An' after that, ye'll own a baby's sake may be as much as any other body's, more especial one that was born the very day mine was buried—and that was—that was—" and here Phoebe threw her apron over her head, and sobbed outright—"that was like another baby that you'd nursed and dragged about when you were little more than a baby your self."

"I ain't a good one to make things plain," Phoebe went on, presently; "I can't speak right out; there's some things I won't say even while I want to, and I can't set it all plain while I'm a holding something back, as some folks can."

"Well, Phoebe," said Miss Brook, "keep some thing fresh to tell in Heaven. We needn't be afraid of having a secret, if it's one we shall be able to speak out there."

"Master David's taking one or two such secrets with him," said Phoebe, tearfully, "and maybe he'll hear one or two in his turn."

"Maybe he won't hear them just yet," Miss Brook interrupted, rather fiercely. "Maybe he's not going to die now, after all. I was given over by doctors twice before I was twenty, and here I am now, and believe I shall be till I'm a hundred."

"The Lord grant you're right," said poor Phoebe, "only I lose heart because he's grown so like—somebody—that I saw die years ago. I'd like to go first, and let him bury me. Many's the time I've told him so."

"Well, Phoebe," said Miss Brook, "if you are to stay behind, depend on't there's a reason for it. The withering leaves hold to the tree longer than the blossoms, that they may take care of them till the last."

"Ay, and that's so," Phoebe cried, with a light of battle kindling in her eye. "There's one or two things that I'll be even glad to stay behind just for to say! That impudent Betsey, the parlor girl at Acre Hall, had been telling over her lies to the landlady, who told me. Miss Devon was in calling at the Hall, an' she asked how Mr. Maxwell was, thinking they'd be sure to know; and says Miss Robina, 'Oh, we want to hear nothing about him now; my brother picked him out of the gutter, and he proved ungrateful; that is all our connection with him.' But I know who lent Mr. Fergus the first money he got hold of! The two young men talked as free as could be before me, coming in an' out o' Blenheim House parlor. If Miss Robina don't mind what she's saying, I'll astonish her! Phoebe Winter won't hide the truth and encourage the devil a second time in her life! Picked out of the gutter, indeed! For that matter, howsomever, her brother picked Miss Robina herself out o' the gutter, and she'll smell of it to the end of her days. But don't let them tell no lies about my master especially if he's taken, and can't any longer be a smoothing me down as he could and did. I'll die an old vinegarvixen yet, I believe, if I'm left to myself." And Phoebe carried the beef-tea up-stairs, and wept so bitterly that she had to leave it at David's chamber door, and lost one of her few remaining "sights" of him.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE END OF MILLICENT'S ROMANCE.

HEARTS might be aching, and fierce passions still throbbing all around. But in the chamber of death there was peace—the peace that passeth all understanding.

David knew that he was dying. He said so himself, and only added in a whisper: "It is so strange!" And there came upon his face a look as of one who in a beautiful silence listens for a burst of still more beautiful music.

He named Fergus Laurie once—only once. And fearful lest he might be repressing a wish that he thought would not be approved, Christian forced herself to ask if he would like to see him.

"No," he said. "Don't send for him, for perhaps he would not come, and then he would be sorry afterward."

The nature of his illness, as well as its great weakness, forbade him speaking often or ever above whispers. He lay for hours with his eyes closed, and would then smilingly whisper to Christian that he was "dull company."

He liked her to read to him—especially from Isaiah, and the Psalms and Revelation. And as he lay with shut eyes, there were verses which she heard him saying softly to himself.

"They shall not hunger nor thirst; neither shall the heat nor sun smite them; for He that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall He guide them."

"And they shall build up the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations."

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain."

"Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desire of thy heart."

He said that twice, and then opened his eyes, and whispered: "Yes, He does, except when we desire a stone, and then He gives us bread."

Another time he said: "What a pity I didn't contrive to take better care of myself last week, and remember to eat my meals and to keep myself from worrying! Because this happening afterward makes Phoebe think things that make her bitter. I wish she would see that I did nothing but what thousands do every day, and that I am dying because I am not worth life."

"I knew I had a very uncertain life by the rate I had to pay to insure an annuity for Phoebe. She don't know I did it. She'd have made a fuss, and opposed it. But when it's all over I think it will be a pleasant surprise to find it out.

"I made my will years and years ago, and there is now but little more than the definite sum that is definitely disposed of there. That little goes also to Phoebe, and so, of course, does my furniture. If she takes a boarder in my place, as it were, I think she may be very comfortable. You may recommend any one to her care. You may, really, on my word.

"But there are two or three little remembrances I should like to leave."

"I will write them down," said Christian, "and then your own words will go with them, and make them so much more precious."

"I want you to take my desk. It is only an old, old desk, that used to be in Blenheim House, but my hand had got so used to it that I never cared to get another. It is not worth giving, only there are a lot of papers inside, and you are so kind that I am sure you will look over them for me, and burn what ought to be burned. Will you?"

"I will," said Christian.

"I am afraid I have nothing fit to leave your husband, or even Robert. My watch is only silver, and I should like to give that to the lad who helped me in the laboratory. He has none at all, and it would be useful to him, for it keeps good time. Ah, but I have a little gold locket. You will find it in a drawer in my desk. I bought it years ago. I don't know what made me buy it. It has A. E. I. engraved on it. Give that to your husband, and tell him he is to put your portrait inside. Ay, and there is the engraving from that picture of the men who went into church to scoff, but 'remained to pray.' Give that to Robert, with my best wishes. It will be a contribution toward his own furnishing," added the dying man, playfully, thinking, with a smile, of the probable bright lines of the healthy young life that had touched his own so nearly just at its close.

"Give Mr. and Mrs. Webber that set of 'The Rake's Progress.' I remember hearing her say that she enjoyed Hogarth. So do I. One can dare to look at the gloom of the world, when one knows God sees it, too.

"I won't ask you to give anything to Fergus Laurie. He might fancy it was only a kind of reproach. It's no use showing good-will, when it is likely to raise bad will. Poor Fergus, he don't know himself just now. But if ever—if it should happen that you should see him, and that he should mention me as if he didn't quite hate me, I should like you to give him my Prayer Book, and to say that I asked you to do so whenever he should speak about me—but not before. Tell him I thought it might pain him to send him a dying gift in the middle of his angry thoughts. But that I wanted him to have this remembrance the moment he could think of me less bitterly, and forgive whatever he doesn't understand.

"And now"—and a pale, pale flush flitted over the sunken face, and there was a fall perceptible even in the almost voiceless voice—"and now I should like to give my Bible to Miss Millicent. We have worked with each other so long, and been through so much together, you see. She won't mind my leaving it to her, do you think?"

"It will be a pleasure to Millicent—ay, and a blessing, too," said Christian, frankly.

"Then if you will hand me the book and a pen I think I can write her name in it."

Christian obeyed.

The weak hand was long in obeying the loving will, and as Christian took back the volume she glanced at its new inscription. It was only "Millicent Harvey." Nothing more. A life's love might lie between the failing letters, but only angels could read it.

"I have enjoyed nothing so much as those grapes Miss Millicent brought me," said David, faintly turning his face aside upon his pillow.

"I will tell her so," answered Christian, "and then she will bring some more."

For Millicent had called at her brother's house twice, and even thrice a day to ask after David. She had left clusters of grapes and bunches of flowers. That was all she could do. She had no right to do more. She had not been David's friend as Christian had. Nay, when without the slightest improvement, he still lingered till Christian needed a relief-guard for her watches by night, Hatty Webber had come. Even Hatty had been far more David's friend than Millicent Harvey.

After the exertion and excitement of expressing these last wishes, the dying man lay silent and motionless for hours. Christian did not know whether he slept. He did not stir when her tea was brought up to her. She, too, sat motionless, thinking and dreaming of those half-forgotten things which come back upon us in all their freshness when we watch in death chambers—looks, and smiles, and words of those who have gone before, and who seem not so far away then, but as though they had come down to their other shore to welcome the boat which we are watching drift away from ours, and perhaps to ask tidings of us.

The sunlight faded from the room, and the gray shadows of twilight had crept over it, before David spoke again. Then he startled his watcher from her reverie by a clearer tone than she had heard for days.

"I am getting so rested! I think I shall go into Heaven quite fresh. I've heard some people say that they hoped Heaven would give them a rest, and others that it would give them more strength for work. I think I understand now. Each will get what he is fit for. I think Jesus Christ will welcome each one—and to some He will say, 'Go first and take the sleep of my beloved,' and to others, 'Come at once and sit with me at our Father's table.' It will be just like going home after a long journey. If we had a rest by the way, we go in ready for work; but if not, we must take a slumber when we get there. But home is home, either way, and Heaven is Heaven."

"What a comfort it is to be sure that one is going to Heaven, because it is nothing to do with one's-self, but all with Jesus!"

"Dear friend, who have been so good to me! Has Miss Millicent been here yet this evening? If not, I want to see her when she comes, and Phoebe, too, please."

"It will be too much for you. You will have a bad night afterward," Christian reasoned.

"It will make no difference at all," he answered, and looked at her, with a strong light returned to his dim eyes, which told her he was right.

He did not speak again till Millicent came. Even when he heard her ring at the street door, he only silently turned his face to watch for her entrance.

She and Phoebe came in together. He stretched his thin hand toward them, and smiled. Voice was far too precious to be used in any common greeting.

"It is different since we parted," he gasped to Millicent.

"It is well to be you, and go away," she said, with one tearless sob.

"And it is as well to be you, and stay," he smiled. "I should like to stay—for some reasons. But it is best for me to go! You'll never say that it was not, Miss Millicent? I am so sorry about Fergus—so are you, aren't you? We shall be so glad when he comes to his right mind again, shan't we? That is one of the things I should like to stay to see!"

"I shall be glad for your sake," sobbed Millicent, whose tears were coming fast now.

"Ah, you'll really be more glad for his own sake, though you mayn't own it, or know it, till you are lying as I am now. Good-bye, Miss Millicent, and give my kindest remembrances to your mother.

"Good-bye, dear old Phoebe," he said, fondly. "But, oh, Phoebe! I do wish I'd heard something about my mother!"

"I'll tell you the best news you can hear of her now, Master David," cried the old woman. "She were a sinner that wanted pardon, and got it; and she'll tell you all the rest herself. She'd ha' told you herself if she'd lived, and I warn't agoin' to do it when she wasn't there to put in a word between, and kiss ye, an' take yer kiss at the end o' the story."

"Mother!" said the dying man, as he might have said it if he had seen her bending over him, with his image mirrored in her eyes. He kept hold of Phoebe's hand for a moment, and then let it drop, and Christian gently put the two weeping women from the chamber.

Millicent did not go home. She spent the night sitting in the parlor with Phoebe and Miss Brook, neither of whom went to bed.

When she left her brother's house next morning all the blinds were down, and she went home with David's Bible in her hand.

"He is just gone," she said to her mother, and went straight up to her own room, and sat down and wept as she had not wept for years and years; and cried to God as she had never before cried in her life.

"Father, forgive me that I am not able to forgive! O Father, Father, I do want to forgive! O Father, I am outside Thy kingdom still, but do not shut Thy door! Forgive us our sins, as we forgive those that sin against us! O Father, there is no entrance there for me! Unless Thou help me to forgive, I cannot. I have tried, and my forgiveness has been thrown back to me, and lies in my own heart till it corrupts to bitterer hatred."

And a voice came into her heart, and said, "I will help thee to forgive. See what a poor creature thou art. There was one of my saints beside thee, and thou didst not know him for a saint. There was self-righteousness in thy heart, which is the proof of unforgiven sin, yet thou thought thyself a Christian. It needed something to show thee these things. Thou seest them by the flaming ruin of another life. Henceforth thou owest something to that poor ruin. It has lit thee from a precipice—it has revealed to thee a hidden crystal. Canst not thou pity its own desolation?—canst not thou be prepared, if the day of its rebuilding comes, to carry a stone to its foundation, or a carving to its cornice? It might have been thy life instead of that life. Thou wast as far from God as that was. Who maketh thee to differ?"

And Millicent rose up and faced the emptied life in which she had found her Redeemer. As Hatty had met him in the spring morning sunlight of life, and George in the summer's noontide heat—so Millicent met him in the gray and sultry autumn afternoon. Nobody knew of the meeting. When the great Books of Life are opened, nothing will be more astonishing than some of the dates therein. Henceforth Millicent was not "her own," but "Christ's." And there was joy in Heaven over a sinner that repented. It is strange how that sweet sentence has grown distorted on the minds of men. They cannot understand Christ's beautiful irony. All must feel sinners, and repent, before they can be forgiven, and the "just persons who need no repentance" are simply those lost ones who cause that mysterious under-shade of divine sorrow which is cast by the yearning arms of divine love.

David was buried. They carried him out into the country, and laid him under an old Norman tower, in a grave that nobody else would ever share. And on his tombstone they did not carve the name that had darkened his life—that had been but the haunting ghost of sin and shame and sorrow—they simply put—

TO THE MEMORY OF DAVID,
A SERVANT OF GOD.

And there they left him. And Millicent went back to her work and to her duties. Oh, how she wished that she had known him and loved him with a long, constant, familiar knowledge and love! Had it been so, her heart, now so poor, would have been rich with a treasure safe in Heaven. Instead of which she had stored where moth and rust had verily corrupted it, till at last a thief had entered and stolen even the last remains!

It so happened that the Sunday after David's funeral Millicent went to church alone. The weather was stormy, and her mother was not very strong, and Miss Brook had a cold. Even the sacred service was trying to the lonely heart, left with blighted fields in its harvest time. There was comfort in the chosen text, "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand forever." Yet it was stern comfort, which braced for endurance rather than soothed into hope. It made her leave the church, when all was over, feeling strong enough to bear her own sense of loss and waste, and to face the long sterile prospect of the future without fancying a single flower to soften it. She went lonely down the churchyard path. There was no familiar group about her now to give sweet human meanings to the divine message. Brother and sister were now to other groups what her mother had been to them, and she had kept no place for herself in those groups, but they must be rent, as it were, however lovingly, to let her in. There was no Fergus watching to give greeting. There was no David marking the text for his Sunday-scholars, or holding the gate open for poor old women. No, of all MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, there remained but the Bible of the dead in her hand, and in her heart a burning pain of pity for the living.

INSUBORDINATION; OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER IX.

TROUBLE ON BOTH SIDES OF THE HOUSE.

"OLD Lignumvite's getting as cross as a bear," said Bill, on the afternoon of the day on which Hardamer had passed through his first shaving operation. "We'll have to check him again. It won't answer to let him have the upper hand of us; if we do, there'll be no living in the house with him."

"He mustn't hector me again, as he did a little while ago, I can tell him; or he'll get his own pretty quick! I've no notion of it," responded Ike.

"He talked about giving me the stirrup, yesterday," said Tom. "I should just like to see him try that game once; I'd show him how much more interesting it was when played by two instead of one. Since he's got to going down hill, there's no living with him. It's snarl and jaw all the while!"

"He's done one good thing, though," said Ike.

"What is that?"

"Why, he's set our beauties up-stairs to work. If I didn't see Gertrude trying to make a shirt yesterday, I wish I may be shot! Millie says all three are at it, but none of 'em, except Genevieve, who is now the best of the bunch, knows much about it. Whenever anybody calls in, Gertrude and Geneva hide their work away, and then sit with their hands in their laps until the visitor has departed."

"It isn't possible, Ike, that they are such fools?"

"How can you ask such a question, Tom? But, Millie says, and I say, too, that they'll not hold out long. They are both too proud and too lazy to work."

"That's a fact," said Bill, energetically.

"It's most time we gave 'em another serenade. Suppose we amuse them a little to-night?" said Ike.

"Agreed!" responded his two companions, heartily, and that night about twelve o'clock, the whole family were awakened by another full chorus of diabolical sounds. Instantly Hardamer seized his old musket, which had been loaded some time before pretty plentifully with small shot, and throwing open the window, blazed away right in the midst of them. Not one of the young serenaders but had a taste of the shot, but it happened, fortunately, that none received any wound of consequence; the little messengers of punishment only penetrating the skin in unimportant parts of the body. It is needless to say, that there was a sudden cessation of the music, and a silent scampering of the young rascals. Putting down his gun, Hardamer proceeded at once to the garret, and lo! there was no one there but little Jimmy.

"Where are the boys?" he asked in a loud, quick voice.

"They're gone out, sir," replied the frightened lad.

"Gone out where?"

"They went out of the window, sir."

"When?"

"About half an hour ago, sir," said Jimmy, trembling from head to foot, he scarcely knew why.

Hardamer turned on his heel, and went down-stairs quickly, but returned in a minute with a cowhide in his hand. He did not wait long before the three boys came scrambling up the roof, smarting from the few small shot that had penetrated beneath the skin; and frightened, dreadfully, at the idea of being wounded. Ike jumped from the window-sill to the floor, first, and upon him was made the opening demonstration of his master's skill in using the cowhide. Heavily and with rapidity did the blows descend for the space of nearly a minute, by which time Bill and Tom were fairly at the scene of action. Ike had begun to recover a little from the surprise and confusion of the sudden attack, and, watching his opportunity, caught at the cowhide, and jerked it from his master's hand.

"Come on, boys!" he called out, "let's give the devil a taste of his own porridge." And flourishing the cowhide about his head, he brought it across the face of his master with tremendous force.

Quick as thought, Bill and Tom responded to the summons, and before Hardamer had recovered from the sudden attack, Bill struck him a heavy blow under the ear, with his fist, which brought him at full length upon the floor.

"Now slash it into him, Ike!" cried Bill, "and if he attempts to rise, I'll beat his brains out with this boot-jack!" picking up the article named, and brandishing it over the head of his master in a threatening manner.

Ike did not wait for a second invitation, but poured in the blows with the cowhide thick and fast.

But Hardamer was too much excited by this unexpected scene, to lay quietly upon the floor. Disregarding Bill's boot-jack, and not seeming to feel its force as it descended upon his head, Hardamer sprang to his feet, and catching Ike by the collar, dealt him two or three tremendous blows with his fist, which, in turn, brought that individual to the floor.

A new thought now struck him, and, retreating at once from the battle-ground, he called in the aid of three watchmen, who proceeded, mace in hand, to the garret. Suspecting the design of Hardamer, the boys barricaded the door, after driving a nail over the latch, by bringing their bedsteads against it. But this only served to embarrass the watchmen a little, not to keep them out. They quickly forced the door.

"Touch me at your peril!" said Ike, as the three rebels crowded together at the one end of the room, armed in no very offensive manner; their several weapons consisting of a boot-jack, a broom-handle and a heavy, knotted cane.

"You'd better give in at once, my lads," said one of the watchmen, brandishing his mace. "We're used to handling men." And so saying, he advanced upon them with his two associates. Each watchman singled his prize, and made his capture with an ease and quickness that showed him to be a perfect master of his trade.

That night our serenaders were quartered in the watch-house. On the next day they were committed by a magistrate, and on the third day were tried before the city court for an assault upon their master. Being indentured apprentices, and the assault proved, they were ordered ten lashes, each, by the court. Previous to this, however, a surgeon had examined their wounds, and removed about twenty small shot.

On the night after this flogging, the three boys bundled up their clothes, and, leaving the house by the garret window, took a final leave of their master. In this act was consummated the evils of improper discipline. Had Hardamer treated them, from the first, as he would have liked his own children treated, and carefully watched over them with other than exclusively selfish feelings, he would never have found them opposing and insulting his authority, nor have been deserted by them at a time when he more than ever stood in need of their services. Nor would he have been the cause of three stout lads, utterly unfit to govern themselves, breaking loose upon the world, to add, in all probability, to its annals of misery and crime. Had he governed his own household aright, children and apprentices, the former would have been respected by the latter, and the latter kindly treated by the former. No such an act as the mock serenade could possibly have occurred. But Hardamer started wrong from the beginning, and the evils inherent in his family government increased, until they were consummated in open insubordination.

The loss of his three boys, just at this time, was, to Hardamer, a serious matter. It required him to seat three more journeymen, at ten dollars a week each; thus, in his embarrassed condition, adding to his cash expenses about twenty dollars per week; for, taking the year round, it had not cost him, in the way he fed and clothed the three boys, over ten dollars weekly. This additional cause of embarrassment, and consequent anxiety, tended to increase his despondency, and to irritate his feelings in a very great degree. Burdened with a large and helpless family, from whom he received no sympathy, he felt himself unequal to the task imposed upon him. All he could do to press sales and force collections, was of no avail in keeping him even, when the due-days of notes rolled around. Doing only a retail business, he rarely had a note of any consequence to offer for discount; and, therefore, whenever short of money, he had but one resource, and that was his friend Mr. Centum, who never failed him at the hour of extremity.

Six months rolled away, and during that time he had become more and more inextricably involved with his money-lending friend. Hardly a day passed that some operation was not required, either in taking up notes, renewing checks or extending loans, and, in every case where either of the latter were effected, it was at a ruinous sacrifice; for the broker, in extending a previous loan for a new term of twenty or thirty days, beyond which he rarely went, always made it the excuse for taking an exorbitant interest, screening himself, too, behind some pretended invisible wealthy individual, who would receive nothing less. During the first six months that Hardamer remained in the web of difficulties which the broker was weaving around him, and by which he was embarrassing his movements more and more every day, that individual succeeded in getting from him, in unreasonable discounts, about five hundred dollars, and was, at the end of that time, bleeding him at the rate of from thirty to forty dollars weekly; and yet, at the same time, did not risk in all over fifteen hundred dollars, to secure which he had obtained a mortgage on Hardamer's house, worth, at least, with the ground, five or six thousand dollars.

Amid all these increasing difficulties, Hardamer found no sympathy in his family, except from Genevieve, who saw from his manner that he had sore trials to contend with. What these really were, neither she nor the rest knew; but, as her own heart had been deeply tried, she had learned to feel for others. Her father failed not to perceive the differ-once in her manner toward him, and her willingness to make herself useful; and gradually his feelings warmed toward her. As for Genevra and Gertrude, the more difficult it became to get money out of their father, to spend in all kinds of fashionable extravagances, the more importunate did they become, and the more insulting in their manner toward him.

Time had rolled on to past midwinter, and during this gay season these two young ladies had dashed away with as much show and extravagance as if their father had been made of money. Indeed from the time it became known that he had met with a heavy loss, they had considered it as their true policy to dress more extravagantly than ever, to force people into the belief that they were still rich, and that their riches were inexhaustible. Hardamer, whose mind was greatly confused in relation to the true state of his business, imagining that it would yield him at least the usual income he had derived from it, felt in no degree inclined to deny his family any indulgence they had been used to. But the loss of a thousand dollars a year, from the desertion of his boys, and the abstracting of more than that sum to pay usurious interest, made a very material difference in the state of matters and things. And, by the end of the first six months of his downward career, he began to think seriously of retrenchment and reform. For reasons, other than economical ones, he had insisted on his three oldest daughters doing all the sewing of the family; but Gertrude and Genevra had receded from that state of compulsory industry, and upon Genevieve had fallen the entire burden of the ordinary sewing. Of course, the young ladies' dresses were still made by the most fashionable and expensive dressmaker in the city.

In looking over his expense account one day, he was by no means satisfied with the large sums that were posted under the titles of "Dry Goods," "Millinery" and "Dressmaking."

"This will never do," he said to himself, closing the book with emphatic force.

It so happened that there was to be a fashionable gathering at the Assembly Rooms during the next week, and Gertrude and Genevra had received invitations. It was to be a splendid affair, the last and most imposing of the winter series. Each of the girls had one or two dangles in tow, and as this was to be the last grand affair of the season, they were nervously anxious to accomplish something. Fully determined to eclipse even themselves, they made application, on the evening succeeding the day on which their father had determined to reform them a little, for fifty dollars a-piece.

"I haven't got it to spare, just now," he replied, rather gruffly.

"But we must have it!" said Genevra.

"And, pray, why must you have it, miss?" responded the father, sensibly irritated.

"Because there's to be a splendid ball next week, and neither of us has anything fit to wear."

"Then you'll both have to stay at home, I'm thinking."

"But, pa," urged Gertrude, "we must go; I wouldn't stay away for the world."

"Well, go! Nobody wants to prevent you."

"Yes, but we must have something to go in," responded Gertrude. "Neither of us has a ball dress fit to be seen in at such a place. All the dresses are to be new and splendid; and I, for one, have no notion of being thrown into the shade."

"Then you'll both have to stay home, let me tell you," said the father, in a quick, excited voice, "for, not one dollar shall you have to waste on such tom-fooleries. I'm going to put a stop to these things. No later than yesterday I had your extravagance thrown into my teeth, when I asked for a little time on one of your outrageous dry goods bills."

Gertrude and Genevra raised their hands and eyes in astonishment; and in a few minutes pumped up a plentiful effusion of tears.

But Hardamer was mailed in triple armor against all such assaults.

"You needn't set up any blubbering and crying here, my young ladies, now, I can tell you!" he said, in a firmer and more determined voice. "Hereafter—and you might as well know it at once—you must not consider yourselves as a rich man's daughters, with money to waste. I've got my hands full, and my heart full, too, to get you something to eat and decent clothes to wear; and, with these, you will have to be content. So, you may just as well come down from your high notions. You have no business at this ball. It is no place for a poor man's daughters!" So saying, the father turned abruptly from the room.

"Humph!" said Gertrude, drying her tears in a moment; "a poor man's daughters! Ain't that too bad! That's the first time I ever heard myself called a poor man's daughter—and I'd just like to hear anybody else say so to me! A poor man's daughter, indeed!"

"But what shall we do, Gertrude? Pa won't give us the money."

"We must have the ball dresses, that's certain," said Gertrude, emphatically. "Why, I wouldn't miss going for the world; especially, since Miss Stubbs was so cut up at the last ball, because my dress was more elegant than her's, and said she'd eclipse me the next time, if it cost her her life. Who's she but a tavern-keeper's daughter? And to talk of eclipsing me!" And the accomplished Miss Gertrude Hardamer curled her lip disdainfully.

"But, if pa won't let us have the money, how are we to get the dresses?" asked Genevra.

"Why, go and buy them at Martin & Morrison's, and not say anything about it. The bill won't be sent in for three or four months."

"I shouldn't exactly like to do that," said Genevra.

"Nonsense! Haven't we been in the habit of making bills there? But what will you do?"

"That's what I can't say," replied Genevra. "I must go to this ball, and I haven't anything fit to be seen in. I want to make a dash at Mr. Appleton, the merchant, and if I don't get a new ball-dress, I shall stand no chance."

"A new and splendid dress—something a little ahead of anything there," urged Gertrude, "will attract a host of admirers, and he will come in at once, in fear of a rival. You will then be off of pa's hands, and can pay the bill yourself, before he comes to know anything about it. And even if that should not be convenient, after you are married, he won't, of course, care anything about it, especially, as the new dress will have secured so fine a fellow as Mr. Appleton for a husband."

"That's a new view of the case altogether," said Geneva, brightening up. "And I don't see how we can get along in any other way. Pa's determined, that's certain."

Evil counsel prevailed, and Geneva joined her sister in the proposed plan of operations. On the next day they called at Martin & Morrison's, and there discovered a piece of rich, embroidered, blossom-colored satin, and some beautiful figured blonde veils.

"These'll be grand!" whispered Gertrude to her sister. "This blonde over the blossom-colored satin, will make the most splendid dresses that can be imagined."

"Shall we get them both alike?" said Geneva.

"Of course; we'll attract the more attention," responded Gertrude.

"Shall I cut this piece of satin for you, ladies?" said the polite salesman. "It's the most beautiful thing in town. No other store in the city has the same pattern. Mr. Martin could only get one piece in New York—all the rest of the case having been sold to the retail trade of that city," at the same time holding the piece of satin so as to let the light fall upon it to bring out clearly the rich embroidery.

"It is beautiful!" exclaimed Gertrude, lost in admiration.

"Beautiful!" responded Geneva.

"How much will you have, ladies?" urged the salesman.

"Shall we take it, Geneva?" whispered Gertrude.

"Of course," replied the sister.

"Then we'll take thirty yards, sir," replied Gertrude, not once thinking, or, indeed, caring for the price, which was three dollars a yard.

"Will you take some of this blonde?" continued the salesman, after he had measured off the thirty yards of satin.

"How many do you think it will take?" said Gertrude, turning to her sister.

"One for the body, two for the sleeves, and four for the skirt—seven for each. How many of this pattern have you?" she said, addressing the clerk.

"About fourteen," replied that accommodating gentleman, who had overheard her enumeration.

"Then we'll take them," said Gertrude.

"Nothing else this morning, ladies?"

"Nothing more to-day. We shall want something else, and will call in during the week. Please send the satin and blonde veils to Mrs. Sartain's, in Liberty Street, and charge the bill to Mr. Hardamer."

"Certainly, miss," responded the polite salesman, bowing low, and the young ladies departed.

"How much did you sell them, John?" asked Mr. Morrison, coming forward.

"Let me see," said the clerk; "thirty yards of blossom-colored embroidered satin, at three dollars, are ninety; and fourteen figured blonde veils, at four dollars a-piece, are fifty-six dollars—one hundred and forty-six dollars, sir. Pretty good sale, that!" added the clerk, smiling with an air of self-satisfaction at having done so good a half-hour's work.

"Yes, I suppose it is, John. But I'm afraid those extravagant daughters of old Hardamer will ruin as honest a man as ever lived. I shall hate to send in the bill."

"That's his look-out, not ours, you know," replied the clerk, laughing. "It's our business to sell goods."

"That's very true," responded Mr. Morrison; and he turned to his desk to make the charge.

Neither of the young ladies felt perfectly satisfied with what they were doing; but they had bought the satin and blonde, and it had passed into the dress-maker's hands. There was now no retreating, even if they had wished to do so. But, of this they had no idea, uncomfortable as they felt about it. They had never before so wilfully and directly gone against a positive command of their father's, and they could not feel very easy in mind. But none of their uneasiness arose from a sorrow for disobedience—it had reference only to the consequences, when it became known.

On the night of the assembly they attired themselves in ball-dresses used on a former occasion, and then rode off with the young men who had called for them to Mrs. Sartain's, and there had themselves arrayed, by that skilful lady's own hands, in their splendid dresses.

"The most beautiful thing I ever saw," said Mrs. Sartain, glancing with a skilled and practised eye at Gertrude's dress, which she had just finished arranging on that young lady's person. "I have made several for the ball—but they won't bear a comparison with this."

"I am sure of that," responded Gertrude, greatly pleased.

And, certainly, they were splendid dresses; and if the figures they had been made to fit had only been graceful and well-proportioned, Gertrude and Geneva would have looked like queens.

Proudly did they glide, on that evening, through the dance, their beautiful dresses the admiration of some—the envy of many. Numerous were the beaux who crowded around them, and the hours flew by with almost the velocity of minutes.

Among the company were two young men—Mr. Appleton, who had recently opened a dry goods store, and Mr. Carson, his friend, in the same business. These young men, who had been for some time endeavoring to make up their minds to make proposals to the two girls, accompanied them to the ball this evening, and at its close attended them home.

"Well, how were you pleased, Carson?" said his friend, as they left Mr. Hardamer's door, on bidding the girl's good-night.

"Humph!" responded that individual, "I think there was more froth than substance there."

"So do I. These gatherings were never much to my taste, any how."

"I've made up my mind," said Carson, "to back out."

"Ay, indeed! Why, what's the matter? I thought you were particularly pleased with Gertrude."

"Well, I must confess that I did feel a little inclined, as you know," replied Carson; "but, the fact is, Appleton, I've seen a little too strong an exhibition of extravagance to-night. Gertrude was dressed splendidly, but rather too much so for a shoemaker's daughter, especially now that her father's affairs are in so embarrassed a condition, through his heavy endorsements for Mr. —. I tried to think that she looked elegant, but every time she came near Miss Wilmer, with her neat, plain white dress, innocent face and graceful, elastic form, I could not but feel that her only merit, like birds in gay plumage, lay in gaudy externals. I feel sick and disappointed."

"Pretty much the same kind of thoughts passed through my mind," said Appleton, "in reference to Genevra. Why, she'd ruin any man with her extravagant ideas! I must take counsel of prudence and relinquish my visits. I'd be a fool to put my neck into a halter with my eyes wide open."

This conference confirmed in each a half-formed resolution to look somewhere else for a wife.

The heads of our young ladies were too nearly turned to be able to think rationally about anything except the ball for a week after. Their splendid dresses were, of course, seen by their mother, who passed a slight censure upon them, and concealed the matter. As day after day, and week after week passed away, the wonder of the girls increased more and more, at the prolonged absence of their two particular beaux; and at the few and far between visits which they received from other young gentlemen. The truth was, the real condition of their father's affairs was better known to everybody than to themselves; and there were few at the ball who did not feel something like contempt toward young ladies who could be guilty of making so unnecessary a show, when prudence, and every other consideration, should have prompted them to have made an appearance better suited to their real condition and standing. They were, now, further from making the desired matrimonial haven than ever.

Having once passed the Rubicon, in consenting to run up a large bill in opposition to their father's implied commands, they were tempted to increase that bill from time to time, in the purchase of costly shawls, fine dresses, and the various et cetera of a woman's wardrobe, until the gentlemanly owners of the store felt it necessary to hint to them that their bill had already reached the round sum of five hundred dollars. Surprised and alarmed at this, they stopped short, and now had added to their other causes of trouble, the dread of the day when their father should receive this bill, the result of only three months' extravagance in dress.

In the meantime, Genevieve found the good seeds implanted in her mind through the agency of Anne Earnest, gradually striking their roots deeper, and shooting up into tender and green leaves. Her character was undergoing a thorough change—silent, gradual and sure. Living constantly from a sense of duty, she always found enough in her father's house to give activity to both mind and body, and thus was she kept above the distressing dependency that would otherwise have robbed her of all peace. Her father saw, and her mother and sisters felt the change without acknowledging it. The former began to have different and kinder feelings toward her; but the latter felt that she had disgraced them by her imprudent marriage; and all desertion of beaux, or failure of false calculations on different young men, Gertrude and Genevra charged upon her as the cause.

So far as her husband was concerned, Genevieve grew more and more desirous every day to hear from him and to see him. Her own views and feelings being now thoroughly changed, she cherished the hope of winning him to regard her from other motives than the mere hope of riches. His desertion of her was a cruel one; and his continued silence she felt to be still more cruel; but, being bound to him as his wife, she felt it her duty, as a wife, to do all in her power to interest his affections, if he should ever return to her—an event for which she ceased not to hope. Under all the circumstances, her condition was one of painful trial; but, where there is the effort to do right and to feel right, the mind will never sink into distressing dependency. Strange as some may think it, her's was the most peaceful soul in her father's house.

CHAPTER X.

A FAILURE IN BUSINESS.

"INDEED, Mr. Centum, you must renew this note for me. When I merged all my notes into one, and increased the amount to twenty-five hundred dollars, you gave your positive promise, that you would continue to renew it, so long as the discount was regularly paid. You know that you have ample security."

"Do you think I could go on in that way forever? You have a strange idea of business!" said Mr. Centum, in an irritated manner.

"But, Mr. Centum," urged Mr. Hardamer, "it is only three months since I made the note, and I have paid you your own price upon every renewal. I've never complained of the discount, though it has been large."

"Well, I can't help that, Mr. Hardamer. I've other use for my money, just now, and this must be paid to-day."

"It is impossible!"

"It must be done," said the broker, angrily.

"But you know it is perfectly safe; and what is the use of your driving me to ruin. I cannot possibly pay the money to-day—it is as much as I can do to raise the interest."

"I don't know that it is so safe," replied Mr. Centum, doubtfully. "Property is beginning to fall. Besides, you are too extravagant in your family. Morrison told me yesterday, that your daughters' dry goods' bill for the last three months was over five hundred dollars."

"He didn't tell the truth!" said Hardamer, quickly, and with a good deal of irritation in his manner.

"Well, I never caught him in a falsehood," replied the broker, calmly. "But that is neither here nor there. I cannot renew this note any longer. It must be paid to day!"

"It cannot!" said Hardamer, despondingly.

"So much for befriending you!" replied the broker. "I never yet accommodated a man in trouble that he didn't disappoint me. Do you suppose when I loan my money for a certain time that I do not expect to get it when that time expires? If I find it convenient to renew, why it's all well enough. But if I don't, nobody has a right to complain. Whenever I want my money, it is my rule to get it. It's only my own that I ask for."

"But, surely, Mr. Centum, humanity would prompt you to make a small sacrifice in a case like mine. You know my situation as well as I do, and know that it is impossible for me to take up this note. I will pay almost any price for the money."

"It's no use for you to talk, Mr. Hardamer. You will be no more able to pay me six months from now than you are to-day," said the broker.

"But I am not able to pay you to-day, as far as ready money is concerned."

"That's your look out," replied Mr. Centum, showing his teeth. "You are aware that I have my remedy."

"But you cannot, certainly, find it in your heart to break me up with a large family upon my hands."

"Pooh! what's that my business? I've got my own affairs to attend to, not yours. When a man borrows money, he ought to pay it, and have no to-do about it."

"You won't have the note protested, Mr. Centum, will you?" urged Hardamer, in a supplicating tone.

"Won't I?" said Centum, with an angry grin. "Wait till three o'clock and see! I don't do my business by halves, and never did."

"In pity, spare me!" said Hardamer, in a voice of agony, driven almost to desperation at the thought of a failure in business.

"I've got no time to fool with you, Mr. Hardamer! Pay that note, or it will be protested, and the mortgage foreclosed to-morrow!" replied the broker, in a loud, angry voice, and abruptly left his office.

The evil day had at last fallen upon him, and there was no hope for poor Hardamer. In the last three months he had paid more than seven hundred dollars in exorbitant discounts to Centum; and that individual, having played with him as long as he thought it prudent, now determined to bring matters to a crisis. His security, it is true, was ample, but there had been a slight decline in the value of property, and he had no idea of running the slightest risk. More than half of the twenty-five hundred dollars due him, he had received in interest, during nine months, from Hardamer, who, in his eagerness to get money, had not hesitated to comply with the money lender's most unrighteous demands. In a state of mind not easily imagined, did Hardamer wait until the town clock rung out, loud and clear, the hour of three. Every stroke of the bell fell upon his ear with a solemn, funereal sound. But after the last ringing reverberation had died on the air, he breathed more freely, and sat himself down to wait, in a state of forced calmness, the arrival of the notary. In the course of half an hour that individual came tripping in, and, with a most unconcerned and unsympathizing face, asked for payment of the note.

"I have no money," said Hardamer, mechanically.

The notary went away. When the protest came, Hardamer took the fearful document and read it over with strange composure.

It takes but a short time to wind up an honest debtor. Everything was given up by Hardamer into the hands of a trustee, and the business brought to a settlement as speedily as possible. His house was sold, and brought but three thousand five hundred dollars, which, with his book accounts, paid off the whole of his indebtedness to everybody. Among the bills brought in was that of Martin & Morrison, for dry goods, amounting to five hundred dollars. It was paid, of course.

The business had proceeded as usual, for the two months during which it was in the course of settlement, under the superintendence of Hardamer. All of his stock of leather, and some of the manufactured work, was left in his possession, with about five hundred dollars. This constituted his whole capital, at the age of fifty-five, with which again to start in the world. His dwelling and shop, no longer his own, could not now be occupied, unless at a rent of six hundred dollars a year. This he was not able to pay, and he therefore looked out for a small dwelling, and for a shop separated from it, in some neighborhood where rents were lower.

A small dwelling-house in Vulcan Alley was advertised, and upon ascertaining the rent to be one hundred and twenty dollars a year, he engaged it, without consulting any one of his family.

"What do you think?" said Geneva, coming up from the breakfast-room, where she had learned from her mother that her father had engaged a new house. "Pa's gone and rented a little bit of a pigeon-box up in Vulcan Alley, and is going to move away from here."

"It ain't possible!" exclaimed Gertrude, jumping up from the piano, at which she still continued to spend hours every day.

"It is possible, though!" said Genevra, bursting into tears.

"Well, I'll not go there! I'll die first!" said Gertrude, stamping upon the floor. "Pa's got no kind of spirit or consideration! Does he think we're agoing to be cramped down in that narrow hole among draymen and niggers?"

"You are wrong, Gertrude," said Genevieve, mildly. "Pa's in great trouble. He is now old, with a large family upon his hands, and all of his property is gone."

"He was a fool for giving it up; that's all I've got to say!" responded Gertrude, passionately. "No man is justified in robbing his family in that way!"

"Gertrude," said Genevieve, firmly, "you must not talk so about pa. He has always been too indulgent to us, and now that he is old and in trouble, we ought to feel for him, and try to help him all we can."

"Nobody asked for your advice, miss, so just shut up, will you!" replied Gertrude, in a loud and angry voice.

"I spoke in vindication of father," Genevieve answered, mildly, but still firmly. "Say what you please to me, about myself, and I will be silent; but I cannot hear him spoken of unkindly, and remain silent."

"I wonder how long it is since you became so dutiful," said Genevra, with a sneer. "You've forgotten the hopeful young gentleman you ran off with last summer, haven't you?"

"Silence!" said Hardamer, in a loud, angry voice, coming suddenly into the room from the passage, where he had heard the rebuke of Genevieve, and the cutting remark of Genevra.

"Do you know, buzzy! who you are talking to, or what you are talking about?" he continued, much excited. "What is the meaning of this? How dare you talk to your sister thus. Your sister, who is better, in every sense of the word, than a dozen such proud, lazy, extravagant trollops as you are. Has she ever run me in debt like this, ha?"—exhibiting Martin & Morrison's bill of five hundred dollars. "I'll turn you out of the house in a minute, if I hear another unkind word from you to your sister. Why don't you go to work as she does, instead of abusing her, and try to help me a little in supporting you. I'll sell that piano, my lady!" he continued, turning to Gertrude, who still remained on the piano stool, and notwithstanding her father's anger, kept running her fingers over the keys in a careless, indifferent manner. "You'd better be mending stockings, a great sight!"

"Not exactly!" responded the young lady, drawing her lips together, and tossing her head quite significantly, at the same time continuing to let finger after finger fall upon the keys, in slow succession.

For a moment the father's feelings were roused to a degree that scarcely left him any control of himself; but, by a strong effort, he restrained the inclination he felt to box the young lady's ears, and turning upon his heel, went down-stairs.

"Humph! sell the piano, indeed!" said Gertrude, as soon as her father was out of hearing. "I should like to see him try that trick. I reckon he'd find the house too hot to hold us all."

"Indeed, indeed, Gertrude!" said Genevieve, "it is very wrong for you to speak in that way. I cannot bear it."

"None of your gabble, miss!" responded Gertrude, turning up her nose with a sneer.

"She's got pa on her side, now, and she thinks she is somebody," said Genevra. "But she needn't put her jaw in where I'm concerned, I can tell her! She only sews here from morning 'till night to curry favor with him."

"But how do you know, Genevra, that he's taken a house in Vulcan alley?" said Gertrude, interrupting her.

"Why, I heard him tell ma so, just now."

"And what did she say to it?"

"Why, she said it wouldn't do at all!"

"Well, and what reply did he make to that?"

"He said it would do, and it should do. That he was going to take matters and things into his own hands now, and have them his own way."

"Hasn't he said that a hundred times," said Gertrude, with an incredulous toss of the head. "It's no use for him to talk; we're not going to live in that dirty hole, no how at all. Why I'll die before I'll go there!"

In about fifteen minutes after the father turned abruptly from the room, and while Gertrude and Genevra were still in a state of great excitement, he re-entered, accompanied by a well-known piano-forte maker.

"This is the instrument, Mr. H——. But you know all about it. What do you think you can give me in cash for it?"

The girls started, in utter astonishment; but a dark and threatening look from their father, kept them silent; for there were times when they saw, in his countenance, that which they dared not oppose.

Mr. H—— examined the piano all round, struck the keys, and after having satisfied himself, said: "I can allow you something in the neighborhood of three hundred dollars."

"Very well. You can take it at that. I must teach my girls to play on some other instrument now. Every dog must have his day, and we have had ours."

"It's a pity to rob the young ladies of this sweet-toned instrument," said Mr. H——, glancing at Gertrude and Genevra, whose countenances exhibited dismay and consternation. To counteract this, Hardamer cast on them a menacing look, and they were silent.

"A dutiful and affectionate daughter," he replied, "could take no pleasure in idling her time at the piano, while her old father was toiling from morning until night to support her; particularly, if by her industry she could lighten his burdens."

"True, sir, true," responded Mr. H—. "Duty first, pleasure afterward. But when do you wish me to take the instrument away?"

"At once, sir. Please send your men around immediately, and remove it. I wish to have the money as soon as I can lay my hands upon it."

"It shall be done," said Mr. H—, bowing, and in half an hour the piano was gone.

The determined air with which all this was done, utterly confounded the young ladies. They could not understand it at all. And they were not only astonished, but in a great degree dispirited. They could not but feel how vain would have been opposition in the case of the piano; and a painful consciousness of weakness and inability to oppose their father came over them and humbled their determined spirits.

"We're not going to live in Vulcan Alley, ma, are we?" asked Gertrude, anxiously, that evening, after her father had retired to the shop.

"Yes, we are, though. Your father has taken a house, and will not be persuaded to give it up. I don't know what to do, he's in such a strange humor."

"It was cruel to take our piano," said Genevra, bursting into tears for the twentieth time since the instrument had been removed. "What shall I do with myself? I feel disgraced, too, for everybody of any standing has a piano."

"You'll find enough to do, I expect, without playing on the piano," replied her mother.

"What do you mean, ma?" asked Gertrude, quickly.

"I mean that you've all got to go to work and help to support the family," said Mrs. Hardamer. "Your father says so—and he is in no humor to be crossed."

"Never! I'll die first!" responded that young lady, indignantly.

"We'll see about that," said her mother, calmly. "There's always a way to do a thing. I don't, myself, see that there is any great harm in a young lady's employing her time usefully. I had to work when I was a girl, and I don't see that you are any better than I am. Your father has to work hard, and will have to work harder still to get bread for us all, and you are no better than he is."

"I'll die first!" broke in the pertinacious Gertrude, sobbing.

"I'm sure I cannot see that it is such a disgrace to work," said Genevieve, looking up from the garment upon which she was sewing. "Anne Earnest does not think it a disgrace to work, and she—"

"Do you dare to even me with Anne Earnest?" exclaimed Gertrude, her eyes flashing fire as she spoke.

"I have no wish to do so, Gertrude, if it is offensive to you," replied her sister. "I was only going to say that Mrs. Webster esteems her as her own daughter, and yet Anne sews for her all the while; and more, Mr. Illerton is going to marry her next week."

"How do you know that?" asked Gertrude, in astonishment, springing to her feet.

"Why, I had it from her own lips, yesterday, in Mrs. Webster's presence. And, more than that, Mrs. Webster says that all of Mr. Illerton's friends in Virginia approve the match, and that his father, mother and sisters are to be here at the wedding."

"I don't believe a word of it!" said Genevra. "Mr. Illerton is not going to marry a poor hired girl, whom nobody knows. And I'd like to know, anyhow, where you saw Mrs. Webster when she told you all this?"

"I heard it at Mrs. Webster's own house," replied Genevieve, mildly.

"And, pray, what were you doing there?" asked Gertrude, in surprise.

"I go there every week to see Anne," said Genevieve. "And Mrs. Webster is very kind and lady-like in her manner toward me. She has often told me how much she loves Anne, and says that she feels as near to her as if she were her own child. 'I never saw a girl of such pure principles and such an innocent heart. Mr. Illerton, who is a son of my old and dearest friend, has indeed found a treasure,' were the very words she used to me one day last week, when we were alone. And, yet, Anne is busy all the while; and what is more, Mrs. Webster sits and sews with her by the hour; and we all know that she moves in the very first circle in the city. So, you see, Gertrude, that it is not thought disgraceful to work by the first ladies in town."

This was too much for the girls, and they hung their heads in silence. Two days afterward this interesting family underwent the process of removing into a small two-story house in Vulcan Alley. It had a large back building, which afforded, with the front chambers and garret, room for the whole family. It was a house without a passage. But the two neat parlors below were thrown into one by folding-doors.

Notwithstanding her determination to die first, Gertrude removed with the rest; and, in a sad state of mind, in which Genevra fully sympathized with her, settled herself down, hopeless of ever receiving a beau again that was anybody. In all the care, bustle and confusion of moving, Genevieve was prompt, active, and thoughtful, while Gertrude and Genevra were to the family as the fifth wheel to a carriage—an incumbrance. The eyes of the father and mother, now fairly opened to the true character of their three oldest children, saw all this, and their affectionate consideration for Genevieve was greatly increased. Especially did her father feel his heart warming toward her; for, in the change of circumstances that had passed upon them, while the other two, and even his wife and younger children, bore countenances of distress, that robbed him of all quiet of mind, Genevieve was ever active and cheerful. Particularly was she careful for his comfort. Every little attention that could in any way add to it was promptly given, and with an evidence of affectionate regard that softened the stern and harsh features of his character, and made him often feel toward her a degree of tenderness that his heart had but rarely known.

"You are a good girl, Genevieve," he said to her a few days after they had moved, with a heartiness of tone, and a smile that warmed the heart of his child. He had just discovered some little attention, which her thoughtful regard had been prompt in executing and its character had affected him. He had never before expressed to her his consciousness of her dutiful regard, and these few words, which seemed to gush forth spontaneously, were to her heart a rich reward. Ever since her unfortunate marriage she had felt alone, forsaken and despised, even in her father's house, and only in the steady performance of duty she had found peace for her troubled spirit.

True, he had the week before spoken well of her, in rebuking her sisters, but this was done in a moment of angry excitement. Now there was no mistaking the warmth of his feelings. She looked up into his face with eyes instantly suffused, and with an expression of subdued but heartfelt delight upon her countenance. She could not utter a word in reply, but he understood and felt the language of her face. Touching his lips to her forehead, an act of affection she had not received for years, he hastened away, his own heart overcome with rising emotions.

The gush of tears that relieved the oppressed feelings of Genevieve, were the most joyful tears that had ever fallen from her eyes.

THE STORY-TELLER.

LAI'D UPON THE SHELF.

BY MRS. H. G. ROWE.

"I DON'T suppose you have any idea of going, mamma?"

"Why, really, Eva, I did think I should like to go to this party."

Mrs. Ray's tone was deprecatory, and she gave a quick, shy glance at her daughter's surprised face.

"I don't, generally, care much for these large gatherings; but Mrs. Brent was an old schoolmate of mine, and I should like to go to her silver wedding—if I can."

"It's to be a grand affair, and, of course, you can't wear your old black silk—you've worn it everywhere for the last six years."

"No, of course not. I was thinking of getting me one of those handsome silver-gray silks that we saw the other day at Macy & Packard's. Don't you think," with a timid look at her daughter's unsympathetic face, "it would be suitable for me?"

"Oh, yes, certainly," was the cold response; and Eva drew up the last scallop of her tating with a jerk and a frown, while she added, in that quietly aggrieved tone so painful to a sensitive ear: "I can help you on your dress, for I shall stay at home myself."

Mrs. Ray colored painfully. "Why, what do you mean, child? You have been talking of going ever since the invitation came. What has made you change your mind so suddenly?"

"Only," affecting utter obliviousness of the pained surprise in her mother's look and tone, "if you have to buy a new silk for yourself, papa won't think he can afford me the dress that I intended to have for this party, and I had rather stay at home than wear the same dress that I've worn to every party, large and small, that I've attended this winter."

"I thought," the mother's voice faltered as she spoke, "that, as your dress was new and handsome, it would do to wear through the season."

"I don't care to be known by my dress," was the "short" reply, and with a sigh for the lost entertainment that she had anticipated with real pleasure, the unselfish mother replied with an effort at cheerfulness:

"Oh, well, if that's the way of it, pu stay at home. I shouldn't take any comfort in going if I thought I was depriving you of a pleasure."

Eva's fair face was all sunshine in an instant.

"Thank you, mamma! But, honestly now, I don't believe you'd have enjoyed it a bit, if you had decided to go. The confusion and crowding, and the late supper—all together, would have worn you out entirely."

Mrs. Ray smiled sadly, as she thought of the daily round of wearying, wearing domestic cares, with the suppers both "late" and early, whose preparation had helped to make up the burden that had bowed her shoulders into the stoop of premature old age, and roughened the hands that her dainty daughters looked upon with a kind of pitying contempt.

"Mamma never was intended for a lady," Eva remarked, confidentially, to her sister Bessie. "Only see how red and rough her hands are; and she wears a number five boot. I don't see, really, how you and I came to have such small feet and hands."

"Oh, we got those from papa's side of the house. You know what beautiful soft, white hands Aunt Jenny has."

"Yes, and well they may be. She never soiled them with waiting upon herself even."

Eva spoke rather scornfully, for she was really energetic, in her own way, and had little sympathy with idleness even in the much-admired paternal relative of whom her sister had reminded her.

"I think Aunt Jenny is perfectly splendid! The last time she was here we used to take such comfort sitting together up in her room, reading Mrs. Browning and Tennyson. Her voice is so sweet and flexible, and she has such a quick and delicate appreciation of what she reads. It is a perfect delight to listen to her."

Eva laughed.

"Did you hear Mr. Washburn asking mamma the other evening how she liked Bret Harte? I wanted to laugh, although I was frightened almost to death at the thought of her making him some ridiculous answer, for I didn't suppose that she had ever even heard of him; but—"

"How did she get out of the scrape?" interrupted the younger sister, with more force than elegance.

"Why, luckily, she had the good sense to acknowledge that she knew too little of his poems to be a competent judge of his merits. I believe I never was so grateful to her in my life as I was then."

"Very likely," laughed Bessie, with a shrug of her plump shoulders. "But, honestly now, Eva—" She hesitated and colored a little, pausing, as the sound of their mother's voice, giving directions to the laundress in an adjoining room, fell upon their ears.

"You must be more particular—as I've told you over and over again—especially with Mr. Ray's shirts and the girls' muslins and cambric skirts. I can't have them put off with a rub and a promise, if everything else is."

The tones were sharp, and considerably higher than the lady-like pitch that her well-bred daughters were always careful to confine themselves to; and Bessie, unmindful of the loving thoughtfulness that had prompted the rebuke that so jarred upon her delicately-trained senses, took up the thread of her remark with an angry petulance that was as unbecoming as it was uncalled for.

"I was about to say that it had always been a mystery to me, ever since I was old enough to reason about such things, that father made the choice that he did of a wife. I don't mean anything against mamma, of course," as she caught the startled look of disapproval upon her sister's face; "but their tastes and feelings are so different. Now papa is really intellectual, although he has so little time to cultivate his tastes in that direction; and he loves music and poetry; and I am sure everybody says that he is one of the most agreeable of men in society. Now you know that when he is at home an evening, nothing pleases him better than to hear us play and sing, or read to him. But mamma—why, only last evening, when I was reading that lovely poem of Poe's, 'The Bells,' aloud, when I came to those lines about the fire-bells—

"In a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire,
In a mad expostulation with the deaf and frantic fire,"

I was reading my very best, and I could see that papa was holding his very breath to hear me, when up jumps mamma, as if she had been shot, and rushes away to the kitchen as fast as her feet would carry her. It seems that she had left the range open, and my reading of the fire reminded her of it. That was all the profit or enjoyment that she found in such a splendid poem."

"Mamma is naturally domestic, and her family cares have prevented her giving much attention to other things, if she had wished it ever so much."

Eva spoke reprovingly, and there was a tiny under-thread of tenderness in her tone, the effect, perhaps, of some lingering filial affection that all her inborn and cherished selfishness had been unable to quite choke out.

Mr. Ray expressed neither surprise or regret when informed of his wife's determination to stay at home from the wedding party. For himself, it was simply his duty to act the part of cavalier to his gay young daughters; but his wife—why it was "just like her" to prefer to stay at home. For years, she had seemed to take little or no interest in anything outside of her own house and family. She had toiled, and saved, and planned, in their earlier and less prosperous days, to dress and educate her children—those same children who now, in the proud arrogance of a cultured womanhood, forgot those long years of childish dependence, that a mother's loving care had made so free and joyous; the days and weeks of sickness and pain that only her tender ministrations had made endurable, and were now, unconsciously, it may be, but none the less surely, strewing her downward path with those sharpest of all thorns, the cruel outgrowth of filial ingratitude.

The time had been short for the preparation of Eva's new dress, and although every available needle in the household had been pressed into her service by that energetic young lady, it was only by the mother's sitting at her sewing until near morning, the night before the party, that the elaborately-trimmed garment could be finished in time, of which service Eva's characteristic acknowledgment was something in this fashion:

"It was too bad, mamma, that you should have had to sit up so late to finish it. I would have kept you company, but I knew that if I sat up after eleven o'clock I should be as stupid as an owl the night of the party. It was so provoking in Miss McStitchet to disappoint us, and we've always been such good customers, too. I've a great mind to say that she never shall make another dress for me as long as I live."

That was all. Not a word of thanks, of loving acknowledgment for the wearying, toilsome service, not even a smile, a kiss, a gentle reminder that she should take a few hours for rest from the hum of busy preparation, that made her aching head beat and throb yet more wildly, while that strange, sharp pain in her side, that had troubled her so often of late, seemed at times like a dagger thrust to her very heart.

She made no complaint, and the young ladies were so completely engrossed in their preparations for the evening, that the tell-tale heaviness of her eyes, and the unnatural pallor of her worn and wearied face, entirely escaped their notice, until Bessie, tapping with dainty finger tips the half-opened petals of a rose in a glass of beautiful hothouse flowers, turned to her mother with: "I wish you would arrange our bouquets for us, mamma. You have the art of making a few flowers show to the best advantage. But—what's the matter?"

"I—I don't know. I think smelling that heliotrope must have made me faint. I feel strangely," and she put her hands to her head in a helpless, bewildered way, that awakened some feeling of sympathy in her daughter's heart.

"Oh, well, well! Let the flowers alone, we'll arrange them ourselves, and you'd best go and lie down awhile till your head feels better. How thoughtful it was in papa," turning to her sister, "to get these flowers for us; and they are so well selected, too. It isn't every man of his age that would have had the taste, even if he had thought of it, to make such a tasteful selection."

Eva nodded a cordial acquiescence, while the mother, dizzy and half-blinded by the pain in her throbbing temples, crept quietly away to the solitude and silence of her own chamber, where, with her face buried in her pillow, she strove to stifle the cries that this new and strange agony wrung from her white lips.

"This terrible pain at my heart," she murmured to herself, between the spasms of suffering, "grows worse and worse every time. My mother and grandmother died of heart disease, and—perhaps I shall go the same way."

After a time the spasms decreased in violence and frequency, until when the clock below rang out the hour of seven, and her husband's step—he was always punctual to a minute—sounded in the hall, she rose from her bed, weak and trembling, but free from pain, and leaning heavily upon the oaken balusters as she crept wearily down the stairs, made her way unobserved to the dining-room, to see that everything was in that perfect order that the delicate tastes of her husband and daughters required.

A little careful rearrangement of dishes, a spot on the tablecloth, overlooked by the careless servant, covered with a mat, a clean napkin to replace the soiled one in Eva's ring, and the supper-bell was rung, while Mrs. Ray sank into her chair, so exhausted that she scarcely noticed her husband's careless salutation, as, smiling proudly upon his handsome daughters, he escorted them into the dining-room with a merry affectation of gallantry, while in the gay gossip that accompanied and served as a relish to the simple tea and toast, she heard only a bewildering jumble of words, in which she had neither lot nor part, any more than the tea-urn itself; that simply added its mite to the comfort, while it was powerless to contribute to the amusement or entertainment of the lively group gathered about it.

She had grown so timid and shy of expressing an opinion, or asking a question even, so afraid of the half-concealed amusement and the unconcealed surprise that she had so often been obliged to face, that she had learned to look upon silence as her only shield against the unconsciously given heart-thrusts that were making life itself a weariness.

It was nine o'clock, and the last echo of their gay voices had died upon her ear as she stood alone in the silent hall. She had fastened the sheltering wraps more securely about Eva's white shoulders, had arranged the dainty opera-hood over Bessie's bright curls, had hunted up her husband's scarf for him at the last moment, and then, seized by an irresistible impulse, as her youngest daughter was about to cross the outer threshold, she caught her little gloved hand in both her own, and, drawing the girlish face toward her, kissed it fondly, once, twice, thrice, with such a quick, passionate vehemence that the girl looked perfectly amazed, as if half fearing that her mother had lost her senses.

"Be careful, mamma! You'll crush my roses if you kiss me so hard," she laughed, a little constrainedly. "I'm coming," in answer to her father's call. "Now, mamma, you'd better go to bed as soon as you can; you'll be yourself again after a good night's sleep," and she hurried down the steps, and in a moment more was lost in the darkness without to the tearful eyes that watched her from the half-open door.

The gas was lighted in the family sitting-room, revealing the little disorders that are always attendant upon a departure—a rumpled handkerchief and a pair of worn gloves dropped carelessly upon the floor, the evening paper unfolded upon the sofa, and the shawl that Eva had worn over her wrapper at supper lying across a chair-back.

Mechanically, Mrs. Ray replaced each article in its proper place, lingering with a half-sad, half-tender thoughtfulness over the gloves, as she examined the seams and lining.

"I will mend them before I go to bed," she said to herself. "He shall find them all ready for him in the morning." And drawing her work-basket to her side, she was about to begin her task, when from the torn lining there dropped a tiny spray of sweet-brier, crushed and faded, yet emitting a faint, soft perfume, whose well-remembered sweetness brought back, as in a dream, a troop of thick thronging memories, that lent to that grave, wrinkled face, for a moment, something of the flush and hopefulness of its long-past springtime.

The gloves fell unheeded upon her lap, and a strange mist floated before her eyes, shutting out the quiet, too quiet, room, with its familiar furniture, while from out the dimness familiar faces, half forgotten, but now strangely fresh and life-like, looked out at her with a weird, half-pitying significance, that sent a strange, wild thrill to her aching heart.

That bright-faced, clear-eyed girl, shyly proud of the love that promised henceforth to make her life one long dream of trustful happiness—blushing, through happy tears, at the ardent protestations of her gallant young lover, as, playfully claiming the spray of sweet-brier that she wore in her bosom, he placed it next his own heart, the pledge and sign of their betrothal. Could it be that? And involuntarily her trembling fingers wandered slowly over the worn, sharp face, from which toil and care had chased all the hopefulness and bloom of other days.

What long, long years of patient, ceaseless toil had been hers since then; and yet—a smile of tender significance, one of those smiles that mothers alone can interpret, stole over her faded lips, as she thought—oh, how tenderly!—of the tiny nestlings that had been so joyously welcomed and so lovingly cherished in the innermost temple, the holy of holies, of her fond motherly heart; the bright, studious school-girls for whom she had toiled, early and late, feeling herself more than repaid by a merit mark or note of commendation from their teachers; of the handsome, high-bred "young ladies," who, in their conscious superiority of mind and manners, now treated her with much the same air of good-natured tolerance that they would have felt it necessary to bestow upon a faithful old family servant that had worn herself out in their service.

And it had come to this! Her love for her children had been stronger than her love of mental culture, and for that those children themselves despised her.

"That sweet-brier bush grew close to the wormwood," she whispered, with a smile, at once bitter and pitiful. "But, God grant," and her face drooped wearily upon her folded hands, "that death may give me back the sweet sweet-brier of my youth once more."

It was late that night when Mr. Ray and his daughters found themselves standing upon the threshold of their own home, and the lively badinage that passed between them as they removed their outer wrappings in the hall below, sounded strangely in the otherwise silent and deserted house.

"Biddy asked leave to go home to-night, and I suppose mamma was too much excited with seeing us off to remember to turn down the gas," remarked Eva, as in passing the door of the sitting-room she caught a glimmer of light through the keyhole, and she opened the door with a half shudder as the cool air of the hall struck upon her thinly-clad neck and arms. "Why, mamma has been sitting up for us till this late hour! Are you asleep?" and she glanced wonderingly at the silent figure with its bowed face, that neither moved nor spoke at their approach.

"Mamma!" called Bessie, in her clear, girlish voice. "Come, do wake up and say something! It always makes me nervous," she began, when, with a sudden cry that checked the words upon his daughter's lips, Mr. Ray sprang to his wife's side, and as he lifted the white, rigid face into the full glare of the light, a moan of bitter, bitter anguish escaped from his quivering lips, while with too late tenderness he smoothed back the scanty hair, pressing remorseful kisses upon the cold, calm forehead of the dead.

"Too late! too late! Would God I could re-live the past!"

They buried her with all the show and ceremony that modern funeral etiquette demands—costly wreaths, crosses and delicate trailing vines, made fragrant and beautiful her last resting-place; but in the thin, pale hands, folded idly at last over the now peaceful heart, was a single spray only of sweet-brier.

"Papa would have it so," whispered Eva, in tearful confidence, to a friend. "Now I think it would have been in better taste to have arranged a few of those beautiful white lilies with geranium leaves to put in her hands. They would have partially covered her hands, you know, and unless any one has remarkably pretty hands, I think it's best to make them as little conspicuous as possible."

AUNT TABITHA'S MISTAKE.

BY MISS L. E. BAKER.

"YOU want to know how I came to get married, do ye, Clinthy Ann, and settled down into such a dog-trot kind of life as this? Well, child, if it'll be any warning to you," here Aunt Tabitha's eye lighted upon Christopher, in one corner of the great old-fashioned kitchen, busily engaged in one of those mysterious inventions of boyhood which are always to be something, but seldom arrive at that desirable consummation. "Now, 'Tophar," which was her familiar contraction of her son's more venerable title, "you just leave that whittling and go help your brothers. Why can't ye be smart, now, and leave the loafing to them that's older?" Which was as near as the good old soul could ever get to warning her boys not to follow in the footsteps of their lazy, shiftless, good-for-nothing father.

Not that Tobias Short was at all dissipated, only supremely selfish and lazy, and fond of loafing around the stores, and driving sharp little bargains with whoever he could beguile into trading with him, or lying in wait about his own doorsteps, and pouncing out, like some lean, rapacious old spider, upon any passer-by to whom there was the slightest prospect of his being able to pass off the skinny, raw-boned animals which filled his barn, and that only departed to make room for others like themselves which he could pick up for a trifle, and dispose of for twice the value of good animals.

It was strange that he could find people to trade with him under these circumstances, but somehow he generally did. So he flattered himself that he was a useful member of the family, while the money he made in these ways always stayed in his own pocket, and his poor, hard-working wife maintained the family.

Christopher finally disposed of, Aunt Tabitha resumed: "As I was going to tell ye, I never would have told you (or anybody else) a word about it, if you wasn't my own sister's child, and p'r'aps it may save you from jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire, as I did.

"I was a-keeping school over to Hard Sorabble the summer I met Tobias Short. I had had to punish Job Skinner's boy (and a dreadful bad boy he was, too,) for something, I misremember what, and Job, he was as quick-tempered as a flash, what should he do but prosecute me for it. Tobias was sheriff then, and came for me to go to court, arrested me I s'pose you'd say, but it was all as pleasant as could be, and he just invited me to get into his nice spring wagen and ride down with him, and so I did.

"Well, you see, I hadn't any money to spend on lawyers, for seven an' six a week was considered a good price in them days for school-marm's; but what with helping father on the farm, and paying your Aunt Tribulation's doctor's bills—she was a'most always ailing—there wasn't much left. So what should I do but plead my own case, an' the judge, who looked like a clever old soul, gave me the case.

"Then on the way home what should Sheriff Short do but propose to me, that he hadn't seen a week afore. An', ye see, I was that tired of keeping school, an' boarding 'round, an' all its homelessness and ingratitude and cold-heartedness, that after a minute, to get over the shock like, I said yes.

"I didn't pretend to love him then, Clinthy Ann, an' he didn't ask me to, for, ye see, he was only driving a bargain of a little different sort from his usual trades, an' didn't consider it anything but a transaction any how.

"I had had my own little love dream—as girls generally do before they get to be as old as I was—I was twenty-five that summer—an' I had buried it, an' that was the end of that.

"I won't deny that the prospect wasn't of the sunniest to me even then, but it was better than keeping school an' boarding 'round, an' so I shed a few tears in dark corners, when I couldn't help 'em, an' Tobias kept company with me a while for form's sake, an' then we were married.

"But I very soon found that I hadn't buttered my bread. for Tobias had a little farm, an' he always left me with the heft of the work to do, an' the harvesting or what not a spoiling in the field, while he was off trafficking.

"But still it wasn't school-keeping, an' so I kept on an' made his home bright an' cheery an' comfortable for him, an' always had a hot supper an' nice fire for him when he'd come home at night, even if I had had to split up the wood for the very fire he warmed himself by.

"After a while Tobias's old father came to live with us, an' I made him welcome, an' tried to humor his whims as best I could; but he was a terribly fractious old man, an' nothing I could do would suit him, an' things got more an' more uncomfortable every day.

"Our family kept growing larger an' more expensive, too, all the time, for I'd hardly get one baby fairly out of my arms before another would come to take its place. But I loved the little fellows, so reasy and rugged, an' never saw the time when I could have spared any one of 'em. An' their father was proud of 'em, too, they were so smart an' bright, an' would say when a new baby boy was put into his arms: 'Well, there's plenty of work in the world for him to do; good as a hundred dollars in bank, Tabitha.' An' I knew he meant there's another one to work for me.

"But though I loved my boys, my heart yearned for a little daughter, because she would seem so much more mine than those strong, stalwart, strapping boys who were so brimful of animal life that I doubt if they ever noticed how their loud voices an' hearty ways made my aching nerves tingle, for hard work, an' constant at it, had made me whimsical an' nervous.

"Well, at last the little one my hungry heart had longed for, came.

"But when old Nurse Gracie took up the little thing, an' put it into Tobias's arms, as he stood by my side, an' said: 'As putty a little girl as ever ye see, Mister Short,' I saw a frown come over his face, an' I knew my little daughter wasn't welcome.

"I tell ye, Clinthy Ann, it hurt me sore, for I hadn't a thought, a minute afore, but that he'd have been as glad as I was.

"It really seemed as that my baby grew older that it knew it wasn't wanted by anybody but me, an' Tobias couldn't coax it out of my arms. It clung an' clung to me in the most piteous way, an' didn't want me to leave it alone a minute, an' when I put it down on the floor, or in the rocking-chair, while I went about my work, it would just follow me with its great, wistful, yearning, blue eyes, an' never seemed to care to play at all.

"The boys, dear fellows, were wild over their little sister, an' she would submit to their rough ways, an' seemed to realise as much as any queen on her throne that they were her most loyal an' devoted subjects.

"But by an' by, Clinthy Ann," and Aunt Tabitha's tears were falling like rain, yet her peaceful, placid old face was undisturbed, "there came a time that is hard to tell ye of; only in the morning my little angel child was as well as usual, an' at night she was in her shroud. But before she died that sad, grieved look went out of her eyes forever, an' I don't believe that in that other Home she'll ever feel that she wasn't welcome.

"But I hadn't much time to weep for her, if I would, for, one by one, every one of my eight boys came down with the croup, as she had done, but they all fought it through, an' when they were all staving about again I was ready to lie down by baby Nell's side. But Tobias an' the boys couldn't spare me, an' so I dragged on.

"The summer after baby died Gran'ther Short was taken down. An', child, I hope you never'll know what it was to me to take care of that old man, an' he in one continual fret an' scold from morning until night. Sometimes I wouldn't get to bed from waiting on him until one or two o'clock in the morning. An' I never knew Tobias to carry him so much as a cup of cold water.

"Just before gran'ther died, he said to me one day: 'Well, Tabitha, ye've done as well as ye could.' An', child, if ye will believe it, no starving soul was ever so thankful for a crust of bread as I was for even that faint praise.

"At length, what with the sickness an' expense an' all, the farm couldn't maintain us, an' then Tobias wanted to be even more at liberty, so we sold it, an' came down here to the Corners, an' opened this tavern stand with only me to do all the work in-doors. An' nobody knows how I have worked, early an' late, to keep things respectable and make both ends of the year meet.

"But, then, I don't mean to blame Tobias, for, you see, it's his nature, an' I don't know as he fret's an' worries about house any more than a good many other men. I've tried to be a true wife to him, an' done the best I could.

"The hardest of it all was, Clinthy Ann," and Aunt Tabitha's voice sank almost to a whisper, "after we moved down here to the tavern, who should come along one day but Paul Blytherbee, the man I had cared most for in my girlhood. He had come all the way from California to hunt me up, an' it seemed he had written me again and again, but his letters were always lost. He had been comforting himself all these years that I loved him well enough to wait for him; an', Clinthy Ann, I thought he didn't care for me because he never said a word to me before he went, an' because I never heard from him afterward.

"An' when he recognised me here, notwithstanding I had grown so worn an' old with all the hard work an' trouble, p'raps I ought not to have listened while he told me all that, but I knew then that for all I was Tobias Short's lawful wife, my heart would go hungry to my grave.

"Oh, Clinthy Ann, there's harder ways in the world than keeping school, an' sadder things than being an old maid. An' let me warn ye now, don't ye ever marry for the sake of an establishment, or to get out of any honest business Providence has put you into. That's my advice." And Aunt Tabitha having knit into the middle of her needle, did up the coarse blue sock she was knitting, and got up to go and get tea for those eight great boys, her husband, and herself, and sixteen boarders, while I, Clinthy Ann Merrill, her niece, ran home to meditate on Aunt Tabitha's Mistake.

GRANDMOTHER'S RECOLLECTIONS.

WHAT! "a burden to us!" and you wish 'twould please the Lord to take you now you can't work! For shame, Mury, you ha'n't no right to speak so. A young thing like you to lose heart so soon. I know a fever do leave a body a poor creature for a long time, but, please God, we'll have you at service again in a few months. And if not, why depend on't you'll be wanted for something, even if you ben't able to work. I'll tell ye something I recollect of the time I was a girl. I was seventeen or so when my brother married Bessie Snow. Right glad was I about it, for thinks I, "when she live near (and there warn't a stone's throw between the two houses) we can spend a good deal o' time together over our spinning-wheels." Folks spent a heap o' time spinning in those days. That is how I came to be living at home instead of going out to service. But my mother—that's your great-grandmother, Mary, that is dead these fifty years ago—my mother warn't so glad of Will's marriage as I was. Not that she warn't fond of Bessie—every one was, for she was the sweetest-dispositioned girl—but she thought her a poor ailing thing to be a laboring man's wife. It ain't no easy life, a woman's as have to keep the house straight on eight-hillings a week, and that were all what the men earn't in those days in the East country village where I lived, though to be sure many things was cheaper then than now.

Howsoever, Will he loved Bessie, and the end of it was they took each other "for better, for worse, in sickness and in heal'h," and right happy they were for awhile. But 'that spring was a wonderful late cold one, and Bessie she just wasted away. She wouldn't see no doctor, for I think she was afraid to hear as how she were right in what she dreaded. At last mother made her go with her and ask. I warn't in when she came back, but when I did come in I saw mother had been crying. Then she told me as how the doctor said it was too late to do her any good; she was in a decline, and he did not think she'd live till next winter.

Well, 'twas a hard time as came after that. Bessie couldn't nohow make up her mind to leave Will and all of us. Sometimes she'd fare in high spirits like, and talk of what she'd do next year, and make believe as how it warn't true, and she were going to get well again. But she knowed it was true, all the same, and when she caught sight of mother's sad face, she'd burst into tears all on a sudden, and say: "Oh, mother, don't ye look so, I arn't agoing; I can't go. The Lord would never take me away from Will so soon for certain. And than I'm so feared. I ha'n't got not none o' them feelings as good folks have afore they die." Then my mother would try to comfort her: "Now hush, my dear" (I never heard no one that fared to mean so much as mother did by that little word dear). "Hush ye! ye believe I love ye, don't ye? and that I wouldn't do nothin' to hurt ye, not if 'twas ever so? Then can't ye believe the same of the Lord on high? He love ye better than I do. I ar'n't a mite afeared but what He'll take care of ye." Still, all mother said did not seem to do no good, not to last. Bessie was so fearful. She was a right humble girl, and I think she was afraid that even if the Lord did take her to Heaven she'd hardly be happy there, for she wouldn't be good enough to fit her place. She'd be so strange there, she thought, and she clung to us all—the timid, gentle-spirited thing—as if she could not bear to leave us.

Still her cough grew worse, and she wasted wonderful, and got too weak to muddle about the work of the house. Mother or I used to wash and do for her, while she sat and watched us, sometimes, as I've told you, very low in her spirits, sometimes laughing as if she had forgot all about her trouble. I never liked to hear that laugh, though. It sounded kind o' make-believe, not a real merry one.

One morning I woke later than usual, and found mother had gone out without waking me and the children. I got their breakfast quick as ever I could, and went into Will's to look for mother. She was there, down-stairs, with something wrapped in her shawl. She smiled when I went in, but with the tears in her eyes. Then she turned back the corner of her shawl, and showed me the face of a sleeping baby—such a little mite it was! "Bessie's little daughter," says she. You may think how I were pleased, and what a little beauty I thought it.

"Bessie's right pleased," mother went on. "Poor dear, that have come quite like a surprise to her. She said when first I showed her the little dear: 'Mother,' says she, 'I never thought I'd live to see my baby's face.' But I'm feared there's trouble coming. The child don't seem to have no strength to cry out loud like other babies, and if that's taken Bessie will take on sadly."

For two days the little wailing cry was heard in the house. Then it was silent again. The little babe went off so quiet I thought it were asleep when mother laid it down in the cot, till she said: "Poor little soul! That's better off where 'tis, for this is a hard world, and if, please God, we had reared it, that must ha' been a great sufferer."

Presently we heard Bessie's cough up-stairs (she had been asleep till now), and she called: "Mother, won't you bring baby up here? I want to have her lie by my side."

Mother went up-stairs, and I crept up after her, and sat down on the top step.

"Ha'n't ye brought her?" said Bessie, when she saw mother's arms were empty.

"My dear," said mother, "baby's safer and better off than she'd be lying by your side. And now, dear, you maun't fret. The lord have taken her to a better place than this." I could not see Bessie's face from where I was. I heard her give one start, and then she lay quite still. After a bit mother went on: "I wish you could ha' seen how quiet and peaceful she went. She warn't afraid to go to her Heavenly Father."

Then Bessie spoke, but so low I could hardly hear her.

"Yes, it's best so. It would ha' been dreadful hard to leave her here without a mother. I know what that is." (Bessie's parents had died when she was a baby, and she had been brought up by the Union. Perhaps that was why she clung so to mother.) "You'd ha' been kind to her, I know," she went on, "but she'd ha' had no own mother." She ended with a burst of tears, and, "Oh, baby, I'd ha' liked to see you again!"

Mother warn't one of those who put the thought of death out of sight, and are afraid to speak of it, so she just kissed Bessie, and said: "You will see her again soon, please God, and then, by and by, we'll join you, and be all together again."

From that time Bessie never shrank from the thought of dying. How could she be afraid to follow where her little one was gone? Heaven warn't the strange place now that she had been used to think it. She knew how much she loved her little child, and could guess from that how much God loved her. Sometimes she'd be downcast and unhappy for a bit, thinking how bad she was, and how she did not love God as she ought to; but these unhappy times never lasted long. While they did last, nought did her good like father's singing. Mary, my dear, learning's a fine thing, I'd be the last to deny that. But there's a finer thing still, and that is a loving heart, that's ready to use whatever it has for the good of other folk. Father warn't no scholar, for there warn't no such schools in his young days as there be now; but he was a real religious man, for all he couldn't read his Bible, and a sore trouble it was to him that he couldn't. Still he had a good remembrance, and being regular at his chapel, where they read the hymns out by two lines at a time, he knew a many of them by heart. And he used to sit by Bessie's bed and sing to her. My dear, if every one as have a deal of learning would make anything nigh as good a use of it as father did of his one little bit, the world would be a deal more like what it ought to be.

We followed Bessie to the grave less than two months after her little one died. I remember mother saying, when we came back from the funeral: "I do think the Lord sent that baby o' purpose to make Bessie's going easy to her, blessed little angel that it was. That fared to make Heaven so home-like to her. You wouldn't think that a little senseless babe as didn't live two days could ha' done much good; but that did what none of us could do. I don't suppose any one in this whole world could ha' done for its mother what that little babe did."

Well, Mary, that's the end of my story. Maybe ye see by this time what I told it ye for. Sometimes I'm like you, I'm feared I may live to be a burden to ye all. Nay, I know what ye want to say; but if ye are fond o' me, that don't prevent your father being a poor man, with a lot o' mouths to fill, all out of his wages. And your mother's a busy woman, too, without having to wait of me if I should live to be bed-ridden. But when I think of that baby, and what a blessing its little life was, I fancy there's other things to do for our Father besides working, either with hands or head. I don't doubt but what He'll take me away as soon as ever He have nothing left for me to do here. You are young, Mary, and I hope and think you'll get over this fever soon, and be right strong again; but if not, just you remember grandmother's story, and don't wish your life away, for its a great gift, and, depend on't, God has a reason for letting ye keep it.

Let not thy table exceed the fourth part of thy income: see thy provisions be solid and not far-fetched—fuller of substance than art; be wisely frugal in thy preparation, and freely cheerful in thy entertainment; too much is vanity; enough, a feast.

A PARISHAN lady recently called on her milliner to inquire the character of a servant. The morality of the latter was beyond questioning. "But is she honest?" asked the lady. "I am not so certain of that," replied the milliner: "I have sent her to you with my bill a dozen times, and she has never yet given me the money."

SCIENCE AND NATURAL HISTORY.

"IN THE BEGINNING."

SECOND PAPER.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

THIS paper will treat of the Secondary Epoch in the Creation of the World, if a gradual growth can be strictly called a creation. Geologists have agreed to divide the secondary epoch into three periods, which they call the Triassic, the Jurassic, and the Cretaceous.

Animal life appears modified and developed in this epoch. In the Primary epoch life seemed confined almost entirely to the water, and took the form of Crustaceae, and lower orders of fishes. But, as that epoch gave place to the succeeding one, new forms appeared. Reptiles seemed especially the feature of this period of time. The Trilobites had disappeared, and for the first time a Turtle was found in the bosom of the sea and on the borders of the lakes. The cryptogamic plants were less numerous, and the Conifers more extensive.

In the variegated sandstone formations are found traces of this epoch. This formation is found in great abundance in Germany, and more or less throughout Europe. It covers vast surfaces in the mountainous regions of Bolivia, in South America, and is found also in certain districts of North America. This sandstone is excellent for building purposes. The cathedrals of Strasbourg and Fribourg are built of it, and it seems peculiarly adapted to their style of architecture. Whole cities in Germany are constructed from material drawn from its quarries.

The seas of the Triassic period, judging from the shells which remain to us from this period, contained great varieties of mollusca, twelve different genera of Saurian reptiles, turtles, and six new genera of fishes protected by a cuirass. Traces of gigantic reptiles have been found, one of which is called the Chirotherium, or Labyrinthodon, from the complicated arrangement of its teeth. Another reptile of great dimensions was the Nothosaurus, a species of marine Crocodile.

It has been a question, from certain footprints which are found in great numbers on the rocks in the neighborhood of the Connecticut river, whether enormous birds like the ostrich did not exist at this period; but, as no skeletons of birds have been found, the general opinion among geologists is that these tracks must have been those of some other creature.

Ferns attaining to the height of trees grew in greater variety than in the previous period, and on the rocks underneath them crept huge reptiles, unlike anything which now exists.

"The footprints of the reptilian animals of this period," says Figuier, "prove that they walked over moist surfaces; and, if these surfaces had been simply left by the retreating tide, they would generally have been obliterated by the returning flood, in the same manner that is seen every day on our own sandy shores. It seems more likely that the surfaces on which fossil footprints are now found, were left bare by the summer evaporation of a lake; that these surfaces were afterward dried by the sun, and the footprints hardened, so as to ensure their preservation before the rising waters, brought by flooded muddy rivers, again submerged the low, flat shores, and deposited new layers of salt, just as they do at the present day round the Dead Sea and the Salt Lake of Utah."

The geological formation of the Triassic period consists of layers of variegated sandstone, alternating with red marl, while, as subordinate rocks, are found deposits of a poor pyritic coal and of gypsum. Saliferous beds, twenty to forty-five feet thick, alternate with clay deposits, the whole sometimes attaining a thickness of nearly five hundred feet.

At Württemberg, in Germany, and in several places in France, the rock-salt of the saliferous formation is an important branch of industry. Some of the deposits of the Triassic age, we are told, are at great depth, and can only be worked by excavating shafts and galleries.

The red color of the new Red Sandstones and marls is caused by peroxide of iron. Professor Ramsay considers that all the red-colored strata of England, including the Peruvian, old Red Sandstone, and even the old Cambrian formation, were deposited in lakes or inland waters. The remains of land-plants, and the peculiarities of some of the reptiles, found in this strata, seem to confirm Professor Ramsay's opinion.

There were at this period few islands or mountains. There were large lakes or inland seas, with flat and uniform banks.

Lecoq says, in his "Botanical Geography:" "During this long period the earth preserved its primitive vegetation; new forms are slowly introduced, and they multiply slowly. But, if our present types of vegetation are deficient in these distant epochs, we ought to recognize also that the plants which in our days represent the vegetation of the primitive world are often shorn of their grandeur. Our Equisetaceae and Lycopodiaceae are but poor representations of the Lepidodendrons; the Calamites and Asterophyllites had already run their race before the epoch of which we write."

The earliest trace of a mammal which has been found in the secondary rocks, is a molar tooth of a small predaceous animal of the Microlestis family, whose nearest living representative appears to be the Kangaroo rat. This fossil tooth was found in some gray marl in England.

One of the last formations of the Triassic period are certain beds of white and cream-colored limestone, known to geologists and quarrymen under the name of "White Lias." Some specimens of this stone, when broken at right angles to its bedding, present curious dendritic markings, bearing a singular resemblance to a landscape, with trees and water.

The second division of the Secondary Epoch is called the Jurassic period, receiving its name from the Jura mountains, that range being composed of rocks deposited in the seas of that period. The Jurassic period is subdivided into two sub-periods, known as the Lias and the Oolite.

The Lias is an English provincial name given to an argillaceous limestone, which, with marl and clay, forms the base of the Jurassic formation. Zoophytes, Molluscs, and fishes of a peculiar organisation, and reptiles of an extraordinary size and structure are found in the Lias-clay. Cuvier exclaimed, when the drawings of the Plesiosaurus were sent him, "Truly, this is altogether the most monstrous animal that has yet been dug out of the ruins of a former world!"

The Plesiosaurus belongs, as its name indicates, to the lizard family. A description of this animal reads as follows: "The Plesiosaurus was a marine, air-breathing, carnivorous reptile, combining the characters of the head of a lizard, the teeth of a crocodile, a neck of excessive length, resembling that of a swan, the ribs of a chameleon, a body of moderate size, a very short tail, and, finally, four paddles, like those of a whale. Its enormous long neck comprises a greater number of vertebrae than the neck of either the camel, the giraffe, or even the swan. The body is cylindrical and rounded, like that of the great marine turtles. It was, doubtless, naked, i. e., not protected with the scales or carapace with which some authors have invested it, for no traces of such coverings have been found near any of the skeletons which have been hitherto discovered."

In England, in the quarries of Lyme Regis, have been found numerous remains of the Ichthyosauri, another marine monster of ancient times.

We are told that "in 1811 a country girl, who made her precarious living by picking up fossils, for which the neighborhood was famous, was pursuing her avocation, hammer in hand, when she perceived some bones projecting a little out of the cliff." These bones, when they were carefully excavated, proved to be those of "a monster some thirty feet long, with jaws nearly a fathom in length, and huge saucer-eyes, which have since been found so perfect that the petrified lenses have been split off and used as magnifiers."

This was the complete skeleton of an Ichthyosaurus. These dragons of the sea had jaws eight feet in length, and one hundred and sixty teeth. Whenever a tooth was lost in the monster's head by contests with other animals, or in any other manner, nature soon replaced it; for, at the inner side of the base of every old tooth there is the bony germ of a new one. The eyes of this monster were larger than those of any animal now living, their size frequently exceeding that of the human head, and were an optical apparatus of wonderful power and singular perfection, capable of performing the office of microscope and telescope at pleasure. Its food was fish and smaller individuals of its own race, which it swallowed without masticating. It was essentially voracious and destructive.

The Pterodactyle was a still more wonderful creature of this period. In size and general form, and in the character of its wings, this genus resembled our modern bats and vampires, but it had a beak elongated like the bill of a woodcock, and armed with teeth like the snout of a crocodile; its vertebrae, ribs, pelvis, legs and feet resembled those of a lizard, while it was probably covered with naked skin. "It was, in short," says a writer, "a monster resembling nothing that has ever been heard of upon earth except the dragons of romance and heraldry."

"With flocks of such like creatures flying in the air, and shoals of Ichthyosauri and Plesiosauri swarming in the ocean, and gigantic crocodiles and tortoises crawling on the shores of primeval lakes and rivers—air, sea and land must have been strangely tenanted in these early periods of our infant world."

The vegetation of the Jurassic period was peculiarly rich and abundant. The tree-ferns of the Carboniferous period had lost their enormous dimensions, but were still beautiful in form. The Cycade now appeared for the first time, and seem to be forerunners of the Palms, which appeared in the next epoch.

In the next, or Oolitic sub-period, mammals began to make frequent appearances. Hitherto they had been limited to a single species. These early mammals exhibited the peculiar characteristic of the kangaroo and the opossum, in that the young were transferred in a half-developed state to an external pouch upon the abdomen of the mother, and there remained until they became perfected.

During the Oolitic period, Bees, Butterflies and Dragonflies appear on the earth for the first time.

The Ceteosaurus, the bones of which have been discovered in England, was a species of Crocodile, and probably the largest creature that ever walked upon the earth.

We are told by a modern writer that "a full-grown Ceteosaurus must have been at least fifty feet long, ten feet high, and of proportionate bulk. In its habits it was probably a marsh-loving or riverside animal," and was not apparently carnivorous, which was certainly a great blessing to the smaller animals with which it was surrounded.

The Ramphorychus was a creature similar to the Pterodactyle, already described, except that it had a very long tail.

The Telosaurus was another formidable-looking reptile, about thirty feet in length, resembling a crocodile, and coated with a cuirass both on the back and belly.

Corals appear in great abundance during this epoch.

In the last formation of the Jurassic period, we notice the first bird. The remains of a bird, with feet and feathers, having been discovered, but without a head.

The name Cretaceous (from creta, chalk) is given to the third division of the Secondary Epoch, because the rocks deposited by the sea are almost entirely chalky in their character. This is not the first appearance of carbonate of lime, however. It is discovered in the Silurian period, and in the Jurassic formation; but the accumulations are vaster during the Cretaceous period than during any other. The limestone formations are composed of the shells of innumerable Zoophytes and Mollusca, most of them microscopic in size, which existed at this period. Chalk, placed under the microscope, will attest to the truth of this, showing it to be composed of the most wonderful shells of minute size. The strata of chalk, where thickest, are from 1,000 to 1,200 feet in thickness. Let any one compute, if he can, the number of microscopic creatures which must have existed and perished to form these vast deposits.

In the basin of the Baltic Sea may still be observed the phenomena taking place, which specially distinguished the Cretaceous period. The bed and coast-line of that inland sea are slowly encroaching upon the water by the constant deposit of calcareous shells, so that in time the sea is certain to be filled with these deposits.

Palms appear for the first time, some of them differing little from those of our own period. Ferns and Cycads lose their importance in numbers and size; traces of the alder, the wych-elm, the maple, and other trees known to us, are discovered.

The seasons are no longer marked by indications of central heat; zones of latitude already show signs of their existence. The pike, salmon and dory tribes lived in the seas of this period, and became the prey of the sharks and dog-fish. There were still huge reptiles and curious fishes—some of the former exceedingly predacious in their habits. The Ichthyosauri and the Plesiosauri became extinct toward the close of the Cretaceous period, giving place to the Monasaurus, a monster who was, by all accounts, the tyrant of the seas.

We find in this age the Hylæosaurus, or great lizard of the woods, a reptile from twenty to thirty feet in length. The Megalosaurus was another reptile, sixty or seventy feet long, with teeth partaking of the natures of a knife, sabre and saw. The Iguanodon was larger still than the Megalosaurus, and had upon its muzzle or snout a hard, bony protuberance. The bone of this reptile's thigh surpassed that of the elephant in size, while the form of its feet show that it was intended to walk upon the ground. It was herbivorous in its habits.

The landscapes at the close of the Secondary Epoch did not differ greatly from those of the present day, except that there was a tropical luxuriance of vegetation and an absence of mountains; and huge, strange monsters wandered about under the trees, flew in the air, or beat the waters of the seas and lakes.

HOME-LIFE AND CHARACTER.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSEY POTTS.

No. X.

SOMETIMES one or two members of a family prefer potatoes baked instead of boiled; I know it is that way in our family, Granny and the deacon like theirs boiled whole, while Bub and the girls and myself prefer ours baked. I've hit on a plan, and that is to put all on to boil together, and when they are about half done I slip ours into the hot oven and we have nice baked ones.

This economizes time, saves a very hot fire, and facilitates the job.

I felt a little touch of pride this morning, as I listened to a rambling conversation carried on between two of my neighbors, both good common-sense farmers. They were talking about women. First sentence I heard that caught my attention was: "I tell you now, Jabes, I don't believe there is such a thing as a genuine American woman being lazy. I never saw one in my life. They are all nerve and ambition, and they are constantly working beyond their strength. Seems as if they couldn't help it. It is no uncommon thing for a woman to do two good day's work in one. I've seen my poor wife wash and bake in the forenoon, and then churn and iron in the afternoon, besides cooking three meals a day, and doing the other little chores. Very frequently though, she wouldn't be able to do anything the next day. I think it is a crime and a very grave one, especially for a mother. She lays such a tax on the physical resources that one night's sleep does not rest her, she cannot recuperate what she has lost, does not pay back as much as she so recklessly borrows, and this is the reason that our active women so soon become pale and thin of flesh, and their beautiful figures grow so angular and unlovely."

"If they didn't make a practice of it day after day," said the other neighbor, "it wouldn't be so bad, but they will persist in it, and sometimes it is to gratify the silliest whims and ambitions that ever found lodgment in a woman's breast.

"Now, there was my wife—she took it into her head to paper the three rooms up-stairs. I offered to help her, if she'd wait until I got the hay in, but she said she'd rather do it now while she was feeling real well; then I offered to get Jack Miller to do it; but she insisted, and said it would save a little, and she would work at it leisurely, and all that, and I gave up. She put it right through within three days, and that woman's never looked like herself since. She is feeble and tired all the time, and her eyes are sunken and her lips white, and she's no appetite. I declare sometimes I've a mind to tie her. It does trouble me so to have her work so hard and so unreasonably. I wish women would learn to take care of themselves. I tell you it sticks with me to hear so much about the rosy, robust English women who grow more beautiful as they grow ripier in years; and then just think what our wide-awake, energetic American women are and what they might be. They might be just as beautiful in mid-life as they pleased; they might be the most attractive women on the face of the earth, if their beauty did not fade, and fall behind their wit and vivacity, and charming freedom and ease of manner. Now, our women are naturally so sprightly and full of fun, so prepossessing in all their pretty talk and pretty ways, so ready in all their replies, knowing just what to say and do, and when and where to say it. We men would lose our hearts many a time if the women we met were as attractive in person as they are in mind. But so often when they break physically, they become repulsive, sallow, and sunken-eyed and nervous, and the sweetness in the voice changes to a coarse croak, or has a masculine hoarseness in it that repels. Now, I never would be attracted to an English woman as I would to an American. Foreign women don't have that trust and confidence in us that our native-born women have. They seem to doubt us, or stand in awe of us, while an American woman will, with the most child-like trust, step up to you in a strange depot, and perhaps lay her hand upon your arm, and look you right in the eyes trustfully, and say: 'Will you be so kind as to show me where the ticket office is?' or, 'Will you please direct me so-and-so?' and then she thanks you so cordially and gracefully and frankly, just as though it was impossible for you to be any other than the best fellow in the world."

And there I, Pipsey Potts, sat and heard all this, and I'm not a bit ashamed to say that I had hard work to check my tears and dry my eyes long enough to say, when the men rose to go out of the hall where we were sitting, "I've heard every word you men have spoken, and in behalf of the sisterhood I must thank you for your good opinion of American women. Your words have filled my heart full of gratitude and good will, and I do most sincerely thank you both, in the name of all the women in the United States of America. With such blessed words of good cheer we women ought to grow better and better as we grow older, even if we do grow uglier in our poor, tired, faded faces. Our souls ought to grow very beautiful under the sweet summery shine and shower of such warm words, such an exalted and heart-felt expression of praise."

The poor, abashed men! they were perfectly bewildered and surprised. They thrust their hands into their pockets, and then they loosened their collars, and smoothed their hats the wrong way, and threaded their fingers through their beards, and were as embarrassed as a couple of school-boys.

I left that hall not at all a baffled eavesdropper, but happier and with gladder and broader views, on one theme at least, than I had when I entered it. Bless the two good men! long may they live, and long may their appreciative wives walk beside them, crowned with all the graces of an exalted womanhood.

I have always been more or less troubled about our Sunday dinners. I do hate to come home tired, at two o'clock, and find the fire out, or nearly so, and all the Potts family as hungry as myself. It is not hard to prepare a Sunday dinner at this season of the year. I will tell you what we had the last time.

Saturday I baked a dish of sweet apples, and some pumpkin pies, and a pan of meat and beans, the latter for father and Granny.

Did I ever tell you how I bake beans? Friday evening I pick over a quart of small white beans, and put them to soak in cold water. The next day, when the stove is not in use, I put them on in cold water, and put a piece of pickled side-meat down in the centre of the pot. When the beans are almost done I take all out into a deep earthen dish or a sheet-iron pan and put in the oven, allowing the piece of pork-rind, side up, to stick above the beans a little ways. I cut it in gashes with a sharp knife and sprinkle pepper over. It will be baked enough in an hour. If they are likely to be too dry, add boiling water.

For people who have once endured the hardships of pioneer life this is the nicest dinner you can place before them.

Poor souls! the memories and the habits of their early days of want and poverty, never leave them. These olden memories seem to give a relish to this wholesome dish that we of later days know nothing about. I always set the beans in the oven on Sunday as soon as I get the fire started.

Then we had a boiled rice pudding, eaten cold with sweetened cream, and some soft boiled eggs, and bread and butter and coffee. Sometimes I cook tomatoes the day before, all ready for the table—they can be warmed in the oven or in a spider in a few minutes. If I don't have baked pork and beans I make instead a beefsteak pie. I cover the bottom and sides of a deep pan or brown earthen dish with good pie-paste. Cut the fresh beef, raw and tender, in little pieces, spread them evenly over the bottom, scatter on a few little bits of butter, that you have rolled in flour, and add a sprinkle of pepper, salt and flour, then cut some little strips of dough and lay all over it until it is quite covered. Then put on again small pieces of the beefsteak all over it, then the bits of butter, and so on, as before, until your baking-pan is half full, using your best judgment about the quantity of the material and the seasoning, then spread a layer of the paste, half an inch thick, all over it.

Just before you put it in the oven cut a gash in the centre of the top crust, and pour in some hot water. Let it bake slowly at first. It will require between one and two hours to bake done. Watch and see that it don't bake dry; you can tell by pressing down on the crust, if it does, add boiling water. If it is likely to bake too dark a color lay a piece of thick brown paper over the top, the same as you do when baking bread or cake.

If this Sunday dinner pie is made of cold beefsteak, it will not be so good, but that can be partially remedied by adding more butter, and if the weather is cold and the dish is to be eaten soon you can pour in a cupful of warm cream when you put it to bake.

Almost any kind of cold meat, fresh pork, veal or fowl, can be made into a very palatable dish by exercising a little housewifely skill. This pie always requires baked apples, or cranberry sauce, or pickles, or something sour with it.

I think it is not generally known that there is such a wonderful curative power in simple hot teas, when one is ailing. Pennyroyal, tansy, peppermint, sage, thyme and red pepper teas, are all good in any little derangement that makes one feel chilly or headache-y, or dull and heavy-headed. If your boy has been working in the dust all day, and feels miserable, give him a good drink of weak hot tea, when he goes to bed, and he will be apt to perspire freely and throw off the transient ailment. One trouble is that such teas are generally made too strong—they should be weak, but hot when taken.

A bad cold can be checked by drinking hot teas, and sweating freely, and eating little or nothing, and lying a-near the stove for a day or so.

But it is a bad plan to give a headstrong boy or man this kind of treatment at night, and let him start out the next morning, as though there was nothing the matter with him, out into the cold and the incident exposure. Far better to have done nothing at all with him, than to thus throw open the way and invite another and a severer, and, too often, a fatal attack.

I escaped all last winter with only one cold, and I cured that the first evening by sipping a pint of lemonade, piping hot, and by greasing my breast and throat well and covering up in bed snugly with something warm at my feet.

Don't forget this remedy—it is a very comfortable one. Half the little aches and pains we women, with our delicate organism, have, could be relieved by drinking a cup or two of weak, hot red-pepper tea when we go to bed at night. Don't let us use drugs—hard and bitter and merciless drugs. They may bring temporary relief, but fearful will be the penalty in the end, if persisted in. They will entail other and more perverse maladies, stubborn ones that will not yield to any skill; they will grapple with us until we topple over and fall into untimely graves. For little ailments, then, drink hot teas, and use warm poultices, and draughts of mustard, or of horseradish leaves, and live on a moderate diet—short rations; keep cheerful and hopeful, and laugh merrily, never borrowing trouble; do good to others, eschew bad habits; live at peace with all men, be the sinned-against rather than the sinning, and you'll find this the best kind of a world to live in. This life is brim full of enjoyment, and if we don't find it so, we are to blame ourselves.

Don't fail to improve the finest October days—spend them in the woods, if possible, gathering sweet memories to keep all through the dreary winter, that cometh apace. Everything is so beautiful in October; that time

“The loftiest hill—the lowliest flowering shrub—
The fairest fruit of season and of clime;
All wear alike the mood of the superb
Autumnal time.”

Make family picnics, and take your dinners with you and stay all day, and then come home another route; put just as much into the day as it will hold—gather leaves and grasses and berries, and be your very happiest and sunniest.

I think we Pottses are highly favored; we have such beautiful places to visit. In the hot summer-time we spend an occasional day among hills and rocks, pines, hemlocks, fountains and cascades, and we explore winding roads that lead either into pleasant valleys or end in wild, cavernous, rocky places, grand unto sublimity. Then, in the autumn days, when the soft, blue haze rests upon the distant hill-tops, in the dreamy October we visit the lakes and sail upon their placid waters, and gather waving, plummy grasses, and we dine upon their breezy banks, and we crowd into those golden days the most beautiful and precious memories. Our walls are hung with such pictures—pictures, beside which chromos fade into insignificance. But, go and gather for yourselves; take all the dear little children with you, too, and let them eat dinner out in the woods, and be made superlatively happy. One's children are never half so handsome as when they are "having a time" in the free, wild woods. They will caper like lambs, and their cheeks will glow, and their hair be tossed by the fingers of the wind, and their blue eyes excel the sapphire in brilliancy. No harm can come to them there. The guardian spirits of the wildwood will attend them.

When we Pottses were all at home, and were children, we wanted to go some place one time to spend a day among the dark, wild rocks; we yearned after such places, and knew of none nearer than six miles. There was a glorious wildwood fountain, and the peaked top of the hill, from whose side the stream gushes—a marvel of magnificence—was in sight of our door, but we knew it not at that time, and not knowing this, we thought only of the Canaan six miles away.

I gathered the little brood into our bed-room one night and laid the ease of our sore need before them, and asked them if they thought they could stand it to walk that far and home again. The eyes were deafening—they clamored vociferously. I said, "The baby is only seven years old, and you know we couldn't go and leave the little fellow at home; it wouldn't be fair."

He straightened and pursed out his lips, and said, "I'm nearly a man; I wear breeches, and have two pockets. See how long my legs are," and the dear baby thrust out his legs; and, really, he didn't look much bigger than a family pepper-box.

He said if we'd let him go he'd be the colt, and run behind the rest, and we pitied him so that we resolved to take him with us, and carry him on our backs when he was tired. Three or four neighbors' children—girls—went with us. Each one carried a part of the dinner that was to be served among the rocks.

We were very tired when we arrived there; but the cool air in those sylvan recesses invigorated us, and we enjoyed the excursion immensely. None of us at that time had ever tasted such pleasure before—it was as though an iron gate had swung open and let all the glory of another and a sunnier clime in upon our poor little blighted, darkened lives.

What did we care if our limbs did ache, and our feet were blistered, and our arms so tired from carrying the burden of basket and pails. It was such rare fun to romp among real rocks, and swing on lithe saplings, and make beds on the moss, and to spread our table under trees that seemed to reach the clouds.

I remember, among other things we had for dinner that day in the woods was a little pail full of peaches and a quart-bottle full of cream, sweetened. We didn't use very good judgment in the selection of what was the easiest to carry. We said, as we cut our names on the smooth trees, that we'd come again often, and our eldest brother told us, "When any of you pass here in the years to come, climb up the rock to this tree, and see my name and the date."

Poor boy! he died in a year or two, and then the wild place we loved had no charm left for us—its memories were very, very painful, and our hearts were always heavy when we passed there. We never went again to spend a day there.

On our way home that time we took turns carrying the baby; we wished vainly for a friendly team to come along, and I don't know how we would have endured the walk, only that I chanced to think how grandly we could ride home with long sticks for horses. The woods at the roadside was fuller of good horses than an emperor's stable.

Then we chose horses to suit ourselves; I rode an Arabian mare of the finest mettle, and the baby was soon astride of a dear little Shetland pony. How his fiery little pony would squeal, and rear and plunge, and how hard it was to hold! My beautiful Arabian would toss her head and flit her tail and kick every horse that came a-nigh, except the pacing little Shetland. One of the horses was a racker, the envy of all the boys; it would lopo and rack alternately. All our horses were more or less wild, never had been ridden before.

Who said "blistered feet" or "tired limbs?" Whoever it was he was mistaken. After we had gone about three miles, a wagon came in sight. Then we rode slowly. It came up, a big wagon with only a man and a boy in it, and the man was Col. Ayres who used to live close to our schoolhouse; two of his boys married the Butler girls who attended our school and read in the History-of-the-United-States class, and we were in that same class! Why we were almost related to Col. Ayres! the father-in-law of two of our intimate schoolmates! Many and many a time we had leaned on Victoria Butler's shoulder while we were reading!

I was the contractor of that day's job, all authority was vested in me, so I tipped back my bonnet and held up my hand for the team to stop.

"You are Col. Ayres, I believe," said I; "we are, nearly all of us, Deacon Potts's children—Deacon Potts, of Pottsville—we've been off having a day of it, and we are so very tired, I do wish you'd please to let us ride. We will be so grateful to you."

"Deacon Potts's young uns! why, bless my heart! yes, jump in! jump in! R'aly, I wish we had seats in our wagon, you'll get yer dresses dirty, I'm 'feared! Deacon Potts's children! r'aly, I 'spected you were a gang of young gypsies who had wandered off from the camp, he, he! I thought when you signed us to stop you wanted to tell my fortin';" and the kind old man chuckled over the very reasonable mistake he had made.

Elder Nutt's been here to-day. We talked about the weather and the crops, and the state of religion, and we became so interested that we forgot ourselves and never knew how time was passing, until Ida called us to supper. She had made pancakes, and had opened a can of maple molasses, and had everything very nice. The elder duly appreciated the pancakes, and I thought he lathered them extravagantly with the choice maple syrup. I did think he was better bred though than to toss the skins over his shoulder as he took them off his boiled potatoes.

I growled a little about it after he'd gone away, but father said that went to prove that he felt very much at home, and that educated men generally had peculiarities, but he was a servant of the Most High, a watchman upon the walls of Zion, and we must show him reverence.

I think it is a little strange that he never mentions the name of his wife or how she died, whether she died happy or not, or anything about her. I have heard indirectly that she has been dead over two years, and that the members of Goose Creek Church are anxious to have him select a helpmate and settle down in their midst permanently. If, in the providence of things, he ever should make love to me, I hope he will sit or stand with the best side out, as the old woman said of her wood-box, over one side of which she had pasted wall-paper. I couldn't smile very propitiously upon his suit if he turned his ragged eye full upon me—that great, ugly, red, unwinking Cyclops of an eye!

When he started away, tilting along in his jaunty little surkey, he looked very pretty. His hat was low down on his forehead and the brim turned up behind, and his neck was bare and broad and as fat and wrinkled as a baby's neck. I loaned him a book of poetry, "Parnell's Poems." He said he would return it soon, but I told him it was immaterial if he never returned it. When he shook hands at parting, his expressive eye looked into my face, and he said in a low voice: "I want to talk over old times with you, Miss Potts, the next interview we have together."

I have thought of those words more than fifty times. Talk over "old times!" what can that mean? He has not lived in the bounds of this Association more than a year, if he has that long. It couldn't be possible that the magnetism of my sparse attractions has drawn his affections toward me—could it? I say this to myself in the privacy of my own quiet meditations. Time will tell; for, as the poet says:

"Time, time at last sets all things even;
The mills of earth do the grinding for Heaven."

Citron, such as we buy to put in cake and mince-pies, can be manufactured at home quite as good as though it came to us through other hands and was paid for with cash. Cook the citron thoroughly in a thick syrup of white sugar, then spread the pieces on a plate and sprinkle them with sugar and dry in an oven. Scatter sugar over as long as the citron will absorb it. If prepared thus, carefully, one can make her own citron as good as you will buy. It is not much trouble, because one needs only a small quantity.

One of my neighbors told me how she managed her *quince*s last year. She had not many, but they were very fine ones. When she canned and preserved them, she added to the quincees half their quantity in crisp, sweet apples. It made both better than either would have been alone. When I prepared mine to preserve and make jelly of, I saved all the cores and peelings of a half-bushel of the fruit and stewed them in just water enough to cover them. Then I added that water to the expressed juice of the prepared quince, and it made excellent jelly. In preserving them, use three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit.

To keep squashes: Leave them in a wood-house loft or some cool, airy place until they are endangered by frost; then remove them to the darkest corner of the cellar, where they can be hung up by the stems or laid on a hanging shelf so as not to touch each other. A good Baptist sister sent me a half-dozen the first of last February that had laid in an old open chamber, above her kitchen fire, except two or three of them and they had been buried in the ground as we sometimes bury potatoes.

I always have bad luck in trying to keep mine all winter; specks of decay will come in them. It is a good plan to cook squash and dry it on plates; it is handy for pies then in the winter.

I saw a device the other day for blackening stoves that pleased me, it was the invention, too, of a tidy little country girl; well—it was my namesake, Pipsey Ellen. There are so many places in the intricate flower-patterns on stoves that cannot be reached by a brush, and to remedy this the child had tied a round bit of sponge on the end of a pine stick, and by dipping it in the liquid polish she could touch every place on the stove. Pipsey Ellen is smart for one of her age. I mean that she shall never be ashamed of her name.

If it should be providential that she should marry well, say a Baptist preacher, I mean to give her a good setting out. I mean to give her as fine a feather bed, bolster and pillows and all, out and out, as can be found in the bounds of this Association, and as good a cow as ever chewed a cud or suckled a calf.

I think it is a credit to any woman of my age and position and standing in the church to have such a namesake. I don't know how she learned to iron ribbons and velvet ribbons, but her way is vastly ahead of that ruinous way of dabbing a hot iron on it, taking out the color and giving it the appearance of a tinkered ribbon. She lays a hot flat-iron on its side and draws the wrong side of the ribbon briskly across it. Yes. Pipsey Ellen's smart.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

BEFORE MARY TUDOR WAS QUEEN.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

HAS it ever struck you what a different figure Mary Tudor would make in English history, if one could only separate the last three years of her life and reign from all which goes before?

Because I have asked you this question at the beginning, I do not intend to put in a special plea for her case as Froude has so eloquently done for her hard, cruel, old father.

Mary Tudor stands branded in history with the most awful name which has ever cursed the memory of a woman.

I think she fairly earned it. The martyr-fires, which shed their lurid light across the waning of the sixth decade of the sixteenth century, are eternal witnesses against her.

The men and women—more than three hundred of them—whom she sent to the dreadful death of the stake for no fault but holding a different creed from her own, seem to rise out of their graves like accusing spectres whenever Mary Tudor stands at the bar of history.

Three generations have pronounced their verdict against her. It will never be altered.

Yet each man and woman who stands at that solemn bar has a right to every consideration which temper-ment, the character of the times, the influences of circumstances may offer in his or her behalf. These have all helped to make the men and women of history what they were, just as they are helping to make us what we are to-day.

This "Bloody Mary," the elder of the Tudor queens, the first woman who reigned sole sovereign in English history, has something to be said for her also, something which, in all honesty and justice, cannot be left unsaid in summing up the character and career of the woman who stands with her branded memory before the generations.

Precisely, too, because she was a woman, and therefore her life and work must be of some consequence to all other women, is it a kind of duty to look at the circumstances of her birth and the surroundings of her youth, and we shall see what powerful agencies both of these must have been in moulding Mary Tudor to the character which she afterward developed to the world.

In the first place she started with all that bad blood of the two royal houses from which she sprung. There was her hard, cruel, treacherous old grandfather, Ferdinand of Spain on one hand. On the other was the stern, jealous, avaricious old Tudor, who founded the greatness of his house, and waded to his throne in the blood of Bosworth Field. He was the son of that fierce old Welshman, living among the wild northern mountains, who probably could not write his own name when he came to form one of the body-guard of the pretty, silly young queen-mother, and captivated with his handsome person the weak fancy of the Frenchwoman.

Two royal houses joined themselves in the cradle at Greenwich palace, where Mary Tudor first opened her eyes to English sunshine, and yet it was dreadful stock to spring from.

It was bad for Mary, too, in many respects, that her own mother had so largely the charge of her early education. Catherine of Castile and Arragon was not an Englishwoman in character, taste or temperament. Her great sorrows and her bitter wrongs have placed her a tender, saintly figure in history; and the immortal genius of Shakespeare has touched the dead queen's forehead with a ray of its eternal splendor.

But Catherine was, in her whole organization, a Spanish woman, and it was on an English stage that Mary Tudor was to act her great part in life. On an English throne she was to sit, with an English crown on a brow under which beat, to its last throb, a Spanish heart.

Catherine had the virtues of all the women of her race; she was loyal, true, tender, in her proud, prejudiced, narrow fashion.

She possessed the native gloom, the superstition, the unbending haughtiness of her Spanish race. The children of Ferdinand and Isabella do not seem to have inherited the best qualities of their mother.

Catherine was as true a wife as ever woman could be to the hard, cruel tyrant whom she had been forced, for state reasons, into wedding, in his reluctant boyhood.

This wifely loyalty was a part of her religion, yet it seems to me that the princess, come from that long line of Spanish kings, must have regarded her marriage with the son of the first Tudor sovereign as a kind of mesalliance. In the stately halls and sunny gardens of the Alhambra, where she had sported away the happy hours of her childhood, this giving the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella to a son of the new royal line of the Tudors must have been always thought a sacrifice of Spanish pride to Spanish interests. Catherine, one may be certain, would share this sentiment of her court and house, for, though she was only a little past her fourteenth birthday when she came from her sunny Granada to the cold, gray skies of England, her character seems to have been formed, and she never for a moment forgot her race or her beloved Spain.

So, Mary Tudor, the only one of the Spanish queen's children who lived beyond infancy, grew up in her English home in an atmosphere saturated with foreign traditions, superstitions and haughtiness.

She learned to lip the stately Spanish; she must have listened with eager childish curiosity to the stories her mother was forever telling her of the glory of her maternal fathers, and of the home in the Alhambra, marvellous and beautiful as Paradise, and of the soft blue skies of Granada, from which Catherine of Arragon had come to wear the English crown and sit down on the English throne, and from which, at last, she was to be so cruelly driven.

A foreign education of this sort could not, under the happiest circumstances, have been the best for an Englishwoman, for an English queen, especially.

Unhappily, Mary had inherited the qualities of her mother's race. She had the narrowness, the superstition, the gloom, the fierce cruelty which could blaze out with such remorseless barbarity.

She proved herself capable of intense, passionate devotion, but this quality of her character had a precisely opposite one of steady, remorseless cruelty and vengeance. Perhaps she herself and those around her were never conscious of this until she sat down on the English throne to act her bad part there.

Mary seems to have inherited little of the Tudor qualities except the splendid courage of the race. This was again and again put to the severest tests during her life, and it never failed her. She had the inveterate obstinacy of her father's race, too, but this was quite as likely to come from her mother's side.

With her temperament, it would have been almost impossible for Mary to have the faintest comprehension or sympathy with that new spirit of inquiry and freedom which was stirring the age when she first came upon it.

Much as her cousin and husband, Philip II, disliked her person and society when she was his wife, she was wonderfully like him in character and tastes. Her dark superstitions, her veneration for authority, ancient usage and for all the old habits, ceremonies and traditions of the past, were as like the crowned tyrant's, whom she had wedded, as possible.

All the teachings of Catherine must have tended to develop and strengthen what was most unfortunate in Mary's character, and prepare her for the time when she should sit down, with her Spanish heart, on the English throne.

When the great tempest broke into the life of Catherine of Arragon, Mary Tudor was a young woman. The daughter was devoted to the mother with all the passion of her narrow, ardent nature.

What must have been her anguish to see that idolized mother despoiled of her crown, driven from her throne and her husband's side, and her title and place usurped by the heretic maid of honor, by the daughter of those Boleyns, who, within a century, had been mercenaries and traders in old London! With what swelling anguish must Mary have thought that her mother, the daughter of that long line of kings, was supplanted in state and name by that false, fascinating maid of honor, so far below her in rank!

Dreadful were the humiliations and wrongs which both mother and daughter were called to endure, and they, no doubt, inflamed and hardened Mary's soul for the day of vengeance, which was so long and late in coming.

The gentlest, sweetest nature would have been soured and darkened by such cruel sufferings as clouded the early womanhood of Mary Tudor; and one can hardly exaggerate their effect on that morbid, narrow, superstitious nature, with its underlying ferocity, which circumstances were yet to bring to light.

Yet, I suppose the fond, doting mother, who lies carved in saintly sweetness in English history, had no conception of the cruel passions which were smouldering in the nature of her daughter, and which were to sear her name with that dreadful epithet by which every child first comes to know her.

To her mother, no doubt, Mary Tudor was the most devoted of daughters, the most cruelly outraged and wronged of princesses.

She saw her child—that Spanish mother, who believed that she, the daughter of the great Ferdinand and Isabella, had brought with her hand such glory to the English crown, such honor to the newly-raised Tudor race—suddenly degraded from her rank and place; the heiress of the English throne, over whose childhood and blossoming youth had shone the splendor of two crowns, despoiled of her birthright, denied her succession to the English crown, her name of princess a forbidden word, and all the long retinue and ceremony with which she had kept her state as the king's daughter and heir, suddenly taken away from her. It must have seemed that never queen and princess had such wrongs and griefs as these which fell to the lot of the wife and daughter of the English king.

Perhaps the bitterest trial of all that long, bitter time was that autumn of fifteen hundred and thirty-three, when Mary Tudor was summoned to Greenwich Palace to rejoice in the birth of the new heiress of the crown, named after the king's mother, Elizabeth, as Mary had been named after his favorite and younger sister—the one, you remember, who went away to the French court to marry the king; and who, amid her train of blooming English girls, counted one, fair and bright, a mere child, the daughter of a knight, her name—Anne Boleyn!

And it was the daughter of this Anne Boleyn, "the king's mistress," to whose birth Mary was summoned in the pleasant English September days. That was a refinement of cruelty on Henry's part. But the Tudor grain was coarse and pitiless. It mowed down, like swathes of summer grass, everything that stood in its way; it trampled on the tenderest feelings; it hesitated at no sacrifice of others to its own pride or passions.

It must have been bitter as death for Mary Tudor. Just think of it for a moment. She had left the mother, from whom she had been separated at this time by the orders of Henry, a sick, forsaken, grief-bowed woman, disowned and dishonored, in the lonely country-house, which Henry had assigned for the residence of the wife he had repudiated.

The splendid pageants and ceremonies of the journey through the city, when Anne Boleyn first showed herself to the people of London as their queen; the grand ceremonies of the coronation at Westminster Abbey, in the beautiful English May weather, were all passed now. The bitterness of that time for Catherine and Mary could, at least, never be lived over again; and now Mary was called to be present at the birth of one, the very sight of whom must have been utterly hateful in her eyes—for that baby-girl of Anne Boleyn's was to take her own place in the English succession, to claim the titles and wear the crown to which Mary Tudor had been born!

The first name she had heard over her cradle had been that of princess; all her life she had been saluted by that title, and worn its state in her father's court. Think of the galling bitterness of her humiliation; think of the feelings which must have swelled in her soul when Mary Tudor heard the first baby-cry of that new life which robbed her own of its birthright, of all which made its pride and power!

In the bitterness of that cup there must have been only a single drop of sweetness.

Just before Mary had been summoned by the king's orders to Greenwich Palace, where Elizabeth was born, as Mary had been, more than seventeen years before, Catherine had written to the daughter whose presence was denied her. It was the letter of one who could never forget that she was the daughter of kings, full of courage, hope, secret exultation, too; for Catherine's long, terrible fear was quieted at last, the spectre that haunted the wife and mother's days and nights, lest the pope should yield to the mighty pressure brought to bear upon him, and disannul the boy-marriage of Henry Tudor with the girl-widow of his dead brother.

Catherine was a true Catholic. To the will of the pope she must bow as to the will of God, even though the fiat of the Vatican should divorce her from her husband, and disinherit her child.

But Catherine had learned from some private source—quite probably through her nephew, Charles V. of Spain, who keenly sympathized with the wrongs of his kinswoman—that the pope had, during the summer, decided against the marriage of Tudor and Boleyn, and commanded the English sovereign to forsake his mistress.

"I do make sure you shall see a very good end, and better than you can desire. I would God, good daughter! that you did know with how good a heart I write this letter unto you," wrote Catherine, just before Mary was to set out on that cruel errand, by her father's orders, to Greenwich Palace.

Catherine dared not reveal to her daughter the cause of her joy, nor the source from whence she had received it; but we cannot help feeling a flash of sympathy for the poor, disowned and forsaken wife and mother and queen, who so firmly believed "God did love her daughter," though that daughter was yet to be the curse and the blighting misery of England; while that baby-girl, whose birth she went so bitterly to celebrate, was to be alike the honor and glory of the realm, through the long century, the first third of which had just passed away as Elizabeth Tudor opened her eyes to the light in that old Greenwich Palace.

Nothing could have been more agonising than Mary's position at this crisis. Whatever Anne Boleyn might be in the eyes of all England, however she might be regarded at the different courts of Europe, where the power and influence of Henry was paramount to Catherine and Mary, she must always be the fair, false maid of honor—the mistress of the king.

And to see the woman who had supplanted her own passionately loved mother, surrounded with all the pomp and state and ceremonial which belonged to the banished queen, to see the honors, the splendor, the homage which belonged to that proud, suffering, broken-hearted woman, offered to one who had robbed the true queen of husband and throne and crown—to hear that woman's daughter greeted with Mary Tudor's own title of princess, and proclaimed heiress of the throne to which she herself had been born—to think of her there at Greenwich amid all the splendid festivities which greeted the birth of the King's daughter, with Mary Tudor's heart gone well-nigh to breaking in its grief and desolation—and to remember she had only her seventeen birthdays, and all the swift chafing pride of her youth to bear her through this crisis of agony and humiliation! One cannot help pitying that young girl—forgetting for a moment, just a moment, you know, the fires of Smithfield, the lurid glare of those three years that lay waiting beyond the middle of the century; and forgetting, too, that this lonely girl, robbed of state and title, was to stand in history as “Bloody Mary!”

Just one moment and no more.

But it was over at last; and however endless the trial seemed to Mary, her stay at Greenwich does not seem to have been a long one, for she left the palace and all its tumult of gayety and rejoicings over the new birth, before the month was gone.

She must have found some consolation and triumph in her departure, for the old London streets were full of a crowd which surged around her carriage; and as they looked upon the young girl sitting there, a great cry burst from the people: “She is princess for all that!”

Everything in Mary's position and circumstances must have appealed to the sympathies and loyalty of the English people; and the time was coming when they would make good that cry which rang through the streets on the day when she rode away from Greenwich Palace after the long, fiery trial was over. They would bear her yet, that eldest daughter of the Tudors, to the palace and set her there triumphantly on the throne of her fathers; and then she would take her long, late vengeance. The hoarded bitterness of years should come up then for account, and woe to those who had at last to settle with Mary Tudor.

But it is doubtful whether in those young days she could have looked forward to the future with any anticipations of vengeance.

She was always delicate, this one daughter of all the children of that ill-starred Spanish and English union who had survived infancy.

The trials of her youth must have told heavily on her sensitive organization, for about this time she was frequently and seriously ill, and, no doubt, her griefs aggravated some natural morbidness and gloom of her constitution.

Other days of sore trials lay in wait for her, beyond that day when she left Greenwich and rode through old London streets amid the weeping, shouting people, who, despite her hard old father's will, would have her for their princess.

A little later it became a crime colored with treason to call Mary Tudor this; the house at Beaulieu where she had held her state as heiress of the crown was dissolved; the one hundred and sixty attendants who formed her household were dispersed; and, cruellest of all, Mary Tudor was ordered to Thursdon, the old country seat of the Boleyns, where the baby Elizabeth had been sent to reside with royal pomp.

Under the roof of Anne Boleyn's daughter Mary was now compelled to take her abode. Gratuitous humiliations and injuries were heaped upon her. She saw her place usurped and her honors worn by the child whom, as we saw, she could only regard as the daughter of her father's mistress, the place and honors which had been hers from her cradle.

She thought of the maid of honor in her pride and beauty and power at court, she thought of her mother, sick and forsaken, in her lonely exile at Bugden or Ampt-hill. It was a hard time for Mary Tudor.

It seems to us now that it would have been wiser and better for Catherine to return to the Spain of her childhood, to the sunny Alhambra, where she had sported away the morning hours of her life; but this, with the unbending determination of her race and character, she refused to do. Who, after all, can blame her?

She must have reasoned that husband and child and crown were in England. Her place, in her own eyes, was there, and she would not leave it until death came and released her.

In a little while, too, he came; and the great, silent peacemaker had tenderly relieved from all her troubles the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella.

Poor Anne Boleyn went her proud, triumphant way; her way of pomp and state, of crown and throne, a little while, and then the end came, swift and terrible as the cruel will of the tyrant who raised her to his throne and hurled her to the scaffold.

It is altogether probable that Henry Tudor believed, or, at least, persuaded himself that he believed Anne Boleyn guilty of the crimes of which he accused her. Suspicion and jealousy were in the Tudor grain. Henry VII. always regarded with a kind of brooding dislike the Elizabeth of York to whom he owed the security of his crown and throne. Their son probably inherited his father's dark jealousy and the worst qualities of the Tudors; the hardness and tyrannous will always grew with their years.

Anne Boleyn made the fatal mistake of believing that her power over Henry was absolute.

It was her great misfortune, too, that her manners and sentiments had been formed at the splendid, corrupt court of France. Her habits had been formed on a pattern altogether different from that dignified reticence which was the model of an English matron.

The height to which she had been suddenly elevated would have tried the steadiest brain. Her own seems to have grown quite dizzy at that altitude. She was gay, vain and imprudent, after the manner of the ladies at the court of Francis I., and she forgot to watch the temper of the harsh, moody tyrant on whom her fate depended. He who had not hesitated to defy for her sake the anger of the proudest and strongest royal house in Europe, the anathemas of the pope, who had put away from his throne the wife of twenty years, and the daughter of kings, would not hesitate, when his wrath and vengeance blazed out, to sweep the daughter of an English knight from the throne to which his sole will had raised her, or to send her to prison or the block.

Two years and a half had passed since Mary Tudor went to Greenwich and to her trials there, in the pleasant September days.

It was May now, and the air was full of the sweetness of blossoming hawthorn, and the green, English fields were glad with the golden laughter of the daisies.

The songs and feasting and dances in the soft twilights around the May-poles, with which that old England greeted the new spring over the land was past now, and the beautiful wreaths hung limp and fading upon the May-poles.

The sweet spring air is full of a dark tragedy, and the men and women in the old English capital move about, holding their breaths with terror; for she, the young, fair wife and mother, who wore the crown of England when the May came in with its sunshine and song of larks, and blossoming of hedges, lies now a prisoner, doomed to death, in the dark old Tower by the Thames.

It is the day before her execution. Inside those gloomy walls a scene is going on, such as the sun, which shines on the pleasant English pastures outside, has never witnessed before.

I do not know that painter has ever portrayed or poet told the story, but what a subject it offers for a historic picture or drama.

The people of London could not see inside the Tower-walls, and only dimly imagined what was going on there, in the heart and soul of the woman who so lately had been their queen.

Anne Boleyn, we must remember, always solemnly denied her guilt of the crime for which she was beheaded; and no historian, not even the greatest of modern times, has made a satisfactory case against her.

But, in the hour of her bitter abasement and agony the conscience of the beautiful woman awoke, and she remembered the little girl at Thursdon, and the older girl there, the daughter of the dead queen, whose rival she herself had so lately been.

She remembered, too, all that Mary Tudor had suffered, and Anne Boleyn's conscience flashed a new light upon scene after scene, where she had flaunted her insolent, pitiless triumph before Mary Tudor!

For the sake of her own daughter, she had doomed the child of Catherine of Arragon to cruel humiliations and griefs. She remembered them all now, when the shadow of the scaffold was closing round her.

In a sudden swell of anguish and remorse, she summoned Lady Kingston into the presence-chamber—for they allowed the woman who had worn the crown of England to keep her state until she went down to the scaffold on the Green.

Lady Kingston was Mary Tudor's friend, as she had been the dead queen's; and Anne Boleyn knew this; therefore, her confession and reparation would be the deeper.

When the two women were alone, the poor, doomed queen pointed to the chair of state, and bade her lady-in-waiting sit in it.

Lady Kingston refused. Even in that hour the etiquette of courts could not be disregarded. "She could not sit in the presence of the Queen of England!" she said.

But Anne Boleyn commanded and entreated, and, at last, Lady Kingston, with much protestation, yielded, and sat down under the sacred canopy. Then the queen fell suddenly at the feet of the startled woman, and there, holding up her hands, with streaming eyes, solemnly charged her, "as in the presence of God and His angels," that when all the bloody work of the next day was over, Lady Kingston should go over to Thursdon, and kneeling at Mary Tudor's feet, in like manner confess the wrong which Anne Boleyn had done her, and ask her forgiveness, as the doomed queen was doing now, otherwise her "conscience would not be at peace."

And the May sunshine looked through the narrow windows of the old Tower, and saw where Anne Boleyn knelt at the feet of Lady Kingston and made her confession the day before her death. The lady-in-waiting made her promise. She went down to Thursdon and fulfilled it afterward.

It was long before Mary Tudor was queen. Catherine of Arragon was at rest, with her broken heart, in her English grave; but at that moment, when Lady Kingston knelt at Thursdon, in Anne Boleyn's stead, Mary Tudor must have felt, it seems to me, that she and her mother were at last avenged!

RELIGIOUS READING.

THE USE OF PRAYER.

WHAT is the use of prayer? What special good is to be accomplished by it? Will the loving and all-merciful One feel anywise differently toward His children on account of their prayers addressed to him? Can the feeble petitions of frail, ignorant and sinful mortals change the disposition or conduct of the all-wise and loving Father?

Certainly not. No prayer that we can offer can alter the Heavenly Father's purpose, or make Him more desirous than He always is to bless His children. It cannot add anything to His goodness or love. It cannot increase His knowledge of our wants. It cannot make Him more tender, compassionate, or forgiving, nor change in the least His purpose toward us. Of what use, then, is prayer, or what is accomplished by it?

This—it works no absolute change in God, but a change in us. It opens the avenues of the soul to the inflowing of life from Him, awakening or renewing within us an assurance of His divine mercy and forgiveness, and thus making Him appear to us more merciful and forgiving than He was before. The change in our own consciousness makes it seem as if a change had been actually wrought in God Himself. When the earth's atmosphere is laden with smoke, the sun appears dim or fiery-red; but when the smoke is dissipated and the atmosphere purified, he appears in all his native brightness. A change seems to have taken place in the sun; but this appearance is caused by the change in our own atmosphere. In respect to the earth, it is as if the sun itself had changed. And so all the apparent changes in the Divine Being are caused by the real changes in our own states of mind and heart.

The graces of Heaven are all bestowed on certain conditions, without which they cannot be received. And one of these conditions is that we recognize them as belonging to and coming exclusively from the Lord, and humbly and earnestly asking for them. They can be given only to those who sincerely desire them; for no others are able to receive them. Therefore the Lord says, "Ask, and it shall be given you."

And the reason is plain; for it is in the nature of true prayer to operate on the interiors of the suppliant. It is in its nature to open those inner avenues of the soul through which flow the light and warmth of the upper spheres. The Lord is ever ready to give; all we need to do, is to put ourselves in an attitude to receive. We must, therefore, desire the Heavenly life—must long for it, strive for it, pray for it.

Pray earnestly, then, for power to overcome your evil inclination, and new strength will be given you day by day. When your path seems dark and dreary, pray that the Lord will shine upon it, and the light of His countenance will guide you. When a wilderness of difficulty is before you, and you know not which way to turn, look to the Lord Jesus Christ in humble prayer, and He will be to you a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. When you go to your daily duties, pray that His spirit may go with you and shield you from the tempter's snare, and keep you diligent, kind and just; and the grace you need will certainly be bestowed. If, in your family, your business or your social relations, you have peculiar trials, pray that God will give you grace to bear them with meekness and patience, and your prayer will be assuredly answered. Pray for a blessing on your enemy—if you have one; and the very petition, if sincere and earnest, will soften your heart toward that enemy, and so bring down a blessing on yourself. Pray for the prosperity of a righteous cause, and your prayer will be answered in this, if in no other way; it will open your soul to a fresh influx of God's grace, and bind you more strongly to that cause. Pray for the poor, the sick, the tempted, the sorrowful, and you will grow more into sympathy with them, and your heart will be imbued with a sweeter, broader and nobler charity. Pray for the down-trodden and enslaved, and your prayers, oft repeated, will open within you the avenues through which the Lord will pour His graces upon you more abundantly, making you more tender and pitying like Himself—making you feel more sensibly the wrongs of others to be your own, and nerving you with fresh courage and resolution to do your part toward breaking your bonds asunder.—H. B. BROWNING.

MINISTRY OF ANGELS.

ANGELS are our constant attendants and intimate associates; they enter into and foster all our good affections, and labor to repress or to moderate our evil propensities. There is not a holy feeling or an upright thought in human minds, which they do not inspire; in short, the channels through which the Divine mercy and grace are conveyed to mankind, who, in their fallen state, could not, without their means, be kept in connection with the fountain of infinite purity and inaccessible delight. Indeed, the life of man is supported by spiritual association, for he could neither think nor will without the agency of congenial spirits. Man is, therefore, not only attended by angels from Heaven, but also by spirits from hell; and, as those from above give the power of thinking and willing what is true and good, so those from beneath give the power of thinking and willing what is evil and false. As man of himself is mere evil, in his unregenerate state he draws into connection with himself such spirits only as are of a similar nature; and were these allowed to obtain entire possession of the human faculties, their unhappy subject must inevitably perish. It is only, therefore, to the providence of the Lord that we are indebted for that angelic protection and influence which we enjoy, which raises us, as it were, out of hell into the midst between the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness, and preserves us in the perfect liberty of turning to the one or to the other. The vision which was made to pass before the mental eyes of Jacob, when reposing on his stony pillow, is at once a clear proof and beautiful representation of angelic ministration. A ladder is presented that reaches from earth to Heaven, by which the word is to be understood; and while God is above and man below it, the intermediate steps are occupied by angels, not in a state of rest, but of activity, ascending and descending, raising the thoughts and affections of man to God, and bringing down the gifts of God to man.—BRUCE.

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.

BY JAMES HUNGERFORD.

"In the beginning was The Word (Logos); and The Word was with God; and The Word was God. * * * In Him was life; and the life was the light of man. And the light shineth in the darkness; and the darkness comprehendeth it not. * * * This is the true light, that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

TIS written in the Book of Books—

A book whose Heavenly doctrines shine

In human nature's hidden nooks—

The Logos is the truth divine;

It brighteneth the darkest spot,

Yet darkness comprehends it not.

Men know not that the simple truth,

Which lights each purpose night and day

In thoughtful age and thoughtless youth,

In plainness shows their upward way.

This is the light The Logos gives,

That lighteth every man that lives.

The darkest soul in heathen lands,

That feels the sense of wrong or right

In e'en the smallest things, commands

The guiding truth, the Heavenly light;

And following, as it shows the way,

His upward path is clear as day.

The truth which shows our earthly needs,

And how they best may be supplied,

Which lights our good and evil deeds,

Flows whence it never is denied;

It shines forever on our way—

Its source the Everlasting Day.

God's gifts are still refused to none,

On all mankind alike they fall;

Free as the air, the rain, the sun,

His truth and goodness are to all;

And, as we use them here below,

We win eternal bliss or woe.

THE WORK AND DUTY OF TO-DAY.

WE must labor daily and diligently in the present uses to which the Lord calls us. If a man sincerely desires to be led by Him, he will know unmistakably where he is wanted. There is nothing that so destroys the manhood of a man as unrest of soul—grasping after untried conditions and labors before we have become sufficiently purified by the fires of preparation to be master workmen in His hands. Character is formed by slow accumulations—by the trials, sorrows and disappointments of life; by combats with the demons of the under-world; by disease; by false friendships and unrealized hope. In a word, life's discipline goes hand-in-hand with the daily work appointed for us to do; and as we are faithful and heroic, these crushing burdens weigh less heavily upon us: We live in the sunlight of Heaven, and enjoy the smile of Him who is the All-in-all to us.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

TOO BUSY.

"MOTHER! mother!" cried my little Willy, coming in upon me, as I sat busily at work, "I've lost my arrow in the grass and can't find it."

He was just ready to burst into tears from grief at his mishap.

"I'm sorry, dear," I said, calmly, as I went on with my work.

"Won't you go and find it for me, mother?" he asked, with a quivering lip, as he laid hold of my arm.

"I'm too busy, dear," I replied, gently shaking him off. "Go and tell Jane to find it for you."

"Jane can't find it," said the little fellow, in a choking voice.

"Tell her to go and look again."

"She has looked all over, and can't find it. Won't you come, mother, and find it for me?"

The tears were now rolling over his face. But I was too busy to attend to Willy. I was embroidering the edge of a little linen sack that I was making for him, and that, for the moment, seemed of more importance than the happiness of my child.

"No—no," I replied. "I'm too busy to go down-stairs. You must take better care of your arrows. Go and ask Ellen to find it for you."

"Ellen says she won't look for it." Willy was now crying outright.

"There! there! don't be so foolish as to cry at the loss of such a little thing as an arrow," said I, in a reproving voice. "I'm ashamed of you!"

"Won't you go and find it for me, mother?" he urged, still crying.

"No indeed, Willy. I'm too busy now. Go and look for it again yourself."

"But I can't find it. I have looked."

"Then go and look again," said I, firmly.

Willy went crying down-stairs, and I heard him crying about the yard for some ten minutes, until my patience began to give out.

"Such a to-do about an arrow! I wish I'd never bought him the bow-arrow!" said I, moving uneasily in my chair.

"Ellen, won't you make me another arrow? Here is a stick," I heard him ask of the cook, in a pleading voice.

But Ellen replied rudely: "No indeed, I shall not! I've got something else to do besides making arrows."

The child's crying was renewed. I felt vexed at Ellen. "She might have made him the arrow," I said. "If I wasn't so busy I would go down and make him one myself. But I must get this sack done."

And I sewed away more rapidly than before. The crying went on. Willy had lost his arrow, and his heart was almost broken. Unfortunately, I was not in a mood to sympathize with him. An arrow, to me, was a very little thing, and it worried me to hear him crying as if his heart would break over a loss so trifling as that of an arrow.

"Willy?" I at length said, calling out of the window, "you must stop that crying."

"I can't find my arrow, and nobody will make me another," replied the little fellow.

"That's nothing to make such disturbance about!" I said. "Go and find something else to play with."

"I want my arrow. Won't you come and find it for me, mother?"

"No, not now. I'm too busy."

The crying went on again as loudly as before, and I soon lost all my patience. Laying aside my work, I went to the head of the stairway and called down: "Come, now, sir! There's been enough of this crying, and you must stop it."

"I can't find my arrow," returned Willy.

"Well, suppose you can't; will crying bring it? You should take better care of your things. Little boys must look the way they shoot."

"I did look, but I can't find it."

"Go and look again, then."

"I have looked, and it ain't there."

And then the crying went on again. To Willy the loss of his arrow was a real grief, and he was too young to have fortitude to bear his trouble patiently. But I was not in a state of mind to feel with him.

"Stop that crying instantly!" said I, as the worrying sound came again upon my ears. "I won't have such a noise in the house!"

But my words had no effect; they did not produce the arrow. Willy cried on.

Unable longer to endure the sound, and also thinking it wrong to let him indulge the habit of crying, I laid my work aside, and going down-stairs, took hold of him resolutely, saying as I did so: "Now, stop this instantly!"

The child looked up at me with a most distressed countenance, while the tears covered his face.

"I can't find my arrow," said he, with quivering lip.

"I'm sorry—but crying won't find it. Come up-stairs with me."

Willy ascended to my room.

"Now don't let me hear one word more of this. The next time you get an arrow take better care of it."

There was no sympathy in my tones; for I felt none. I did not think of his loss, but of the evil and annoyance of crying. The little fellow stifled his grief, or rather the utterance of it, as best he could, and throwing himself at full length upon the floor, sighed and sobbed for some ten minutes. A sigh, longer and more fluttering than usual, aroused my attention, and I then became aware that he had fallen asleep.

How instantly do our feelings change toward a child when we find that it is asleep. If we have been angry or offended, we are so no longer. Tenderness comes in the place of sterner emotions. I laid aside my work, and taking Willy in my arms, lifted him from the floor, and laid him upon my bed. Another long, fluttering sigh, agitated his bosom as his head touched the pillow. How reprovingly came the sound upon my ears! How sadly did it echo and re-echo in my heart!

"Poor child!" I murmured. "To him the loss of an arrow was a great thing. It has disturbed him to the very centre of his little being. I wish, now, that I had put by my work for a few minutes until I could have found his arrow, or made him a new one. I would have lost no more time in doing so than I have already lost. And, after all, what is a little time taken from my work to the happiness of my child? Ah me! I wish I could learn to think right at the right time. Dear little fellow! He was so happy with his bow and arrow. But all was destroyed by the untimely loss, which I could have restored in a few moments. Unfeeling—unnatural mother! Is this the way you show your love for your child?"

I stood for nearly five minutes over my sleeping boy. When I turned away, I did not resume my sewing, for I had no heart to work upon the little garment. I went down into the yard, and the first object that met my eye was the lost arrow, partly concealed behind a rose-bush, where it had fallen.

"So easily found!" said I. "How much would a minute given at the right time have saved! Ah me! We learn too late, and repent when repentance is of little avail."

It was an hour before the deep sleep into which my Willy had fallen, was broken. I had, in the meantime, resumed my sewing, after having lost fully half an hour in consequence of being unwilling to lose a few minutes for the sake of attending to my child, and relieving him of the trouble that had come upon him. The first notice I received of his being awake was his gratified exclamation at finding his lost arrow beside him. All his past grief was forgotten. In a few minutes he was down in the yard shooting his arrow again, and as happy as before. No trace of his recent grief remained.

But I could not forget it. With me the circumstance was not as the morning cloud and the early dew. The sunshine that came afterward did not dissipate instantly the one, nor drink up the other. I was sober for many hours afterward; for the consciousness of having done wrong, as well as of having been the occasion of grief to my child, lay with a heavy pressure upon my feelings.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

WHAT THE SUNBEAM SAW.

BY MRS. MARY LATHAM CLARK.

"STAY, dear sunbeam," murmured a bright wood-lily, as the sunshine danced in, one summer day, among the white pine tree branches. "Stay a while and rest upon this bright carpet of moss, and tell me a story. It is so quiet here to-day, in the forest, that I am almost asleep. I wish I could get out into the world and see some of the fine sights there. What a gay time you must have of it, dancing about wherever you please from morning till night!"

"Nay," said the sunbeam, "I cannot stop to tell you all I have seen; but, if you care to hear it, I will tell you what was the prettiest sight of all."

"Do," said the wood-lily, bending her graceful head to listen.

"I was kissing away the tears that the night had left upon a cluster of climbing roses that overhung a cottage window," said the sunbeam, "when I heard the sweet sound of children's voices. I looked within and saw two dear little girls at play. Many pretty toys were scattered about the room, and each of the little ones had a doll clasped in her chubby arms. I thought them lovelier than the flowers in the garden, and their happy voices made sweeter music than the birds. By and by they put up their sweet lips and kissed each other, while I hovered over them with delight, caressing their cheeks and brows, and turning their brown curls to shining gold."

"A pretty sight, indeed, that must have been," said the wood-lily.

"And now," continued the sunbeam, "shall I tell you the saddest sight that I have seen to-day?"

The wood-lily bent her head still lower.

"I went again to see the dear children, and to give them my parting blessing; but I found them, alas! how changed! Harsh words issued from their rose-bud lips, frowns clouded their fair, white brows, and their little hands—ah! shall I tell it?—were raised in anger."

"That was a sad sight, surely," said the lily.

"A sad sight!" murmured the summer wind through the pine boughs.

"A sad sight!" breathed a cluster of violets, while tears fell from their blue eyes into the little stream beside which they grew.

"A sad sight!" echoed the stream, as it rippled on its way.

"A sad sight!" sang the birds in the branches overhead.

So it was as if a gloom had suddenly settled itself over the forest, and all because of the sad story the sunbeam had told.

Have a care, dear children, that no bright sunbeam ever has so sad a tale to tell of you.

THE DESPISED CREATURE.

IS there any little boy or girl who likes a spider? Do not all little folk at sight of one say—"Heugh! The ugly thing, get it away!" And now I wonder why? It does not bite. At least there is only one kind, the Tarantula.

tula, that does, and that is not common in this country. The only thing I do not like about spiders is that their legs are doubled and ugly.

Let us talk a little of them that you may become better friends. They have eyes all over their heads, which are stationary. Well, they need them to seek their food, and they are not ugly, for you can scarcely see them. Their form is, I am sure, beautiful, they have such slender waists, and the large "Zebra Spider" is quite handsomely marked. You all like, I expect, the little Money Spinner, and try to get it in your pockets or bags. Well, it is just a young spider.

The "Diadem," or Garden Spider, is the one that makes the fine regular web so perfect in all its lines—not one out of place. In an early morning, after a dewy night, how beautiful these webs look with the sparkling dew upon them; and do you know, these webs have to be made fresh each day, for the tiny threads are all gummed to catch flies and insects, and the damp air takes the gum off, so that unless the spiders are diligent and renew them, they get no food.

It is the "Gossamer" Spider that makes those minute threads across the lanes and doorways, and from bush to bush in its search for insects, and though they sometimes are a little unpleasant, yet you see they have a purpose, and you can better brush them off your face than the poor spider can go without breakfast.

Some kinds do not make nets or webs, but wait rolled up in leaves and flowers, or in holes in walls, till they see a fly, or something good to eat, when they make a spring sideways, and seize upon their victim.

The most curious is, I think, the "Diving Spider," which dives under water in search of its food. A large species, common in England, constructs a raft of weeds, or floating island, on which it is wafted about, and from it seizes upon drowning insects. It lives in an air-filled diving-bell, fixed by threads to plants, and in this it shuts itself up all winter.

Spiders can live for months without food. There is a story of one kept by a gentleman that lived nearly a year without food, and at the end of that time it was so strong and brave, that it killed and ate another spider as big as itself.

Will you remember this autumn, and look for spiders' nets, and admire them, and remember that the poor despised creatures are useful and industrious, and certainly not ugly? They are welcome inmates in all stables, where they catch the flies that would otherwise disturb and distress the horses.

WRETCHES' (RETSCH'S) OUTLINES.

THIS is a very interesting and amusing game for young persons, and where there is any talent for drawing, is sure to bring it out. The players, of whom there may be any number (the more the better), seat themselves around a table, on which are pens and ink, each provided with a piece of paper and a pencil. Each player draws a line in ink (the black lines in the illustrations show how this may be done) on his piece of paper, which he then passes to his next neighbor, who must make a picture of it, introducing the ink line as a part of the outline of his picture.

The ink line may be as long or as short as the maker of it chooses, only he must not lift his pen while drawing it; or, at least, he must make the line unbroken. Short lines make the best and funniest pictures. The picture must be drawn in pencil. There is no attempt at any careful or finished drawing, as the pictures must be completed quickly; else the game is apt to be dull and slow. The greater the variety the better. Care should be taken to prevent the too frequent repetition of one idea. Profiles of faces may very easily be made of almost any line. The best sport is caused by the most uncouth pictures.

DAILY WORK.

In the name of God advancing
Sow thy seed at morning light,
Cheerily the furrows turning,
Labor on with all thy might.
Look not to the far-off future,
Do the work which nearest lies;
Sow thou must before thou reapst,
Rest at last is labor's prize.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

WITHIN.

BY ROSE TERRY COOKE.

OPEN the door, dear heart, and see
 What lies beyond its look and key;
 Within the house, when thou art come,
 Sit down and rest, for here is home.
 What if it be a little place!
 Its furnishings are gifts of grace,
 Not on the wall or on the floor,
 But, filling it forevermore;
 For here is Peace, with lilies white,
 That shed their perfume day and night;
 In moon or starlight, storm or sun,
 Her ministry is never done.
 As in some lone and quiet cave,
 Whose base eternal oceans lave,
 The castaway forgets the roar
 That beats upon the cruel shore,
 And breathes alone the odorous breath
 Of that wild sea that threatened death;
 So sleep, while Peace keeps watch and ward,
 The threshold of thy home to guard.

Here Love abideth every day.
 Wingless, he cannot fly away.
 The little god we used to know,
 With stinging arrows in his bow,
 And pinions fluttering in the sun,
 Sulks out of sight, his mischief done.
 For here a calmer angel dwells,
 Whose song a sweeter story tells;
 Whose tender lips can smile or sigh
 As cloud or sunshine wanders by,
 If guilt or sorrow, want or shame,
 Assail thy life or dim thy name,
 Here all these troubles are unknown,
 For here remaineth Love alone,
 Intent to rescue and to bless
 In every tempest of distress.
 Awake to hear thy faintest sigh,
 To watch the tell-tale in thine eye,
 To fold thee safe in such repose
 As only Love's beloved knows;
 To die—ah, far more dread! to live,
 So long as life can blessing give.

Here Patience, like a Quaker maid,
 Sits in her sober garb arrayed.
 Where she abides no bitter word,
 No cold and cruel taunt is heard;
 The soft lips utter softer speech,
 Her voice the troubled soul can reach,
 And feed its hunger fierce and wild,
 As some sweet mother feeds her child.
 The hurried misery of to-day
 With slow caress she charms away;
 The dread of what to-morrow brings
 She hushes under brooding wings;
 Her silent prayer, like fragrant balm,
 On fevered spirits pours its calm;
 Her lingering kisses still the brain,
 And bring its vernal strength again.
 A daily blessing, like the air
 That comes without our thought or prayer.
 Rest! while her gracious dews shall shed
 Their benediction on thy head.

Not every palace holds the three
 That keep thy quiet home for thee;
 Not every hut or humble cell
 Affords a place for these to dwell.
 In sadness long they slowly grew
 Like plants of rosemary and rue,
 Those herbs of grace that know no bloom,
 But flourish oftenest by a tomb.

But if they come to live with thee,
 Dear heart, entreat them tenderly!
 Affright them not with faithlessness,
 Thy worldly longings all repress,
 Pine not for power nor treasures more,
 Nor yet an adverse fate deplore;
 For he to whom the Lord hath lent
 These visitants must have content,
 The clasping grace to hold them fast
 'Gainst any outer tempest blast;
 Nor entertain as unaware
 The angels who his dwelling share.
 Make such a gracious atmosphere,
 That all thy guests shall linger here,
 Till to thy house at length shall come
 The message of a dearer home,
 And summon thee with this sweet word,
 "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord!"

LITTLE MACHEN.

The following poem is by Miss EMANSON, who claims to have written "Betsy and I:"

"UP a few steps higher, Machen,
 Only up anoder flight,
 Are your little feet aweary
 Mit der walk they took to-night?"

"Ah, you could not sell der baskets,
 And your very step is sad,
 Come and sing to me, my darling,
 It will make my old heart glad.

"Yes! your voice is growing stronger,
 It was always sweet and clear—
 Softly, Machen, sing more softly,
 Lest some one outside should hear.

"Now remember what I tell you,
 Never sing a vord or note
 On d' street or in d' alley,
 Keep der song-birds in your throat.

"Keep them all for me, my Machen,
 Never mind if we are poor,
 We will never sell our music
 For der money, dat is sure."

* * * * *
 "I am going, little Machen;"
 Grandsire's voice was weak and low;
 "I was wrong to hush d' song-birds
 In your throat—dey warble so.

"Dey would bring you food and fortune,
 Dey would bring you gold and gear;
 Ah, 'tis late! too late, my Machen,
 Hush, your mutter's voice I hear.

"Come to guide me on my journey
 To her home of love and light,
 Up a little higher, Machen,
 Only up anoder flight."

Years went by; a glorious singer
 Makes a million hearts rejoice
 With her life's pure, quiet beauty,
 And the magic of her voice.

And we know her music thrills us
 With such wondrous power to-night,
 Just because her heart is always Ready for a higher flight.

FOR MY SAKE.

BY HESTER A. BENEDICT.

MOTHER mine across the mountains, if you sleep or if you wake,
Turn your face this way, I pray you, just a moment, for my sake;
For the winds are going westward, led by spirits sweet and fair—
And I've given them my kisses for the silver of your hair.

I have told them what to whisper in your ear and to your heart,
Of the much my life has leaned to since we journeyed far apart;
Of the storm and of the sunshine, beating here and blinding there;
Of the roses and the ruin—of the passion and the prayer.

But I think if I could find you by the lifting of my hand,
All the burden that I'm bearing you would better understand.
And it may be you could tell me, as none other tells me
true,
Why, to-night, my arms are empty—why my life is empty, too.

So I'm calling, calling to you! And the night is calm and still;
Can't you hear my crying, mother; hear and heed it, if you will!
I am tired of this farce of life—of the social mask I wear;
Of the purple of the velvet that can cover only care.

And I want your arms to hold me as they held me long ago,
Ere my head and heart were handled by the fingers of the snow;
Want to lie and watch the sunrise, with the lilies of my face
Changed to roses, in the heaven of my long-lost resting-place.

Ah, my life would lean to laughter from such recompense divine,
For its mockery of manna—for its mockery of wine!
But I cannot find your bosom, and you cannot hear my call;
And another day is dawning in the old way—that is all.

A HOME PICTURE.

BY FRANCES D. GAGE.

BEN FISHER had finished his hard day's work,
And he sat at his cottage door—
His good wife, Kate, sat by his side,
And the moonlight danced on the floor;
The moonlight danced on the cottage floor,
Her beams were as clear and bright
As when he and Kate, twelve years before,
Talked love in her mellow light.

Ben Fisher had never a pipe of clay,
And never a dram drank he;
So he loved at home with his wife to stay,
And they chatted right merrily;
Right merrily chatted they on, the while
Her babe slept on her breast;
While a chubby rogue, with rosy smile,
On his father's knee found rest.

Ben told her how fast his potatoes grew,
And the corn in the lower field;
And the wheat on the hill was grown to seed,
And promised a glorious yield—
A glorious yield in the harvest time;
And his orchard was doing fair;
His sheep and his stock were in their prime,
His farm all in good repair.

Kate said that her garden looked beautiful,
Her fowls and her calves were fat:
That the butter that Tommy that morning had burned
Would buy him a Sunday hat;
That Jenny, for pa a new shirt had made,
And 'twas done, too, by the rule;
That Neddy the garden could nicely spade,
And Ann was ahead at school.

Ben slowly passed his toil-worn hand
Thro' his locks of grayish brown—
"I tell you, Kate, what I think," said he;
"We're the happiest folks in town."
"I know," said Kate, "that we all work hard—Work and health go together, I've found;
For there's Mrs. Bell does not work at all,
And she's sick the whole year round.

"The'er worth their thousands, so people say,
But I ne'er saw them happy yet;
'Twould not be me that would take their gold,
And live in a constant fret.
My humble home has a light within
Mrs. Bell's gold could not buy—
Six healthy children, a merry heart,
And a husband's love-lit eye."

I fancied a tear was in Ben's eye—
The moon shone brighter and clearer,
I could not tell why the man should cry,
But he hitched up to Kate still nearer:
He leaned his head on her shoulder, there,
And took her hand in his—
I guess—(tho' I looked at the moon just then),
That he left on her lips a kiss.

THE OLD-WORLD SPARROW.

BY WM. C. BRYANT.

WE hear the note of a stranger bird,
That ne'er till now in our land was heard.
A winged settler has taken his place
With Teutons and men of the Celtic race.
He has followed their path to our hemisphere—
The Old-World sparrow at last is here.

He meets not here, as beyond the main,
The fowler's snare and the poisoned grain;
But snug-built homes on the friendly tree,
And grubs for his chirping family
Are strewn when the winter fields are drear—
For the Old-World sparrow is welcome here.

The insect legions that sting our fruit,
And strip the leaves from the growing shoot,
A swarming, skulking, ravenous tribe,
Which Harris and Fitch so well describe,
But cannot destroy, may quail with fear—
For the Old-World sparrow, their foe, is here.

The apricot, in the summer ray
May ripen now on the loaded spray;
And the nectarine on the garden walk
Keep firm its hold on the parent stalk;
And the plum its fragrant fruitage rear—
For the Old-World sparrow, their friend, is here.

That pest of gardens, the little Turk,
Who signs with the crescent his wicked work,
And causes the half-grown fruit to fall,
Shall be seized and swallowed, in spite of all
His sly devices of cunning and fear—
For the Old-World sparrow, his foe, is here.

And the army-worm, and the Hessian fly,
And the dreaded canker-worm, shall die;
And the thrip, and slug, and fruit-moth seek
In vain to escape that busy beak;
And fairer harvests shall crown the year—
For the Old-World sparrow at last is here.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

A VALUABLE book has just been published by D. Appleton & Co., of New York. It is entitled Food, is written by Edward Smith, M.D., an English physician and scientific man of note. It treats of all kinds of food, and describes their proper modes of preparation. We copy a page or two from his chapter on the "Description and Cooking of Flesh."

"The effect of cooking flesh is chiefly physical, and is chemical in a very limited sense only. When meat is either roasted or boiled, it decreases in bulk and weight, and the cooked food is generally less soft than fresh meat in the first state. The diminution in bulk and weight is owing to the extraction of the juices of so much of the mass of flesh as may have been acted upon by the heat, and these are chiefly water containing salts and the peculiar flavor of meat, with a proportion of fat in a fluid state, gelatin, and perhaps some albumen. The flesh thus treated becomes contracted in bulk from loss of the juices and by coagulation of the albumen, whilst the mass is composed of solid fibrin, with a proportion of albumen, and the juices and fat which have not been extracted. The tubes having lost much of their contents, shrink and separate from each other, and so far the meat may be made more tender; but this varies in degree, and is often more than counterbalanced by the hardening of the albuminous contents of the tubes.

"The object of cooking is to render the flesh more submissive to mastication and digestion, but it may be entirely frustrated if the substance of the flesh be hardened in any appreciable degree. It is also employed to make the food hot when it is eaten, with a view to improve its flavor, and to stimulate the sense of taste. It is only an incident in cooking, however inseparable from the act, that the flesh should diminish in weight by the loss of its fluid parts, but if all that is valuable from the extracted matter be collected, there will be no real loss of nutriment. There is, however, in this respect some difference according to the mode of cooking. If the meat be boiled, the introduction of fluid into the substance of the meat, whether between the structures or within the fibres, aids the extractive process, but at the same time retains and preserves that which is extracted. If it be roasted whilst surrounded on all sides by the air, the heat is not applied so uniformly and gently, and therefore the outside becomes over-cooked before the inside is sufficiently cooked, and this occurs to a far greater extent than in boiling. Hence not only is the fluid part of the juices extracted and lost, but the loss is greater than when the meat is boiled. It is, however, to be understood that the matters extracted are only such as may be dispersed by heat; and whilst, therefore, the evaporated water may carry off some of the flavors of the meat, it does not remove the salts which are present in the juices. Hence meat which is properly roasted has lost weight more than that which is boiled; but if no account be taken of the matters extracted, it contains a larger proportion of nutritive elements than the larger mass of boiled meat, and in a given weight is more nutritious. When, however, the extracted matter is collected and used, there is a greater proportion of nutriment in the boiled meat with the broth, than in the roasted meat with the liquefied fat, and it is clearly desirable that both the broth and the boiled meat should be eaten together.

"Stewed meat occupies a position between that of boiled and roast, for it may have been submitted to a greater heat, and for a longer period than boiled meat, and thereby a larger proportion of soluble matter may have been extracted, whilst it differs from roasted meat in that the outside is not hardened, and all the extracted material is retained. Boiled meat may be cooked so that the solid part shall still retain nearly all the nutritive elements of flesh, whilst the solid part of the stewed meat may be even less nutritious than the material which has been extracted from it.

"The degree in which extraction of the juices takes place in cooking meat depends upon the heat employed, so that the proper application of heat is a fundamental question in cookery. It has been intimated that the extraction of the juices is chiefly from the cut ends of the soft fibres, and that the fibres become harder by the coagulation of the albumen during the process of cooking. When, therefore, the fibres have become hardened, they have lost some of their contents, but this condition prevents or retards the further passage of juices from parts beyond the hardened ends. The sooner, therefore, the hardening process can be effected, the sooner will the loss of juices be diminished or prevented. Dipping the meat to be boiled into boiling water effects this object, for albumen coagulates at a temperature much below that of the boiling point of water; and placing the meat to be roasted very near the fire at first has the same effect. Thus less juices escape (all other parts of the process being equal), and the mass of flesh retains its nutritive elements. This is clearly desirable when the flesh only is to be consumed; but if it be desired to make good broth or beef tea, the opposite course must be adopted, and by keeping the temperature below 160° the tubes may be emptied to a far greater degree than with a higher temperature. Hence the explanation of the saying that, you cannot have good broth and good meat from the same piece of flesh.

"But the preliminary point having been settled, the proper mode of cooking is clearly not to coagulate the albumen unduly, but to make the whole mass of meat soft and tender. A slow fire, or water at a temperature of 160°, will suffice to expand the fibres, and in some degree to rupture them, whilst it separates these and other structures, and renders the whole mass more fitted for mastication and digestion. To keep meat in boiling water, or to expose the joint to continued heat before the fire, is to make it hard and to extract a greater proportion of the juices.

"Flesh thus treated is less susceptible of decomposition than fresh meat, by reason of its harder crust and the diminution of its juices, and may thus be preserved in a state fit for the use of man for some time."

RECIPES.

CLEANING SILK.—Use potato water for all colors and kinds. Grate some potatoes into cold spring water, say a large potato to every quart of water, of which five or six will do for a couple of dresses. If for very light silk, pare the potatoes; if any way dark, merely wash them clean. The pan of water must not be stirred in the least for forty-eight hours, then very slowly and steadily pour off the clear liquor, but not a particle of the sediment, into an open vessel—a bath, or such like. Dip the pieces of silk into this liquid up and down a few times, without in the least creasing them; then wipe them on a flat table with a clean towel, first one side and then the other. It is as well to hang each one as dipped upon a line to allow the drops to drain off a little before wiping. Have a damp cloth to cover them in till they are done, then iron one way on the soiled side. It is astonishing to see how nice a dress looks done in this manner.

TO CLEAN GOLD CHAINS.—Put the chain in a small glass bottle with warm water, a little tooth-powder and some soap. Cork the bottle, and shake it for a minute violently. The friction against the glass polishes the gold, and the soap and tooth-powder extract every particle of grease and dirt from the interstices of a chain of the most intricate pattern. Rinse it in clear cold water, wipe with a towel, and the polish will surprise you.

IRON-RUST.—To remove iron-rust from linen, apply lemon-juice and salt, and expose it to the sun. Use two applications if necessary.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

THE TRAVELLER'S TOUR.

A PARLOR GAME OR PASTIME.

THIS game may be played by any number of persons. One of the party announces himself the Traveller, and about to take a little tour. He calls upon any of the party for information respecting the objects of the greatest interest to be noticed in the different towns and villages through which he intends passing.

He is given an empty bag, and to each of the persons joining in the game are distributed sets of counters with numbers on. Thus, if twelve persons were playing, the counters required would be up to number twelve, and a set of ones would be given to the first person, twos to the second, threes to the third, and so on.

When the Traveller announces the name of the place he intends stopping at, the first person is at liberty to give any information, or make any remark respecting it; if he cannot do so, the second person has the chance, or the third, or it passes on until some one is able to speak concerning it. If the Traveller considers it correct information, or worthy of notice, he takes from the person one of his counters, as a pledge of the obligation he is under to him. The next person in order to the one who spoke last is to proceed, so as not each time to begin with number one. If no one of the party speaks, the Traveller may consider there is nothing worthy of notice at the place he has announced, and he then passes on to another.

After he has reached his destination, he turns out his bag to see which of the party has given him the greatest amount of information, and that person is considered to have won the game, and is entitled to be the Traveller in the next game.

If it should happen that two or more persons should have given the same number of counters, those persons are to be allowed in succession to continue to assist the Traveller and deposit their pledges, until one alone remains.

EXAMPLE OF THE GAME.

TRAVELLER.—I intend to take a little excursion this summer, and shall soon start from New York for Niagara; but as I wish to stop at several places, I shall travel slowly. My route will be by steamboat up the Hudson to Albany, thence through the centre of the State to the Falls.

NUMBER ONE.—Soon after leaving New York City, you come to the Palisades, which form one of the first objects of interest in your route. The noble river is then walled in for thirty miles by high, precipitous rocks, upon whose summits imagination has but to place some ruined castles to suggest olden memories, and the inferiority of the scenery of the vaunted Rhine to that of the Hudson must be confessed.

TRAVELLER.—Thank you for this information; pray deposit a counter in my bag, that I may remember to whom I owe it. I propose to stop at Tarrytown.

NUMBER TWO and THREE not answering.

NUMBER FOUR.—Pray visit the spot of André's arrest. After the final arrangements with Arnold in regard to the betrayal of West Point were made, André proceeded on horseback to New York, and when he reached this spot supposed himself to be within the British lines, and thus secure from danger. Here he was stopped by three soldiers, whose names will ever be held in remembrance—Paulding, Williams and Van Wart. Instead of showing his passport, he inquired whence they came, and receiving for answer "From below," he responded "So do I," showing at the same time his uniform as a British officer. "We arrest you as an enemy of our country," replied these soldiers; and resisting all his attempts at bribery, they led him captive to the headquarters of the American general. His sad fate is well known. Hung as a spy near this place, his remains were left here a few years, but are deposited among England's illustrious dead in Westminster Abbey. Number Four deposits a counter.

NUMBER SEVEN.—The Hudson is rich in revolutionary reminiscences. A short distance from Tarrytown, on the opposite shore, you will reach Stony Point, the scene of Mad Anthony Wayne's daring exploit in 1779, when, without firing a single gun, the fort here situated was surprised and taken by assault, forming one of the most brilliant exploits achieved during the war. A counter of Number Seven is put into the bag.

TRAVELLER.—I cannot stop long here, but must proceed with my journey. Where shall I stop next?

NUMBER NINE.—You pass then at once into the Highlands. Here the Hudson has burst its way at some distant period through the mountains, leaving on each side a rampart of almost perpendicular hills of from six hundred to seventeen hundred feet above the level of the river. Most prominent among them are the Dunderberg, Anthony's Nose and Butter Hill. Number Nine deposits a counter.

NUMBER TWELVE.—In the bosom of the Highlands you will find West Point, which is unquestionably the most romantic spot on the river. The village is placed upon the top of a promontory one hundred and eighty-eight feet above the river, where there is spread out a level plateau or terrace more than one mile in circumference. Number Twelve puts a counter into the bag.

TRAVELLER.—Can you give me any other information?

NUMBER TWO.—West Point is the seat of the United States Military Academy, established in 1812; the land was ceded to the United States by New York in 1826. Number Two deposits a counter.

NUMBER SIX.—It is famous as the scene of Arnold's treason. During the Revolution this post was considered the key of the Hudson, and a heavy chain was here stretched from shore to shore. The British were very anxious to obtain possession of this place, which they would have done had Arnold's treason succeeded. Number Six hands the Traveller a counter.

TRAVELLER.—Are there more objects of interest on the river?

NUMBER EIGHT.—Notice the Catskill Mountains, which present a very abrupt front on the river and run nearly parallel to it for twenty miles. The views from the Mountain House are grand and majestic—up and down the Hudson one can see for seventy miles either way—and the Fall of the Katers Kill, three miles from the House, is exceedingly beautiful. Number Eight deposits a counter.

TRAVELLER.—My time will not permit me to visit all objects and places of interest; the principal ones must content me; my next resting-place will be Albany.

NUMBER THREE.—You will find Albany pleasantly situated. From the top of the capitol, which is built on a hill, the view is very fine. You will find all the public State buildings worthy a visit, as well as those for educational and literary purposes, Albany being distinguished for these last. Number Three deposits a counter.

TRAVELLER.—I shall no doubt find pleasure in visiting them, but after leaving Albany I shall be obliged to hasten, taking the cars from there as the most expeditious way. Shall I stop at Schoenectady?

No one replies, so the Traveller considers there is nothing peculiarly interesting there, and proceeds to another place, asking: "Where would you advise me to stop?"

NUMBER FIVE.—The beauty of Trenton Falls is well and widely celebrated. Stopping at Utica, you will have a slight detour of sixteen miles to make in order to reach them, but you will be fully compensated for the trouble. Number Five deposits a counter.

NUMBER NINE.—When again on your route, do not fail to stop at Syracuse, at which place, in connection with the village of Salina, a few miles distant, you will find the most extensive salt manufactories in the United States. Salt is obtained from the various salt-springs here abundant, in several ways, by boiling, evaporation, etc.—and the processes are exceedingly interesting. Number Nine hands a counter.

TRAVELLER.—Shall I find more objects of interest here?

NUMBER ELEVEN.—Syracuse is situated on Onondaga Lake. In the southern part of this State lie a cluster of lakes, of which this is one, all remarkable for beautiful scenery. The tourist for pleasure will not regret the time spent among them. Number Eleven deposits a counter.

TRAVELLER.—I am much indebted to my friends for the information I have received; which one will give me an account of my place of destination?

NUMBER NINE.—On the western border of the State, in a river or strait of thirty-four miles in length, running from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, and pouring the waters of the Great Lakes over a precipice of one hundred and sixty-five feet in perpendicular height, thunders the famed and unrivalled cataract of Niagara, in whose presence all stand dumb with no power to describe, but only to wonder and adore. About three miles below its commencement the river divides into two arms, which embrace an island called Grand Island, twelve miles long and from two to seven wide. Nearly three miles below Grand Island the Rapids commence, and, after a course of rather more than half a mile, terminate in the Great Cataract. Goat Island, a quarter of a mile wide and half a mile long, extends to the very brow of the precipice, and divides the Falls into two portions, the higher of which is on the American side, but the greatest body of water is on the Canadian. The American Fall is again subdivided very unequally by Iris Island, with the greater of these subdivisions nearest the New York shore. Of the grandeur and sublimity of this scene, and of the emotions with which it fills the soul, I am utterly unable to speak.

The Traveller, having reached his place of destination, examines his bag, and finding that Number Nine has deposited the most counters, he is considered to have won the game, and is entitled to be the Traveller in the next game.

THE PLAGUE OF MOVING.

"ISN'T it too provoking, Cousin Marion, this house is sold, and we must move again this spring? We have only been here two years, and have just got accustomed to all its ins and outs. I did not like it very well at first, but now I am accustomed to it I don't want to leave."

"Have you decided on another house?"

"Oh, yes, Charles is always in season about that. He has a very pretty place engaged, and I should like it if it were not for the earthquake of moving."

"It is trying, Nellie, I will not deny, but then there are mitigations. I have never moved in my life but that I felt the Lord appointed the change for my good, or the good of my household. We are so apt to settle down into ruts, mentally and physically, that we need an earthquake to shake us out of them effectually. It does us good to have our houses turned inside out occasionally, more thoroughly than even house-cleaning does. Not a piece of old carpet nor an old garment hung away in the garret escapes a thorough shaking, when it must be taken down and packed away. But this is not the greatest consideration. Our minds need a change of scene. The very views we look out upon from our windows have their influence upon our spirits. I always keep open the shutters that look out on the pleasantest prospects, and if a view is uncomfortable I shut it out when I can."

"We shall have beautiful views of the mountain from our new home," said Nellie; "and there is a large vacant lot with a neat fence around it just across the street. The children were delighted with the smooth grass-plot, and the many robins hopping about over it, early as it is."

"It will do the children good to have these new surroundings. They help to develop their characters more than ever we suspect. Of course there are undesirable things in every new location. Neighbors are not always what we like. No house is just such a one as we would build. But even these things are needful discipline. We may get good out of them, just as the bee gets honey from very dull-looking flowers, and even those that are poisonous."

"I have had a dim feeling that our four or five changes have really been for our advantage, after all, much as I disliked them at the time. But that does not make the present discomfort and hard labor of moving any lighter."

"It is a very great tax on one's strength, that is true. But, take my advice, and hire enough extra help to lighten your part of it, as far as you possibly can. Economize somewhere else, if you must. Economy here is sheer wastefulness. Money is no consideration beside your health and strength. Begin in season to put aside light articles you do not need for daily use, and get all such things out of the way before the grand breaking-up comes. And then, when you are stranded amidst the debris at the other house, go about things deliberately. Have the men set the articles where they belong, as far as you can, and keep a good, stout woman, beside your own force, to help you for several days. I learned by experience to reduce moving to a science, and, at last, was able to manage it very well. Not the least important item is to cook a supply of food for several days' campaign. The children will enjoy picnicing, with barrel-heads for tables, provided they have an abundance of substantial cold boiled ham, boiled eggs, biscuit and a big loaf of cake, dark with raisins. Moving is hungry work.

"But, above all things, Nellie, don't invite a company of neighbors in to help you that day, of all the days in the year. I think it would hardly be more wearing to do all the work yourself. Let your help all be hired-help, whom you can direct as you please, not company-help, you feel bound to entertain. Baby and Archie are to come to me that day, remember. Then you will have the coast clear for work. Send Dick over with them in the morning early, and I will send back a pail full of my doughnuts for moving-day picnic."

"Thank you, Marion, very much, for your offer. I feel as if you had taken off quite a weight of anxiety and worry about moving, by your encouraging words. In two weeks we shall be all settled once more, and house-cleaning done early. I don't mean to fret another word about it, but look ahead to the good time coming."

"That is always good philosophy," said Marion, as she gave her a good-bye kiss. ELEXOR.

WORK WHILE 'TIS DAY.

"The night cometh, when no man can work."

T. C. O'KANE.

Work, for the night is com-ing; Work thro' the morn-ing hours; Work while the dew is spark-ling;

Work 'mid spring-ing flow'rs; Work when the day grows bright-er; Work in the glow-ing sun;

Work, for the night is com-ing, When man's work is done. Work, when the day grows bright-er;

Work, when the day grows

Work in the glow-ing sun; Work, for the night is com-ing, When man's work is done.

bright-er;

Work in the glow-ing sun, for the night is com-ing.

2. Work, for the night is coming;
Work through the sunny noon;
Fill brightest hours with labor;
Rest comes sure and soon.
Give every flying minute
Something to keep in store;
Work, for the night is coming,
When man works no more.

3. Work, for the night is coming,
Under the sunset skies;
While their bright tints are glowing;
Work, for daylight flies.
Work till the last beam fadeeth,
Fadeth to shine no more;
Work, while the night is dark'ning,
When man's work is o'er.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

[The people are indebted to Dr. Dio Lewis for a great deal of free and easy talk on the subject of health—and very sensible talk it is in the main. Running our eyes through a volume of To-Day, which is edited by Dr. Lewis, we find a great number of most excellent hints and suggestions on the care of our bodies and the preservation of health, some of which we copy below for the benefit of our readers.—EN. HOMER MAC.]

EQUALIZE THE CIRCULATION.

IN one of his "chats with the girls," the doctor says:

Take the glass part of a thermometer out of the frame. Hold the bulb under your tongue. Wait four minutes. Now look. It is 98°. That tells you how warm your blood is. Now hold it against your foot. Don't be in a hurry. Give it a chance to feel the exact state. Down it goes to 65°. That tells you how warm your feet are—33° between your tongue and your feet.

Don't you know that equable circulation means good health, and that the loss of it means bad health? Let us see. You have a headache. Your head is hot. It throbs. Your feet are icicles. Now put your feet in a pail of hot water. In six minutes you say, "Oh, mother, how good I feel! That rush in my head is all gone." You have headache about half the time? No. Well, then, pain in your side? No. Well, I venture that every day you have some bad feeling about the head, or neck, or chest, or back? Now let me tell you something. It is very rare that a hot foot-bath will not remove all those bad feelings for the time being. What does this mean? Why, it means that there is too much blood in the head, or neck, or shoulders, or back, and that there is a lack of it in the feet and legs. A hot foot-bath draws the blood down below, and takes the excess of blood from the upper parts. That's exactly the philosophy of it. Of course the foot-bath is a bad thing, but it serves to illustrate the law.

Now let me whisper in your ear. I will tell you a secret. If you will during the damp and cold season put one or two pairs of thick flannels on your legs, and very thick woollen stockings, and wear strong, broad-soled shoes, you will have all the time that good flow of blood that the hot foot-bath gave you. This will keep the blood from crowding into the head and upper parts of the body, and will prevent those uncomfortable feelings.

What I have been saying about the legs is true to some extent of the arms. The extremities, both upper and lower, will in our climate, during the damp and cold season, be sure to get cold, and thus the balance in the circulation is lost. Then comes fulness in some organ within the body, or in the head or neck, with heat or pain or some other uncomfortable feeling. This can all be prevented by keeping the blood flowing equably in all parts. In this climate we must depend upon clothing. Friction is good. Exercise is good. But the main dependence is clothing. So you must, for eight months of the year at least, dress your legs and feet and arms with very thick woollen garments.

Just think how women dress. About the trunk, the warmest part of the body, they put one, two, three, four thicknesses; then comes a shawl and then thick-padded furs, while their legs, with one thickness of cotton, go paddling along under a balloon. They go to the family physician and say, "Oh, doctor, my head goes bumpitybump. Doctor, it seems as if all the blood in my body is in my head and chest."

"Well, madam, how about your legs and feet?"

"Oh, doctor, they are like chunks of ice."

"Ah, madam, if you dress your legs and feet so that the blood can't get down into them, where can it go? It can't go out visiting. It must stay in the body somewhere; and if it can't go down into the legs and feet, it of course goes into your head and chest."

Girls, most of you wear too much clothing about your shoulders, chest, back and hips, but there is a sad lack of it about your legs, feet and arms.

TO A COLD-FOOTED LADY.

Madam, allow me to prescribe for you. I have had a long experience in the management of delicate women, and believe I can give you some important advice. For the present I prescribe only for your feet.

1st. Procure a quantity of woollen stockings—not such as you buy at the stores under the name of lambs' wool, that you can read a newspaper through, but the kind that your Aunt Jerusha in the country knits for you, thick as a board, that will keep your feet dry and warm in spite of wind and weather.

2d. If you want to be really thorough, change them every morning, hanging the fresh ones by the fire during the night.

3d. Procure thick calf-skin boots, double uppers and triple soles, and wear them from the first of October till the first of May. Make frequent applications of some good oil blacking.

4th. Avoid rubbers altogether, except a pair of large rubber boots, which may be worn for a little time through snow-drifts or a flood of water.

5th. Hold the bottoms of your feet in cold water half an inch deep, just before going to bed, two or three minutes, and then rub them hard with rough towels and your naked hands.

6th. Now, madam, go out freely in all weathers, and, believe me, not only will your feet enjoy a good circulation, but as a consequence of the good circulation in the lower extremities, your head will be relieved of all its fulness and your heart of its palpitations. Your complexion will be greatly improved and your health made better in every respect.

EXPANDING THE CHEST.

Take a strong rope, and fasten it to a beam overhead; to the lower end of the rope attach a stick three feet long, convenient to grasp with the hands. The rope should be fastened to the centre of the stick, which should hang six or eight inches above the head. Let a person grasp this stick with the hands two or three feet apart, and swing very moderately at first—perhaps only bear the weight, if very weak—and gradually increase, as the muscles gain strength from the exercise, until it may be used from three to five times daily. The connection of the arms with the body, with the exception of the clavicle with the breast-bone, being a muscular attachment to the ribs, the effect of this exercise is to elevate the ribs and enlarge the chest; and, as Nature allows no vacuum, the lungs expand to fill the cavity, increasing the volume of air, the natural purifier of blood, and preventing the congestion of the deposit of tuberculous matter. We have prescribed the above for all cases of hemorrhage of the lungs and threatened consumption of thirty-five years, and have been able to increase the measure of the chest from two to four inches within a few months, and with good results. But especially as a preventive we would recommend this exercise. Let those who love to live cultivate a well-formed, capacious chest. The student, the merchant, the sedentary, the young of both sexes—ay, all—should have a swing on which to stretch themselves daily. We are certain, that if this were to be practised by the rising generation in a dress allowing a free and full development of the body, many would be saved from consumption. Independently of its beneficial results, the exercise is an exceedingly pleasant one, and, as the apparatus costs very little, there need be no difficulty about any one enjoying it who wishes to.

HORSEBACK-RIDING FOR CONSUMPTIVES.

Dr. Lewis has great faith in horseback-riding as a cure for consumptives, as will be seen in the following:

There are some impurities in the atmosphere which have been thought favorable to the lungs. The coal-smoke of cities has been so regarded. It has been likewise asserted that consumption, when actually developed, is less rapid in its progress in an atmosphere of coal-smoke. The same opinion prevails with reference to many odors and effluvia, but it may well be doubted whether a pure, odorless atmosphere is perceptible of improvement. The "balsamic odors" of certain forests have long enjoyed a reputation for healing maladies of the lungs, but I think their virtues come from the outdoor life which wandering among these groves involves. If the odor of pine forests and tar-kilns were concentrated in the air of a furnace-heated house, I fancy that life in that atmosphere would not favor the lungs. But I have no doubt that living in the pine forests of Upper Georgia has often cured consumption.

But if you will select two consumptives in similar condition, and you will take one to saunter in the elevated pine regions of the South, I will let you select the most unhealthy locality in the Northern States, and I will take my case there. Now, if you will give me plenty of flannels and a saddle-horse, I will wager you a farm that my patient will recover sooner than yours. You may take your case to the hills of San Domingo, and have him live gently and quietly, and I will take mine to the worst region of New England, and with the flannels and saddle, I will cure my patient in half the time which it will take to cure yours.

An Eastern dervish was once asked by a wealthy Mohammedan, "Of what service to society is an order of men who employ themselves in speculative notions of divinity and medicine?"

"If you were more cautious and temperate in your meals," answered the dervish; "if you would learn to govern your passions and desires by a due attention to abstinence—you all may be sages, and have no occasion for dervishes among you. Your appetite and aliment impair your understandings."

Willieh, who gives this anecdote, says, "It is in infancy and early age that the foundation is laid for indigestion and the many diseases arising from it which are found now in almost every family."

FLORAL DEPARTMENT.

OCTOBER is the month, above all others, for taking time by the forelock. So much can be done this month that is not infrequently delayed until spring, that the labor of spring-gardening will be very much decreased—in fact, reduced to little more than play. New walks and drives can be laid out and made, and old ones repaired, new flower-beds can be made or the old ones put in order, ready for the spring planting, or set out immediately with perennials, designed to bloom the next year. New lawns can be made, and the barren spots in old ones sown with grass-seed.

The Tuberoses and Gladioluses, and all summer bulbs must be taken up before the frost has time to injure them, dried, and stowed away in a room where they will neither freeze, be injured by damp or by mice.

Hyacinths, Tulips, Narcissuses, Crocuses, and the rest of the hardy spring-blooming bulbs, should be set out this month as early as possible, to give their roots time to strike and get a vigorous growth before the ground freezes.

Such bedding-plants as have not been taken up during September should now be transferred to the house, and it is not yet too late to make cuttings of seedling-plants. October is the month in which the floriculturist should prepare for her winter garden, and make sure that she has a supply of vigorous plants which will give continuous bloom during the coming months. She should not forget, while disposing of her bulbs, to provide herself with a few pots and vases of Hyacinths, etc., for house-blooming, etc. Several bulbs can be planted in a single pot. Or a bulb placed in a hyacinth-glass, the glass filled with water almost to the bulb, kept in the dark a few weeks until the roots have well started, and then brought to the light, will give great pleasure and satisfaction by bountiful bloom in midwinter.

Cannas should be taken up before the foliage is killed by frost, and laid in a shed to dry for two weeks, and then stored in a cool, dry cellar.

The gardener should not relax her efforts in her garden at this season of the year. It is too frequently the case that on the approach of winter the garden is neglected, and becomes unsightly with fallen leaves, dead annuals, and rubbish of all sorts. If properly attended, it should be a source of pleasure until the fall of snow. The fall-blooming flowers are among the most brilliant of the whole season. Zinnias and Petunias hold their own until frost, and Marigolds do not come into full bloom until quite late in the season. Dahlias will make a magnificent show if properly attended to, and Chrysanthemums retain their bloom until near Christmas.

The walks and drives should be carefully raked and cleared from falling leaves. The flower-beds should be cleared of the dead and dying stalks of the summer bloomers, the flower stalks of the perennials that have gone out of blossom should be cut down, the empty beds made over neatly for the next year, the transplanting attended to, the dahlias and chrysanthemums properly staked, and the garden will prove a source of pride and satisfaction up to the very coming of winter.

It is especially necessary to transplant early blooming perennials, such as peonies, in the fall, as they never do so well when transplanted in the spring.

If it is intended to have an extensive winter garden, now is the time for sowing seeds of annuals for winter flowering. They should be sowed in pans of rich soil, and pricked out into pots or boxes as soon as they are large enough to handle.

A petunia cut back to the root and transplanted into a pot, will send out new shoots and bloom all winter. A few chrysanthemums potted after the buds are well formed, will add to the beauty of the parlor garden.

Every parlor should have its ivy vine. It is, without question, the most beautiful of floral decorations. A writer, in praise of it, says: "A single root has been known to wreath a bow-window with thick garlands, and then strike off into lovely independent paths along picture-cords and above cornices, till the room seemed all a-bud like Aaron's rod. It will cover a screen of wire, curtain a curtainless window, festoon a pillar, frame a favorite picture, (and what more graceful or delicate frame could be desired?) arch a door, climb and twist about a window-sill, and swing in long-looped tendrils from a bracket. There is no end to its beautiful uses. Tickle it with a little guano, and how it frolics. Nip off the terminal shoots, and lo, too, bright, persistent tendrils shoot forth, and curl and twine about your very fingers. Wash its dusty leaves, and no child could look more gratefully in your face. It harbors no vermin, encourages no blight, but steadily and sweetly keeps its daily course."

The author of "Window Gardening," a useful book published by Henry T. Williams of New York, says of the Ivy: "The Ivy requires rich soil in which to grow, and must have strong food. You must therefore select for it the best soil which your garden can afford; add to it one-half each of well-decayed manure and leaf mould rubbed together; then set the pan of compost in the oven and bake it, if you wish to kill all larvae of worms and white ants. Plant the roots in large, well-drained pots, with an inch or two of bits of charcoal at the bottom, and as the roots increase, transfer them to larger sized pots or buckets. The Ivy will grow in wood vessels as well as pottery, and pails or buckets painted green can be made to do duty for the pots.

"The Ivy seems to be the least sensitive to changes of light of any plant we have; neither does it require much heat, thus-being exceedingly well adapted to situations in halls or balconies, or rooms not very well heated. Like all plants, however, it must have a uniform temperature, and though it will bear a little chilling without much injury, yet it should be kept where there is some degree of warmth. It delights in considerable moisture, and if neglected or permitted to dry up, its luxuriance soon suffers.

"Ivies for the house should be brought in before November, or even before it is time to build the fire. Place first in a cool room, and then bring gradually into the warmer room.

"Vines can be grown by immersing the stems in small vials of water, and fastening them to the backs of picture frames they are desired to ornament. With a number of vials quite a luxuriant growth can be imitated, but care must be had to keep the vials filled with water. At intervals two or three bits of charcoal may be added to sweeten and purify."

THE OBSERVER.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

THE recent exposures and investigations in the case of a lunatic asylum in Vermont should arouse the people in all sections of the country to inquire into the condition and management of the asylums in their own localities. In the case of the asylum to which we refer, there was so little known about it that it was supposed to belong to and to be under the control of the State, when investigation proved that it was an institution owned by a private corporation, and entirely independent of State authority. The most gross outrages were constantly perpetrated upon the unfortunate patients within its walls, and not unfrequently it became a prison-house for persons of sane mind, whom their relatives desired, for certain reasons, to put out of the way. In brief the horrors described by Charles Reade, in his novel, "Very Hard Cash," were here realized in degree, if not in kind. And the State of Vermont has been going quietly on for years, taking for granted that all was going on right within the walls of the institution, while the Legislature has yearly voted money for its support.

Private insane asylums are always dangerous affairs; there is so much opportunity for and temptation to abuse. Even in State institutions the utmost care and watchfulness are required by those who have supervision over them, to see that there is no foul play; for, to accuse a perfectly sane man of insanity, and to condemn him to incarceration in an asylum, is often sufficient to make him appear insane for the time being.

It seems as though even the best of asylums had hardly yet hit upon the right plan for the treatment of the insane. They are huddled together in wards, under circumstances and with surroundings that must tend to increase rather than diminish their morbid and unhealthy state of mind. We believe that in some asylums wise physicians do their best to ameliorate the condition of their patients, and to study the cause and cure of their maladies. But there is no doubt that in other asylums the utmost indifference, not to say criminality, prevails. Every now and then the world is shocked by the story of some person who has managed to escape from a living tomb, after long years of imprisonment, instigated by the hate or cupidity of relatives.

The story of this Vermont asylum had its counterpart not long since in one in Illinois, where the tale of horrors was as dreadful and the abuse as flagrant. We do not know what course was pursued in the latter case, but we trust to humanity that things were not left to pursue their old courses.

The insane are an unfortunate class, which are entitled to our deepest commiseration, and no effort should be spared to return them to mental health, or, if that be impossible, to render their condition as comfortable as possible. Beatings, cold shower-baths, imprisonments, hard fare and general hard usage are not the means likely to result in either, yet these are the agencies employed in more than one insane asylum in our country, as developments have shown. Let the public see to it that such a course is continued no longer.

THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

THE Shah of Persia, the "King of Kings," and we know not what else besides, has visited Europe and gone back to the Orient. He has been processioned, and feted, and toadied to generally, by high and low, in a way that we thought Americans only were capable of. Kings and queens have delighted to do him honor, and the common people have stared at him with open-mouthed wonder.

Now that only the cold meats remain of the feasts, and the wax-tapers have burned low, and the distinguished stranger has taken his departure, with his numerous retinue, and is fairly out of hearing, we begin to find what manner of man he is. It seems strange, knowing so well from the tales of travellers what his nation is like, that there could have been any doubt or ignorance about the matter. We are told that he is gross in appearance and boorish in manners; in brief, the representative ruler of a barbarous nation, which arrogates to itself all the wisdom and refinement and religion of the world, and looks with contempt and hatred upon all outsiders.

Still, we hope that the Shah's Western tour may not be unproductive of good results to himself, and through him to his people. Having seen Western civilization in its full tide, he may be emulous of introducing some of its material advantages at least into his own country, and from them may spring a spirit of toleration which is now nowhere found in Mohammedan countries. The railroad which is to connect El Medina with Mecca will do much toward breaking down the barriers of Orientalism, and it may yet be found, not only in Persia, but in every portion of the world, that the iron track will become the literal representative of the bonds of fraternity.

THE TENEMENT-HOUSES OF NEW YORK.

NEW YORK is making an examination into the number and condition of her tenement-houses. An official statement declares there are 43,460 of these houses within the city limits. The official report does not give the number of people who are crowded within them; but, no doubt, their actual number is almost incredible. The tenement-house of New York has scarcely a parallel in Philadelphia, as miserable and vile as some of the latter city really are; and if this official investigation is followed by official action, the moral and physical health of that city will be greatly increased.

ITALIAN SLAVE-CHILDREN IN AMERICA.

THE public mind is becoming thoroughly aroused to this cruel iniquity in our midst. The investigations recently conducted in New York by officers of the law reveal a condition of things painful to contemplate. The cruelties practised upon the friendless little ones is of the most outrageous and brutal character.

An article in a recent number of the New York Herald gives a full account of this infamous traffic in these Italian children, which is carried on to an extent heretofore unknown to the public. Besides those taken to England and France, it is estimated that over seven thousand of these little slaves are in the United States. For a long time France was the only market-place for the little harpists and violinists; but the trade was limited; the road across the Alps was interrupted at every step by barriers, passports and policemen. The market of America was not yet open, and, between sorrowing mothers and the outstretched arms of their little sons, the ocean did not pass. To-day, however, as the official documents show, the industry is carried on by an extended association on a vast scale, upon almost a boundless territory reaching from the Province of Basilicata, in the old Kingdom of Naples, to the shores of California. The traffic counts by hundreds its accomplices, and by thousands its victims. It has branches, agents, directors; placers in all ports, countries in all the points of the world's emigration.

The headquarters of the traffickers in this country are, says the Herald, in the dirtiest streets of New York City—Crosby, Mulberry, Baxter and Elizabeth Streets—and the chief leaders, or capi-padroni, are Giuseppe Argenti, Felice Padulla, Luigi Lapettino, Sansone Noccozo, Vincenzo Lauletta. These men are members of large companies, banded together for profits and tyranny, and having ramifications from Italy into all the chief cities of the two Continents. They play the part of mandarins over the unhappy children in their possession. They live in a state of indolence, being too lazy to do any work, except count, late at night, the money that the children are compelled, under the severest penalties, to bring in, look after the affairs of the agencies with which they are connected, and skillfully avoid attracting the attention of the police.

They do not trouble themselves with preparing food for the children when reaching home at night; the latter have to pick up crumbs and scrape wherever they can. As regards sleeping accommodations, it is an invariable practice for the men and women, boys and girls, to sleep all together, pell-mell, in the narrowest of rooms, or rather nurseries of immorality and crime. The amount exacted from each little wandering musician averages seventy-five cents per diem. Failure to hand in the expected sums entails a "licking." The hands of the infants are tied together, and then they are unmercifully beaten with anything or weapon that happens to be handy; sometimes they are tied up with their heads hanging down and then whipped; sometimes the soles of their feet are rapped; sometimes they are stripped, placed in a kneeling attitude and bitten in various parts of their flesh; sometimes they are pinched with forceps. These and various other kinds of torture have become known through official investigations made in this country and in London and Paris, the other two chief slave markets for little Italians.

Girls make more money than boys and more is required of them, for it is calculated that they inspire a greater sympathy. At present they are sent out by couples, wearing new dresses and straw hats, and they cut rather a queer sight in their new Quaker-like attire as they stand at the doors of lager beer saloons playing the "Wacht am Rhein." This little tribute to Von Moltke never fails to bring down the house. There are at least five hundred ambulating organ grinders in the American cities from the villages of Boronassae, province of Chiavari, and Fontana Buona, province of Genoa. Many of these carry about with them monkeys dressed up in red clothes and taught to dance and beg, as well as old women, who ply the tamborine while asking for a few cents and proclaiming: "We are poor Italians!"

Medical statistics show that out of one hundred children of both sexes who quit their native villages, only twenty return home; about thirty settle in various parts of the world, and fifty succumb to sickness, to privations of all sorts and cruel treatment. The mortality then in the ranks of these little emigrants is fifty per cent.

The Italian ambulating musicians are divided into three classes. The first, which may be called relatively respectable, consists in the traditional travelling companies, properly styled Viggianesi. They are grown-up men, noted fiddlers from the village of Viggiano, in the Neapolitan province of Basilicata. They are a species of wandering Jews, accustomed from time immemorial to penetrate into the remotest regions, and who, if only as instructed in letters as in music, could write narrations of voyages as interesting as those of Dr. Livingstone or M. Paul du Chaillu. The second category is that of the organ grinders. They are chiefly from Lombardy and Genoa, and their name has come to be the synonym of vagabonds. When trade is bad these organists sometimes have recourse to secret tricks in order to augment their daily gains. One of these resources is to cause their organs to play out of tune—stunare—to extort money from the hearer, who could not be so easily moved by pure philharmonics. The throwing of a few coppers soon proves that the hearer has at least some music in his soul. In London, at one time, this trick was so much practised that a regulation was made expressly for fining those who indulged in it. After these two classes comes the third which is simply the infamous traffic in innocent little children, torn from their mothers and their native country, condemned to exile and slavery, to sing gay songs and cut high capers in places where they have greater probabilities of success—in low taverns and in houses of ill fame throughout all capital cities.

And now that the American public are in possession of all the facts touching this wicked thing, it should be at once uprooted from our midst. The hand of the law should be laid upon the shameless institution without delay, and the cruel slave-masters receive the punishment they deserve.

A PAGE OF VARIETIES.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

A MAN who had a scolding wife, being asked what he did for a living, replied that he "kept a hot-house."

SAID a man who tumbled out of a third-story window: "When I first fell I was confused; but when I struck the pavement I knew where I was."

A CALIFORNIA gentleman thought himself justified in sending his cook to a lunatic asylum because she persisted in boiling cucumbers for his breakfast.

A WEALTHY bishop congratulated a poor priest on the good air which he breathed in his parish: to which the latter replied: "Yes, my lord, the air would be good enough, if I could live upon it."

AFTER asking your name in the State of Arkansas, the natives are in the habit of further inquiring, in a confidential tone: "Well, now, what was your name afore yer moved to these parts?"

My first I hope you are;

My second I see you are;

My whole I know you are.

Well-coine.

We travel much, yet prisoners are,
And close confined to boot;
We with the swiftest horse keep pace,
Yet always go on foot.

A pair of Spurs.

AN editor in a neighboring city has been reading one of Dr. Hall's "Health Tracts," in which the doctor proves conclusively that married men live longer than bachelors. This journalist says he don't know it is, for he has been married three times, and yet he knows a bald-headed bachelor who is twice as old as he is.

IN the time of George III. there were messengers about the Court called runners, and one of these was anxious to secure his master's good opinion. Amongst that master's virtues was his devout behavior at Divine worship and the habit of attending morning prayers in his private chapel. On one occasion the runner was present, and made a great effort to attract the king's notice by the very loud tone in which he repeated the responses. When the service was over he could not find his hat. The king saw him bustling about hunting after something, and asked: "What is the matter?" "Please your Majesty," he replied, "I have lost my hat." "Lost your hat, lost your hat, have you? You prayed well, but you did not watch, you did not watch!"

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS.

PHOSPHORESCENCE.—Many bodies shine in the dark, i. e. glow with a peculiar light; this is phosphorescence, well known in the case of common lucifer match-balls. If two lumps of white sugar be rubbed together, they will show this phenomenon. A piece of flint-spur, obtained for a few pence at any mineralogist's, if heated on a shovel and removed to a dark room, will be observed to glow most beautifully.

ELECTRICAL EXPERIMENT.—Cut a piece of zinc to the size of a shilling and place it under the tongue; above the tongue place a shilling; if the two be allowed to touch by their edges at the tip of the tongue, a peculiar tingling sensation will be felt, due to the development of electricity. This will cause some amusement when a few friends are together because the metals are invariably spat out with some consternation. The experiment is quite harmless.

A BLIND SPOT ON THE EYE.—Every one has a blind spot on his eye. It may be proved thus: Take a sheet of note-paper, and about three inches apart make two black spots, each about the size of a pea. Shut one eye; hold the paper at arm's length, and look fixedly at the left hand spot; though looking at one only, both will be seen. If now the paper be brought gently and gradually toward the eye, still looking at the one spot, the right hand one will suddenly disappear when the paper is about a foot distant from the eye, and will appear again as the paper approaches more closely.

MAGICAL LANDSCAPE.—Draw and shade with Indian ink a landscape copied from the many that may be found in the various illustrated papers. Take a solution of chlorite of cobalt, and point out the foliage of the trees and grass, carefully adding a little extra here and there to compensate the shade. With a solution of acetate of cobalt touch a few flowers, and with another solution of chloride of copper a few others. This picture will now appear like some drear winter scene; but on holding to the fire, when thoroughly warmed, it will glow with all the life and colors of summer. The colors fade again when the paper is cold, but can be revived by warming.

VOL. XII.—50.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

FINISH the work in hand before beginning anything else.

BE guarded in conversation, attentive, and slow to speak.

It is easy to wish for Heaven, but difficult to get a heavenly mind.

BE not forward to assign reason to those who have no right to ask.

A QUIET mind, like other blessings, is more easily lost than gained.

BE strictly temperate. You cannot use intoxicating drinks and keep free of danger.

A MAN too busy to take care of his health, is like a mechanic too busy to take care of his tools.

BE punctual and methodical in business, and never put off until to-morrow what should be done to-day.

A MAN who gives his children a habit of industry, provides for them better than by giving them a stock of money.

If any one speak ill of thee, consider whether he hath truth on his side; and if so, reform thyself, that his censures may not affect thee.

NEVER retire at night without being wiser than when you rose in the morning, by having learned something useful during the day.

NEVER let a day pass without having made an effort to make some one happier; every such effort, whether successful or not, will increase your own happiness.

The truly beneficent man is the happiest man. He derives a purer and deeper joy from the luxury of giving to make others happy, than he does in receiving from others.

The bad man, diffusing the hue of his own spirit over the world, sees it full of treachery, selfishness and deceit. The good man is continually looking for and sees noble qualities.

TIME may bear on us like a rough trotting-horse; and our journey may have its dark nights, quagmires and its jack o' lanterns—but there will come a ruddy morning at last, a smoother road, and an easier gait.

OTHER feelings grow cold—other memories pass away; but the gentle image of the mother who has watched our childhood—her love, her tenderness, her unvaried devotion, will forever be mirrored in the human heart.

FINE sense and exalted sense are not half so valuable as common sense. There are so many of wit for one man of sense; and he that will carry nothing about him but gold will be every day at a loss for want of readier change.

BY seeming to countenance vice in others, we insensibly countenance it in ourselves, for there is a subtle and almost mysterious sophistry which she employs as her chief agent in pacifying the mutinies of conscience and seducing reason from her vigilance.

INDUSTRY is not only the instrument of improvement, but the foundation of pleasure. He who is a stranger to it may possess, but cannot enjoy; for it is labor only which gives relish to pleasure. It is the appointed vehicle of every good to man. It is the indispensable condition of possessing a sound mind in a sound body.

CONUNDRUMS.

What wine is both food and drink? Port wine with a crust!

When is a carpenter like a circumstance? When he alters cases!

What sort of a day would be a good one to run for a cup? A muggy one!

When does a farmer double up a sheep without hurting it? When he folds it.

Why are circus-horses such slow goers? Because they are taught-orces (ortoles)!

Tell us why it is vulgar to send a telegram? Because it is making use of flash language!

Why ought a greedy man to wear a plaid waistcoat? To keep a check on his stomach!

What extraordinary kind of meat is to be bought in the Isle of Wight? Mutton from Cowes!

How many young ladies does it take to reach from New York to Philadelphia? About one hundred; because a Miss is as good as a mile!

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

HUNTING THE WILD ELEPHANT IN AFRICA.

(See Frontispiece.)

THE gathering and sale of ivory is a regular business among the natives of Africa. To obtain these vast quantities of ivory, for which there is such a constant demand, it is necessary to hunt the elephant whose tusks furnish this ivory.

Various means are employed by the natives to capture and kill the elephants. The Fans, one of the tribes of Central Africa, have a peculiar method of entrapping them. Du Chailu thus describes this method: "The elephant, like most other great beasts, has no regular walk or path, but strays somewhat at random through the woods in search of food; but it is his habit, when pleased with a neighborhood, to remain there for a considerable time, nor let any small matter drive him away. Now of this the Fan takes advantage. The forests here are full of rough, strong, climbing plants, which you will see running up to the tops of the tallest trees. These they twist together, and with them ingeniously, but with much labor, construct a kind of huge fence or obstruction, not sufficient to hold the elephant, but quite strong enough to check him in his flight and entangle him in the meshes till the hunters can have time to kill him. Once caught, they quietly surround the huge beast and put an end to his struggles by incessant discharges of their spears and guns."

Sometimes a large pit is dug in the ground and concealed by boughs of trees, and into this the unwary elephant falls, and becomes an easy prey. This mode of capturing elephants is practised by the Apingi, another tribe of Central Africa.

Sometimes large bodies of men, numbering as many as five hundred, go out together on elephant hunts. On other occasions two or three hunters alone engage in the sport. When the latter is the case, the utmost caution is necessary if they would not get the worst of the encounter.

In the picture which we give this month two hunters have evidently fired at what they supposed to be a solitary elephant. The wounded and infuriated beast comes staggering toward them, lashing the air with his huge trunk, while a second elephant plunges at them from a thicket where he had been concealed, and the only chance left for them is to fly for their lives.

Elephant hunting is attended by many dangers which, to the genuine hunter, are, perhaps, among its greatest charms. If the huge beast is only wounded at the first encounter, his fury is something frightful to see, and occasionally difficult to escape.

THE FRUIT OF EXTRAVAGANT LIVING.

A WEALTHY merchant of New York is quoted as saying: "Sitting here at my desk I can feel the business pulse of the entire country. Our customers are in every State of the Union and in all but two of the Territories. Times are now dull and hard, and depression exists everywhere. Collections are slow, because the people are unable to pay their debts.

"This state of things has been brought about by our extravagant habits as a people, and their sole and only remedy is in economy. It is one of the hardest things in the world for people to learn, this matter of economy, when once they have acquired expensive habits. But there is no other way out of the present depression in business. Nearly everything we consume is too high, considering the amount of money in circulation and the retrenching and debt-paying policy of the Government. More money, an expansion of the currency, would afford us but the most fitful and temporary relief.

"We have got to get down to bed-rock economy some time, and the sooner we look in the right direction for the good or the evil of hard times, and put our own houses in order, the better. Suppose the Western farmers were to practice the same economy which ruled their actions during the years of 1858, 1859 and 1860, there is hardly a county in your great productive West in which good times would not prevail in less than six months. There is, in fact, no class of people in the nation which is not spending too much money; and until we have retrenchment and economy among the people we cannot ultimately hope for any better times."

The truth of this every man of common sense and common observation sees and deplures; yet few have the courage and self denial to "put their houses in order," and prepare for the coming-down time that is surely approaching. It is better to step down than to fall down; to leave a house that is crumbling rather than remain until involved in its ruin; to take the lessons of prudence instead of the lessons of disaster.

With the exception of a few men of very large fortunes, what are known as our well-to-do people, are, in nine out of ten cases, living in great extravagance—that is, spending far more in houses, furniture, equipage, travel, etc., than their incomes warrant, and so steadily exhausting their resources and crippling their business. What is true of these, is true of people below them as to income. The lawyer of moderate practice, the merchant of limited means, the small store-keeper, the clerk, the teacher, the artisan—all are living in comparative extravagance, and nearly all spending everything they make—too many more than they make—and so on the strain and rack all the while, and all the while in danger of disaster.

It is impossible for such a state of things to remain permanent. The time is not far distant when the fruit of all this must come; and the fruit will be very bitter. What we want, as a people, is individual independence, honesty and courage—the independence to choose our own style of living, and the honesty and courage to maintain that style. We must not consult our neighbor's style of furnishing when we set up housekeeping, but our purse and income. Anything but this will prove a fatal mistake.

"The prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself; but the simple pass on and are punished."

OUR GRAND MOUNTAIN RANGES.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN, of the Geological Survey, writing from among the Rocky Mountains, says that the expedition is among the waters that flow on to the Grand River, which in turn flow on to the Colorado.

He says: "We are in the grandest mountain scenery in the world, and are close to the two highest peaks in the United States. We have named them the 'Capitol' and 'White House.' We have named the great range in the Upper Arkansas the 'National Range,' as it is the longest in the United States. We are eleven thousand feet above the sea, and fifty peaks can be seen one thousand four hundred feet high."

The range of the "Three Tetons" has been carefully mapped. Immense masses of snow and cakes of ice were found on its sides, and abundant signs of modern glacial action. At certain seasons of the year, usually in August and September, the air is filled to a great height with grasshoppers flying in every direction. They sometimes rose to the height of several thousand feet, and as they passed over this Teton range they became chilled and dropped on the snow and ice in vast numbers and gradually melted the snow so that myriads of little holes which they formed gave to the surface a peculiar roughness. It was due to this fact that Messrs. Stevenson and Langford were able to cling to the almost vertical icy sides of the peak and complete the ascent.

The elevation was found to be thirteen thousand eight hundred and fifty feet above the sea, thus entitling it to rank among the monarch peaks of the continent; yet on the summit of this peak there were indications that human beings had made the ascent at some period in the past. On the top of the Grand Teton, and for three hundred feet below, are great quantities of granite blocks or slabs of different sizes. These blocks had been placed on and formed a breastwork about three feet high, inclosing a circular space six or seven feet in diameter, and while on the surrounding rocks there was not a particle of dust or sand, yet the bottom of this inclosure was covered with a bed of minute particles of granite not larger than ordinary grains of sand, which must have been worn off by the elements from the vertical blocks until it is nearly a foot in depth. There was every appearance that these granite slabs had been placed in their present position by the Indians, as a protection from the winds, many centuries since.

LIQUOR-SELLING IN THE PARK.

WE referred last month to the fact that our Park Commissioners, men of the highest standing in this community, permit the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday within the limits of the Park, in violation of law. We did not then know that the Act of the Legislature, passed April 14, 1866, appropriating ground for the purposes of this Park, contained a clause prohibiting the sale of liquors within its bounds at any time—weekday or Sunday.

It is clause XVII. of the Rules and Regulations established by the Legislature for the government of the Park, and reads as follows:

"That no intoxicating liquors shall be allowed to be sold within the Park."

In section 22 of the Act it reads:

"It shall be the duty of the police appointed to duty in the Park, without warrant, forthwith to arrest any offender against the preceding rules and regulations, whom they may detect in the commission of such offence, and to take the person or persons so arrested forthwith before a magistrate having competent jurisdiction."

Now, the police appointed to duty in the Park may be seen at almost any time at Belmont, weekday or Sunday, with liquor-selling and liquor-drinking going on before their faces; and yet there are no arrests. What does it mean? Are Park Commissioners and Park police above and independent of the law?

It is a sad thing for morality and good order, when men like our Park Commissioners take the side of liquor-selling and disregard of the law!

PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF FASHION.

THE Hens Magazine contains every month a report of the newest styles in dress from the house of E. Butterick & Co., 655 Broadway, New York. These reports, with the illustrations and descriptions, give the best practical suggestions and instructions to be found in any other magazine of our class.

From the clearly-written explanations which accompany all patterns given, the fullest comprehension may be derived as to every detail of a garment, including the cutting and fitting, economical making up, and amount of material that goes to its fabrication.

The "Butterick" system, in its essential nature, is free from the objections urged against the old-time fashion-plates. Adopting as its standard an average human creature—man, woman or child, as might be exacted—it enlarged, diminished and adapted its patterns upon a principle so sound, and with the aid of machinery so ingenious, that perfection in its kind was inevitable. Each garment was reproduced in patterns with such endless variations as to insure a fit to every form presented. With each pattern is a working description, so minute that the veriest apprentice of a country dressmaker could not fail to understand it, and bring properly together the several parts thus carefully shaped to her hands. In brief, no suggestion taught by experience and realizable by ingenuity and skill, was omitted in making these patterns at once practical, simple and in fallible; and hence the wonderful success of the system which is now familiar to every household in the country, and has its agencies in almost every village, town and city.

Our monthly reports are always full and varied.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. B.—Don't forget to give your baby a sip of cool water now and then. Infants often suffer great distress when sick on account of thirst, which they have no way of making known except by crying or moaning. You will often be delighted to see how quickly their trouble will cease on giving them water.

T. R. D.—The mistaken ideas of nurses and physicians in regard to the food of patients often seriously retard convalescence. Nature is the best guide to what shall or shall not be eaten by sick people. What the appetite craves will, in most cases, be found the right thing. An eminent professor gives this sensible advice to young doctors: "Whatever sick people have a true desire for they ought to be indulged in. When your little patients have been sick a long time and have become emaciated (it may be for want of proper food), have them carried to the table, and allow them to indicate by signs, if they have no words, what their systems require to build them up again." This is common sense and common humanity as well.

B.—Drawing on wood for the use of engravers must be learned as a special art. Any good wood engraver will tell you how it is done.

MARY.—We cannot undertake to criticize the articles we decline. Often we do not read beyond the first sentence or the first page. As soon as from the style, the subject or its manner of treatment, we find that an article will not suit us, we lay it aside, having no time to throw away. If you want critical estimates of your literary ability do not go to an editor.

SADIE.—You are right in your guess.

ADVERTISERS' DEPARTMENT.

THE STYLISH FALL OVERCOATS manufactured by Wanamaker & Brown this season have merited the approval of the most critical votaries of fashion, while the durability of these useful garments is of a character that warrants unprecedented satisfaction. Messrs. Wanamaker & Brown now have the Largest Clothing Establishment in America. They are noted from the Atlantic to the Pacific as the most popular and enterprising firm in the ready made clothing business. The magnitude of their stock of gentlemen's, youths and boys clothing for Fall and Winter will exceed by far that of any establishment in this country.

A GRAND VICTORY OVER EVERY COMPETITOR IN THE WORLD.

The following Cable Dispatch from Vienna will convey the glad intelligence to the world that the "World-Renowned Wilson Sewing Machine," has not only taken all of the highest Awards at Fairs and Expositions in the United States, but that it has overwhelmingly defeated every Sewing Machine manufactured in the World, and carried off the first Grand Prize at the Vienna Exposition:

VIENNA, Austria, Aug. 15, 1873.

To W. G. Wilson, President Wilson Sewing Machine Company, Cleveland, Ohio:

"The Wilson Shuttle Sewing Machine was awarded the Grand Prize at the Vienna Exposition for being the best Sewing Machine."

RAYMON.

THE FOLLOWING CABLE TELEGRAM is just received:

World's Exhibition, Vienna, Aug. 19, 1873.

To Peterson & Carpenter, General Agents for Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Co., Philadelphia:

"Awarded grand medal on progress. Grand medal of merit, and the only Sewing-Machine Company recommended by the International Jury for the Grand Diploma of Honor."

GROVE'S COMBINATION TRAYS AND LEAF

are not simply a beautiful cabinet addition to a sewing-machine, but a very substantial, and, to the last degree, useful addition to the machine. The operator can have all the trays open at once, while running the machine, with her needle and cotton, scissors, thimble, etc., right before her eyes all the time while she is at work, and of the various extension leaves this one is the most solid and substantial.

The price of this latest and best of all the wood work improvements is no more than is charged for the commonest and meanest.

Sent, C. O. D., to any address. Suitable terms to sewing-machine agents. See advertisement.

PUBLISHERS' DEPARTMENT.

To our Friends, New and Old.

We have already suggested to our friends and club-getters to move early in securing names for 1874. The earlier this is done the easier it will be found.

For next year we shall have a still richer and more attractive Magazine to offer our readers. In the January number Mr. Arthur will begin his new serial story of American life, entitled

"WINDOW CURTAINS."

"PRAISEMY POTTS" will continue her popular and unrivalled articles on home and domestic life, and Miss VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND is engaged for a new series of papers similar to those which have been so highly appreciated this year. Other literary attractions, not yet ready for announcement, are in preparation, one of them a series of articles on the daily life, duties, character, studies, etc., of young American girls, written by one of our most sensible and spicy correspondents. This series will be rich and good.

The Magazine is to be more distinctly classified, and a larger space given to household matters. Its value, as well as its interest for all readers, will be in every way greatly increased. In fact, the HOME is to be made the GREATEST HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE OF AMERICA—a periodical which no intelligent and well-ordered family can afford to be without.

The Lady's Friend.

[ITS UNION WITH THE "HOME MAGAZINE."

As announced to the subscribers of "THE LADY'S FRIEND," the subscription list of that periodical has been purchased by us; and the HOME MAGAZINE will be sent to them for the unexpired time for which they have paid. All the unfinished stories will be continued and completed in a Supplement, which will be stitched in the edition of our Magazine sent to "THE LADY'S FRIEND" subscribers. In order that no confusion may occur, we print in large letters on the front cover of the Magazines sent to these subscribers, "LADY'S FRIEND EDITION." This edition contains the Supplement above referred to.

To our new friends we can only say, that we trust the few months' acquaintance we shall now make will prove so pleasant that it will be only the beginning of an intercourse that shall run through many years.

Special Inducements for New Subscribers to Give their Names at Once.

New subscribers who pay their subscriptions for 1874 in September, October, or November, can, if they desire it, begin to receive the MAGAZINE at once, by adding to their subscription ten cents for each of the numbers of this year they may wish to order. Thus, for forty cents additional, the MAGAZINE will be sent from September; for thirty cents from October, and for twenty cents from November.

Under this arrangement new subscribers can begin at once to receive the MAGAZINE, the numbers for this year costing only half price.

Our New Premium Picture.

Our new steel engraving will be ready for subscribers some time in September. It is larger and more valuable than any we have yet given. The title of the picture is

"PEACE BE UNTO THIS HOUSE."

It represents the Saviour entering a house, and with his hand giving it his divine benediction. For grace and beauty and tenderness, this picture has few equals. In our selection from a large range of subjects, we found nothing but pleased half so well.

In size, our picture is equal to the fine English original which sells for $14; and our artist, Mr. J. R. Rice, has given us so close a copy, that few but experts will be able to tell the difference.

To Advertisers.

We call the attention of advertisers to the large increase in our circulation consequent on our purchase of "THE LADY'S FRIEND" subscription list, which makes the HOME MAGAZINE still more valuable as an advertising medium.

Without a Rival.

As a Household Magazine, the HOME now stands without a rival. From all quarters comes this testimony. Never, from the date of its publication, popular as it has always been, has it found so warm and hearty a reception from the people everywhere, as since we took our "new departure" in January last. It comes, they say, nearer to the common household want in intelligent American homes than any other periodical ever attempted. This is just what we are aiming to make the HOME MAGAZINE, and it is gratifying to know that we are successful.

Important to Agents in New England.

No reliable agent, no matter what engaged in, should fail to know the chance now offered for immediate and permanent employment in New England, where we have taken a "new departure" in earnest.

SECTION OF VOLCANO.

VOLCANOES.

BY E. CHARDON.

AMONG the most grand of the phenomena of nature are the volcanoes which are to be found in different portions of the earth, some of them being in a state of perpetual eruption, others erupting only at intervals.

All volcanic phenomena can be explained by the theory of fractures in the solid crust of the globe, resulting from its cooling. The various phenomena which existing volcanoes present to us are, as Humboldt has said, "the result of every action exercised by the interior of a planet on its external crust."

We designate as volcanoes all conduits which establish a permanent communication between the interior of the earth and its surface—a conduit which gives passage at intervals to eruptions of lava. In the illustration, at the head of this article, there is represented, in an ideal section, the geological mode of action of volcanic eruptions.

An interesting volume, translated from the French of Louis Figuier, and published by D. Appleton & Co., of New York, gives many facts and statistics in regard to volcanoes. The author of this book sets down the number of volcanoes on the surface of the globe, known to be in an occasional state of activity, to be about three hundred; and these he divides into two classes: the isolated, or central, and the linear, or those volcanoes which belong to a series. The first are active volcanoes, around which there may be established many secondary active mouths of eruption, always in connection with some principal crater. The second are disposed like the chimneys of furnaces, along fissures extending over considerable distances. Twenty, thirty, and even a greater number of volcanic cones may rise above one such rent in the earth's crust, the direction of which will be indicated by their linear course. The Peak of Teneriffe is an instance of a central volcano; the long, rampart-like chain of the Andes, presents, from the south of Chile to the northwest coast of America, one of the grandest instances of a continental volcanic chain. The remarkable range of volcanoes in the province of Quito belong to the latter class. Darwin relates that on the 19th of March, 1836, the attention of a sentry was called to something like a large star, which gradually increased in size till about three o'clock, when it presented a very magnificent spectacle. "By the aid of a glass, dark objects, in constant succession, were seen in the midst of a great glare of red light, to be thrown up and to fall down. The light was sufficient to cast on the water a long, bright reflection—it was the volcano of Orsono in action."

Mr. Darwin was afterward assured that Aconcagua, in Chile, four hundred and eighty miles to the north, was in action on the same night, and that the great eruption of Coseguina (two thousand seven hundred miles north of Aconcagua), accompanied by an earthquake felt over one thousand miles, also occurred within six hours of this same time. And yet Coseguina had been dormant twenty-six years and Aconcagua most rarely shows any sign of action. It is also stated by Professor Dove that in the year 1835 the ashes discharged from the Mountain of Coseguina were carried seven hundred miles, and that the roaring noise of the eruption was heard at San Salvador, a distance of one thousand miles.

In the sea the series of volcanoes show themselves in groups of islands, disposed in longitudinal series. Among these may be ranged the volcanic series of Sunda, which, according to the accounts of the matter ejected, and the violence of the eruptions, seem to be among the most remarkable on the globe; the series of the Moluccas and of the Philippines, those of Japan, of the Marianne Islands, of Chili, of the double series of volcanic summits near Quito, those of the Antilles, Guatemala and Mexico.

Among the central, or isolated volcanoes, we may class those of the Lipari Islands, which have Stromboli, in permanent activity for their centre; Etna, Vesuvius, the volcanoes of the Azores, of the Canaries, of the Cape de Verde, of the Galapagos Islands, the Sandwich Islands, the Marquesas, the Society Islands, the Friendly Islands, Bourbon and Ararat.

The mouths or craters of volcanoes are usually situated at or near the summit of a more or less isolated conical mountain. This opening is generally in the form of a funnel, descending down into the interior of the mountain. Sometimes the crater becomes enlarged, and gradually filled up by crumbling rocks from its sides, and lava, which has cooled within it. Then, in the centre of this original crater a new crater is formed. Of this character is the crater of Vesuvius, which is, strictly speaking, a crater within a crater, the smaller crater being produced in 1829.

In 1822 the crater of Vesuvius was two thousand feet deep. The crater of Kilan-ea, in the Sandwich Islands group, is an immense chasm one thousand feet deep, with an outer circle no less than from two to three miles in diameter.

The eruption of a volcano is usually announced by a subterranean noise, accompanied by shocks, quivering of the ground, and sometimes by actual earthquakes. The ceeds from a great depth, makes itself heard, sometimes over a great extent of country, and resembles a well-sustained fire of artillery, accompanied by the rattle of musketry. Sometimes it is like the heavy rolling of subterranean thunder.

Fissures are frequently produced during the eruptions, extending over a considerable radius. At Locrarno there are found fissures of volcanic origin, which present a singular appearance; the clefts radiating from a centre in all directions, not unlike the starred fracture in a cracked pane of glass. The eruption begins with a strong shock, which shakes the whole interior of the mountain; masses of heated vapor and fluid begin to ascend, revealing themselves, in some cases, by the melting of the snow upon the flanks of the cone of ejection, while simultaneously with the final shock, which overcomes the last resistance opposed by the solid crust of the ground, a considerable body of gas, and more especially of steam, escapes from the mouth of the crater. The steam is essentially the cause of the terrible mechanical effects which accompany volcanic eruptions. Granitic, porphyritic, trachytic, and sometimes even basaltic matters, have reached the surface without producing any of those violent explosions or ejections of rocks and stones which accompany modern volcanic eruptions.

During the first moments of a volcanic eruption, the accumulated masses of stones and ashes which fill the crater are shot up into the sky by the suddenly and powerfully developed elasticity of the steam. This steam, which has been disengaged by the heat of the fluid lava, assumes the form of great rounded bubbles, which are evolved into the air to a great height above the crater, where they expand as they rise, in clouds of dazzling whiteness, assuming flowed from these volcanoes is readily distinguishable from the analogous lavas which belong to the basaltic or trachytic formations. Their surface is irregular, and bristles with asperities, formed by heaped-up angular blocks. No tradition speaks of the eruption of these volcanoes, and Lyell, a noted geologist, places them in an early period in the history of the world. "Extinct quadrupeds of the upper Miocene and Pliocene eras," he says, "belonging to the genera mastodon, rhinoceros and others, were buried in ashes and beds of alluvial sand and gravel, which owe their preservation to overspreading sheets of lava."

The mud volcano is another form of the volcano. Volcanoes of this class are, for the most part, conical hills of low elevation, with a hollow or depression at the centre, from which they discharge the mud, which is forced upward by gas and steam. The temperature of the ejected matter is only slightly the appearance which Pliny, the younger, compared to a stone pine rising over Vesuvius. The masses of clouds finally condense and follow the direction of the wind. These volcanic clouds are gray or black, according to the quantity of ashes, that is, of pulverulent matter or dust, mixed with watery vapor, which they convey. In 1794, the ashes from Vesuvius were carried as far as the extremity of Calabria. In 1812, the volcanic ashes of St. Vincent, in the Antilles, were carried eastward as far as Barbadoes, spreading such obscurity over the island that, in open day, passengers could not see their way.

There are numerous extinct volcanoes. Vesuvius itself was an extinct volcano from the earliest traditional times up to the year 79 of the Christian era. In France there is a range of volcanic hills nearly twenty miles in length and two in breadth, known as the "chain of Puy." This chain, by its cellular and porous structure, which is also granular and crystalline, the felspathic or pyroxenic lava which elevated. The mud is generally of a grayish color, with the odor of petroleum.

Mud volcanoes exist in numerous localities. There are a number of active volcanoes, as well as extensive remains, in the region of the Yellowstone, in Colorado. Several are found in the neighborhood of Modena, and some in Sicily. Pallas observed them in the Crimea—in the Peninsula of Kertch and in the Isle of Tamán. Von Humboldt has described and figured a group of them in the province of Cartagena, in South America; and they have been observed in the Island of Trinidad and in Hindoostan. In 1797, an eruption of mud ejected from Tunguragua, in Quito, filled a valley one thousand feet wide to a depth of six hundred feet.

The fountains of boiling water, known under the name of geysers, are another emanation connected with ancient craters. They are either continuous or intermittent. In Iceland we find great numbers of these gushing springs—in fact, the island is one entire mass of eruptive rock. Nearly all the volcanoes are situated upon a broad band of trachyte which crosses the island from south-west to north-east. It is traversed by immense fissures, and covered with masses of lava, such as no other coun-of boiling water, eight yards in diameter, charged with silica, to the height, it has been said, of about one hundred and fifty feet, depositing vast quantities of silica as it cools after reaching the earth.

This remarkable geyser, which was long con-try presents. The volcanic action, in short, goes on with such energy that certain paroxysms of Mount Hecla have lasted for six years without interruption. But the Great Geyser, of which we give an illustration is, perhaps, even more an object of curiosity. This water volcano projects, at intervals, a column sidered as one of the wonders of the earth, is eclipsed by several which have been discovered by recent travellers in the Yellowstone region. The country is there honeycombed by geysers, hot and warm springs, which are so numerous and on such a magnificent scale as to astonish the traveller, and to almost challenge the belief of the reader. One of the highest of these Yellowstone geysers throws an immense volume of water to the height of two hundred feet, and there are several others nearly as high;

Each of these volcanoes is governed by a law peculiarly its own, and exhibits phenomena wholly different from that of its neighbor, which may be only a few feet distant; different not only in its intervals while whole acres of ground are occupied with innumerable basins of medicinal springs of various degrees of temperature.

It is in this remarkable locality that the mud volcano assumes its most varied and curious forms.

of activity, but in the character of the material ejected. Recent descriptions of these geysers have been so widely circulated in magazines and newspapers, that most of our readers are familiar with them.

OUT OF TUNE.

"IF I had leisure, quiet, repose! If I could escape from this fret and fever of life—from this daily contact with things that chafe and worry, that hurt and agitate. Ah, my friend! There is something wrong. Something out of joint in the constitution of society, when its action is so painfully felt. If I were as immovable as stone, or if my nerves were steel, I might pass through the world with unruffled feelings. But I am a bundle of sensitive fibres, which answer, like a finely-strung instrument, to every touch; giving melody to soft-falling and skilful fingers, and discord whenever a rough hand invades."

"A living soul, fearfully and wonderfully made," I answered. "A delicately-wrought instrument, created for choral harmonies."

My friend looked at me with a face that questioned as to the meaning of what I had said.

"It is not escape from society that you need," I remarked.

"What then?"

"The chording of your instrument with the grand life-chorus. Drop out of your place—go away by yourself—and you will be as a solitary hautboy, a trombone, a flute, or whatever the instrument may be to which you correspond in the living orchestral world."

"Ingenious and fanciful. But, accepting your thought as true, how can an instrument, finely strung, find its true relation and power where all is discord?"

"Impossible in the nature of things," was my reply. "But there is a grand life-chorus, into which all human instruments, if in tune, may come, each in its turn giving increase to the harmony."

"My senses are not acute enough to perceive this harmony," returned my friend. "I listen; but to my ears come shocks of discord, that send thrills of pain along the strings of my soul. For me there is no hope but in escape from this Babel of sounds. I must get away, and live closer to nature. I must talk with the babbling streams; with the birds; with insects; with sweet air, perfume-laden; with forest and sky; with all things, in fact, which are in the order of their creation, and so image the Creator. Oh, how I am longing to escape! And I will escape!"

My friend was in earnest, and so, seeking for opportunity, he made his escape, going from the city in which his life had been passed, far away into the country, that he might stand face to face with nature, and so be in harmony with her. He found leisure, quiet, repose. The stream which had, almost from its source, moved along in a free current—now hurrying past flowery banks, now flashing back the sunlight in silvery gleams as it swept over stony places or down rocky heights—composed itself to sleep in a tranquil lake.

He found it very pleasant and peaceful for a time. The rush, the hurry, the change were over. No more discord—no more strivings—no more contact with rudeness and coarseness, with all-absorbing selfishness."

"I am at one with nature," he wrote me, soon after the change. "All her peace, and order, and harmony flow into my life. She speaks to me, and I understand her language. She takes me by the hand, and leads me into green pastures and beside still waters. I never understood life before."

The smooth, tree-encircled lake impresses you with a sense of tranquillity. You look upon its calm surface, and feel its quiet influence pervading your soul. But, as you gaze down into its bosom, you begin to have an impression of something hidden and hurtful; of a place in which evil things may be at work. Though the water looks clear, it has nothing of that crystalline life so beautiful in the flowing stream. Dark masses of something you cannot make out, lie at the bottom. Around the edges, weeds grow in wild luxuriance. You begin to feel a sluggishness in the air, and to perceive stifling odors from rank vegetation. How deep and exhilarating is every breath, as you come into the open fields or ascend some mountain paths again! An hour by the still lake has sufficed. It would be death in life to dwell there.

Very pleasant for a time my friend found it in his new dwelling-place, far away from the great centres of humanity. The agitations that swept, sympathetically, from circle to circle of life, did not find him out in his calm retreat—never stirred his heart, reminding him that he was a member of the great body of the people. He was the still lake, reflecting sky and tree, and holding peace in his bosom. The still lake of the soul is affected by moral laws in strict correspondence with natural laws. As it was with the lake on the lower and material plane, so it must be on a higher and spiritual plane. There was no escape for him. Reason would have taught him this, if he could have gone so far above his sensuous self as to comprehend her clear inductions.

I did not meet him again for years after he dropped away from our social and business world, lost to us as an instrument from an orchestra, or a fine voice from a choir. There was gain on neither side, I think; but loss to both. A few letters had passed between us; then communication ceased. Our minds were not in harmony—they did not chord in the music of life.

Two or three months ago, I was in a neighboring city. The call for a public meeting attracted my attention, and I went to note the proceedings. The organization was going on as I entered the hall, and, greatly to my surprise, I saw my friend take the chair. I could not be mistaken in him, for his physique was peculiar. If I had been in doubt, his voice would have assured me. Time, and life, had been at work with him, and, through both, his true manhood was coming out. There was an air of strength about him—of self-poise—of will that knoweth no hindrance. I lost half my interest in the meeting, because of interest in my friend. How quietly, yet with a full consciousness of what the assembling involved, did he, as chairman, hold all its proceedings in the bonds of that rational order out of which so much right action comes. He gave rhythm to the whole.

When I stood face to face with him, grasping his hands, and looking into his clear, thoughtful eyes, I saw that he was a new man. That there had been deaths and births—losses and gains—the laying aside of lower things, and the putting on of what were higher and purer.

"I thought you were vegetating in your country hermitage," I said to him, "and lo! I find you in the very heart, as it were, of the world of action."

"Come home with me," he answered. "We must talk about that. I have thought of you a great many times."

I went with him and passed the night. He was in business again. The fret and fever of life were all about him. He was once more in contact with things that chafe and worry, that hurt and agitate—if we will let them.

"Tell me," I said, "of your states and experiences during the time you lived separate from the world, and alone with nature. You wrote me that you were 'at one' with her; and all her peace and harmony and order flowed into your life; that she spoke to you in a language clearly understood; that she was leading you in green pastures and beside still waters."

He dropped his eyes, and looked thoughtful.

"A mere fancy," he replied. "You know in what state of mind I broke away from society—dropped out of the orchestra, to use your own figure, and went away with my solitary instrument, to enjoy its music alone. An athlete, exhausted in the arena, finds sweet repose on a soft bed in a quiet chamber. It fills, for a time, his idea of Heaven. But, when the weary limbs have rested, and every organ and fibre is flushed with blood and animal spirits, the chamber becomes as a prison. He could not live there. He would grow sick for want of freedom and action. A similar state was mine. The peaceful retreat into which I withdrew myself, was as the bed and chamber to the strained athlete.

"There was far more of fancy than experience," he continued, "in those fine words about my intelligent intercourse with nature. I expressed what I believed possible, rather than what I had experienced. It seemed to me that I was standing at the door opening into the arena of nature, and that a hand was moving it on the inner side. My heart bounded in confident anticipations—which were not realized. The door never turned on its hinges—the mystery of nature was not revealed. I soon wearied of asking vague questions of the trees and stones—of the birds and brooks—of the earth and sky. If they answered me, I did not comprehend their language. The peace, the beauty, the order of external life, did not long transfuse themselves into my soul—nay, transfuse is not the word—did not long reflect themselves from the surface. The old disquiet came back upon me; and I awoke, gradually, to the truth that disturbing causes were within me, rather than without; that my instrument was not in tune. It was a painful awakening. After this, nature, which at first seemed flushing with intelligence, grew stupid and dumb. I knew nothing of botany, of mineralogy, of entomology; and the science wanting, there was no basis for a true interest in things below or above the earth's surface.

"A few years of dull, weary, soul-corroding life, and I came back into the world again, something wiser than when I went away to live by myself. I do not see that we have changed in anything since my first experience; and yet I find my action accordant with the general action in hundreds of cases where it was discordant before. The change is in myself; my instrument is in better tune, and chords more perfectly with other instruments in the grand chorus of life. There is, I find, a great deal around us that we speak of as discord, when the fault is in ourselves. Of one thing I am satisfied, and that is, that in the great social body, marred and diseased as it is, there is a life as harmonious and reciprocal as in the single body of a man—a life inflowing from the source of life, and order, and by virtue of that Source, in the perpetual endeavor to reform, restore and bring back humanity to its lost image and likeness of God. We see this in the effort of every community to get just laws, and have them executed for the common good; in the devotion of men to useful employment, each in his sphere; in concerted benevolent, sanitary and corrective movements, by which diseased and hurtful things may be cast out. Now, just in the degree that each individual brings himself into harmony with this higher circle of life, which is common to the whole, will he find discord and obstruction ceasing. The world will put on a new face for him. She will speak to him in a different language. He will not need to go away into the still places of nature to find rest and peace, for they will abide with him. But, if he narrow his life down to the merest selfish ends, seeking, as some disordered member of the body, to appropriate only, and not to give—to act for himself alone, and not in concert with the whole for the health and well-being of the whole—then he will be out of tune. His life will be jarred by perpetual discords, and he will vainly imagine that he is suffering from defect of harmony in society, when the defect is in himself.

"This," added my friend, "is the lesson I have learned. Taking my peculiar mental construction, there was no way for me to learn it but by the hard one of experience. I had to drop out of the orchestra and try my instrument alone. What poor music I made, sitting afar off in solitary places by myself! I thought it passing sweet at first; but its thinness and monotony soon wearied, and at last disgusted me. I longed for choral harmonies. How they ravished my ears when their chorded delights broke into them again!"

LOOKING OUT FOR MOTHER.

WAITING at the window,
Tired of book and toy,
Looking out for mother,
Stands our darling boy.

"Frankie!" But he turns not;
Does not seem to hear;
Now his lips are moving—
"Where is mamma, dear?"

Hark! a shout of gladness!
How the white hands fly!
Swifter than a bird's wings
In the azure sky.

Turning from the window—
Out through open door—
Springing down the pathway—
Crying o'er and o'er:

"Mamma! mamma! mamma!"
See the darling boy
Leaping into loving arms,
In excess of joy.

Happy little Frankie,
With his head at rest,
In the peace of innocence
On his mother's breast.

THE FIRST LOVE-LETTER.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFY.

(See Engraving.)

"ONLY a letter from Alfred," you say;
I like that word "only," because 'tis so cool!
Do you mean you get love-letters day after day?
You know 'tis your first one, you sweet little fool!

I knew 'tis your first one—don't tell me! I know
By the turn of your lip, and the beam of your eye,
By your hand all a-tremble, your cheek all aglow;
You know you would kiss it if I wasn't by.

And what does he say? 'Tis an age since you met,
And he longs for the clasp of your soft little hand;
Ah, yes, I don't doubt that he says so, and yet
It isn't two days since he stood where I stand.

He calls you his darling, his pet and his own,
And he raves of your eyes and your lips and your curls;
He swears that of women he loves you alone,
That you are his princess, his queen among girls.

He calls you his first love. Ah,
Mary, take care!
Though he says it, he scarcely will think you believe.

He says he is "faithful forever." Beware!
Maids were born to be flattered—men to deceive.

Oh, when is a love-letter coming to me?
And when will my footsteps that paradise gain
Where the air is all golden, where earth and where sea
Were made but to pleasure and comfort us twain?

Us twain!—myself and that one yet unknown,
Who keeps in the future a shadowy place,
All unseen and unnamed! Come to me, my own!
I await you! I long to look into your face!

With eyes all clear-seeing, I long for the hour
When I shall be blinded by love; and with brain
All unclouded, I shrink not from feeling the power
That can turn all my reason to folly again.

With heart beating calmly, with pulse throbbing slow,
I wait for my blood to course madly, and dance;
To feel in my forehead love's passionate glow,
Set on fire by a word, by a touch, by a glance.

Oh, when is a love-letter coming to me,
With its sweet-written pages to ravish my eyes?
The most beautiful letter a woman can see,
That lifts her and bears her from earth to the skies.

Then read on, dear girl. 'Tis your first—'tis your last!
There can never be one such another for you.
'Tis a tremulous joy, yet how soon it is past!
We know it is beautiful! Would it were true!

"IN THE BEGINNING."

THIRD PAPER.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

THE third, or Tertiary Epoch of the Creation of the World, introduces an altogether new order of things in the animal kingdom. As in the Primary epoch crustaceans and fishes were the only living things, and in the Secondary epoch reptiles predominate, so in the Tertiary epoch mammals took their place upon the earth. Fishes and reptiles still remained, though some of their orders were extinct and other new orders created.

Among the new reptiles were Salamanders as large as crocodiles. Birds, too, of song and of prey, were in plenty, though inferior in number to the mammals. During this epoch the earth was fairly crowded with life, as the immense number of remains show. The agglomerated remains of the shells of microscopic mollusca, forming in some places beds hundreds of feet thick, testify to the swarms of life which filled the seas.

The Tertiary epoch is divided into three distinct periods, called by Sir Charles Lyell the Eocene, the Miocene, and the Pliocene.

Lecoq thus describes the vegetation of the Eocene period: "The lower tertiary period," he says, "constantly reminds us of the tropical landscapes of the present epoch, in localities where water and heat together impress on vegetation a power and majesty unknown in our climates. The Algae, which have already been observed in the marine waters at the close of the Cretaceous period, represented themselves under still more varied forms in the earlier Tertiary deposits, when they have been formed in the sea. Hepaticas and mosses grew in the more humid places; many pretty ferns vegetated in cool and humid places. The fresh waters are crowded with Naiades, Chara, Potamogeton, Caulinites and Zosterites, and with Halochloria. Their leaves, floating or submerged, like those of our aquatic plants, concealed legions of molluscs, whose remains have also reached us. Great numbers of Conifers lived during this period. M. Brongniart enumerates forty-one different species, which, for the most part, remind us of living forms with which we are familiar—of pines, cypresses, thuyas, junipers, firs, yews and ephedra. Palms mingled with these groups of evergreen trees. Creeping plants, such as the Ocumeites variabilis, and the numerous species of Cupanioides, twined their slender stems round the trunks, doubtless ligneous of various Leguminaceae. The family of Betulaceae, of the order Cupulifera, show the form, then new, of Quercus, the oak. Trees predominate here, as in the preceding period, but the great numbers of aquatic plants of the period are quite in accordance with the geological facts, which show that the continents and islands were intersected by extensive lakes and inland seas, while vast marine bays and arms of the sea penetrated deeply into the land."

It is evident that in the Tertiary epoch the earth's crust was sufficiently cooled, so that the surface was no longer greatly affected by internal heat, and there was a consequent development of various latitudes. Nevertheless, most of the vegetation of the Eocene period is tropical in its character, and some of it remains to us to this day in the islands of Australasia. The mammals were also of the order that at the present time are found only in warm latitudes.

The first mammals, with the exception of the Marsupials, were the Pachyderms, to which family the elephants of the present day belong. The representatives of the family were, however, far superior in size and in number of varieties to those with which we are familiar. In the plaster quarries of Paris, Montmartre and Pantin, are to be found vast quantities of their remains. Every block taken from these quarries incloses some fragment of a bone of these huge monsters.

It was from the fossils furnished by these quarries that Cuvier made his studies, and finally succeeded in restoring several, and defining their appearance and habits.

The Palæotherium was one of the animals which Cuvier identified and described. It bore points of resemblance to the horse, the rhinoceros and the tapir. There were many species of them of different sizes. The nose terminated in a muscular fleshy trunk, or rather snout, the eyes were small, the head large, the body squat, thick and short; the legs short and stout.

The Arioplotherium was another animal which Cuvier has discovered for us. It was about the size of the ass. What would have distinguished it most must have been an enormous tail, of at least three feet in length, and very thick at its junction with the body. The tail evidently served it as a rudder and propeller when swimming in the lakes or rivers; for, Cuvier decides that in its habits it must have resembled the hippopotamus and other quadrupeds which frequent the water.

The Xiphodon seems to be a species of hornless deer. Cuvier says: "Like all active herbivorous animals, it was probably timid, and with large and very mobile ears, like those of the stag."

These animals were all herbivorous in habits. It is curious to consider that at this period there were few or no carnivorous mammals. The earth was filled with huge creatures which browsed the herbage of the plain and the succulent plants, and lived in quiet and harmony.

It was at this period that the Nummulites existed in the bosom of the seas, far from shore. The shelly agglomerates of these Protozoan Rhizopods now constitute very important rocks. In the chain of the Pyrenees the Nummulite limestone forms entire mountains of great height. It was of these rocks that the pyramids were built in Egypt. "The Nummulitic formation," says Lyell, "plays a far more conspicuous part than any other Tertiary group in the solid frame-work of the earth's crust, whether in Europe, Asia or Africa. It often attains a thickness of many thousand feet, and extends from the Alps to the Carpathians." It is also found in great quantities in Asia and Africa. "When we have rived at the same conclusion," says the same authority, "that the Nummulitic formation occupies a middle place in the Eocene series, we are struck with the comparatively modern date to which some of the greatest revolutions in the physical geography of

The vegetation of the Miocene period was still tropical in character, though indicating an approach, in some latitudes, to a cooler temperature. The primeval forests of South America furnish even at this day, no doubt, a tolerably accurate idea of the vegetation of that period. These were palms, bamboos, laurels, maples, walnut trees, beeches, elms and oaks, all growing with tropical luxuriance, and bound and woven together by magnificent vines.

Now, for the first time, are discovered carnivora among mammals. Apes, bats, dogs, and other new species make their appearance. Bats, dogs and coati inhabited Brazil and Guiana, rats ranged North America. There were genetters, marmots, squirrels and opossums. Thrushes, sparrows, storks, flamingoes and crows were added to the list of birds. Snakes, frogs and salamanders abounded in the marshes, and perch and shad appeared in the lakes and rivers.

The largest terrestrial mammal that ever lived belonged to this period. The name of Dinotherium has been given to it. Though this name signifies "terrible animal," yet its habits seem to have been peaceful enough. It is supposed to have inhabited the marshes bordering fresh-water lakes and rivers, and to have lived on roots and plants. Though much larger than the elephant, it bore a strong likeness to that animal. It probably had a proboscis similar to the elephant's. Its tusks, however, instead of proceeding out of its mouth, grew, bent downward, from the lower jaw, and though no doubt of use as weapons of defence, were especially intended as a powerful natural mattock for penetrating the soil, and tearing up the roots upon which it fed.

The mastodon was similar in size and appearance to the elephant of to-day. Its body was somewhat longer, and its limbs a little thicker. Numerous remains of mastodons have been found in North America, especially in the regions of the Ohio and Hudson rivers. Two complete skeletons have been formed from the remains of mastodons, one of which is on exhibition in the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, the other was sent to London. A single fossil tooth of a mastodon weighed about seventeen pounds.

The North American aborigines called the mastodon "the father of the ox," and there are numerous traditions which indicate that these creatures were in existence up to a comparatively recent period in the world's history. America abounds in remains of mastodons, but few bones have been found in Europe. They seem most plentiful in that country in the Val d'Arno, and a magnificent skeleton was discovered at Turin.

Fragmentary remains of several species of apes have been found, and an entire skeleton of a mesopithecus, which, in appearance and general organisation resembled the dog-faced baboon or ape of the present period.

The remains of the vegetable world of the Miocene period are found in the shape of a certain imperfect or spurious coal called lignite. It is utilized in many countries in the place of coal. The beds of this coal are of various degrees of thickness, from a few inches to above twenty yards. Yellow amber is found with this lignite. It is the mineralized resin which flowed from certain extinct pine trees of the Tertiary epoch. This amber is washed up by the waves of the Baltic Sea, and has, for ages, formed quite an article of commerce. In this fossil gum are frequently inclosed insects and other extraneous bodies, where they have been preserved in their original color and integrity of form.

The marine deposits of the Miocene period are beds of soft clay and shelly marl. The soft clay deposits include sandstone, much used for building purposes. This marine formation is sometimes succeeded by a fresh-water deposit of a whitish and partly siliceous limestone. The shelly marl deposits are formed of broken shells and corals, and the corresponding fresh water deposits contain numerous remains of the contemporaneous animal kingdom. This shelly marl is extensively used for fertilising land.

The Pliocene period or third subdivision of the Tertiary epoch was marked by a wonderful change in the manifestations of nature, and consequently by wonderful geographical alterations. The world had, up to this period, been divided into land and water, but with the land more or less level. Mountains had hitherto been unknown. But now came terrible subterranean convulsions. The outer crust was cooled and hardened, and as the boiling and seething mass within needed vent through which the compressed steam might escape, the hardened crust would be forced upward and a volcano would burst forth. It is believed, there being strong presumptive evidence in favor of the presumed fact, that up to this period, the portion of the earth now occupied by Europe was a vast sea filled, perhaps, by numerous islands of more or less extent. The European continent gradually emerged from this deep, while the chains of mountains were forced upward by an internal force. Fossil shells are found upon the Pyrenees at a height of eight thousand feet; on the Alps at a height of ten thousand feet; while in Sicily, the newer Pliocene rocks, covering nearly half the surface of the island, are raised from two thousand to three thousand feet above the level of the sea. In the Andes and the Himalayas the same evidence is found of their having been raised upward by volcanic action, as fossil shells are found on the former at a height of thirteen thousand feet, and on the latter at eighteen thousand feet. In the central Alps Cretaceous, Oolitic, Liassic and Eocene strata are found at the loftiest summits. Oolitic and Cretaceous strata have been raised twelve thousand feet, Eocene ten thousand feet and Miocene four thousand and five thousand feet above the level of the sea. Equally striking proofs of recent elevation are found in the Apennines; the celebrated Carrara marble turning out to be an altered limestone of the Oolitic series, and the underlying crystalline rocks to be metamorphosed secondary sandstones and shales.

During this last period, which precedes our own epoch, the temperature of the earth was gradually cooling, and the vegetation was being modified accordingly. Consequently, we find a striking similarity between the flora of that period and that of the present. The predominating character of vegetation is the abundance of the group of the Amentaceae. Conifers still numbered thirty-two varieties; of maple there were twelve varieties; of oak, three; while willows, beeches, birches, magnolias and other modern trees abounded. The palms totally disappeared from Europe.

Among the mammals which existed during this period we find the mastodon, which I have already described as existing during the preceding period. The hippopotamus, the horse, the camel, the ox and the deer, are among the animals then existing which survive to the present day. The fossil horse presents the greatest resemblance to existing individuals, though only about one-third its present size. The rhinoceros differed somewhat in having two horns instead of one. There was also a dwarf species about the size of a common hog. There were also intermediate species. The famous bird, the roc, which has played so important a part in Oriental tradition, originated in the discovery of the cranium and horns of a fossil rhinoceros. The famous dragons of western tradition had also a similar origin.

"In the city of Klagenfurth, in Carinthia, is a fountain on which is sculptured the head of a monstrous dragon with six feet, and a head surmounted by a stout horn. According to the popular tradition, still prevalent at Klagenfurth, this dragon lived in a cave, whence it issued from time to time, to frighten and ravage the country. A bold cavalier kills the dragon, paying with his life for this proof of his courage. The head of the pretended dragon, killed by the valorous knight, is preserved in the Hôtel de Ville, and this head has furnished the sculptor for his fountain with a model for the head of his statue. Herr Unga, of Vienna, recognised at a glance the cranium of the fossil rhinoceros; its discovery in some cave had probably originated the fable of the knight and the dragon."

The Sivatherium giganteum, remains of which are found in certain provinces in India, had a body as bulky as that of an ox, and bore a strong resemblance to an elk.

The living salamanders are amphibious Batrachians, with smooth skins, and rarely attaining the length of twenty inches. The salamander of the Tertiary epoch had the dimensions of a crocodile. A skeleton of this reptile was found on the left bank of the Rhine, not far from Constance, in 1725. It was mistaken for the skeleton of a gigantic man, and Schenckzar, a Swiss naturalist, published a description of the fossil, entitling it "Homo diluvii testis"—man, a witness of the deluge. Pierre Camper, a German naturalist, in 1787, corrected the error, though he himself mistook it for a Saurian. Cuvier finally settled the matter by plainly indicating to what order of beings it belonged.

Birds became exceedingly numerous. Vultures and eagles were added to the rapacious birds, and gulls, swallows, ducks, pheasants, etc., filled the air and the water.

Dolphins and whales sported in the ocean, differing but slightly from the same orders of the present. An enormous fragment of a fossil whale was found in Paris, in 1779, in the cellar of a wine-merchant. Not being specially interested in natural history, the wine-merchant took the trouble to excavate only a part of the bone, yet that detached piece weighed two hundred and twenty-seven pounds.

At the close of the Tertiary epoch Europe and Asia must have presented nearly all the physical characteristics which distinguish them at the present day. The continents had assumed their present forms; but many lakes now dried up, still existed. The mountains reared their heads and were covered with perpetual snow.

The picture which we give this month is an ideal landscape of the Pliocene period. It is not a sea with islands, but land through which a river is flowing. In the distance arise mountains which nature has recently thrown up in her convulsions. In the foreground are the animals of the period.

A DUEL BETWEEN HUMMING-BIRDS.

A GENTLEMAN of Kingston, in this State, recently witnessed a novel battle in a garden of that place. Two green-backed humming birds were the combatants, and the fray lasted seventeen minutes. The tiny antagonists would dart on each other most viciously; would soar twenty feet or more in the air, and then return to the flowers in the beds for a moment or two, where the warfare raged most bitterly. Occasionally the larger would pin the smaller to the ground, when the latter would strike vigorously at the throat of its foe. Finally the larger bird apparently became very much enraged, and made an energetic spurt. The other fell to the ground, its wings fluttered, the body quivered, one quick gasp, and the ruby-throated little one was dead. The victor flew to a dead twig on a neighboring shrub, smoothed its ruffled plumage as a dove would, and twisted its neck from side to side, then for a moment hovering over the lifeless body of its enemy, as if to be certain life was extinct, it flew swiftly away.

MOZART'S NOSE.

MOZART'S nose was a very long one, a great contrast to his friend Haydn's, who had almost a flat nose. Many jokes passed between them about noses.

One day, in a numerous and grave society, the subject of music was being discussed, and Mozart, in reply to the compliments made him, laid a wager that no one, not even his friend Haydn, was capable of performing, at first sight, a piece which he had composed that morning.

Haydn accepted the wager. The piece of music was placed before him on the piano. Haydn easily played through the first portion of it, then he stopped short, finding it impossible to go any further. The two hands must each be at the furthest extremities of the instrument, and one note in the music imperiously demanded that one of them should be in the centre. Haydn confessed himself conquered.

As to Mozart, he took up the piece of music, and when he arrived at the puzzling note touched it with his nose. Everybody laughed heartily, and not the least he who had lost his wager.

VIENNA.

BY G.

VIENNA having been the centre of attraction in Europe this season, a few remarks concerning its history, past and present, may not be without interest. In the first century it was called Fabiana, and was a Roman station; after some years it was included in Upper Pannonia, and the name changed to Vindobona. It was overrun and pillaged by the Goths and Huns when the power of the Roman Empire declined, as were many other of their possessions. In 800 it formed a part of the empire of Charlemagne, who did much to render it prosperous. It then received the name of Austria, or the Eastern Kingdom, with the territory by which it was surrounded, and became the capital of the margraviate.

The margraves, who governed Vienna, were princes of the family of Babenberg at that time; afterward the title was changed to dukes, and they continued to rule till in the thirteenth century, the line became extinct. Ottakar of Bohemia then ruled in Vienna; under him it increased much in extent, and improved in appearance, but he refused to acknowledge the election of the Emperor Rudolph, and from that cause not only Vienna, but all Austria, came into possession of the House of Hapsburg.

In 1493, Maximilian I. being at that time emperor, Vienna became the capital of Austria, and has continued to be the residence of the royal family.

The University of Vienna, founded 1237, has about five thousand five hundred students, usually in attendance, being the largest number of any in Europe. It has nearly one hundred professors. There are many other important institutions of learning in the city, besides about sixty common schools; the number of scholars is about thirty thousand. Few cities exceed Vienna in literary advantages. The Imperial Library, which adjoins the palace of the emperor, and occupies a very handsome edifice, is one of the largest and most valuable in Europe. It contains three hundred and ten thousand printed volumes, and twenty thousand manuscripts, many of which are of extreme rarity, or very unique. There is also annexed to the library an almost unrivalled collection of engravings, which was originally commenced by Prince Eugene, and which now contains three hundred thousand of the finest prints.

The University Library, and two other libraries connected with it, contain about two hundred thousand volumes. Any educated person, and even strangers in the city, are admitted to any of these freely, and access can easily be had even to the emperor's private library, which contains more than fifty thousand volumes; or to those of eight or ten of the princes and nobles, who each have as large a collection of valuable books as the emperor. So that those who visit Vienna, and have time and inclination for reading, can be gratified to almost any extent. Here also the artist will find large collections of valuable paintings, containing specimens of all the different schools.

There are many public and private picture galleries which are well worth visiting, also an attractive sculpture gallery.

Of the many museums, that of Natural History, which adjoins the Imperial Library, is considered the most curious, interesting, and valuable. In a museum of works of art, is the celebrated salt-cellar made by Benvenuto Cellini, for Francis I.; also, an enormous onyx, nearly thirty inches in diameter, which formed a part of the dowry of Mary of Burgundy, the wife of the Emperor Maximilian.

There are many churches, palaces and public buildings, deserving of a more particular notice than can here be given. The Cathedral of St. Stephen is a lofty, cruciform, Gothic structure, very large and high, and is built of large blocks of hewn stone. The west facade is adorned with rich tracery and sculpture, and flanked by two octagonal towers. From the centre of the south facade rises a magnificent tower, diminishing gradually from its base in regularly retreating arches and buttresses, till it terminates in a point, which is four hundred and sixty-five feet high, being the loftiest in Europe. It has a very large bell, cast of cannon taken from the Turks. Besides the tower, it has a dome covered with several remarkable statues, carvings and sculptures. The interior is rather gloomy, but very imposing. It is supported by twelve very large pillars, and has nearly forty marble altars and various monuments, of which that of the Emperor Frederick IV. is the most gorgeous, and that of the celebrated Prince Eugene the most interesting.

There are many finely-proportioned edifices, with interesting and unique interiors, which will well repay the curiosity of the traveller, and which many of the thousands who have visited Vienna the past summer have been interested in viewing.

DUNELLEN, N. J.

UNDER THE MAPLES.

BY S. JENNIE JONES.

WALKING under the maple boughs—
The year's bright afternoon,
With its shower of gold and crimson gay,
Is sweeter than rose-crowned June.
Sweeter, in all its ripened wealth,
Than sickle, smiling spring;
Walking under the maple boughs,
Our life-song, love, I sing.
We smiled and wept, and smiled again,
And the changeful days passed by,
And brightest hours, with fervid glow,
Enwrapped our earth and sky,
Till peaceful, purple autumn-time
Threw back her golden gate;
Now, walking under the maple boughs,
We smile and love and wait.

HE seldom lives frugally who lives by chance.
Hope is always liberal, and they that trust her promises make little scruple of revelling to-day on the profits of to-morrow.

THE DEVIL-FISH.

BY MARIAN KNIGHT.

"IN the more ancient formations of the old world, we find two murderers—a nipper and a sucker. The first is revealed to us by the imprint of the trilobite, an order now lost, the most destructive of we may judge from such a beak, this monster—if the other parts of the body were in proportion—must have been enormous; its ventose, invincible arms, of perhaps twenty or thirty feet, like those of some monstrous spider. In making war on the mollusca, he remains mollusc also; that is to say, always an extinct beings. The second subsists in one gigantic embryo. He presents the strange, almost ridiculous fragment, a beak nearly two feet in length, which if it were not also terrible, appearance of an embryo was that of a great sucker or cuttle-fish (Sepia). If going to war; of a fetus furious and cruel, soft and transparent, but tenacious, breathing with a murderous breath, for it is not for food alone that it makes war; it has the wish to destroy. Satisfied, and even basting, it still destroys. Without defensive armor, under its threatening murmurs there is no peace; its safety is to attack. It regards all creatures as a possible enemy. It throws about its long arms, or rather thongs, armed with suckers, at random."

Such is Michelet's highly poetic description of the Molluscous Cephalopod, popularly known as the devil-fish. Victor Hugo gives an equally eloquent and even more carefully delineated picture of the same monsters in his "Toilers of the Sea." But they are both the descriptions of poets, rather than of naturalists. These Cephalopods have in all ages excited wonder and imagination. The ancients believed in them as monsters in size, large enough to grasp and crush ships in their long-reaching and powerful arms, and lurking in the depths of the ocean waiting for victims.

Pliny relates the history of an enormous Cephalopod or cuttle-fish which haunted the coast of Spain in the neighborhood of Castris, and was a terror to the fishermen. It was finally captured, and was found to be seven hundred pounds in weight, and with arms more than thirty feet long.

Olaris Magnus believed in the truth of the report that the northern seas were the home of a monster not less than a mile in length. This fabled giant of the seas was called the Kraken, and numerous stories are yet retained of its appearance.

The Cephalopods or devil-fish of modern times dwindle into insignificance when compared to these mythical monsters of the ancients. The length of the creatures from tip to tip of the arms measures from two to eight feet, and seldom exceeds five or six feet. Their weight is ordinarily from fifteen to twenty-five pounds. Péron, the naturalist, met "in the Australian seas a huge cuttle-fish, rolling heavily on the surface of the waves, its arms more than eight feet long, twisting about like hideous snakes." Swediaur reports that some whalers took out of the mouth of a whale pieces of a cuttle-fish which were twenty-five feet long.

The following facts we gather from a recently-published book:

"The steam corvette Alecton was between Teneriffe and Madeira when she fell in with a gigantic calammar, not less—according to the account—than fifty feet long, without reckoning its eight formidable arms covered with suckers, and about twenty feet in circumference at its largest part; the head terminating in arms of enormous size, the other extremity terminating in two fleshy lobes or fins, the weight of the whole being estimated at four thousand pounds. The flesh was soft, glutinous and of a reddish brick color. The commandant, wishing in the interests of science to secure the monster, actually engaged it in battle. Numerous shots were aimed at it, but the balls traversed its flaccid and glutinous mass without causing it any vital injury. But after one of these attacks the waves were observed to be covered with foam and blood, and a strong odor of musk was inhaled by the spectators. The musket-shots not having produced the desired results, harpoons were employed, but they took no hold on the soft impalpable flesh of the marine monster. When it escaped from the harpoon it dived under the ship, and came up again at the other side. They succeeded at last in getting the harpoon to bite, and in passing a bowling hitch round the posterior part of the animal. But when they attempted to hoist it out of the water the rope penetrated deeply into the flesh, and separated it into two parts, the head with the arms and tentacles dropping into the sea and making off, while the fins and posterior parts were brought on board. The latter weighed about forty pounds."

A book about the "Natural History and Fishery of the Sperm Whale," gives the following incident, in which one of these curious creatures plays a prominent part:

"Mr. Beale had been searching for shells among the rocks in Bonia Island, and was much astonished to see at his feet a most extraordinary-looking animal, crawling back toward the surf; which it had just left. It was creeping on its eight legs, which, from their soft and flexible nature, bent considerably under the weight of its body, so that it was just lifted by an effort above the rocks. It appeared much alarmed, and made every attempt to escape. Mr. Beale endeavored to stop it by putting his foot on one of its tentacles, but it liberated itself several times in spite of all his efforts. He then laid hold of one of the tentacles with his hand and held it firmly, and the limb appeared as if it would be torn asunder in the struggle. To terminate the contest, he gave it a powerful jerk. It resisted the effort successfully, but the moment after, the enraged animal lifted a head with large, projecting eyes, and losing its hold of the rocks, suddenly sprang upon Mr. Beale's arm, which had been previously bared to the shoulder, and clung to it with its suckers, while it endeavored to get the beak, which he could now see between the tentacles, in a position to bite him. Mr. Beale describes its cold, slimy grasp as extremely sickening, and he loudly called to his friend, who was also searching for shells, to come to his assistance. They hastened to the boat, and he was released by killing his tormentor with a boat-knife, when the arms were disengaged bit by bit. Mr. Beale states that this Cephalopod must have measured across its expanded arms about four feet, while its body was not bigger than a large hand clenched."

It seems as though the name spider-fish would be a more appropriate one for this creature than the one by which it is usually known. The pictures of the different varieties of this creature have all, more or less, a spider-like appearance. They are composed of an immense head bearing large, staring eyes on each side, and with arms or legs proceeding immediately from this head. The arms are used for swimming, walking and for seizing and holding its prey. The arms, of which there are eight, are covered with suckers, each arm having about two hundred and forty. They feed on crustaceans, fishes and also on shelled molluscs—every kind of animal, in fact, which comes within their reach. They live for five or six years, and lay eggs, which are known by fishermen as sea-grapes.

Some of the Cephalopods secrete a blackish, inky fluid, which, when pursued, it discharges in a jet, and which so discolors the water that, under cover of it, the creature has time to escape. The ink of the cuttle-fish is used in water-color painting under the name of sepia.

The sepia are voracious in their habits, and they not only kill to eat, but for the sake of killing, making murderous assault upon whatever comes in their way, even after they have gorged themselves. But they have a terrible and relentless enemy in the dolphins. To make another quotation from Michelet: "These lords of the ocean," he says, "are so delicate in their tastes that they eat only the head and arms, which are both tender and easy of digestion. They reject the hard parts, and especially the afterpart of the body. The coast of Royan, for example, is covered with thousands of these mutilated cuttle-fish. The porpoises take most incredible bounds, at first to frighten them, and afterward, to run them down; in short, after their feast, they give themselves up to gymnastics."

In the family of Octopodæ are Cephalopods, having eight long arms united at the base by a web. Mr. Henry Lee, F. L. S., writes, in "Land and Water," the following account of experiments with an octopus, in an aquarium:

"Desiring to have a better view than I had previously been able to obtain of what follows the seizure of a crab by an octopus, I recently fastened one to a string, by which an attendant was to lower it in the water close to the glass, while I stood watching in front. The crab had hardly descended to the depth of two feet before an octopus, for which it was not intended, and which I had not observed (so exactly had he assumed the hue of the surface to which he clung), shot out like a rocket from one side of the tank, opened his membranous umbrella, shut up the suspended crab within it, and darted back again to the ledge of rock on which he had been lying in ambush. There he held on, with the crab firmly pressed between his body and the stone-work. As this was not what I wished, I directed Cosham, my assistant, to gently try to pull the bait away from him. Not a bit of it! As soon as he felt the strain he took a firm grasp of the rock with all the suckers of seven of his arms, and, stretching the eighth aloft, coiled it round the tautened line, the suckers actually closing on the line also, as a caterpillar's foot grips a thin twig or a cobbler's leathern pad folds round his thread when he is making a wax-end. Noticing several jerks on the string, I thought at first they were given by the man overhead, and told him not to use too much force; but he called out, 'It's not me, sir, it's the octopus; I can't move him; and he's pulling so hard that, if I don't let go, he'll break the line.' 'Hold on, then, and let him break it,' I replied. Tug, tug! dragged the tough, strong arm of the octopus; and at a third tug the line broke, and the crab was all his own. The twine was that used for mending the seine net, and was therefore not particularly weak. Although this experiment furnished a fresh illustration of the holding power of an octopus, it had not taught me exactly that which I wanted to know. I wished to be underneath that umbrella with the crab, or (which was decidedly preferable) to be able to see what happened beneath it without getting wet. My plan, therefore, was to procure the seizure of the crab against the front glass, instead of against the rock-work. Our next endeavor was successful. A second crab was so fastened that the string could be withdrawn if desired, and was lowered near to the great male octopus, who generally dwells in a nook in the west front corner of the tank. He was sleepy, and not very hungry, and required a good deal of tempting to rouse him to activity; but the sight of his favorite food overcame his lassiness, and after some demonstrative panting, puffing, and erection of his tubercles, he lunged out an arm to seize the precious morsel. It was withdrawn from his reach; and so, at last, he turned out of bed, rushed at it, and got it under him against the plate-glass, just as I desired. In a second the crab was completely pinioned. Not a movement, not a struggle, was visible or possible—each leg, each claw, was grasped all over by suckers—enfolded in them—stretched out to its full extent by them. The back of the carapace was covered all over with the tenacious vacuum-discs, brought together by the adaptable contraction of the limb, and ranged in close order, shoulder to shoulder, touching each other; while, between others, which dragged the abdominal plates toward the mouth of the black tip of the hard, horny beak, was seen for a single instant protruding from the circular orifice in the centre of the radiation of the arms, and the next had crunched through the shell, and was buried deep in the flesh of the victim. The action of an octopus when seizing its prey for its necessary food is very like that of a cat pouncing on a mouse, and holding it down beneath its paws. The movement is as sudden, the scuffle as brief, and the escape of the prisoner even less probable. The fate of the crab is not really more terrible than that of the mouse or of a minnow swallowed by a perch, but there is a repulsiveness about the form, color, and attitudes of the octopus, which invests it with a kind of tragic horror."

LET your discourse of others be fair; speak ill of nobody. To do it in his absence is the property of a coward, that stabs a man behind his back; if to his face, you add an affront to the scandal. He that praises bestows a favor, but he that detracts commits a robbery, in taking from another what is justly his; every man thinks he deserves better than indeed he does; therefore, you cannot oblige mankind more than to speak well; man is the greatest humorist and flatterer of himself in the world.

CROOKED PLACES.

A STORY OF STRUGGLES AND HOPES.

BY EDWARD GARRETT,

Author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," "Premiums Paid to Experience," etc.

THE LAST PART.—THE CONCLUSION OF THE WHOLE MATTER.

CHAPTER I.—A STRANGER FROM AFAR.

"I BEG your pardon very much, madam, but surely your name is—or once was—Harvey?"

It was a tall gentleman who thus accosted Millicent, standing straight before her in the churchyard path, raising his hat from a very stately iron-gray head. And as the startled Millicent looked up at him and answered, there came over her a confused recollection of long candle-lit evenings, very full of needlework, and a sound rang in her bewildered brain like Hatty's naughty whistle of old days. It was like a once familiar language forgotten. And then a trifle—a nothing characteristic in itself—made it all clear, as one translated word will sometimes restore the lost key of knowledge. It was only a worn signet ring on the stranger's little finger.

"I am Millicent Harvey," she said, "and—I know you now—you are Harry Westbrook."

"I am he," he answered, grasping the hand she held toward him. "And thank God for the friendly sound of the old name—you are the first that have called me by it since I have been back in England!"

He turned and walked by her side. "I knew I could not be wrong," he said, speaking with an eagerness of delight that contrasted half pathetically with his dignified figure and whitening hair. "I could not mistake a Harvey face. I should have known it if I had met it on the Himalayas."

"I have not to question you, fearful what your replies may be," he went on. "Only yesterday, I took a wandering about our old haunts in Mile End, and went into one of the shops where Hatty used to deal, and where the same old name was up. I asked after you all. 'Yes, the old lady was still alive,' they told me, 'and looking finely. And Master George was married and had a grown-up son, and was a great man. And Miss Milly was still at home. And Miss Hatty was Mrs. Webber, but she still looked in sometimes of an evening, and sat down, and was as friendly as ever.' I did not need to hear that Hatty was Mrs. Webber," he added, with a touch of gravity in his playfulness. "I knew that years and years ago. I saw an old newspaper with the marriage notice. If you think I may see Mr. and Mrs. Webber, I have something for them. If not, I will send it through you. It is only an inlaid chess-table, and a set of chessmen in Indian ivory."

"I am sure they will both be very glad to see you," said Milly, not speaking without authority, for Harry Westbrook, though seldom mentioned, was no tabooed subject in the Webbers' house—Mr. Webber having always stoutly maintained "that it had been a good sign in any young man to be taken with Harriet," while Hatty, though a light shadow would flit over her merry face at the old name, was always humbly and thankfully conscious that she had been guided to do the right thing—not being one of those weak and foolish women who think that their hand alone has strength to save a man's life and soul, such women being generally those who would only seal his perdition. "I am sure they will be very glad to see you," Milly reiterated; "but will you not come home first and see my mother? Our house is quite near. And Miss Brook is still with us—do you remember Miss Brook?"

"Indeed I do," he said, cheerfully, "she is not a woman to be forgotten. A very important piece of my home-coming triumph would be lost if I missed Miss Brook. It is a treat worth having, to put in a creditable appearance before those who predicted our disgrace."

"But nobody will be better pleased than Miss Brook," said Milly, "she really liked you."

"I know she did," he replied, heartily. "I did not think so at the time, but it is now some years since I came to that conclusion."

And so Millicent led in the unexpected guest. The two old ladies were seated in their little parlor, Mrs. Harvey reading the Pilgrim's Progress, and Miss Brook perusing the book of Job. Mrs. Harvey caught the name of "Harry Westbrook," but thought such a possibility was so exceedingly pleasant that it could scarcely be true, and therefore rose and made her dignified, old-world curtsy, with its accompanying "Very happy to see you, sir," with the added aside—"Who—who—does she say it is?" while Miss Brook promptly took it all in and shouted in her ear:

"It's that young Westbrook, been and made his fortune, and come back wonderfully improved, as I always said he might be"—a turn of her prophecies which threw the whole party into a hearty laugh, out of which they all emerged as comfortably familiar as if they had never been separated for more than a week.

Of course, Mr. Westbrook stayed to dine with the Harveys; indeed, it was instantly settled that he should remain with them for the whole day, and if the Webbers did not look in at the cottage before evening service, then Mrs. Harvey or Milly would take him to their house after it. In one way or the other the Harveys and the Webbers always saw each other every Sabbath. Mrs. Harvey and Milly still went to church, and the Webbers still went to chapel, so as they did not meet in God's House, they regularly met at the household altar.

There was no overwhelming amount of conversation, and the inquiries mostly came from the stranger, and the news from the hostesses. It is not "travel in far lands" which furnishes subjects which we care to talk over in the sacred first moments of re-union. Days would come when the three women would hang interested on their gratified visitor's stories of Indian life and society, on his sketches of Benares and the Himalayas, his descriptions of Hindoo ceremonials, and his specimens of Oriental needlework and flora. But just now it was far more interesting for him to hear about the death of his old minister, and how the house in which he used to live was pulled to bits and turned into a factory. The sight of the same old dishes of former days seemed to him more astonishing than the seven wonders of the world, and one or two old books lying about he lifted as reverently as if all the souls whom they had ever comforted still clasped their hands about them.

It is strangely solemn, that meeting of family friends, long parted in utter silence. Influences have been moulding each, of which the other knows nothing, which may have driven them apart, or may have drawn them nearer together. There is scarcely an ordinary phrase, a tune, a public event, a sunset glory, or a moonlight shadow which has not acquired some secret meaning for each. These things escape speech—they are never so disguised as when clumsily clothed in words. What is there to tell of our histories? Somebody died—somebody married—somebody was introduced to us—everybody knows beforehand that such things must have happened to us. But the bare facts are nothing; and those who know them know nothing. These old friends of his knew all about Harry Westbrook's old love affair, and time will come when it will be frankly talked over among them, but they will never know—he will never be able to tell them—how it felt to sit lonely in the shadow of tropical trees, and know that Hatty and her husband were singing out of one hymn-book in their little East End chapel. Millicent, in her turn, mentioned both Fergus Laurie and David Maxwell to Mr. Westbrook, in the course of this his first visit, and in due time he will know all about the ambition and selfishness of the one and the saintliness of the other, but Millicent will never be able to tell how she felt when she wrote to Fergus and offered him her money, or when she watched the sun go down, as she flew through the country in the Harwich train. If others cannot see these stories in our eyes and hear them in our voices, they will never know them at all. Those who can read these open secrets know us better after one hour's talk than some who have lived with us all our lives.

To Millicent that Sabbath afternoon was like a peaceful dream; or rather years and years gone by seemed like a fevered delirium, all except David's Bible lying on the table, and David's grave in the sunlight, not so very far away. She knew that Acre Hall was still standing where it did—that the man in possession was gone (though he might not be without his transitory successor), and that the household still remained unchanged, for Fergus had not yet started for America, but was going about in the most dashing of frys, buying for himself the most sumptuous of Russian-leather portmanteaus, and coolly assuming that all of his creditors had done a very good thing for themselves when they allowed him to get into their debt. Millicent only marvelled within herself how she had ever wavered in her judgment as to what must be the end of such way of life—how she had ever hoped to gather figs of thistles—to find a hero walking in the counsel of the ungodly—a saint sitting in the seat of the scornful. It must have done harm, too—this wilful judgment of hers—when, rather than own herself in the wrong, she had shut her eyes to the right, and accepted excuses where she should have uttered protests. Fergus might be saying to himself and to others that she had not been a true friend. It was a bitter lie as he meant it, but she owned to herself that it was but too true in a far different sense!

Mr. Webber and his wife did not call in at the cottage, and so, when evening service was over, Millicent and Mr. Westbrook went to their house.

The good little stationer himself received them, because, as he explained, Hatty was still up-stairs "taking off her bonnet."

"I'm proud to see you, sir," said the worthy man, "and it will be just as great a pleasure as you could give my Hatty. 'If he ever comes to England, he'll never come near us,' she's said often and often."

"Well, Mr. Webber, I can't say I meant to do so when I landed," said Mr. Westbrook, frankly; "but the worst of it was, there was nobody else to come to see, and there was no place I cared to haunt, except where we all used to live."

"I'll go up and tell her myself," said Mr. Webber, bustling away, and Mr. Westbrook sat down to wait their return.

The guest gave one glance round the room—Hatty's ménage. No, he wouldn't have liked such a room to live in. This would never have been his best home, as it was hers. This was fit for her, she had made it for herself, in fact, but she never would have been able to make it if she had been linked with him.

Hatty came down presently. Not very quickly. She had had something to say to Mr. Webber first; probably she had also to give him a kiss. At any rate, she had had to put her best pearl brooch, her husband's wedding-gift, into her lace collar. "He won't notice what you are dressed in," Mr. Webber had reasoned, but Hatty persisted.

Mr. Westbrook rose and went forward, and the two old lovers met under the clumsy gilt chandelier, and shook hands, and said how glad they were to see each other.

"But you've grown, surely," said Hatty, trying to laugh.

"In some ways, I hope," answered Harry Westbrook, rather wistfully.

One felt, as the two stood together, that there had never been a husband and wife like them in the world, though Millicent remembered thinking in the old time what a suitable pair they looked—quite a typical couple. But she had never seen an old settled husband and wife such as these now. Together they would not have grown so. Sitting gazing at them from her twilight corner, Millicent caught one of those curious revelations of possibilities in faces, which come to us all sometimes, understand them or not as we may. Sometimes they show us what people might have been, as well as what they may be. These two might have been a lazy, ill-conditioned, reckless man, and a soured, indifferent woman, with a useless, restless heart like a caged animal. And as Milly caught this glimpse of the escaped dangers of the past, even Hatty's rich silk dress seemed to cling about her, as would have clung the poor touselled shawl she was never to wear, and Harry's tall and stately form seemed to droop into the shamble of the drunken sensualist, that, thank God, he was never to be! No, the fondest love could wish neither but what they were, and what they were they never could have become together.

Before Harry Westbrook and Millicent left, the two sisters had a little chat in Hatty's bedroom.

"I'm just awfully glad to have seen him again," said Hatty, using her stepson's slang in sober earnest, "only I wish he was married and settled. He seems to have made plenty of money. Do you know whether he means to go back to India, Milly?"

"He says so; he speaks of going back quite soon," Millicent answered.

"I wish he was married. But you needn't fancy I'm such a donkey as to fear he is keeping single for my sake, unless it is in the way that I gave him a disgust at women."

"There's plenty in life besides marriage," said Millicent, "even the world admits as much in the case of men. Marriage is never said to be their chief object in existence, as is sometimes stated of women."

"But it's six to one and half a dozen of the other, for all that," said Hatty, shrewdly. "Unless it's six to one and more than half a dozen to the other, for the world's talk generally goes by contraries. I can understand a woman looking at her future with only a side glance at marriage, she can easily fancy herself living with kindred, or set in households somehow, as women always are. But I can't fancy a man looking forward and wondering whether he'll pay his housekeeper fifty pounds a year or a hundred. That's a dismal look-out. Mother is very pleased to see Harry, isn't she?" Hatty inquired, with a sudden change of subject.

"Yes, we all are," Millicent replied. "You don't know how much those old cheery times of ours have been in my mind lately. I had been thinking about them as I think Noah's family must have thought of the blue hills and green dells while they were floating over the face of the dull gray flood. It seems so odd that Harry should turn up just when my mind was full of the old memories which he shares."

Hatty kissed her sister. "No, I don't think it's odd," she said. "It always happens so. It is wonderful, but it does, and that only makes it more wonderful. It wouldn't be half so wonderful if the sun forgot to rise, or the trees to bud in spring, as that they never do."

And the two sisters went down-stairs, and warm invitations to renew his visit were given by the Webbers to Harry, and then he escorted Milly home.

They walked in silence for a few minutes, then Harry said: "Well, I thank God that I knew your sister. I believe my knowing her saved me for this life and for the next. You see I had nobody of my own, Miss Harvey, no sister, no near relation. I had no ideal of home till I saw yours. It was God's providential blessing that it all happened as it did."

Millicent understood the thought in his heart, narrowed as was its expression. She knew that he felt now that Hatty had given him the utmost and the best that she had for him, that any giving more would not only have overflowed, but overturned the cup. There are men and women whom God makes brothers and sisters and sacred kin in spirit as in the flesh, and between these there is a spiritual barrier, similar to the lawful "impediment" between near relationships. They can be so much to each other, unless they lawlessly determine to be so much more! With them, transposing the poet's sentiment,

"A little less, and how much it is!

A little more, and what worlds away!"

Yet Milly understood, too, that the heart of the dignified man beside her was conscious of a new loss, even the loss of his old crown of loss. A man who has fancied himself heir to an even irredeemably forfeited estate, feels himself beggared to find that there was a blunder in his genealogy, and that he never could have had the least claim to the alienated land. The bed where only rue and rosemary have grown looks drearier still when left empty for weeds to overspread. There may be shadow and rest under a yew-tree, and an alas when it is cut down. Harry Westbrook would never again sit on the Himalayas and soothe his solitude with sighs over the solace that had slipped from his life. But we cannot joyfully take the spoiling of our sorrow, if it be all we have!

Millicent's sympathetic reverie was broken by Mr. Westbrook saying, as if in answer to her unspoken thought: "Ah, but I am very glad I have come back to England. I don't suppose I shall ever lose sight of you all again, and I shall leave the country very differently to how I left it last time. Then I felt ready to run away anywhere—anywhere. Why, I went down to the cabin and lay down in my berth, just to miss the last sight of England! Now I shall watch the shadow of her last rock! No, Miss Millicent (as they paused at the cottage gate), I will not come in to-night, for your good hospitable mother would not let me go without another half-hour's chat, and I will not be drawn into breaking her wholesome custom of early hours. But I will come back in a day or two if I may? Yes? Then perhaps I may look in to-morrow. Good-night."

"Good-night," said Millicent, and went in, her heart full of thankfulness for the safety and welfare of the dear old friend, whose familiar face had returned to her like a fresh blossom from a tree planted long ago.

And the moonlight shimmered through the elm-trees round Acre Hall, and slept on David's grave beneath the Norman tower.

CHAPTER II.

LAST THINGS.

HARRY WESTBROOK kept his word. He did visit the cottage the next evening, and the day but one after that, and then the next Sunday. He went to the Webbers, too, and took them his tardy wedding-gift—what fun the step children made out of that, and young Dick would have it that it was for somebody else—for there was a second generation of weddings now in the very near future of the Webbers' household.

Under all circumstances it was only natural that Mr. Westbrook and Millicent should make the best companions for each other. They had such a mutual past. Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook could join in their laughing gossip over old times; but they were not their own "old times," which were twenty or thirty years further back. In the spring time of these those had been absorbed, anxious women. Then George and Harriet had each had the poem of life since the prelude, and their memories did not habitually go back so far.

Gradually Harry Westbrook spoke less of going back to India—actually said that there was no particular hurry to do so; it might even depend upon circumstances whether he went at all! And more significant than his words, was the fact that he began to give serious attendance at the London office of the firm in which he now had an important share.

Mr. Westbrook's was one of those characters that begin by being all possibility. Most of us have a little actuality to begin with, which is a splendid start at first. But you cannot tell the size of a flower by the size of its seed. Nay, a grain of mustard seed "is indeed the least of all seeds, but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs." The secret lies in that mysterious gift of growing.

Such a little thing means so much to such natures. The very easy goodness of Harry's nature—its sheer want of grasp—had made it seem possible that he could take the world without a struggle—enter into his inheritance, without proving his right thereto. The thing he had needed to learn was that giving goes before taking, and that the heir, so long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant. When Harry sacrificed the sometimes treacherous joy of self-sacrifice, and did the right thing first instead of vainly striving to accomplish the beautiful one instead, she had taught him this. It showed him that the verb to be goes before the verb to have.

The native easy goodness stayed. He did not hurry on to any second lesson before he had thoroughly learned the first, and it had served his entire life hitherto. His soul had lived in that silence and solitude which for souls who are strong enough to bear it, is the tropical region of spiritual growth.

"When one has nothing else to remind one of God, I think it makes one hang the harder to one's own prayers," he said. "Why, a travelling missionary's sermon at a station sometimes had to serve me for a whole year. But it always did. The more I turned it over the more came out of it; you see I was always a slow fellow."

And yet out of this silence and solitude, he stepped into a far wider world than Millicent knew, in her busy life. As she entered into his interests, it was as if a door in a convent garden was opened upon a breezy common.

To him the world did not seem a worn-out world, for himself to galvanize, as it had to Fergus, rather it was a great car rolling upward with so many pulling and pushing it, that his own shoulder to the wheel concerned himself rather than it. He did not stop short to sneer at the petty quibbles and human weaknesses of boards and committees, but lifted up his eyes upon the mission fields, white for harvest, and blessed God for the laborers there, however few. He looked upon the Church in the world, and saw her, as God Himself surely sees her—a queen in disguise, greater than she seems, with jewels hidden under her rags. He was quite sure that there was plenty of heroism and endurance and unselfishness in the world—quite sure—whether he saw it or not, he knew it was there. Perhaps he had learned this faith by a few untold heroisms of his own. It is a way people have of learning that lesson.

He thought thoroughly well of the prospects of humanity, because being a good man, he honestly judged that there were many a great deal better. One may generally know a man by that test.

Poor Millicent! She was conscious of a soft glory like autumn sunlight creeping over her life. She said to herself that it was very pleasant—this renewal, this deification, as it were, of an old friendship. Surely it was something like the renewals of Heaven—the same old familiarity and dearness—yet so much better. Nay, it seemed a faint, faint type of many of the mysteries of immortality. Had not their friend found his way back to them over all the time and distance, only because they had once been really in his history, and had not he fallen fittingly into a new place among their new ways of life?—not jarring, not disarranging, but completing and beautifying. How many tangles would be so unravelled There! And Millicent lifted up her eyes toward the pleasant fields beyond the swellings of Jordan. And her peace came back as the peace of a little child. For what makes childhood but trust and hope? Only the childhood which is of the Kingdom of God, trusts in Him instead of man, and hopes in Heaven instead of in "growing up."

Only at last there came a something—a silence—a mystery—between Harry Westbrook and Millicent Harvey. Any stranger, seeing them, would have known at a glance that they were not brother and sister, nor familiar kinsfolk, nor merely old easy friends.

"Do you think that people grow too old for new love?" Mr. Westbrook asked, abruptly, as they two were walking home through the lanes after a visit to George and Christian.

"I think it depends on the people themselves," said Millicent.

"Do you think that a love is the richer or the poorer for another love having gone before?" Harry went on.

"I think that, too, all depends on what the first love was, and how it was lost," answered poor Millicent.

"I think, then, that I understand you hold the good, old-fashioned belief that there can be but one love, in the supreme sense, for each life?" observed Mr. Westbrook.

"I do think so," said Millicent, raising her dark eyes, where the passionate enthusiasm of youth was not dead, but only sleeping. "I do not believe in 'second love,' as the phrase is often used. I believe in the love that goes on into Heaven. In an utter misconception of what love is, lay the grossness of the Sadducees' question about the woman with the seven husbands."

"And yet many second marriages are very happy," said Harry.

"Of course they are," Millicent argued. "Sometimes the second marriage, and not the first, is the real soul-marriage, and at other times it is a solid and substantial friendship, which, after all, is nearly as high as love, and almost as beautiful, but different."

"And the last is like some so-called 'first love,'" said Harry.

"Yes, that is just so," Millicent answered, knowing in her heart that he was thinking of his own story; "and sometimes they are only blocks for love to be fitted upon, as it were, till it is ready for its proper wearer," and then she knew in her heart that she was thinking of her own.

"What do you think makes a true soul-marriage?" asked Harry.

"When two grow together, and because they are together grow the faster to the full stature possible to their natures," said Millicent, "while in the dearest friendship they may grow apart, and to different heights, till there is little in common between them but the old kindliness."

"Ah, and how precious that is!" said Mr. Westbrook. "If in youth there is a charm in very novelty, as we grow older the dust Time leaves behind him turns to gold."

"That is so true," Millicent responded.

"Let us turn down this way," said Mr. Westbrook, pausing at the end of a lane, where houses were but sparsely scattered between the hedgerows. "It will make our walk home the longer."

Millicent hesitated just half a minute, and then obeyed.

Harry Westbrook was a wise man. That little complaisance put a great deal of courage in his voice, when he said, presently, "Millicent, do you think you could marry me?"

"I might try, if I were asked," she answered, with a smile about her mouth, though there were tears in her eyes.

The pair had come to that time of life when sentiment masquerades in humor.

"You know I've had a 'first love,'" said Harry. "But we are quits, for I'm quite sure you have. It was not that good David Maxwell, and it couldn't be that humbug, Fergus Laurie, yet it seems to me to lie between those two. I think you ought to tell me all about it."

"It was between them," Millicent confessed, with tears brimming over. "They were together, you see, like a bright lantern and a dark one. And the light of the one shone on the other, and the shadow of the other overspread the one. There was a hero and there was a nothing, and I mistook them, don't you see. I made my love upon the block, and fancied it was the real man, and only found out the mistake when he did not want it, not even for a shroud!"

Harry Westbrook caressed the hand that lay trembling on his arm.

"I think we both got lost in the same jungle," said he. "There was a sister and a wife, and years ago I mistook them."

The playfulness of his tone did not jar the tenderness at Milly's heart. The analogy was fitting. He understood.

"We will both love Hatty better than ever," he went on, "and we will both pray for Fergus Laurie, and if—if we are ever very nearly concerned in naming a little boy-child, we will call him David Maxwell."

"Only—only"—and Millicent's proud head was bowed, and her tears came very fast—"only I feel so afraid that David's life lost something. He gave, but he never got. I don't mean that my love was any loss," she said. "I can't be sure that he ever cared for it. The kind of love I had then was not worth anything—it is worth more now, because something of him is in it somehow, Harry. But I feel as if he missed something."

"No, Millicent," said her lover. "God has a secret for such as he. Be quite sure of that. And just fancy God keeping a secret for one! What must it not be when his common words are blessings and his open ways make straight the 'Crooked Places'? Such as David are the heirs of God's 'Last things,' and remember what His 'last things' mean—'Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; but thou hast kept the good wine until now.'"

CHAPTER III.

MADE STRAIGHT.

HARRY WESTBROOK and Millicent Harvey were married. A very, very quiet wedding, with no bridesmaids, and even Harriet and Christian only sitting in a pew as "friends." The bride's dress scarcely marked her as a bride. And during their six weeks of beautiful travel in Switzerland they might have been an easy middle-aged pair, taking a rest and a breathing time on the summit of life, preparatory to jogging down hill together.

They came home, and settled down in an old house at Tottenham, an old red house with old brown rooms, and an old green garden. The Westbrooks were rich people in their quiet way, but they took so many duties along with their wealth, that they still got some pleasure out of their money. It was still a personal treat when they ventured to appropriate a trifle of their wealth for the purchase of an ebony cabinet, or a bit of old red or blue china. And affluent matron as she was, if Millicent still occasionally forgot to put on new gloves quite as soon as she ought, and, absolutely neglected to purchase a seal-skin jacket or an Indian shawl, till Hatty carried her to do so in triumph, and would not let her off with anything but the best in the best shop—at any rate Millicent never forgot anybody's birthday.

God sent two little children to the quaint roomy house, that seemed as ready for them as an old elm-tree for nests. "Elizabeth" came first, and was old enough to have a doll before, "David" arrived. Dear Grandmamma Harvey gets into trouble about those children. Mamma says they really must not go to see her so often, she spoils them so. Poor grandmamma says that it is the spirit of the age that has demoralized her, she is sure she used to be a good disciplinarian; but she thinks the spirit of every age always demoralized grandmamas! Every day she promises to keep them in better order, if they only come again to-morrow. Little rogues! they ransack the sacred old work-box that her own grown-up daughters think it almost sacrilege to look into. They find the funny old yellow card whereon "Mrs. Devon (long since dead) desired her compliments, and hoped that Mr. Harvey and his sister would give her the pleasure of their company at the Vicarage on a certain date." Fancy grandmamma keeping that. How funny! They run off, shouting, to show it to mamma, who takes it tenderly, as if it were a bit of her mother's heart.

All the Webbers—Richard, James and Ellen—are married. Richard is in Calais, Ellen in the Isle of Wight and James in Dublin. Mr. Webber's business is chiefly in the hands of managers now, and he and Hatty spend a great deal of time visiting among their children. Hatty's "step-daughters-in-law" all like her so well that their own mothers are in danger of being a little jealous, or would be, only that Hatty conciliates them by the way in which she says: "I'm not a mother-in-law, you see. I'm only Dick's step-mother—no real relation at all; don't you understand?" And when the mothers by blood want to give a little advice, they sometimes come to Hatty to suggest it, "because, you know, it is ticklish for relations to interfere. Young people think they are presuming on their rights, but our Dick, or my Jane, will be sure to listen kindly to you, as a friend." And Hatty always gives the advice, and the young people are generally under the impression that they asked her for it and got exactly what they wanted.

George and Christian are living where they did. Their boy Robert is a young man now, and has just taken holy orders. But he is not going to settle in England. He will presently start for the far West of America, where he is to minister to a little township where the people will all be like himself—emigrants from the old country. They are all going from a certain western shire, in a village of which Robert Harvey is now serving as curate; James Webber, who is a doctor, is, with his young wife, determined to go, too. "It is to-day's version of the Pilgrim Fathers," says Christian. "It is your poems in a crystal, my husband. And as for America being very far away, hearts make tracks," she adds, "and Heaven is everywhere, and nobody are separated but those who will not be together." And she thinks of Fergus Laurie, who has been in England again and again since he migrated, and yet David's Prayer-Book is still left in her keeping. Christian has written out David's message concerning it, and the paper is laid inside the book, and the book is made up into a parcel, with "Mr. Fergus Laurie" put outside. It may reach Fergus some day yet. Who knows? None but God.

And here we leave the Harveys. Our story has come round to those with whom it started. Elizabeth Harvey, the widow, and Cicely Brook, the spinster, are left together in their little leafy cottage. They will have it so. They have not a want unsupplied, but Mrs. Harvey will not leave the old place for any of her children's houses. She tells Millicent (she finds there are now some things which Millicent understands better even than Christian), "I've never lived in a house with a master since I lost my Peter—your father, my dear, whom you do not much remember. I'd rather go on as I am."

The two old ladies talk over their simple, ancient gossip, and patiently darn their old lace (they will not have any new), and puzzle their failing eyes over their old books. "Spectacles and all, it takes me a minute to make out a word now," says Mrs. Harvey; "but somehow there seems a great deal more in it. I think we mostly read too fast, especially in our Bibles."

There is an old hymn which Mrs. Harvey is always crooning when she is left alone. She has it in manuscript, and she has set it herself to a favorite old tune. She has taught it to Bessie and Davie Westbrook. It is sweetly touching to hear them singing it—the dear old cracked voice and the pretty trebles. Sometimes all the family sing it when they are gathered together.

Listen to their blended voices! There are lines in that plain old hymn that seem made for each:

"Take the praise we bring Thee, Lord,
Something more than what we speak,
For the love within us feels
Words uncertain, cold and weak.
Thoughts that rise and tears that fall,
Praise 'hee better: Take them all!

"Looking back the way we've come,
What a sight, O Lord, we see,
All the failure in ourselves,
All the love and strength in Thee.
Yet it seemed so dark before,
Would that we had trusted more!

"We will shun no future storm,
Sure Thy voice is in its wind;
We'll confront each coming cloud,
Sure the sun is bright behind:
Praying then, or praising now,
Only wilt Thou teach us how!

"Use us for Thy glory, Lord,
In the way that seemeth right,
Whether but to wait and watch,
Or to gird our limbs and fight,
Marching on, or standing still,
Each is best, when 'tis Thy will.

"When at last the end shall come,
What, O Lord, is Death but this,
Door of our dear Father's home,
Entrance into perfect bliss,
Peril past, and labor done,
Sorrow over, peace begun!"

THE END.

LILIES.

BY MARY F. HUNT.

WHERE roses blqw in fragrant June,
And summer breezes hover,
The waves flow with a silver tune,
Through banks of blushing clover;
And lilies white, like wreaths of light,
In shade and sheen bend over.

From out the mopy forest old,
Where every sunbeam lodges,
And weaves a tinge of yellow gold,
O'er all the leafy edges,
Through dewy ways, their fragrance strays
Adown the purple hedges.

We see them in their spotless snow,
Beside our pathways clinging,
And backward through the "long ago,"
Their waxen bells are swinging;
Where oft we strayed, each breezy glade,
A garland white is flinging.

Where weary crowds in sorrow pass,
And summer winds are roaming,
They sparkle in the churchyard grass,
Beneath the willows blooming,
And shine o'er years of bitter tears,
Like stars along the gloaming.

Perchance within the fragrance there,
Sometimes we fall a-dreaming,
And catch a glimpse of golden hair,
With bridal chaplets gleaming,
A dimpled face, in clouds of lace,
Through rosy vistas beaming.

Or see, perhaps, a shining band,
While through our dream is ringing
Sweet music from the Eden land,
The voice of angels singing,
Where lilies white, from jasper height,
"Across the tide" are swinging!

NOT to those who soon grow weary,
Soon give o'er the earnest strife,
Faint at heart and dim of vision,
Laggards in the race of life;

From life's rugged pathway shrinking,
From the thorns which pierce the feet,
From the cup of disappointment,
From the "bitter," void of "sweet;"

In each hindrance ever seeing
Mountains none may roll away,
Pass around, or reach their summit,
Step by step, day after day;

Not content to bear, with patience,
Years of toil, some end to gain;
Mind unstable, soon disheartened,
Deeming trial all in vain;

Foolish idlers! ever murmur.
That, to them, "Fate" is unkind,
Worse than useless all endeavor,
"Fortune" to their interests blind;

Meanwhile wasting time and talents—
Not to such true victory's given;
Nor to those who part with honor,
While they for the prize have striven.

But to those whom every failure
To fresh effort doth incite,
Pausing not amid the darkness,
Pressing ever toward the light;

Looking up beyond the roughness,
And the darkness of the way,
Seeing e'er the "prize" before them,
Seeking grace from Him each day.

Hearts so brave to do or suffer,
Trusting all to God and Heaven—
'Tis to these, so proven faithful,
That at length is victory given.

In the mine of hidden treasure
There's success for him who delves;
And in working out life's mission,
"God helps those who help themselves!"

They who, having steadfast purpose,
Nothing daunted at delay,
Conquer, by a firm persistence,
All that may obstruct the way;

They who long delay and failure,
Hope deferred, scorn, doubt and fear
(Though all mountain-high may tower),
Till they're vanquished, persevere;

They who truly live and labor,
They who struggle for the right,
Making glad the hearts of others,
Showing blinded ones the light—

Faithful, earnest, loving workers,
Striving nobly 'gainst all sin!—
Who are these? My soul makes answer:
"These! Ah, these are they who win!"

IS THERE PAIN IN DEATH FROM SUDDEN VIOLENCE?

REV. J. G. WOOD, in his "Natural History," has some remarks on this subject, that will be read with interest. All dread a death by violence, under the idea that it involves the most agonizing pain. But this seems not to be the case. Mr. Wood says:

That one animal should support its own life by the destruction of another creature, appears to be rather a cruel disposition of nature, and repugnant to the beauty and kindness which prevail in the order of created things. Averse as are we, the created beings, to inflicting pain on any of our fellow-creatures, it cannot but seem strange that the Creator should have made so many animals to suffer a violent death, and apparently to endure torturing pangs, by the lacerations to which they are subjected by their destroyers. The reflection is a just one, and one which until late years has never received a worthy answer. Endeavors were made to reconcile the Divine love with this apparent cruelty, by asserting that the lower animals were endued with so low a sense of pain that an injury which would inflict severest torture on a man, would cause but a slight pang to the animal. Yet, as all animals are clearly sensitive to pain, and many of them are known to feel it acutely, this argument has but trifling weight. Moreover, the system which was insensible to pain would be equally dull to enjoyment, and thus we should reduce the animal creation to a level but little higher than that of the vegetable.

The true answer is, that by some merciful and most marvellous provision, the mode of whose working is at present hidden, the sense of pain is driven out from the victim as soon as it is seized or struck by its destroyer. The first person who seems to have taken this view of the case was Livingstone, the well-known traveller, who learned the lesson by personal experience. After describing an attack made upon a lion, he proceeds:

"Starting, and looking half round, I saw the lion just in the act of springing on me. I was upon a little height, he caught my shoulder as he sprang, and we both came to the ground below together. Growling horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier dog does a rat. The shock produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first shake of the cat. It caused a sort of dreaminess, in which there was no sense of pain or feeling of terror, though I was quite conscious of all that was happening. It was like what patients, partially under the influence of chloroform, describe, who see all the operation, but feel not the knife. This singular condition was not the result of any mental process. The shock annihilated fear, and allowed no sense of horror in looking round at the beast. This peculiar state is probably produced in all animals killed by the carnivora; and, if so, is a merciful provision by our benevolent Creator for lessening the pain of death."

This fearful experience is, although most valuable, not a solitary one, and is made more valuable by that very fact. I am acquainted with a similar story of an officer of the Indian army, a German nobleman by birth, who, while in Bengal, was seized and carried away by a tiger. He describes the whole scene in much the same language as that of Livingstone, saying, that as far as the bodily senses were concerned, the chief sensation was that of a pleasant drowsiness, rather admixed with curiosity as to the manner in which the brute was going to eat him. Only by his reasoning powers, which remained unshaken, could he feel that his position was one of almost hopeless danger, and that he ought to attempt to escape. Perhaps, in so sudden and overwhelming a shock, the mind may be startled for a time from its hold upon the nerves, and be, so to speak, not at home to receive any impression from the nervous system. Many men have fallen into the jaws of these fearful beasts, but very few have survived to tell their tale. In the case of Livingstone, rescue came through the hands of a Hottentot servant, who fired upon the lion, and who was himself attacked by the infuriated animal. In the latter instance, the intended victim owed his life to a sudden whim of the tiger, which, after carrying him for some distance, threw him down and went off without him. The officer used playfully to attribute his escape to his meagre and fleshless condition, which, as he said, induced the epicurean tiger to reject a dinner on so lean and tough an animal as himself.

Those who have been in action are familiar with the indifference with which the severest wounds are received. There is one well-known instance of this apparent insensibility to pain, which occurred in the Crimean war. An officer was stooping to light his pipe at a camp-fire, when an enemy's shell plumped into the midst of the embers, and exploded, knocking the pipe out of his hands. He uttered an exclamation of annoyance at the loss of his pipe, unconscious that the fragments of the shell had carried off several of his fingers, and frightfully shattered other portions of his limbs. Even in cases of natural death a similar phenomenon occurs, and those who have expressed, in their last illness, the most utter terror of death, meet their dreaded fate with calm content, welcoming death as a friend, instead of fearing him as a foe.

It were happier, if, in forming friendships, virtue could occur with pleasure; but the greatest part of human gratifications approach so nearly to vice, that few, who make the delight of others their rule of conduct, can avoid disingenuous compliances; yet, certainly, he that suffers himself to be driven, or allured from virtue, mistakes his own interest, since he gains succor by means, for which his friend, if ever he becomes wise, must scorn him; and for which, at last, he must scorn himself.

INSUBORDINATION ; OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XL.

SOME INDICATION OF A CHANGE.

"IS there any one whom you would like to invite, Anne?" said Mrs. Webster.

"You know, madam," said Anne Earnest, in reply, "that I have few or no friends beyond this house; and yet, there is one whom I should like to see here, if her presence would be agreeable to you."

"And who is that, Anne?"

"It is Mrs. Anderson. You have seen her here frequently, and I have often heard you speak kindly of her."

"I will invite her; and she shall be truly welcome," said Mrs. Webster. "The more I see of her, the more she pleases me. She seems changing fast; and changing by the constant activity of good principles. Trouble has done much for her. Would you like to have her sisters invited?"

"No, madam. Such a distinction would only inflame their false pride. Mrs. Anderson will only find encouragement from it, and it will strengthen her in the performance of her duties. I feel much interested in her, for she is struggling alone with many oppositions, without and within. Her sisters despise her, and treat her with all manner of unkindness. An invitation from you may alter their estimate of her character and change their conduct."

"I like your suggestion," replied Mrs. Webster. "Her father has become much reduced of late, I understand?"

"He is now," said Anne, "reduced so low as to leave his family entirely dependent upon his daily efforts. All of his property is gone. But this, in my view, is not his only misfortune. Except in Mrs. Anderson, I doubt if he has an individual in his family, who feels for him any true sympathy."

"Than that, Anne, I should think there could be few greater misfortunes."

"And yet, Mrs. Webster, it is one consequent upon his own neglect of the true interests of his family. Like too many others, he allowed his daughters to grow up in idleness, and in the vain pursuit of pleasure in dress and dissipation. Indulged in everything, is it any wonder that, in the end, they should become so selfish as to think only of themselves in their father's misfortune; and actually to blame him for mismanagement in business."

"Surely," said Mrs. Webster, in surprise, "you must be mistaken in supposing them so utterly lost to every genuine impulse of true feeling."

"I wish, for their own, and for their father's sake, it were only an imaginary conclusion," replied Anne. "I have too often heard them express themselves in reference to their father, in a way that justifies my remark, even if I did not now know, as I do, that they feel and speak as I have intimated."

"How true is it," remarked Mrs. Webster, "that a wrong beginning, if not corrected, makes an evil ending. But, Anne, to change the subject, I hope you and Mr. Illerton have concluded to remain here after your marriage. I cannot part with you, at least for a time."

"I don't know what his intentions are, Mrs. Webster," replied Anne, "for we have not conversed upon the subject. But, as far as I am concerned, nothing would gratify me more than to remain with you. We shall spend a few weeks, you know, in Virginia, with Mr. Illerton's family, and when we return we shall, of course, be glad to find our home here, until other arrangements can be made."

"Look upon it, my dear child, as your own home, as much so as if it were your mother's house," said Mrs. Webster, in a voice that slightly trembled. "And, after your husband, let me claim the next place in your affections."

"Never, while I live, my dear madam," replied Anne, with emotion, "can I forget your kindness and your love. In my heart, your place is next to that of my own dear mother."

"No higher place can I desire to hold, Anne. The mother, who, so steadily, under privations and toil, continued to sow the seeds, and water the tender plants of good principles in your mind, should ever be first in your affections."

"Oh, Mrs. Webster, she was a woman pure in heart, and upright in intention! I wish you had known her." Anne's voice was broken with emotion.

"We would have been friends, Anne, had we known each other truly."

A servant coming in at the moment, interrupted the conversation, and, Mrs. Webster leaving the room in a few minutes, Anne was left alone with her own pleasant thoughts. Illerton had not been long in making an impression upon her heart, and when he asked for her hand, she yielded it without hesitation, for Mrs. Webster had borne testimony, from long acquaintance, to his pure principles.

On the day succeeding that on which the conversation just alluded to occurred between Mrs. Webster and Anne, a servant knocked at the door of Mr. Hardamer's dwelling, in Vulcan alley. He handed in a note directed to Mrs. Anderson. Gertrude and Geneva were alone in the parlor, and one of them received it.

"What is that?" asked Gertrude of her sister.

"It's a note for Genevieve, on gilt-edged paper."

"Who's it from? Open it, and let us see what is in it," said Gertrude, promptly.

Without hesitation the note was opened, and Genevra read: "Mrs. Webster's compliments to Mrs. Anderson, and will be pleased to have Mrs. Anderson's company on Thursday evening, at seven o'clock."

"Are you sure it's for her?" asked Gertrude, incredulously.

"Certainly. It's for Mrs. Anderson," replied Genevra.

"Maybe it's for some other Mrs. Anderson," said Gertrude. "I think we'd better not show it to her, for if we do, she'll be sure to go and make a fool of herself. I'm certain it can't mean her."

"I don't know but what we had," responded Genevra. "I wonder what's to be done there?"

"Anne is to be married, I suppose, sure enough. Well, there's no accounting for tastes. Who could have dreamed that a man like Illerton would marry such a low-bred creature as Anne Earnest! A pretty figure she'll cut! I'd like to be at the wedding, just to see how she would act. I reckon she'll hardly know whether she's on her head or on her heels. Humph! Ain't it too bad!" and Gertrude tossed her head disdainfully.

"If this is the way the thing works," remarked Genevra, "I see no use in trying to be something. A body might just as well take things fair and easy, and trust to its coming out right. If men will prefer such creatures as Anne, where's the use of trying to be genteel! It makes me mad, so it does."

"I don't reckon he's much, any how," said Gertrude; "I always thought there was something low-lived about him. He wants to make a slave of his wife, I suppose, and has been attracted to Anne, because she can work. If he'd married me, I'd have shown him another story, the mean fellow!"

"But what shall we do with this note?" asked Genevra, interrupting Gertrude.

"Why, burn it up. I'd never let her see it," replied Gertrude, a good deal excited.

"But maybe she'll find it out."

"Well, suppose she does? Who cares? I'm sure I don't. She's not going to crow over me in this way, I know."

Acting out their evil intention, the sisters concealed the note in one of their drawers, intending to burn it on the first opportunity. It so happened that Genevieve had occasion to go to this very drawer about an hour after, when her eye fell upon the crumpled note, bearing her own address. She took it up and read it, and understood too well why it had not reached her. Replacing it, she determined not to let them know that she had seen it, but to go to Mrs. Webster's in accordance with the invitation. On Thursday she told her mother that she had been invited to see Anne married; and in the afternoon prepared to go. Gertrude and Genevra could not, of course, forget that this was the evening named in the invitation, and they were not a little surprised to perceive that their sister was making unusual preparations to go out.

"Where are you going, Genevieve?" asked Genevra, whose curiosity exceeded her indisposition to question her sister.

"I'm going to Anne Earnest's wedding," she replied, quietly.

"Not without an invitation, certainly," said Genevra, thrown off her guard.

"Of course not, Genevra," replied her sister.

"But I never saw your invitation! When did you receive it?" said Genevra, with unguarded warmth.

This declaration pained Genevieve exceedingly, and, after a few moments' reflection, she replied, in a serious tone: "I am much grieved, Genevra, that you tried to do me a wrong, and then to say what is untrue about it, without having been asked a question. Surely, you ought to have been content with concealing my note of invitation, and not to have added to your wrong action by a denial of what you had done. No one but yourself can suffer by this. You see it has done me no harm. I cannot understand, Genevra, why you so perseveringly try to wound my feelings; and not even content with that, to endeavor to do me a greater wrong. Surely, your own heart must tell you that I have enough of suffering, without your adding a single pang. I have not mentioned what you have done to any one, and do not intend mentioning it. But, let me entreat of you, as you value your peace of mind, to give way no longer to the unkind feelings you have toward me; I have given you no cause for them, and you can only entertain them to your injury."

Genevra, thus suddenly and unexpectedly convicted of a wrong action, was so confounded as to be unable to utter a word. She hung her head in silence. For the first time in her life she stood rebuked before her sister, and so humbled that she knew not what to say. Seeing her true state of mind, Genevieve took her hand, and continued, in a low, tremulous tone: "My dear sister, you are not happy, nor can you tell when you were happy. In vain will you look abroad for the dear desire of your heart; it cannot thus be found, though you search for a whole lifetime. Your happiness must come from within. Your heart, Genevra, must be rightly tuned, or it will never give forth a pleasant sound. For a long, long time you have indulged in selfish desires. Your world has been a little circle, and yourself the centre. But, have you found contentment? Your trembling hand—that tear on your cheek tell me no!"

"Oh, sister, I am so unhappy!" sobbed out the poor girl, leaning her head upon the shoulder of Genevieve in sudden abandonment of feeling.

"And yet you need not be so, my dear sister," said Genevieve, in a voice of tender concern, drawing at the same time an arm around the waist of Genevra. "If your search after happiness has not been successful, it is because you have not discovered its true source. But there is happiness, and it is for you, if you will only accept of it. Let me direct your mind aright in this matter. Hitherto you have cared only to gratify yourself; you have not thought of others as having claims upon you. But the gratification of selfish desires has only created new desires, too many of which you have found it impossible to realize. And thus, every time your wishes have been met, you have had new causes of discontent. If you would be happy, these selfish desires must be laid aside, and you must begin to consider others with feelings of kindness. You must begin to think, that, as a member of society, there are duties which you are required to perform, and that if you neglect these duties, some one, or many, must suffer. The word duty may seem to you harsh and repulsive. But the more you realize, by practice, its true meaning, the more pleasant will be its sound to your ear. And, first of all, your duties should commence at home. Consider, for a moment, our father—declining in years, ruined in business and burdened with a large family. Can you do nothing, as his daughter, to lighten his toil? Are there no little attentions which you can render, that will make him feel his home to be a pleasant place, and cause him to think of his Genevra with a glow of heartfelt satisfaction? If nothing more, you can, at least, in his presence, seem to be cheerful, and not, by a distressed countenance, make him ever feel that his children are discontented with the best he can do for them. Forget yourself in this matter, and consider him. He has need, as your father, of all your affectionate consideration. And think, if there is nothing that you can do, to make your mother's daily labors less fatiguing. Here are three of us—surely ma need not be the servant of us all! Rather, let us lighten her burdens by taking them upon ourselves, and making her feel that we have for her a tender regard. If each of us was to try her best to make the others happy, what a pleasant family we would be! Can you not see, my dear sister, that in so doing you would be far happier than you have ever been?"

"I do! I do!" responded Genevra, sobbing.

"Then resolve, my sister, that you will try to be more considerate of others; and that, instead of caring only for yourself, you will endeavor to add to the happiness of those around you. Your reward will be a peace far deeper and purer than any that has ever yet filled your heart."

"Oh, Genevieve, how much I have wronged you!" said Genevra, lifting her head, and looking into her sister's face with an expression of deep penitence. "And yet, you have been so patient!—so kind!"

"Be not pained, Genevra, on this account. Let us be hereafter, as sisters," responded Genevieve, pressing her lips to the burning cheek of the weeping girl.

"I shall never be able to lift my head again. Oh, I have been so thoughtless! so wicked!" continued Genevra. "How could I have been so selfish?"

"Let good resolutions take the place of troubling thoughts, and all will be well," said Genevieve, encouragingly.

"Oh, I shall never be as I have been again."

"I trust not, Genevra," replied her sister. "But you will have a hard battle to fight. Your evils are not subdued—they have only retired; and will again show themselves, and enter into combat with your good resolutions. Then will come the time when it will require all your strength and courage. But if you look for aid to Him whose ear is ever open, He will help you, and conquer for you. In your own strength, remember, my dear sister, that you can do nothing—trusting in the Lord, no evil can subdue you."

"I will make the effort," replied Genevra, with a serious, but calm countenance.

"In the strength of our Heavenly Father, you will come off more than conqueror," said Genevieve, tenderly.

That evening, after Genevieve had gone to the wedding, her father wanted a clean cravat, as he had a society meeting to attend.

"Where is Genevieve?" he asked, in a tone that indicated the want of something.

"She has gone out, pa," said Genevra, rising from her chair, and advancing toward him. "Do you want anything?"

"Only a cravat," he replied. "But never mind, I can get it."

"Let me get it for you, pa," she said, going into his chamber, and quickly returning with a white cravat, which she had, already, neatly folded for him.

The father said nothing. But the look which he cast upon his child, was to her a sweet reward.

After he had gone out, instead of folding her hands, as usual, in gloomy idleness, Genevra sat down by her mother, and offered to assist her in sewing.

Gertrude looked up with surprise on hearing Genevra's remark; but when she saw her actually begin to sew on one of her younger sister's frocks, her astonishment broke out into words, and she said, aneringly: "What's in the wind now?"

"Nothing," replied Genevra. "Only I begin to think it hardly right to sit in idleness while ma is at work."

"If she chooses to work her eyes out, that's no reason that I should," said Gertrude, in an irritated tone. "You've grown mighty considerate all at once, upon my word! I thought something was out, when you pattered off so fustily after pa's cravat. But you got no thanks for your trouble!"

Now this was a pretty severe trial for Genevra, and she found her resentful feelings a good deal excited. But she only replied: "It was not because I wanted thanks, Gertrude. But pa wished for a cravat, and Genevieve was away."

"Fiddlestick on Genevieve! I wish she would stay away!"

"I don't think we ought to feel so unkindly toward her," said Genevra, in an earnest tone. "She never interferes with us. We have been very much to blame for our actions toward her, Gertrude."

"You don't say so!" responded Gertrude, with a sneer. "But, in the name of wonder, what has broken loose all at once? You were very fierce the other day, to hide her invitation, and then to burn it!"

"What invitation?" asked Mrs. Hardamer, with a look of surprise.

"Her invitation to Anne Earnest's wedding, ma," replied Geneva. "It fell into our hands, and we were so ill-natured as to conceal it from her, and then to destroy it. But before we had burned it, she saw it by accident, and, saying nothing about it, prepared herself for the wedding party, and went, as you know, this evening. Surprised at her knowledge of the invitation, I could not help saying something to her, when she convicted me in such mild, but strong terms, of my evil intentions toward her, that I felt rebuked and humbled. She did not get angry and chide me with any warmth of feeling, but pictured to me so clearly the wrong I did to myself, as well as to her, that I could not say a word in reply. I feel sensible that I have acted from very bad motives and feelings. And I have resolved to do better, if I can."

"Well, you are a fool!" exclaimed Gertrude, rising to her feet in utter astonishment. "I believe the whole family are going crazy!"

Geneva made no reply, for something seemed to whisper to her that it could do no good; and although she desired very greatly to make the effort to correct her sister's wrong ideas, yet she contended with this desire, and remained silent.

So sudden and unlooked-for a change in Geneva struck her mother with surprise. But it was a surprise that sent a thrill of delight to her bosom. Up to the angry exclamation of Gertrude, she had remained silent. That Geneva did not respond to it, pleased her greatly, although she could hardly tell why, for she was no close observer of mental operations. Feeling now called upon to say something, she replied to Gertrude: "If not disposed to do well yourself, Gertrude, at least suffer others to act in a better way. Geneva is right, and, in continuing as she has begun, she will find her reward in a quiet mind. Let me beg of you, Gertrude," and the tears came into the mother's eyes, "to imitate so good an example."

"Don't preach to me, if you please!" responded Gertrude, hastily leaving the room, and slamming the door after her.

Mrs. Hardamer took off her spectacles, wiped her eyes, replaced them, and attempted to continue her sewing. But the moisture again accumulated, and threw a mist over everything. Again she removed her glasses, dried her eyes, and again replaced them. But it was no use, the tears stole out and again blinded her. Placing her arm upon the work-table, and leaning her head upon her hand, she allowed her feelings to take their course. Still plying her needle, and seeming not to observe her, Geneva ever and anon turned an earnest look toward her mother, and not without emotion did she perceive tear after tear stealing over her hand and dropping to the floor. Were they tears of joy or tears of sorrow?

CHAPTER XII.

AN UNEXPECTED INTERVIEW.

IT was after ten o'clock that night when Mr. Hardamer came home from the meeting he had attended. His wife was sitting up for him, alone, and, as he entered, he could not but observe that her face wore an expression that was new and somewhat strange, and yet by no means painful. She looked him in the eyes so steadily, as he sat down beside the table at which she was still sewing, and seemed about to speak, yet unable, from some cause, to bring her thoughts out into words, that he said, to break the silence: "Has anything happened?"

There was something in the tone of her husband's voice more tender and subdued than usual, and it had the effect still more to soften her feelings. The tears sprang into her eyes, and he saw that, from emotion, she could not trust herself to speak. A new and sudden interest in the happiness of his wife arose in his bosom, and turning a look of affectionate concern, he said: "Something weighs upon your mind more than usual. Let me share it with you, whether it be pleasant or painful."

"It is both pleasant and painful, husband," she replied, while the tears that had been ready to gush forth, rolled over her cheeks, in which both years and care had made many deep lines. She bent her face down upon the table, and sobbed aloud, unable longer to restrain her feelings.

Hardamer did not interrupt her, and in a short time her emotion subsided. Raising her head, she looked him again in the face, and said: "Something has happened to-night that has given me great pleasure. Geneva has changed suddenly for the better; and, like her sister Genevieve, seems anxious to do all she can to make things more pleasant and comfortable."

"Indeed!" responded Hardamer, his face brightening up. "Well, I thought a little strange of her to-night when she offered to get my cravat, and seemed so pleased in handing it to me. But what can be the cause of it?"

"Why, so far as I can understand it," replied Mrs. Hardamer, "both Geneva and Gertrude were so ill-natured as to hide away and then destroy a note of invitation for Genevieve to attend a wedding party at Mrs. Webster's. But it so happened that Genevieve accidentally saw it before it was destroyed, and, without saying a word about it, prepared herself to go this afternoon. Geneva said something to her, when Genevieve convicted her so unexpectedly of the wrong action, and then, I suppose, talked so kindly to her, that Geneva softened down, and then resolved to do better. I should think it an excellent sign to see her so soon trying to act upon her good resolutions."

"Indeed it is," replied her husband, his mind in a state of pleasing wonder. "Well, after all, I shall begin to think that some good can even come out of trouble. There is no denying that Genevieve has very much changed for the better since her unhappy marriage, and changed, too, in spite of all the neglect and unkindness she has experienced in her own father's house. And now, to find Geneva imitating her good example, is wonderful indeed!" Mr. Hardamer's voice slightly trembled.

"There came suddenly into my memory to-night," said Mrs. Hardamer, in reply, "while I sat here, these words, 'Sweet are the uses of adversity.' I never seemed to understand them before. But now I begin to see what they mean. I am sure I feel happier to-night, notwithstanding all our outward reverses, than I ever felt while we were prosperous. I think we have looked too much to the outward things of the world as desirable, and too little to that state of mind which, after all, is to constitute our happiness or misery. I mean to that condition of mind which makes us contented with the present, and desirous that all around us should feel a like degree of contentment."

Mr. Hardamer listened with pleasure and surprise to the words of his wife. She had never been disposed, through her whole life, to give much attention to other than mere external things, and his surprise was excited at hearing her make a remark that seemed to him so sound, and that involved an idea above what he had thought her capable of conceiving.

"Your thoughts have been running in the same channel with mine," replied her husband. "I think, with you, that there is great room for improvement, and I feel a strong disposition to enter upon a change of desires and aims at once. Even for the few minutes that we have been talking, I can perceive a new light breaking in upon my mind, and it reveals many things that I was not conscious existed there, and which I at once acknowledge to be wrong."

At that moment a carriage was heard to drive up to the door, and, in a minute after, Genevieve entered. It was about eleven o'clock when she came in, and she was surprised at finding her father and mother, who usually retired early, up at so late an hour.

"Did you come home in that carriage?" said her father, with an encouraging smile.

"Yes, sir. Mrs. Webster insisted upon sending me home."

"That was very kind in her," remarked Mrs. Hardamer. "And so I suppose Anne is married?" she added, without the tone of her voice indicating the dislike she had so long entertained.

"Yes, mother, she is married," replied Genevieve, pleased at finding her friend alluded to, without the usual sneer.

"I always thought Anne a good girl," said Mr. Hardamer.

"Indeed, father, she is. I cannot tell you how many good lessons she has taught me. Had it not been for her, I know not how I should have borne up under the trials and troubles of the past year." Genevieve's voice trembled, and she regained the command of her feelings only by a strong effort.

Mrs. Hardamer, self-convicted of having wronged the friendless girl, and of having, ever since, entertained toward her feelings of unkindness, was a good deal moved by Genevieve's words and manner. After a few moments of silence, she said: "There is always danger of our passing a wrong judgment upon others; and I have, I believe, been guilty of misjudging Anne Earnest. You can say so to her, Genevieve, when you again see her; and if ever meet her, I will acknowledge it to herself."

Genevieve looked surprised and delighted at this confession.

"Anne has always spoken kindly of you, mother," she said. "I never see her that she does not ask after you; and she expresses for you a degree of interest that I could hardly have expected her to entertain."

"She is a good girl, I doubt not," said Mr. Hardamer; "and I know she has obtained a good husband. May God bless them!" he added, with feeling, taking up a light and retiring to his chamber.

On the next morning, while the family were seated at the breakfast-table, Gertrude said, with a sneer, at the same time glancing at Genevieve: "I suppose Anne Earnest didn't know whether she was on her head or her heels last night."

"Yes, she was as collected and as easy in her manners as ever," replied Genevieve, with a smile.

"No doubt!" responded Gertrude, with another sneer and a toss of the head. "She is just low-minded enough to be free and easy anywhere."

"Gertrude!" said Mr. Hardamer, looking her steadily and somewhat sternly in the face. "I cannot permit such remarks in my presence. Anne Earnest, or rather Mrs. Illerton, is every inch a lady, and has found her true level in society. She was not well treated here, because there was no one in this house who could appreciate her real worth, but Genevieve, and she has had less influence in the past year than her real character has called for. Hereafter I shall expect no more such allusions to her, intended only to wound the feelings of your sister."

Surprised at this rebuke, Gertrude glanced at her mother, who, she well knew, had entertained like feelings with herself in regard to Anne. Mrs. Hardamer understood the meaning of this mute appeal, and said: "Your father is right, Gertrude, and we have all been wrong. Hereafter, let us endeavor to pass more righteous judgment on others."

"You're a—" But the evil-minded girl checked the word as it was forming on her tongue, and, instantly self-convicted of wrong, she arose hastily from the table and retired to her chamber.

Hardamer and his wife understood too well what was passing in the mind of their child, and they finished their meal in silence, deeply pained at heart.

About ten o'clock on the same morning, as Mr. Hardamer was busily engaged behind his counter in cutting out work, an elderly man entered, and with an expression of countenance which he could not but observe to be peculiar, asked if his name was not Hardamer.

"That is my name," he replied, looking at the stranger inquiringly.

"And my name is Anderson," said the stranger.

"Anderson!" ejaculated Hardamer, with a sudden start, while a shade of painful feeling settled upon his countenance.

"You have cause, sir, to be pained at the mention of that name; for, if I am rightly informed, one who bore it has trifled with the hopes and happiness of your child, and through her deeply wounded you," said the stranger, in a voice evidently disturbed by emotions against which he was vainly struggling.

"And why do you thus open wounds but half-healed over?" asked Hardamer, with some sternness of manner.

"I would open but to heal more surely," said the stranger, affecting to smile, but it was a feeble smile. "I am the father of the unhappy young man who married your daughter!"

"His father!" exclaimed Hardamer, in surprise. "Then, my dear sir, what news do you bring from one toward whom I cannot be expected to entertain very kind feelings?"

"Good news, I hope, sir," replied old Mr. Anderson. "He is a changed man, and I have good reasons for believing the change to be radical. This change has been in progress for many months, and, from observing it closely, and with all of a parent's doubting anxiety, I feel sure that it is genuine."

The events of a year had broken down the feelings of Hardamer, and robbed him of much of the control over himself that he had once possessed. The suddenness of this news, as well as its character, and the manner, appearance, and evident emotion of the stranger who stood before him in a new and unexpected relation, all combined to affect him powerfully. He covered his face with his hands, and leaned down upon the counter, evidently struggling to control himself. In a few moments he lifted his head, and exhibited a countenance paler than before, and touched with a tenderer expression. He passed round the counter, and coming in front of Mr. Anderson, took his hand in both of his, and while his lip quivered slightly, and his voice trembled, said, "We are, it seems, companions in a single sorrow—and it has been deep and painful to both our hearts. Let us be friends."

This was answered by a hard pressure of the hand from Mr. Anderson, for he could not reply.

"And, now, sir, be seated, and tell me of your son," continued Hardamer.

After they had retired into a small room, or recess, back of his shop, Mr. Anderson said, "My boy, after he had so cruelly and unrighteously deserted your daughter, went to the South, where a dangerous illness put a sudden check upon his career of folly. Recovering, partially, from this, he returned home, broken in spirits, and well nigh broken in constitution. But he has recovered his health, and, I am glad to say, is in a better and truer state of mind. And now he is here to do all in his power to make your daughter's life happy. I believe we can trust him. I feel sure that the change in him is deep and genuine."

For some time Mr. Hardamer was silent. He was not glad at this unexpected news; for, at once the idea of losing the child who, of all his children, evinced a degree of concern and tenderness for him that had become, in his present condition, necessary to his happiness, presented itself, and he could not endure it. But he saw this to be wrong, and struggling against it for a few moments, said, "What you tell me ought to fill me with pleasure. I wish I could say that it did. Misfortunes have narrowed down my sources of happiness, and almost the only one I now have is this same child you have come to take away from me." The old man's voice again trembled. "She is greatly changed, sir, since her marriage. Trouble has purified as well as chastened her; and she is now everything a father's heart could desire. God bless her, and your son, too, if he is changed as much as she is!"

And old Mr. Hardamer could restrain his feelings no longer, but bent down his head and sobbed like a child. Mr. Anderson, too, was moved, and, after the pause of a few moments, said, "Sweet are the uses of adversity."

"Just the words my wife repeated last night," ejaculated Hardamer, raising his head suddenly, his countenance instantly undergoing a change. "Her very words! And now I remember that I have hope still. Another one of my proud, foolish girls is beginning to feel her sister's example. Thank Heaven, I have hope that I shall see my Genevieve happy, and not be robbed of all comfort myself. It is true, but I never could have believed it—Sweet are the uses of adversity!"

Genevieve sat sewing at the window on the same morning on which the interview between her father and Mr. Anderson occurred. Her mother and Genevieve were near her, also busy with the needle, and Gertrude sat apart from them all, reading a novel, her mind in a moody and gloomy state. It was about eleven o'clock when the door opened and the father entered with a stranger. Genevieve arose to her feet, and looked them both in the face inquiringly.

All the morning she had been thinking, with more than her usual anxious tenderness of feeling, about her absent husband, and the instant her father entered, in company with an elderly man, a stranger, her heart misgave her, that the visit had some connection or other with the one who occupied her thoughts more and more every day. She was not long kept in suspense.

"This is my Genevieve," said Mr. Hardamer, advancing toward his daughter, and taking hold of her hand. "And a dear, good girl she is! If your son has changed as much as she has in a few months, then will they be happy together. And may Heaven bless them!" he added, fervently, his voice trembling down into an inaudible tone.

Old Mr. Anderson came forward quickly, and grasped the hand of Genevieve.

"God bless you, my child!" he said, kissing her pale cheek. "I have come to restore to you your husband. And I would fain hope that he is worthy to claim your hand."

Mr. Anderson could utter no more. The tender emotions awakened by the interview unmanned him. The feelings of the aged are less subject to their control than the feelings of those in the vigor of middle life. He leaned his head upon the shoulder of his new-found child and wept.

The whole scene, so sudden and so unexpected, startled Mrs. Hardamer and the two sisters. Gertrude was confounded—Genevra surprised and delighted. Mr. Anderson's appearance at once commanded respect, and his mild, benevolent countenance gave a favorable impression of his character. In a few minutes a more orderly introduction took place, and such explanations were given as enabled each one to see the new position which affairs had assumed. There was but one heart present that did not warm with a pure delight, and that was the heart of Gertrude. Instead of rejoicing at the happy change about to take place in the truly hard lot of her sister, a feeling of envy and hatred was aroused. She felt rebuked by the whole scene, and that annoyed and irritated her.

CHAPTER XIII.

MORE PLEASING INDICATIONS.

ABOUT one week after Mr. Anderson had left home, a neighbor stopped at the door and left a letter for his wife. He had been to the post-office, and seeing one there, directed to her, had brought it with him.

Retiring to her own room, she broke the seal, and read:

"MY DEAR JANE:—You are painfully anxious, I know, to hear from me, and I now write to relieve your suspense, and, at the earliest moment that I can do so. I have seen the wife of our dear, erring, but repentant boy; and they have met, and been reconciled. And who is she?—and what is she? These are the first questions, to which your heart yearns for an answer. In a word, then, she seems to be all that we could desire. A few months of painful disappointments and trials have done much for her; or her character, when she was married, has been greatly misrepresented. Her father, during the last year, has failed in business, and been much reduced in circumstances. This reverse, from all that I can see, has wrought upon him a salutary change, and other members of his family seem also to feel a like happy influence. When I called upon him, alone, and announced my name, he did not, at first, receive me kindly; but, in a few moments, he softened down, and I saw that the man was sound at heart. His affections are warmly centred upon the child our boy has married; and this deep affection has been called out within the past year. After her desertion, as far as I can learn, she was treated with great unkindness by all of the family, and by her father with coldness and indifference. Cut off from all hope of future elevation in society, which had been her ruling passion, and, having added to this the sorrows of a disappointed affection, and the pains of cruel persecution and neglect, she was driven into the right way. It seems, that, as a measure of relief from the distracting thoughts that passed through her mind, and the gloomy feelings that oppressed her, she resorted to the various domestic employments incident to a family, that had before seemed degrading in her eyes. Her father's reverses, no doubt, awakened a sympathy in her mind, and she, therefore, sought to alleviate his trouble in every possible way. And you know how much it is in the power of a child, by little attentions and affectionate care, to soothe the heart of a parent whose mind is not at ease.

"Once in the right way, and there is everything to hope. It seems that she never thought of looking back. The flowers she found, ever and anon, springing on her new pathway, wooed her onward. And, as she continued to move forward, the flowers became more frequent, and their perfume sweeter. The change in her, if what she once was be truly told, is far greater than that in our dear boy. I already love her; and I know you will take her at once to your bosom.

"I saw her before William did. Poor boy! As the moment approached for him to meet, face to face, the woman with whose affections he had so cruelly trifled, his heart seemed to fail him. But I took words to him from his wife before he saw her again, and when they met, there was an instant oblivion of the past, and a world of new affection created in their hearts. They were suffered to meet alone.

"Day after to-morrow we shall start for home; and, of course, our new daughter will return with us. She seems overjoyed at what has happened; and I can see that there exists between her and our William a genuine affection, notwithstanding the past. I trust that I am not permitting my gratified feelings to create false hopes; but it seems to me that our last days are going to be our happiest. How wonderfully is evil overruled for good! But I shall soon be with you, and then I can say to you a thousand things now crowding upon my thought.

"Yours, ever,

"T. ANDERSON."

"Why, how do you do, Mr. Anderson? What in the world has brought you so far from home?" said an elderly man, advancing with a quick step across the deck of a steamboat, that was gliding swiftly down the Potomac, two days after the preceding letter was written.

"And how do you do, Mr. Illerton," responded the individual addressed, grasping the hand that was extended toward him.

"But what are you doing here? You haven't answered me that yet?" said the first speaker.

"Why, I suppose I am on some such business as you are, friend Illerton," he replied, smiling.

"Oh! Aye! William has been taking a wife, then, has he? Well, that's clever. Who did he marry?"

"You jump to conclusions as rapidly as ever, I see," replied Mr. Anderson. "But, I suppose you are half right, at least. The name of my new daughter was Hardamer."

At the mention of that name, a well-grown boy, rather poorly dressed, who had been standing against the railing, started and turned upon the two individuals a look of inquiring interest.

"Hardamer," repeated Mr. Illerton, musingly. "Well, I believe I never heard of that name before. I hope she's as good a girl as my boy's got, for I think your William is about making a very fine man. He sowed some wild oats, it is true. But he has gathered in the troublesome harvest, and, I suppose, is tired of that kind of farming. I wish you joy, my old friend!" he added again, shaking the hand of Mr. Anderson. "The young folks are all snug in the cabin, I suppose, and have discovered each other before this," he continued. "Well, we'll let 'em enjoy themselves by themselves, for awhile. Young blood don't always mix well with old blood."

"Who has Henry married?" asked Mr. Anderson, as his old friend and neighbor paused.

"Well, I can't say that I know much about her, except that her name was Anne Earnest, and that she seems to have the disposition of an angel," replied Mr. Illerton.

"And an angel she is!" murmured the boy just mentioned, whose ears were taking in every word that passed between the individuals who were talking. But they heard him not; nor, indeed, did they notice his presence.

Just at that moment the whole party from below emerged upon deck—consisting of the wife of old Mr. Illerton, her son and his young bride, Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, and Illerton's two sisters.

The two young men were old acquaintances. They had been raised together. And the reader understands perfectly the relation which Anne and Genevieve bore to each other. A few brief, but somewhat embarrassing explanations took place when the parties all so unexpectedly met in the cabin, upon the starting of the steamboat; and then mutual and sincere congratulations ensued.

The boy moved away as he saw them approaching, and retired to another part of the boat. A close observer could readily have seen that, from some cause, his mind was ill at ease. His face was pale and thin, and he seemed by no means possessed of the healthful vigor usual to boys of his age. He went far forward, upon the bow of the boat, and resting his arms upon the railing, stood looking with a vacant gaze upon the surface of the water. A heavy sigh soon told that his thoughts were busy with no pleasing subjects, and, as if to get rid of them, he raised up from his half-recumbent position and commenced walking backward and forward. After the passage of half an hour he moved toward the after part of the boat. His eye rested upon Anne and Genevieve, seated alone, in earnest conversation, and he paused hesitatingly. Then, as if from a sudden resolution, he walked forward to where they were sitting, and stood before them.

"Isaac, is it possible!" exclaimed, at once, both Genevieve and Anne, looking with surprise and concern into the face of the pale and agitated boy.

"Yes, it is me—or, at least, all that is left of me," replied Isaac Wilson—for it was none other than he—endeavoring to put on an unconcerned expression of countenance, as a mechanical means of controlling his feelings.

"Well, Isaac, what are you doing now?" asked Genevieve, or Mrs. Anderson, in a voice of kind concern.

"I'm not doing anything just now, Miss Genevieve," he replied, and his voice trembled, in spite of his efforts to seem composed, while his tone was sad and even desponding. "I've been sick for two months, and, of course, couldn't work much all that time. If it hadn't been that I was living with a kind-hearted, though very poor old woman, who, I believe was good to me because she had a wild son who had gone away, I must have been sent to the poor-house. After I got well enough to work, I could get nothing to do in Georgetown. I heard of a seat of work to be had in Fredericksburg; and the tender-hearted old woman stinted herself to lend me enough money to carry me there. But I'm afraid when I get there that the seat will be taken, and even if it is not, I may find it hard work to get in, for no boss likes to take a boy like me. I have been questioned so often and so close, and have had to tell so many downright lies about who I was and where I came from, that it makes me sick to think about it."

"Then, Isaac, why don't you go home again?" said Anne, or Mrs. Illerton, as she was now to be called.

"Indeed, indeed, Miss Anne, I have wished a thousand and a thousand times that I was back again into the old shop. But I'm afraid to go back. Mr. Hardamer, you know—asking your pardon, Miss Genevieve—is so cruel when he gets angry. And, if I was to go home alone, he could do anything he pleased with me."

"You needn't fear but that father will receive you back kindly," said Mrs. Anderson.

"I wish I could think so, Miss Genevieve," said the boy, earnestly.

"I am sure he will," replied Mrs. Anderson. "Father, as well as some of the rest of us—you among the number, I perceive—has changed greatly, in the last few months. He is, besides, much reduced in circumstances, and your assistance would be a good deal to him."

The countenance of Isaac brightened up, and he replied, "You almost make me feel like going home. I call it home, for I have not felt as if I had any place to go to that I could really call home, since I went away."

"Be advised by us, Isaac," said Mrs. Illerton, with kind concern. "Go directly back to Baltimore."

Mrs. Anderson, here, will give you a letter to her father, I know; that will be all the introduction you want to give you a welcome back; for her word now goes a good deal farther than it did when you were there. You will give him a letter, will you not, Genevieve?"

"That I will, right gladly, if he will go back," replied Mrs. Anderson.

"Then I'll go home," said Isaac, emphatically. "That is, if I can get home."

"We'll arrange all that for you," said Mrs. Illerton.

"I shall never forget your goodness to me, Miss Anne. From the day you came into our house I have had better desires than ever I had before. And many and many a time since I went away, has the good advice you gave to us all come back into my mind, and kept me from doing many things to which I was tempted. I don't know how it is, but I never resolved to do what was wrong but I thought of you; and many and many a time that thought has saved me from actions that would have brought me more troubles than any I have ever had."

Mr. Illerton, who was standing at a short distance when Isaac came up, observed that he had entered into conversation with his young wife and her friend. Curiosity impelled him to draw near, and he heard, without being observed by him, the entire compliment paid by the boy to Anne. At the moment he ceased speaking, he recognised him, and, extending his hand, he said: "Why, how do you do, my young friend? This is the first time that I've seen you since the day you called to let me know where I should find this young lady," glancing at Anne. "I owe you a thousand thanks!"

"It was all for her sake," replied Isaac, looking toward the person indicated. "And it was one, if the only good action of my life."

"That's true, every word of it!" said Illerton. "Well, I like a whole-hearted friend, and Anne seems to have no others."

"I think it most time to dispense with compliments," remarked Anne, smiling, "and so I will give your thoughts a different direction. It is an old saying that one good turn deserves another; and as you seem to think Isaac has rendered you a service, I propose; as he now stands in need of a friend, that you hold yourself in that relation to him."

"That I will most cheerfully," replied Mr. Illerton. "And now tell me in what I can serve you."

Isaac hesitated to reply, and Anne said: "He left Mr. Hardamer some months ago, and we have been persuading him to go back. From what he has said, I have concluded that he parted with nearly the last of his money when he paid his passage, and cannot, of course, return without aid."

"We'll soon arrange all that for him," replied Mr. Illerton, kindly. "And so you have made up your mind to go back?"

"Yes, sir. I haven't seen much peace since I went away. Somehow or other everything has gone wrong with me. I used to think that if I was only my own master, and free to spend all the money I could earn, I should be happy. But, after I went off, I was afraid to look for work in town, and had no money with which to pay for a passage to any other place. There were three of us, and we set off to walk all the way to Washington, the nearest point at which we could hope to get work. All together we had not over a dollar. At the end of the first day, we stopped at a house near the road and asked for something to eat. We had been afraid to stop at the taverns for fear of being taken up for runaways, and were now very hungry and tired. At this house they gave us some bread and milk, but did not ask us to stay. We set out, after finishing our meal, with hearts somewhat heavier than they were in the morning, for it was growing dark very fast. We had no prospect before us but that of keeping on all night, or lying down in some fence-corner to sleep. We were too much fatigued to do the former, so, after holding a consultation, we concluded to cross over an adjoining field to a haystack that was in sight, and try to rest as comfortably as possible.

"Here we made ourselves beds, and lay down, and so tired were we that we soon fell asleep. It was broad daylight the next morning when I awoke, wet and cold. It had rained during the night, and my clothes were, in places, literally soaked with water. I was so hoarse that I could hardly speak, and so stiff that I moved myself with difficulty. Gradually I recovered the use of my limbs, and we started on again. Not, however, until we had tossed up a cent to determine whether we should keep on or go back and behave ourselves better, for we were already sick of our adventure. That night, at about nine o'clock, we arrived in Washington, even more tired than we were on the night previous. The whole of our dollar was gone, and we did not know a single individual in the city. For some time we wandered about the streets, hungry and fatigued, and were finally obliged to lie out during the night. We were really in a sad condition on the next morning; and so hungry, that we were compelled to beg some bread and meat. For my part, I do not recollect ever to have felt as wretched. My joints were so stiff that I could hardly walk. My skin was dry and hot, and a constant tickling in my throat kept me coughing all the while.

"For the greater part of that day we strolled about the city and through the public buildings. As the day began again to decline, we agreed that it was best to separate, and each endeavor to provide some place of refuge for himself. I went over to Georgetown, and made application at a shop there for work.

"What do you want with work, ha?" said the man I addressed, looking up at me from the bench on which he was seated, with a forbidding, half-angry countenance.

"I must have work, or I can't live," said I, confounded and distressed at the rough reception I had received.

"You'd better go back to your master," he replied, looking down at his work, 'I don't harbor runaway apprentices.'

"I was confounded, and retreated hastily from the shop. 'How should he know that I had run away,' I said to myself, in alarm, as I walked on.

"I soon saw another shop, and into this I ventured. To my application for work, I was asked by a keen-looking man, where I had served my time.

"In Washington," I answered, promptly.

"Who with?" said the man.

"To this question, of course, I could not reply, for I did not know a single shoemaker in Washington. My hesitation and confusion betrayed the falsehood, and, suddenly turning from the man, I hurried again into the street.

"As I passed along, I saw a kind-hearted-looking old woman standing in the door of a small house. 'Here is my last hope,' I thought, to myself, and so, going up to her, I asked her if she could not give me something to eat, for I was very hungry. How my heart warmed under her pleasant smile and motherly tone of voice! She at once told me to come in. It was nearly night, and her table was set, with a clean, white cloth, against one side of the room, ready for her supper. It contained a single plate, a knife and fork, and a cup and saucer, showing that the meal was preparing for herself alone. To her kind invitation I seated myself, and tried to rest my wearied limbs. But I ached so all over, that freedom from motion was not rest. Very soon she brought in a large plate of toast, some cold meat and the tea-things. But when I attempted to eat, I found that my appetite craved but little food.

"You are not well," she said, looking me in the face with concern.

"Indeed, ma'am, I do not feel very well," I replied, filling up.

"She observed that I was troubled, and seemed much concerned.

"Where are you going? Do you belong to Georgetown or the city?" she asked.

"I hesitated a moment, for my first lies had brought me off so badly; and I did not feel like deceiving one who was kind to me, and seemed so good.

"I—I—am from Baltimore," I replied.

"Ah, indeed!" she said, brightening up. 'My boy went there a good many years ago, when he run away from his master here,' she added, her voice sinking into a sad tone. 'Runaway apprentices never come to any good.'

"Her words smote upon my heart; and I turned my head away, so that she should not see the expression of my face. She noticed the sudden movement, and, I suppose, the thought occurred to her that I might be a runaway apprentice.

"I hope you haven't left your master?" she said, with evident concern.

"Yes, ma'am, it is true," I replied, my face reddening. 'But I was not well treated. If my master had been kind to me, nothing on earth would have induced me to have left him.'

"The old woman shook her head, and seemed grieved.

"You boys," she said, 'are not good judges in these matters. And, even if you were not well treated, your condition was better than it is now.'

"I could but acknowledge the truth of what she said; and she went on:

"I have known a good many runaway apprentices in my time, and I never yet knew one that did not repent of what he had done, and wish himself back in his master's house a thousand times. It is always difficult for such a boy to get work, for he will be suspected, and few masters have any disposition to encourage runaways.'

"I did not reply to this, although I felt its truth; but rising from the table, I took off my coat, and rolled up my sleeve to exhibit to her two or three deep cuts which the cowhide of the constable had left upon my arm.

"My back has nearly a dozen worse than these," I said, 'now fresh, and some of them clear through the skin; and, besides, I have twenty seams and scars there from previous floggings'

"This touched the old woman's heart, and she said, with much feeling: 'Indeed, indeed, some boys have a hard time of it! But we won't talk any more about that. You want a good bed to-night; and cannot get one unless I provide it for you'

"She then took me up into a little room, in which was a soft bed with snow-white sheets. In ten minutes I was fast asleep, and did not awake until it was broad daylight. But I forget that you may not be as much interested as I am in all this," he said, suddenly recollecting that he was telling his story without being asked for it.

"Go on, by all means!" replied his listeners, each one of whom felt a warm interest in Isaac.

"Well, on the next morning," he continued, "when I awoke, long after sunrise, I found my joints so stiff that when I touched my feet to the floor, I nearly fell over. My head reeled and ached with a sudden and dreadful pain. I was forced to get into the bed again. I cannot tell you how bad I felt. Sick and penniless, and in a strange place. After awhile, the old woman came up, and as soon as she saw me, she said: 'I am afraid you are not well.'

"Indeed, ma'am," I said, 'I feel very sick, and my limbs are so stiff that I cannot stand on my feet!'

"Then you had better lie quiet for to-day," she said, kindly. 'I will bring you up a cup of tea and some little thing to eat' and so saying, she went down-stairs.

"I never felt so strange as I did when she left the room. Never, since my mother died, had any one been so kind to me. It choked me right up, and made a baby of me. In about half an hour she came up, bringing a tub of water. She bathed my feet with her own hands; and, after she had dried and rubbed them with a towel, she went down again and brought me a large bowl of tea. After I had drank this off, she sat by me for some time, looking me all the while in the face, and seeming pleased at the kind service she had done me. In a little while the perspiration broke out all over me, and I gradually sunk again into sleep. When I awoke, I felt much better, and wanted to get up; but the kind old woman would not let me. On the next morning I was much better, and after I had dressed myself and eaten my breakfast, I prepared to go out again in search of work.

"The refusals I had already met, and the close questionings I expected to meet, made me dread the task. But it had to be done, and so I went out.

"Come back at dinner time," said Mrs. Armour—for that was her name—as I left the door.

"After I was in the street, my heart failed me. I so dreaded to go into a boot-maker's shop, that I at last determined to walk over to Washington, and see if I could meet with Tom or Bill. I thought that, perhaps, they had been more successful than I had in looking for work. As I came along the street which runs from the bridge to the public offices, I looked through a window and saw three or four boys at work upon their benches. How I did envy them! And how I blamed myself for having so foolishly left my master. I thought, at first, that I would go into this shop and ask for work. But, as I turned to enter the door, the thought of a rebuff discouraged me, and I kept on toward the city. Here I wandered about from street to street, and at last found myself at the capitol. On entering, the first persons I saw were Bill and Tom.

(To be concluded.)

THE STORY-TELLER.

THE DARK DAY.

BY MRS. S. W. JEWETT.

I HAD been an invalid for several months, but enabled to bear up cheerfully under the trial, until a certain day, when, for some unaccountable reason, my courage suddenly left me, and I made up my mind to die. My state of mind was one of utter discouragement and absolute hopelessness—and so totally unlike anything I had ever experienced, that I seemed to have lost or forgotten my own identity. I sent for my physician, and inquired of him how long he supposed I could hold out. I did not desire him to give me any encouragement that I should get well, for I could not believe it, even on his authority. He would not, however, fall in with my humor so much as to tell me my case was hopeless, but left a prescription, and departed with a smile. "I was nervous," he said, as if I had not passed through every phase of nervousness before, and did not know this was unlike anything I had ever experienced.

I announced to my husband that my disease had taken a sudden and mysterious turn, and that I was not long for this world. I was deeply hurt that this announcement seemed to produce very little effect.

"Oh, you've got a down day," said he. "I must take you a drive to-night, if the weather should continue fine. Cheer up—good-morning."

And off he went out of the house whistling—yes, whistling; and I liable to die at any moment. So, too, my daughter Fanny. I nerved myself to tell her that she must soon be left motherless, and faintly suggested that I had some last request to make. Instead of being wholly overwhelmed, as I supposed, she said, "We won't talk about it now, poor dear. The doctor says you are suffering from nervous prostration, and that you'll get over it very soon."

If I hadn't been so weak and helpless, I should certainly have given way to a burst of indignation. Why were those about me so obtuse? Why couldn't they, or wouldn't they, see that I was at the point of death? Why would they insist upon it that I was getting well? How they would reproach themselves when it was too late! But, perhaps, for my sake they concealed their feelings and apprehensions. Still, it did seem strange that my husband should have gone down the steps whistling; and that Fanny, my blessed, happy girl, should be singing at her work below-stairs. And I was left alone, face to face, as it were, with death. However, I was astonishingly composed, considering the circumstances, and wondered at my calmness, as I sat down by my pleasant bed-room window to meditate. My life had been, in many respects, a hard one. "The lines had not fallen to me in pleasant places," so far as earthly considerations were involved—neither had I been successful in a worldly point of view. The necessity of exertion had been early laid upon me, and the pressure of poverty compelled me to work sometimes beyond my thoughts. My energy and persistence sometimes amazed myself, for I pursued my arduous way without the stimulus of success; and yet, with such hope and courage, that even those who knew me best, had no comprehension of what I endured under repeated disappointments. But I had done my best, and all that I could. I looked back, as I sat in the shadow of the large elm which overtopped the roof of the piazza, under which was my bed-room, and there were but few landmarks which recalled happy reminiscences of attainment, while scattered all along the past were the graves of dead hopes and expectations. I wished it were possible for me to know wherein lay my great mistake in life—what elements necessary to success were wanting in my character; but I comforted myself with the thought that it would not be long before I should see the web of my earth-life unravelled, and its dark problems solved. I told myself sadly that I was dying of waiting—I could not recall the time when I was not working and waiting for prospective good.

It was no wonder that human nature succumbed at last under such an accumulation of disappointment. Was I weak and selfish in this my last extremity, for indulging the luxury of self-compassion? Indeed, it was a luxury, and I gave myself up to it. I sought to intensify it by calling up painful recollections of the past. I exhumed my dead griefs, and wept afresh over them. I dressed up my faded hopes with all the beautiful adornings of their spring, to make the contrast more painful, and then I told myself that I was the victim of fate—dying of a broken heart. I was not so weak that I could not get up, walk across the room and lock my door—and I did so, in order that I might be as supremely wretched as possible, without fear of interruption. I would not have been anything but the martyr that I was. If a crown had been offered me then and there, I would have rejected it—choosing the cross.

Now, my readers, how much of this state was due to abnormal physical condition, and how much to Adam's fall, I cannot decide. I certainly was an invalid—that every one knew who saw me; but, previous to this turning-point in my malady, I had been an invalid of the cheerful, hopeful type. When I was able to work, I did it with a hearty will; and when disabled by physical weakness, I bore the deprivations with what I considered Christian fortitude. But I must let you into the probable secret of my utter discouragement in this, the darkest day of my life; and, in order to do this, I shall have to become the heroine of my own story.

From early youth I had one dominant ambition—one all-absorbing love, and that was for literary attainment and success. The talent of verse and story-writing developed very early, and my juvenile attempts won high commendation from cultured and distinguished people, who predicted great things in the future for me, when I should have improved my advantages and gained that facility which comes through practice and study. Writing was with me the love of loves, and the life of life. Happily, or unhappily, for me, my father's limited means made it necessary that his children should earn their own living. The way seemed clear before me in which I could make myself pecuniarily independent, and at the same time gratify my personal taste and ambition. I believed that nothing could interfere with the plan I had marked out for myself. The small remuneration and limited recognition I received in the beginning of my career was the foundation of many a wild hope and ambitious dream, which I should blush now to disclose. A pale procession of ghosts sometimes passes in array before me. Oh, how beautiful were those hopes and desires, warmed into life by the passionate ardor of my youth!

Well, this is enough of my history to serve my purpose. I do not propose to write my autobiography. I had just enough literary success to keep alive my ambition, and enough disappointment to undermine my consciousness of my own power; enough poverty in my outward life to make the possibility of attainment an object of feverish endeavor; and enough of external care and distractions to produce an unceasing conflict between the inner and outer world.

But amidst all discouragements, the ruling love of my soul remained unimpaired. The necessity to give expression to my thoughts in language seemed the one law of my being that I could not evade, and in one of those seasons of inspiration which come like a direct influence from invisible intelligences near to our souls, I resolved to write a novel. For years I had a dim outline floating in my brain, which at the auspicious moment I resolved to fill out with the rich material of experience and thought laid away for use when needed.

That auspicious moment came at last, and I began the task. It was my own dear secret. In it were interwoven the very fibres of my heart; with its success my best hopes and sweetest affections were involved. Perhaps I thought too much—worked too hard. I don't know, but the days and months thus employed were the happiest of my life. Just as the work was completed and sent for examination to the publisher, who had expressed his willingness to bring it out if it were likely to be popular, I fell ill, and was under medical treatment for several months.

The evening previous to the dark day, which, as I said just now, was the turning-point of my life—the day which I had made up my mind was to be the day of my death—I received my MS. novel back again, with a courteous letter from the publisher, rejecting it on the ground that there was not sufficient incident in the plot to make it acceptable to the novel-reading public.

As no one had shared with me my happy anticipations and exultant hopes, there was no one to enter behind the veil and witness the anguish of my bitter disappointment and humiliation. Truly I abhorred myself; I abhorred the very sight of my rejected manuscript! I knew I should never have courage to put pen to paper again. The future for my loved ones—whom my imagination had draped with beauty and crowned with immortal verdure—was a barren perspective of tame, cold reality. Poverty, hardship, the necessity of unrelenting toil, uncongenial surroundings—these were to be the portion of those I loved best. I could not make the glory and beauty of their lot. I was under a curse. Nothing that I had ever undertaken had prospered, and I did not care to live.

Perhaps I may have slept an hour during the night, but certainly no longer. My husband—good, easy man—was oblivious of all my anguish. He did not know that I was pacing the room from nervous excitement more than half the night. My dear happy daughter was in the small room adjoining mine, sleeping the sleep of innocence and peace.

I have said enough to show how important words are to express one's misery.

The next day I was utterly powerless and prostrated. I did not think I could live, nor did I desire to. It was not this one disappointment, but it was the culmination of all the sorrows and hopes deferred in my whole life which had utterly crushed me.

The doctor knew that my hour had not yet come; he was not alarmed, and dissipated the fears of my family by saying I was nervous! They were sorry for me; but then they knew I should get over it.

I have said that we were poor, but I did not say how poor we were, because, as I had been always able heretofore to put the best foot foremost, I did not think it expedient to gratify the curiosity of our neighbors as to our resources. But we used to be in doubt sometimes how to pay for our next meal. My husband had one of these easy, jolly tempers that could not borrow trouble or shoulder much care.

I had chosen to keep by myself all day; and after providing for my comfort, the best she could, my light-hearted daughter went to see a neighbor who lived a mile or more away on an errand for me, leaving me meanwhile with Hagar, our old black servant-of-all-work, who had come to us from her "old Kentucky home." It was evident that no one thought me likely to die, or I should not have been left alone. My husband had gone to the city on business.

At her usual hour, Hagar came to my room to know what she should get for breakfast next morning.

"Get what you can," I replied. "I don't expect to eat another breakfast of your cooking. When we sit at table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom, we shan't have to make out a bill of fare, or reckon up what it costs to keep soul and body together."

"Deed not, missis; and Hagar won't be 'bliged to work over the hot fire, neither. Dar ain't no kitchens in the Kingdom, is thar, d'y' think?"

"I reckon, Hagar, the cooking is done below," I said; "but I don't pretend to know."

"That 'minds me to tell ye the wood is done gone, and the charcoal, too. I done used the last for de ironing yesterday."

"Isn't there any left?" I asked.

"Mebbe nuff for once," replied Hagar.

"Well, can't you bring that up here and set it in the middle of the room? Then, Hagar, shut all the doors and windows, and to-morrow there'll be no Hagar to cook and no missis to eat. It's an easy way to die."

"I don't see it," said Hagar; "and I don't want to go before my time."

"My time has come, Hagar," I said, throwing myself on the bed from sheer exhaustion. "I don't think you need cook breakfast for me, my poor old woman. I've lived long enough, and suffered long enough, and I think God will let me rest. Where do you think I should go, Hagar, if I were to die to-night?"

"Where the good Lord pleases," replied Hagar. "But you ain't agoin' to die to-night. You can't go till He calls you."

"Aunt," I said, beckoning her to come to me, "I want to talk to you. My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death."

"Dat's what Mas'r Jesus said, and dey must have seen something was on His mind. What's on your mind, missis?"

"I'm thinking it's very hard, Hagar, very hard, after striving to find the road to good fortune so many years, that I should be left to perish in the wilderness."

"Hagar don't quite understand," replied the good woman; "but 'pears like you has many bleasin's, chile. If you want any more, why don't you ask Mas'r Jesus?"

"I have, times without number."

"Then there's nothing better to do than wait, chile. It's all you can do."

"I've been waiting twenty years or more, Hagar—waiting, waiting, waiting for the good that never comes, and never will come in this world, for I've but a little time to live."

"Something's happened to you, chile, to put you out. Can't yer tell yer old auntie? What's you been waitin' for?"

"Oh, it's too long a story, Hagar—but, sit down on this chair close by me, and preach a little; never mind the breakfast or the wood or the charcoal. You often say to me, you've been talking with Master Jesus. Tell me how you do it—what you say to Him and what He says to you."

"I've just been talking to him this yer afternoon," said Hagar, sitting down, "and I'll tell you all about it. You see, chile, Hagar has her troubles as well as white folks. Now thar's my boy Aleck; he's always grumblin' and grumblin' 'bout his olese. Says I, 'Aleck, you go git ready to go to meetin'.' Says he, 'My coat ain't fit and my shirt-bosom's ragged.' He's got such high notions, Aleck has. Says I, 'You go up-stairs and put on what you got, and say thank ye, Jesus, that you've got as good as you have, and don't let me hear any more grumblin' about rag.'"

"But, Hagar," I said, "seems to me you are hard on the boy. He ought to dress neatly to go to church."

"'Deed yere right, missis, and didn't I wash his ole' self and mend 'em as well as I could, and ain't it because he wants to look fine? Don't I git him things as fast as I kin? 'Tain't proper he should keep grumblin'

'til I done git all he wants. What we all oughter ask Mas'r Jesus for is a contented min'. It's a bad habit reachin' and reachin' after somethin' you hain't got; and there's no end to it when you begin. Many's the time after I came up North and didn't know which way to turn or what to do to keep from starvin', and felt like cussin' everything and everybody, 'case, you see, though I'd got freedom, 'pears like it was nothin' better than freedom to starve, I used to fold my arms jest so," and she rose up a head taller than usual, threw her head back and crossed her arms with an air of defiance, "and I says, 'Mas'r Jesus, I'd better go back where I come from. I can't stan' this yer life with nobody to care whether I lives or dies.' Says He to me: 'Hagar, you jist keep still where you is. You've got to work out your own salvation some how, and you can do it jist as well in one place as another. I ken hear ye and help ye here, jist as well as thar, but it's got to be in my way, not yours.' Says I, 'Mas'r Jesus, you knows I'm willin' to work, but you don't show me what I ken do.' Says He: 'Wait my time, and quit reachin', for you've got to keep quiet in yer mind before I can come to ye.' Says I: 'Then tell me how to keep quiet. You've helped me so fur, and got me free, and now I've a right to expect you'll take care of me.' Says He: 'Of course I will.' So I sits down and shuts up my eyes, and tried to git composed. Next day I was standin' in the door of my shanty, lookin' off somewhere, and I heerd a voice call out 'Hagar.' 'Here, Mas'r Jesus,' says I. 'Go off thar,' says He, 'up that hill yonder, and when you gits to the top, you'll find somebody as wants to see you.' So I gets up, puts on my bonnet, and up I goes clean to the top of Ward's Hill, in the burnin' heat, and thar I see a woman standin' in the doorway of a great house, lookin' down the road. I walks up to her and says: 'Good-morning, missis.' 'Good-morning, auntie,' says she. 'Do you know any lady,' says I, 'that wants to hire a settled woman?' 'Yes,' says she, 'I do. Who sent you?' 'Mas'r Jesus,' says I. 'Wal, then,' says she, 'I s'pose He can recommend ye as willin' and honest, or He wouldn't have told ye to come here. Now, I don't want ye myself, but yonder thar, in the cottage under the big tree, is a lady that'll be glad to hire ye this very day. You go straight thar, as fast as yer legs will take ye, and tell her Miss Smith sent ye, and if yer a mind to, you can give your recommendation—the same as ye give me. D'y'ye hear, now?' says she. 'Tell her Mas'r Jesus recommends ye.' So, you see, I come straight here, and I thank Mas'r Jesus every night and mornin', on my knees, for the good home I've had wid you. I don't ask for anything better this side the Kingdom."

"I feel better than I did, Hagar," said I. "I have made one of my fellow-creatures happy, and my life isn't altogether a failure. I'll try, if I live, to follow your advice and quit reachin'. But as you are on more intimate terms with Master Jesus than I, and far more worthy to be so, perhaps you can bring my case before Him."

"And you knows so much about everything else which old Hagar don't, and never 'speets to know—pity you hain't made friends with Him who's powerful to help."

"Yes, Hagar," I replied, sadly, "you are right. It is a pity—but when I need Him most He seems a great way off. Pray for me to-night, Hagar, for my heart is heavy. Get what you please for breakfast—I shall be satisfied with whatever you do—and, if I live, I will try to quit reachin'. Oh, it's time and labor thrown away! I know it—

I know it; but my sweet dreams! How can I give them up! But, go down, good old aunty, and leave me alone. Perhaps, if you ask him, the Master will come and comfort me."

"I knows he will," said Hagar. And she spoke like one in authority, whose experience of that sort of comfort gave conviction to her words.

"Quit reaching," I said to myself. Must it, indeed, be so? Does God mean that we should sit down in supine indifference, and be contented, while the faculties he has given us rust out for want of use? Is all this beauty and glory of anticipation but an illusion, to call out our powers and exercise our talents, hoping for so much, and finding only disappointment? Surely, life is a mockery! Alas! old Hagar's advice, unpalatable as it is, is the bitter drug that I am forced to swallow. I have no strength left to reach forward—no heart left for hope—no health left for exertion. Oh, that I could die, and begin life again under favorable conditions!

Exhausted and despairing, I fell asleep, and was awakened by hearing the sound of voices, strangely interwoven with the incidents of my dreams.

Fanny and her father were in the room, talking in a subdued tone to each other. I felt too languid even to move or make a sound, but I heard their conversation.

"I don't think, papa, dear, that we ought to tell her to-night," said Fanny. "She has had a poor day, and it might excite her too much. She seems sleeping very soundly, and to-morrow morning will wake up refreshed. Hagar has been with her, and tells me she is very down-hearted. I don't see what can make her so."

"Nothing has happened to fret her, that I am aware of," said her father.

"Not that I know of," replied Fanny. "She got a letter yesterday, and she did not show it to me. I asked her from whom it came, and she would not tell me. I think her depression had something to do with that letter. You know grandmamma and aunts are so poor, and they keep writing to mamma. She does so long to help them."

"She takes everybody's troubles on her own weak shoulders," replied her father. "I tell her so often, but it does no good. She'll wear herself out worrying over other people's trials. But she can't help it. God bless her! I'm not much of a help in a worldly way, that's a fact."

"But, dear father, you cheer us up with your cheerful smile. Oh, it seems as though I could not wait till morning. I must tell her to-night."

"Tell me what?" I exclaimed, rising from my bed of death. "Don't be afraid that I can't bear any amount of trouble. The last thorn did not break my back. I am sorrow-proof—I can't die. Tell me at once."

They both rushed toward me, and when I looked into their faces, I saw it was not trouble they had to communicate.

"Stop," I cried, sinking back upon my pillow. "Don't speak just yet. Although ill news I can bear, I am not prepared for good news; and I see by your looks that you have good tidings."

"We have, indeed," exclaimed Fanny.

"Wait but a moment," I said, "and I will nerve myself to hear them."

They sat down on my bedside, and as I looked from one to another, the sunshine of their smiling faces unlocked the fountains of hope, which I thought had been sealed forever.

"What is it, my precious ones?" I asked.

My husband nudged Fanny, and she undertook to be spokesman.

"You know father's old bachelor-uncle, who lived away off West?"

"Well," I replied, "what of him?"

"Nothing, only that he is dead, and father is sole heir to his property. Sleep on that, poor mother, and let your brain rest from its labors henceforth and for evermore. We shall have money enough, and to spare—and you needn't break your heart when your poems and stories are returned to you. You will write all the better now 'that the pressure of necessity is removed,' and she stooped down and kissed me. I held her close to my heart—that heart in which a new song had arisen of gratitude and love. She put her mouth close to my ear, and whispered something. Shall I betray confidence if I tell? No, not now—for it has come to pass as she said then. "Now, Harry and I can be married, and we will have a little home of our own close to you."

I believe I must have shed tears; certainly, I said but few words, yet my heart and brain were mysteriously lightened of their heavy load.

"You've concluded to live awhile longer," said my husband, good-naturedly.

"If God wills," I said, beginning to feel ashamed of my weakness and want of faith, but assuming the spiritual attitude of submission, that I need not lose my vantage-ground with my immediate family.

"We'll take a trip to Europe," said my husband.

"Yes, that we will," said Fanny, "and Harry shall go, too. Now, poor dear mamma, kiss me good-night; and, father, I think the best thing for you to do is to talk her to sleep; and if she don't wake up early, it's no matter now."

There is no doubt, disguise our feelings as we may, that to go to sleep poor—filled with anxieties and discouragements, our way hid, our efforts thwarted, our hopes crushed—and to wake up to a certainty of good-fortune, is a pleasant change in the drama of earthly life. It is but an exchange of cares, to be sure; but the shifting of the cross from one shoulder to another is a relief, and it gives the galled places time to heal.

Nevertheless, the problem of human destiny is, at all times, and under all circumstances, hard to solve. Nay, I doubt if the wisest and best are able to solve it. Our highest attainment is to accept cheerfully what is inevitable and inexplicable.

Among many unexplained mysteries of my life, the one which puzzles me most is the fact that when the urgent necessity of success was removed, success itself came, unsolicited and without labor or effort. I still write poems and stories for the love of it, and reap a harvest I no longer require—and the old manuscript novel, the rejection of which by one publisher was nearly the death of me, after years of oblivion was dragged to light, offered to another, and accepted. Perhaps this exemplifies the truth of the words, "To him who hath shall be given; but to him who hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath."

It is very reasonable and proper that we should try to glean all the wisdom we can out of our individual experience; and sometimes, when I sit down and recall the days of the years of my life, I say to myself, if I had never struggled and suffered, I should not know how to touch the heart-needs, as well as the worldly needs, of my fellow-creatures, and, therefore, should miss one of the greatest enjoyments of prosperity.

MY COUSIN JUDAS; OR, THE BLACK SHEEP OF THE FAMILY.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

I WAS at Aunt Heppy's home in Massachusetts, sitting by the window. The day was warm, and the hot September sunshine made a twinkling heat above the old gray stone fences. The butterflies flew in crowds, and settled in damp places along the roadside, making one think of yellow roses that had been torn to pieces and the petals scattered. The droning bumblebees crept down into the hearts of the pink hollyhocks under the window, and buried their burnished heads in the golden dust. The sheep on the hillside pasture among the gray rocks and the stunted pines, and the rushing brook added the finishing touches to the rural picture seen from Aunt Heppy's window.

The musical tinkle of the bell down in the ravine among the grapevines, where some of the flock were feeding, came up soothingly, and, lulled by the sweet sounds, I closed my eyes, and leaned back in the rocking-chair in delicious reverie.

I was just dozing dreamily, when I was aroused by Aunt Heppy saying: "Yes, Judas always was considered to be the black sheep of the family; he is the smartest one, but somehow he never could accumulate property like the rest of 'em. Now there's his cousin, my Luther, who owns the old homestead, he began by day's works for the farmers round about, such as shearin' sheep, and diggin' cellars, and makin' rails, an' he was savin', and allus stayed to hum and watched his chances. And while Judas was foolin' away his time, and not layin' up a penny, Luther was coinin' money. I've known that boy to work hard all day and have a singin'-school at night, five mile away, makin' money both day an' night. Be sure, he's broke down and pretty much used up, and is pale and thin, and coughs, but he's suthin' laid up for a rainy day; he can afford to be sick. Now Judas is as hearty as a bear, and as jolly and full of fun as though he owned millions, and the worthless fellow hasn't mor'n a change o' shirts at any time. He feels so good, too. I shouldn't wonder a bit but he'd be right over here, big as any o' 'em, to see you, as soon's he hears you've come."

"But, niece, if I were in your place I wouldn't accept o' the invitation, if he has the audacity to invite you, to visit 'em. They say they only have two rooms in the house, besides an old ricketty loft clas up to the rafters and shingles. It's amasin' how important some people do feel—such very poor people, especially—holding their heads up like rich folks!"

I had only been in Massachusetts three days, and among distant relatives, none of whom I had ever seen. My first stopping-place, of course, would be at the old, old homestead, the birthplace of my ancestors. Aunt Heppy was my grandfather's sister, the last one of that generation. She was very old, but her aristocratic children in Richmond, Va., had tried to rejuvenate the good old lady, and she was so patched up that the picture of Aunt Heppy hanging on my memory's wall is an ill-concocted, jumbled-together mixture of youth and old age. Instead of the beautiful crown of silvery white, her sons and daughters had substituted a wig of abundant silken goldy-brown hair, that lay heavily on her forehead. A full set of artificial teeth gleamed out white and ghastly, while from her shrivelled ears depended glittering jewels. Her dresses were light brown and steel-gray merinos. She had very pretty blue eyes, and her voice was smooth and agreeable, with the soliloquizing plaint in it that comes with the quiet dreaminess of old age.

I liked Aunt Heppy, but I was too democratic to see things in the same light that she did. I thought secretly that the black sheep, poor Judas, whom she so thoroughly disliked, was just the kind of a generous good cousin to whom I would take a special liking.

I couldn't see much to admire in the niggardly character of a young man like Luther, so greedy for worldly pelf that he would even stint and starve and cheat nature, and wrong himself and pay the penalty by dragging his broken burden of a body over his broad acres and through his beautiful roomy palace of a home. I had a warm place in my heart waiting for Cousin Judas, and a welcome such as I would give to a man whom I regarded as a peer among other men.

I leaned on the window-sill and looked down the road, skirted on either side with pointed piny hills, to the marble tombstones in the old burying-ground, where lay my ancestors of a half century ago. The marbles shone out whitely, and made my heart ache with a feeling I could not define. I was very sad indeed. I closed the wet lashes over my eyes, and said: "When can any of them go down to the cemetery with me, auntie?"

"Well, I do 'no', child," said she; "hubby has to go to mill this afternoon, and I can't walk so far, and Sam and Deliar are busy in the dairy, and poor Luther is company for nobody now that he's aillin' so, and the hired girl couldn't tell you anything of our dead like the rest of us could. Maybe Deliar will get her butter rolls all weighed and stamped and packed ready for market afore night, and then when Sam takes it away in the little wagon he'll go right past there, and could leave you till he'd come back."

"Ye-e-s," I said, vaguely seeing myself wandering alone among the sunken graves of a half century, wondering, and guessing, and surmising who and what mouldered beneath this or that sod. I was sad-hearted enough, and homesick, too, in the far-off land of my fathers, and I was afraid that a fit of crying would seize me alone in that spot of which I had dreamed and dreamed for years.

I took up the work that had lain a full hour in my lap, and went out to where Cousin Luther sat in an easy chair on the back porch.

"This is a pretty place, cousin," said I, drawing a little old low chair near him and sitting down. "But maybe I disturb your thoughts?"

"Not at all," said he, coughing. "I was just thinking what a pity it was that, instead of buying you knobby lot where the sheep are pasturing, I didn't take the same money and buy a ten-acre lot that lies to the north here; it was sold by the sheriff just afore Neighbor Grimes died, and I could have got it cheap. Grimes was very hard up; some people thought that it was nothing but worry that caused his death. I think a man should keep a good look out for tight places, and try and be ready to meet 'em. It shows want of forethought for a man to get caught that way. I loaned him money at twelve per cent. interest, and took a mortgage on that south field, there where you see those seven haystacks, and it fell into my hands, of course. I had always wanted that lot, for it just put my farm in good shape, and made my fields all square." And here he stopped and coughed until he was exhausted, and his hair clung in moist slips over his clammy forehead, and the knotted blue veins slowly smoothed to a dim pencilling.

"There's nothing like gumption, after all," said he, speaking slowly, "a man may toil like a slave and be worth no more, in the end, than Cousin Judas is to-day, unless he has tact, and as old Uncle Josias used to say, he must sleep with one eye open all the time, if he wants to watch the corners and see where the luck lies. If I'd the strength that Judas has I'd be worth a million in less 'an ten years, I'll warrant."

"You poor fellow, you look as if you hadn't vitality enough to carry you through one year now," said I, trying to turn his attention to something else, "but if you have the one thing needful, if you have treasures laid up in Heaven, it is of little moment to you how soon you are called to leave these poor earthly treasures that perish with the handling."

"Oh, it's nothing but the heat that ails me now," said he, almost gasping. "I'll be well enough when the cool, braising weather comes on. This oppressiveness in breathing is because the air is stifling hot and the house so under the hill that we don't get the breezes. I have been sorry many a time that I built down here, but I did it on account of the spring and to be out of sight of beggars and poor tramps. One can keep milk and butter so much better if they're a good spring. My butter is worth two cents a pound more than my neighbors, in Greenfield, and, you know, that amounts to a good deal in the course of a year. I tell you two cents a pound extra is nothing to be grinned at, pays a body for living down in a hollow," and he turned around, facing me, and wheezed out a laugh that made me think of the grin of a bony skeleton, and his ugly eyes had the gray color in them of old silver quarters.

While we were talking I heard a rattle at the side gate, and a man's good, round, jolly voice say: "Wha neow! there neow, I say! quit catin' your Aunt Heppy's coriander, you old sneak, you—back with ye, neow!" and who should come bustling on to the porch but a great, hearty, genial, bright-faced man, with a step as frisky as a colt's—dear, old, berated, 'bused Cousin Judas.

Auntie rose and stiffly introduced me. "My cousin—the way from the West!" and he took my face between his broad palms and kissed my cheeks right cordially. I didn't know whether to laugh, or cry, or what to do. His greeting was so kindly, so different from any greeting that I had met since I left home.

"I came up as soon as I could after we heard you had arrived, and my wife Nelly said for you to come right home with me; we're poor folks, but we'll make your visit good, and when you're tired I'll bring you over here again."

"Where on airth did you get a horse to come up with?" said Aunt Heppy.

"Oh, old Uncle Bawkey's—he said if I'd get back by sundown, I could have him, and it's three o'clock now, and I want to keep my word good—come, Rosy, get ready—bring you back to-morrow, if you say so, and Uncle Bawkey will let me have his beast."

Aunt Heppy looked up, as much as to say: "Wonder if you will go?" Luther kept his head turned away, while he pretended to be picking at a mote on the back of his hand.

"I'm in a hurry, and there's no time for ceremony," said Judas, "but you won't mind it, Aunt Heppy, if I don't stay for supper."

Auntie curled her lip, aside, and made no reply, while Luther said: "Oh, we'll try and stand it."

So, Judas and I started.

He drove a horse with a stub tail and a straight neck that made its head poke out queerly, its gait was between a rack and a trot and a canter, only that it was all over the road when it travelled. Its joints stuck out, and it was very bare and bony. The buggy had once been painted black, but had been broken and mended with all sorts of boards, until it had the appearance of being striped, and checked, or barred. But I never felt happier or so "every inch a queen," as I did when he assisted me up into the funny vehicle and gee-ed the old quadruped around, a side at a time, and we started off down the hill as noisily as though we drove a peddler's wagon full of tinware and odd notions.

We hadn't gone far until the buggy jolted against a stone in the road, and our old rickety seat fell flat down and tumbled Judas over on his side, and his hat dropped off and rolled down the bank.

I held the lines while he got it and fixed the seat safely again.

He said it was a new hat, just bought for the occasion, and he had not learned the set of it yet. I observed that he wore it too far back on his head, and by doing so, it gave him a gawky appearance, but I forbore to tell him of it.

We had not gone far until the seat fell again, and at last we had to give up and sit down in the bottom of the buggy.

He said he was very sorry, for my sake, that he could not make a better appearance, but I told him I was tired of seeing people make asses of themselves, and do everything in the fear of what might be said of them by those who cared not a straw for them.

I told him I had never ridden down in a buggy in that primitive style before in my life, and I rather enjoyed it because it was something new.

Judas's wife was a very kind, affectionate woman—he had one daughter, nearly my own age, and three little children. They were very poor, and lived in an old shoe-shop with only a kitchen and one little room. The house was bare—uncarpeted, uncurtained, but very neat and clean.

The joy they all manifested on seeing me made up for any luxury or comfort that was lacking.

In the evening, before we retired, Judas said: "Now, cousin, we want to make your visit just as good as we possibly can, and you must stay a week, and we will have a new programme every morning; we will all live like children keeping play-house, and though we are very poor, we will not let that interfere with our enjoyment. To-morrow Lu and you and I will go down to the river and gather grapes, and when we are tired we will rest in the tangled thickets that are full of bird-songs, then we will go down the river to where poor Uncle Asaph was drowned more than forty years ago. He was your grandfather's youngest brother, and the pet of the family, though, at the time of his death, he was married and had two children."

The next morning we started as soon as the dew was off the grass. It was a walk of about two miles. The grape-vines were loaded—Judas would draw them down, and Lu and I would gather the clusters. He was as cunning and full of fun as a boy.

He would sit still and he would mock the notes of the birds and bring them, anxiously peering in and out among the leaves above our heads. He knew the names and habits of all kinds of American birds, and his bird-love amused me greatly. It was so strange to see an elderly man, with all the buoyancy and freshness of the boy's nature, instead of the sedate, wise old ways of ripe years.

The river was rocky and swift, and one bank was almost perpendicular and thickly covered with sombre pines, whose reflection made the rushing river look gloomy enough to strike one with awe. It suggested one of Poe's saddest songs to me; I feel the spirit of it yet, but no words of the song came to me in the manner in which he had arranged them.

Judas held my hand, and I leaped from rock to rock, while the wild waters roared and dashed between them, and washed up against their bold, gray points. I sat in one, a hollowed-out chair of a rock, with places to rest one's arms and back, while Judas pointed out to me the eddy in which the boat upset, and the dark, cavernous place in which the white, horror-stricken face was last seen; the gloomy spot in which he sank with outstretched arms and pitiful shriek. It made me very sad, and I thought for a moment that death in that wild, secluded spot could not come like a white-winged angel of peace, or a smiling messenger.

Cousin Nelly made a jar of grape-butter from the basket of fruit that we carried home. For supper we had tea and rye-bread and baked apples, and some of the grapes we had gathered. I saw the mother and Lu, whispering, and, woman-like, I divined that some new arrangement had to be made before we could sleep.

I asked them if there was not a low, little loft, in which Lu and I could sleep together. Nelly said there was an old bed up in the loft, but it was a very poor place, that the roof was low, and only one little square window, and she could never forgive herself if she allowed me to sleep there; but when I told her honestly that of all things I preferred a hard straw bed, next to the roof, the humbler and more lowly the better, she consented. Oh, it was so rare to sleep thus! I always desired it.

The next morning when I woke, rested and happy, Lu was gone, and as I rubbed my eyes open, I heard the low hum of voices in the potato-patch back of the house. I could distinctly hear every word that was said, and not listen, either.

One voice was that of Cousin Judas, and the other, I soon learned, belonged to the old man who owned the quadruped.

"Oh, come, now, Neighbor Bawkey," Judas said, "don't be hard on a fellow for every day of this week that you loan me your horse. I will work two days for you—good, hard, honest labor, digging potatoes, husking corn, picking apples, sawing wood, or anything you want me to do."

"Now, Judas," said the old man, "you know nation well that it's like pulling teeth to get you to do a day's work. You'll lie as readily as t'other Judas did. I'd like to have you harvest my potato crop, and I could spare the critter's well as not; but will you keep your word? I've tried you so often, and you've lied every time, you know that."

"See here, Mr. Bawkey, I'll give you leave to shoot me as dead as a mitten, if I tell you a lie this time; why, my honor is at stake. You see, my Cousin Rosy is visiting me; came all the way from Ohio, and I want she should take home, with her a splendid idea of Yankee character. I want her visit should be super-excellent. She has a very high opinion of your horse. I told her he was of the Andalusian breed, from Arabia, and she believes it; ha, ha, ha! Now, I thought if I could get the beast, I would take cousin over to the mountain to-morrow, just to let her see what mountains we have. I would drive slowly, and feed well at noon."

"Well, if you'll dig my potatoes along in the middle of October, like an honest man, you may have the critter the rest of this week," said the neighbor.

"Thank'ee, sir," I heard Judas reply, right heartily.

At breakfast we had corn-bread and potatoes and stewed grapes and molasses.

I liked the breakfast, because I admired the man and woman, who were happy, though poor, and who scorned to make any apologies. They would have been superfluous, weak, untrue.

Better far to face the truth, and not try to hide it.

Judas and Lu and I went in the variegated buggy, all stowed snugly in one seat, to gather chestnuts on the mountain.

We passed beautiful waterfalls, and went over rustic bridges, and through woody dells, all lighted up with a glow of gold and crimson, and the blazing scarlet of trees and shrubbery. Nearly every old tumble-down house we passed Judas would say, "I lived there three years," or "We lived there a year," or "In that little log cottage there was where the baby died," or "There was our house when Nelly lay sick so long," or "This is where Gusty was born," or "The town had to give us a lift when we lived over in that house across the meadow." Things like this, the rich poor-man kept saying all the way, nearly—words that made me know that every inch of the old grounds was familiar to his eyes and photographed on his heart.

I pitied him when we crossed a noisy, bustling crystal brook, that wound through a beautiful meadow, and he said, with a laugh, forgetting the years that lay between, "Just down there is where Una Gilmer caught a trout, the day we were married—the first she ever caught—and it frightened her so that she screamed and dropped the pole on the grass and ran." Una was his first wife, married her when he was an aimless youth of nineteen years. Poor Judas!

We passed an old cottage, almost hugged to death by the strong vines that enwound it all over, and he said, mournfully, "Ah, Luly, here's the old home where you were born, dear. I remember that summer; we had the windows taken out, and the old vine, that was young and gadding then, came right in at the window, and crept around over the walls like a thing of life."

We had a very pleasant ride that autumn morning—there was a spiciness in the air that was like balm, odorous of woods, and falling leaves, and damp mosses, and resinous pines. The old quadruped went over the ground skippingly, and I suggested that we'd name him "Jolly," which we did. We left the critter and the vehicle, which was scarcely buggy, carriage, wagon, or buck-board, at the foot of the mountain, and toiled leisurely up the steep. Half-way up the side was a level place, in which were the ruins of an old house. I said, "Cousin Judas, you never lived here, did you, in this eventful life of yours?"

"Ask Luly," he answered, as he sat down on a very large rock that lay against with the flat-side facing the south. Lu nodded her head sadly, and I saw that painful memories stirred their hearts. Some large chestnut trees stood a few rods distant, and I went to them and found the brown nuts lying glistening in the morning sunshine. They soon joined me, and we filled our baskets before we left the trees.

While Judas was gone up to the top of the mountain,

Lu and I sat on the flat rock, and she told me they had lived there when their family was large, and they were very poor, and their father took to drinking, and they almost suffered for the necessities of life. One of the little ones died while that was their home, and they saw a great deal of trouble.

"This rock," she said, "used to be our place of rendezvous—our sad trysting place, when we were little children together, to huddle, and cry, and comfort each other. There seemed to be a ban resting on father," she said, "he never could succeed in anything he undertook—never prospered—everything seemed to go wrong—he was called the black sheep of the family, and the black sheep of the neighborhood; every man's hand seemed against him. He never was greedy to make money like the rest of the family, and none of them liked him because he was poor, but there was never a kinder, better father in this world."

As soon as we filled the other basket we went home.

We had a great deal of sport, and I thought my poor, easy, good-natured Cousin Judas was the funniest, and freshest, and youngest old man I ever saw. He was not like any person whom I had ever met. He made me think of a pure, cheerful, sunshiny, sweet-souled woman. I couldn't quite understand how it came to be so.

It was late in the afternoon when we reached home, by a circuitous route.

Cousin Nelly had been helping a lady clean house, and she had paid her out of the grocery. Oh, she looked so tired that my heart smote me to think that she had been washing, and scrubbing, and lifting, while we had been visiting and enjoying ourselves out in the glorious autumn day.

I overheard her say to Lu: "I took my pay for my day's work in butter and sugar and lard and crackers, and I never thought of the tea, and there isn't enough for supper; poor pa, he mustn't know it, for he's so happy, it makes me rejoice, and Rosy is having such a good visit—but what will be done?"

"Oh," said Lu, "I wish I'd stayed at home and finished braiding those two hats, that would have brought up twenty cents;" and she drew her brows and looked perplexed enough, then she brightened up and said: "Dear mother, we can sell those chestnuts, can't we?"

Then they put both their glad heads together, and chuckled, and pretty soon I saw Lu measuring the nuts in a tin cup and starting off with them.

In a short time she stole in slyly with a little bundle of parcels in the basket, and her blue eyes were as bright as violets wet with dew.

We had a very nice tea early that evening.

While Lu was washing dishes, I stole up into the loft and took an old coverlet that was woven in checks and spread it down beside our bed for a carpet. A bee-hive, that was half-full of balls of carpet filling, I stood by the window, covered it, and spread a newspaper on it for a stand. A glass-box beside it, with my gray shawl folded and laid over so as to hide it, made a very presentable little stool on which to sit. Two boxes with a wide board laid on them, and nicely hidden by a folded bedspread with a fringed end hanging in front, made a neat enough sofa for any girl's attic chamber. A newspaper fastened over the window to cover a little more than half-way down, tempered and softened the glare of daylight, and made it seem quite homelike within.

From among the rubbish of boards and sticks I managed to construct a rude but well-proportioned cross, about three feet high, which I covered with the patches of gray, tufted moss gathered on the mountain that day. I did it quite evenly and neatly with threads and strings that I kept out of sight. I fastened the lower end securely in the bottom of an old chair that had lost its back, and then made a damp hillock of the remaining mosses at the foot of the cross, completely covering the unsightly old relic of a chair. It looked very pretty and suggestive, standing at the foot of our low little bed, and only needed one thing to make it beautiful, and I soon contrived that. Under the mosses at the foot of the cross I put an old tin can filled with water, into which I stuck asters, and low, blooming flowers, and grasses, and trailing plants, then a living vine of morning glory, made to climb and twist about the cross and hang from it.

I called Lu and the children, and we stepped back and admired the homelike beauty of our attic chamber.

I was as glad as any little girl when I awoke in the night and heard the lulling tinkle of the soft rain-drops on the shingles overhead.

The next day the misty rain fell steadily, and I sat there queenlier than Cleopatra in her beautiful barge, sitting on my own footstool, writing letters for the home papers, on a stand of my own manufacture.

The improvised furniture of my room with two gables, was the kind to be enjoyed and rendered useful.

That evening Cousin Judas sang old songs to us, Moore's sweetest melodies, and Lu joined him, and it was one of the happiest evenings I ever spent.

I remember when Judas ceased singing that sweet song, "Oh, had we some bright little isle of our own," his wife, in tears, came and kissed his dear old face, as she put back his hair of iron gray, and said: "Oh, Judy, that's the same dear voice that made me willing to share your poor lot with you."

"It was a glad day for me, Nelly, dear," said the manly voice, with just a little quiver in it.

I looked away. Poor souls! I felt so sorry for them, though I knew they were the richest couple in the State.

Oh, that was such a good visit at poor Cousin Judas's home! It taught me that it is not the house to which the guest is invited and welcomed, or the food or the furniture, that makes the visit a good one. Only "where love is," and where the welcome is sincere and generous, is the visit sure to be good.

Judas visited the old cemetery with me, and took me to all the places of interest, and we did each other good, and were both the happier for having become acquainted.

He still lives, and is as rich and young and bloated as ever, and my heart yearns to meet him once again.

The rich Cousin Luther, who owned the old "humblestead," and the slices off the adjacent farms, lingered a few years, gasping and snatching at the breath of life, and then his little light went out.

His mother, Aunt Heppy, died, too, and her last words were that she be buried in her wine-colored merino, with bows of white ribbon, her false hair combed down low and brushed till it glistened—white silk gloves on, and that "hubby" would wear crapes wide enough to cover the height of his fur hat, with a bow of the same on his breast.

It was a very grand funeral, I heard. Judas and Nelly came over in the vehicle and drove the quadruped. It was the best Judas could do, but the friends made room for them in a shiny black carriage, with glittering wheels and silver-plated harness, while silken-fringed curtains swept above their dazed heads.

So, Judas, "the black sheep of the family," rode grandly for once in his poverty-stricken life—dear, old Judas!

FRIENDS IN COUNCIL.

OUR CLUB.

BY ANNIE L. MUZZEY.

NO. VII.

THE DOCTOR'S HOMILY.

WHEN the Doctor came in, according to promise, he brought with him a singular addition to our party—a deformed dwarf, with a preposterous cranial development, and with some defect of the vocal organs which rendered his speech unintelligible, save to those accustomed to attend to it.

"A witness, my friends, an eloquent witness to the facts we were discussing last evening, though his speech is untongued," said Dr. Osgood, by way of introduction.

Very evidently the Doctor has a weakness for speech that is untongued, as instanced in his rapt study of Miss Dunbar's expressive face.

We regarded our new member with an interest that went beyond mere curiosity, and carried our sympathies out to the unfortunate everywhere.

He returned our regards with gleams and flashes of intelligence, suggestive of an intellect that might have been singularly bright and keen had it not, like the body, been dwarfed, distorted and its forces scattered by some balking of nature's laws. We pondered in silence what sin could have cast this wreck upon the world; by what human folly this soul, called of God to a high destiny, had been defrauded of its right to perfected organs of expression, denied the development of its powers, and condemned to drag out the period of its earthly existence in the pent-up prison of a body through the dense walls of which it could send no signals and receive no true impressions, catching but scattered and indistinct rays of light, comprehending but vaguely the drift and scope of the hurrying, toiling life in which it seemed to have no part, and waiting in half-conscious misery the end of its dreary, useless probation.

Must it not be that for such as these God had some tender, special care? Must it not be that in the world beyond He gives to them wider opportunity, more gracious and favoring influence, more aids to the growth and perfecting of powers so sadly cramped and fettered and paled here?

We read these questionings as we turned and looked in each other's pitying faces.

"Ah, surely, the Infinite Divine Love will not be baffled by human sinning," answered Jeannette, softly. "The Father above is too good and wise to bind forever on the unoffending the burden of the guilty, and He will find a way in the ascending spirals of eternity to recompense these poor defrauded ones for the loss they suffer here."

"But are we not of those who believe that the fulfilment of the divine plan is hastened by human co-operation?" mildly insinuated the Doctor.

"Thank you for the reminder that we are to lend ourselves to the assistance of God's work," responded Jean, promptly. "Let us not forget to acknowledge, too, your labor of love in the interest of these sad wrecks of humanity, among whom you toil so constantly and zealously that we wonder sometimes whether, in order to attract and hold your attention, it is not necessary to be lame, and halt, and blind, diseased and idiotic."

The Doctor's face glowed with a sudden passion of feeling. "There is nothing under Heaven that I so reverence—I had almost said worship—as a perfect physical organization, clearly and harmoniously developed, and answering with the certainty and precision of a well-tuned instrument to the lightest motion of the spirit," he said, earnestly. "Talk about dedicating temples of wood and stone to God! I feel like declaring with Novalis, 'There is but one temple in the world, and that is the body of man.' At least there is no other that I regard as so sacred; and when I see it desecrated, defiled and laid in ruins by ignorance, superstition and gross, beastly passions, I cannot forbear crying out with a sense of profanation that I would not experience at the ravaging and razing of all the consecrated piles of architecture in Christendom. It is because I do love perfection, Miss Jeannette, because I do hate the deformity with which I wrestle, that I am impelled, with the zeal and constancy and devotion which you are so kind as to impute to me, to give myself unrelentingly to the work of restoring, so far as I may, to their original and purposed power and uses, the broken, diseased, perverted, unclean and loathsome human bodies that drift in my way, feeling that when, under the blessing of Heaven, I have, even in one case, been ministrant to that end, I have assisted in the accomplishment of as mighty a good as he who has builded up a ruined and desolated church—aye, a mightier, for I have helped to make fit for service the holiest temple in which God dwells with man."

"The Doctor is something of a heathen, you see, Jeannette. You must not be led astray by his heresies," warned Templeton, with his warm, sunshiny smile.

"But," said Jeannette, who, however led astray, is pretty certain to return with earnest, persistent purpose to her point again, "after all that is done, Dr. Osgood, what does it suffice if the spirit that reigns in your restored temple be weak, and sickly, and miserable, or beastly and misformed?"

"It would suffice nothing, indeed," the Doctor answered, "if there were not so intimate and subtle a connection between body and spirit that it is not possible to better the condition of one without a corresponding elevation of the other. As I said last night, we must do for the soul diseased, deranged and deformed, precisely what we do, or attempt to do, for the body under similar circumstances—secure for it conditions favorable to the development of qualities, the repression of which has thrown the whole nature out of balance and warped it in wrong directions. A single screw loose in this wonderful human mechanism disarranges its entire action, and brings it under our severest judgment and condemnation, and where we might lend a steady, helpful, strengthening hand, we give the poor, driven, ill-balanced soul a push on its crazy round to ruin and destruction. It seems to me there is nothing in the world so much needed as a wise toleration. When we learn to regard the fault whereby our brother stumbles with thoughtful and patient consideration of its source, and of the influences which have nurtured it, we shall be more chary of blame, more strong to forbear, more wise to help than now, in our virtuous ignorance of everything but the fact that a moral law has been broken, and that it is our Christian duty to assume an attitude of severity toward the unhappy transgressor."

How in the name of justice and mercy did we get the impression that we ought to tear and rend another for his propensity to sin? Not of the Christ whom some of us profess to follow, most surely. Search through the records of our inspired and illustrious leaders, and nowhere shall we find exemplified such divine love and tenderness and forbearance as His. One class alone comes under His sweeping, scathing, blasting denunciation—the self-righteous, self-seeking, hypocritical Pharisees, standing religiously aloof from the suffering and sinful, and thanking God devoutly that they are not as other men, extortioners, adulterers and wine-bibbers, but giving tithes of all they possess, fasting twice a week, praying in the synagogues, doing all things in obedience to the letter of the law. One can hear the thrilling, electric voice of this grandest Hero of the ages thundering down through the tumult and storm of the centuries with its fateful prophecy of ‘Woe! woe! to them that shut up the Kingdom of Heaven against men; that bind grievous burdens on the shoulders of the weak and lift not a finger to move them; that tithe the mint, and anise, and cummin, and omit the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith, that are outwardly righteous unto men, but within full of hypocrisy and iniquity.’ On these fall the weight of His wrath and condemnation; but to the tempted, the failing and the fallen everywhere, His great heart flowed out with an infinite compassion that was, in itself, a proof of His divine nature. He went down to the lowliest and humblest of God’s creatures as brother to brother, walking, talking and breaking bread with publicans and sinners, entering familiarly into their secret trials, temptations, pains, pleasures, feeling out their needs, beating against their limitations, knowing their weaknesses and hidden impulses to sin, yet without scorn for the vilest, His divine pity, His all-embracing sympathy, His upholding hand extended to those cast out and hunted down to perdition by the world’s contempt and persecutions, His forgiveness falling with heavenly benediction on the contrite and sorrowing, the sweetness of His mercy, the inspiration of His trust outflowing to penitent thief, and harlot, and prodigal, in whom, through all the stain of their pollution, He recognized the germs of divine possibilities, and to whom He brought the healing and salvation of a hope in the gospel of a regenerate and enlightened spiritual liberty. I tell you, my friends, the world will never comprehend the length and breadth and fulness of the mission of Jesus Christ until it has accepted the lesson of His sublime life which teaches, if it teaches anything, that the aim of all being is progress toward a purer, higher state, that our superior gifts of heart and intellect, our invulnerable virtues, our clear and lofty perceptions of truth and right are as nothing in the sight of Almighty God if we do not use them to supplement the imperfections and deficiencies and failures of our weaker and less fortunate brother, on whom has descended the blight of circumstances that he could not control, the penalty of laws that he never transgressed, the suffering for evil propensities to which he was involuntarily and unconsciously born and which he as involuntarily and unconsciously exercises. I tell you, our Christianity is all a vain show, an empty boast, if we do not carry its light and strength down to the lowest and feeblest, and sinfulness of fellow-creatures in our midst, striving, with the gentleness of a love that serves no selfish ends, to draw them up, step by step, to purer aims and heavenlier heights. Let none of us imagine that we ourselves may rise while any whom we have power to help struggle unheeded or despised below us. This great human brotherhood is so bound together by the indissoluble ties of nature and of spirit that not one of us, as has been written, can live or die to himself—not one but must be held in some way responsible for the well-being and well-doing of some other. If we believe Christ took upon Himself the burden of our sins, so must we in justification of our faith take upon ourselves the burdens of those more weak, and fallen, and degraded, becoming to them interpreters of the living Gospel of Love, whose glorious light and warmth has only just begun to penetrate the world’s darkened sphere, whose infinite power and magnitude the world has only just begun to feel and grasp. For, I say again, we arrive at a true and perfect understanding of the grand, beautiful and significant mission of the Christ only through the infusion and outworking in our lives of the inspired Spirit and sublime teaching of His life—love, active and untiring, going out in perpetual blessing and helpfulness to all the oppressed, down-trodden and unequal of God’s earth.”

We had been regarding the Doctor with that supercilious stare with which we who pride ourselves on the soundness of our doctrines are prone to favor those whose opinions we have been used to consider as unsafe and untenable, if not utterly heterodox; but the thrill of love and earnestness in the speaker’s voice, the glow of impassioned feeling in his face presently brought a flush of shame surging up from guilty hearts to conscious foreheads, and our eyes drooped after that triest they have when our thought turns inward with remorseful questionings.

Had this man a quicker perception of Christian duty—a greater zeal and enthusiasm in good works than those select souls who freely and indiscriminately applied to him the harsh epithets of skeptic—infidel—unbeliever? Tried by his lofty standard, was it not possible that we—even we—who missed no occasion to rebuke him for his heresies, might fall far short of our profession? Judged by their fruits, was not his life of active use richer and sweeter and stronger and purer than ours of dead, musty, mouldering, traditionary faith? Proven by its practical worth and its broad, tender humanity, was not his religion as wholesome and helpful and saving, and his wisdom as directly and legitimately and divinely derived as ours? Viewed in the light of his clear, shining example of love and fidelity in all his relations with mankind, did not our intolerant spirit of criticism, our ceaseless quarrel with opinions, our self-righteous refusal of fellowship look small and mean and contemptible, showing our pitiable lack of the Christian principles of humility, charity, sweetness, liberality to which we lay claim?

Into the midst of these silent speculations broke suddenly and softly a woman’s low, smothered sob, and we saw that Miss Dunbar had hidden her face upon the table by which she was sitting, and that she was visibly struggling with some strong emotion which she could not at will suppress.

Instantly our hearts responded with a thrill of sympathy to this inarticulate voice of a grief none the less touching because it was mysterious, and we felt ourselves involuntarily drawn toward our unhappy friend with a compassion which no words were delicate enough to express, for we knew instinctively that she would shrink from the slightest demonstration of pity, so galling and intolerable to sensitive natures that would rather conceal their hurts and suffer them alone.

Even the Doctor’s protégé, with his cloudy intellect, seemed to have a vague perception of this, for, pausing in his idle roving about the room and his curious, absorbed, dim-comprehending study of the pictures and ornaments that had fixed and held his attention through all the talk, he came and stood behind the lady's chair, wringing his feeble hands in mute distress and expressing in dumb pantomime his unobtrusive sympathy with a trouble which may have been in his darkly-working mind subtly associated with the strange, inexplicable something which isolated him from his fellows—the sad, perplexing difference which he realized with a dull, dreary sense of pain, but strove in vain to understand.

As if she felt the weight of all this unspoken commiseration, Miss Dunbar, with a strong effort, choked down the sobs that had for a moment overmastered her, lifted her head, dashed away her tears and looked around with a deprecating air at her silent sympathizers.

"Pardon me," she said, with sweet humility, "I did not think to betray such weakness. But it came over me all at once, while the Doctor talked, how many wretched souls there are whose real infirmities the world does not know, who are all their lives cruelly misjudged, because the secret motive that governs and perhaps compels their action is never understood. God only knows the suffering of such. Weighed down perpetually by the consciousness of the hidden failing which makes their inner life a prolonged tragedy, they withdraw into themselves, holding aloof from their fellows with a coldness and outward show of indifference that belies their actually warm, generous, social natures, growing morose, melancholy, bitter, losing sight of their once high aims, letting slip feebly, slowly, sadly, their once lofty ambitions and noble resolves, sinking into that dreary supine state of discouragement in which there seems no longer power of resistance, spirit to aspire, firmness to struggle, faith to sustain, and in all the world no loving, friendly, pitying human helper swift to apprehend their ills, ready to sympathize and support, eager and strong to aid."

"Nay, but believe me, that last is a misconception," the Doctor hastened to say, with a look of more than professional interest at the girl's apathetic face from which all emotion was as studiously discharged as from the slow, dreary, monotonous voice in which the complaint had been uttered. "The world, though we rail at its hardness, coldness and uncharitableness, is all alive with just such loving, friendly, pitying human helpers, swift and ready and strong in comprehension, sympathy and aid. In spite of what I have said of the intolerant and censorious spirit exercised toward the weak and stumbling, I believe it is a result of ignorance, and of a lack of consideration, rather than of hardened and depraved sensibilities; and while I condemn it, as I have in no measured or uncertain terms, I feel that it is nevertheless a fault of mortal nature, demanding the forbearance and charity of which it is itself the failure. Under all this severe criticism and harsh judgment, there must be, and there is, a substratum of tender human feeling which answers with divine certainty to the touch of human need. If we make our appeal, letting our hearts go out in love and trust to one another, leaning on those who are strong where we are weak, upholding those who are weak where we are strong, we shall find and feel the drawing of those fine, invisible chords of sympathy which bind us all together in the indissoluble bonds of fellowship, close as the love of God, which is symbolised therein. Let affection and confidence be manifested, and from the hardest nature will gush forth a responsive current as miraculously as the water from the rock smitten by the rod of God's prophet. For, selfish as we seem, we do live in and through and for each other, and our highest successes and our saddest failures are achieved and suffered in and through the lives inseparably bound with ours. Good or evil, our influence rebounds to us, and we reap in ourselves the reward of our works with others, growing in grace and strength and glory as we have helped our brother to grow, or stumbling into the pit we have thoughtlessly or deliberately dug for his impulsive feet. Standing or falling, then, we cannot stand or fall alone. The deed we do, the word we speak, the thought we think, bears infinite, unending, though unconscious relation to the surrounding forces of spirit and of matter. The drawing of a breath, the lifting of a finger, vibrates to the centre of the Universe. And in this wonderful power and susceptibility to influence, this marvellous capacity for growth, and not less in this fatal tendency to retrograde and deteriorate, we find a proof of what our spiritual instinct teaches us, that the true and grand aim of life is culture, the development of all that is lovely, tender, sweet, noble, exalted, and God-like in human character, the repression of everything vile, ugly, deformed and subversive of order, harmony and beauty. We may seem to have other objects, and to pursue them with more or less eagerness and zeal, but the real end of all our strivings is human perfection, and only as we consciously labor toward the accomplishment of that end in ourselves and in our fellows, do we attain to peace and satisfaction. Here are evils thrust upon us which we must fight valiantly or be overcome; and whatever our individual cross, my friends" (the Doctor addressed us all, but his eyes were upon Mrs. Dunbar's slowly-brightening face), "we must not crucify our hopes, our aspirations and our faith thereon. If sometime in the heat and peril of the day its weight overpowers you, and you feel yourself sinking under the long strain and pressure of your burden, rest it for a little on the shoulder of your stronger brother, and walk free and glad, conscious that in the toiling of the long, changeful way there will come an hour when he also will need the touch of a friendly hand, the echo of a cheering word, to aid him in the carrying of his. So, in this loving exchange of crosses, and tender communion of interests and aims, we shall feel the uplifting of angels' wings as we climb the heavy heights whose heads are ever bathed in heavenly light. I am not, as you know, what the world calls a religious man; I do not understand much about the saving power of creeds, nor do I comprehend, as it is explained, the Gospel plan of redemption; but my heart thrills under the divine command, 'Love ye one another,' and 'Bear each other's burdens.'"

FLOWERS IN NORWAY.—A traveller in the far north of Europe says: "Hardy wild flowers abound, though their number is not great, and there seems to be no effort whatever to cultivate flowers out-of-doors. Judge then, if you can, how strange it seems to find these Norwegians passionately fond of flowers! Every window is literally filled with them. The table on which I write has its contribution both in growing and in cut flowers, and nearly every meal is taken in their presence. The graves at the cemeteries are the only unsheltered places where cultivated flowers are to be found, and here they seem almost as abundant as in the home-window. Not that they thrive well, but that loving hands constantly renew the supply. No sooner has frost cut down the tender stem than another treasure is brought from the warm fireside as a fresh sacrifice."

HOME-LIFE AND CHARACTER.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPASSIWAY POTTS.
No. XI.

I MUST tell you now, just in the nick of time, how to mend a half worn coat, and make it last as long as it has already. You know the back part of a coat never wears out now-days, neither does the upper part of the sleeve. That was the way with the deacon's coat. I told Ida I would buy her the nicest pair of slippers in Pottsville, if she'd do her whole duty by that coat. The sleeves were badly worn. She took them out of the coat entirely, so as to have a chance to do her work well. She seemed willing to pay all that the slippers were worth. First thing, the sleeves were ripped open half-way up, shaken and brushed well, and the worn part cut out to above the elbow, and used for a pattern to cut a new half. Then she cut off three or four inches from the lower end of the upper half of the sleeve, and set in a new piece, and sponged and pressed her seams well, and made the work look very smooth and neat. The shabby collar was covered with black velvet, and the frayed edges of the coat bound with galloon.

Positively, that coat is just as nice as it was the day—I was going to say, the day it came home from the tailor's; but I forgot, it never went away from home to be made. Ida was the handy little tailor who out and made it herself. Now, very often a coat is so worn out in front that the buttonholes hang all in tags, and the wife will hold it up a moment in dismay, shake her head, and toss it among the carpet-rags, as beyond the skill of any needle.

Why, to make that as good as new, is as easy as to fall off a log.

Cut away all the worn part; begin upon the breast, and take out a strip four or five inches wide, if need be, all the way down; use the part you cut out for a pattern, over which to cut the new, making allowance for seams.

After the cloth is sewed in, then cut a new piece of lining for the under side; be careful and not let it draw or pucker, and every time you make a seam dampen and press it honestly. If for every-day wear, and you cannot match the cloth, never mind it, it will look very well, and will speak volumes for your skilful fingers, even though the color be different. Men's clothes cost so much, that we should try and make them last as long as possible. I have told you all I know about making pantaloons, and mending them, so that they won't look like "old patched trousers."

The deacon's Sunday suit has been patched four or five times, but we did it so nicely that nobody'd dream of such a thing. When he's passing round his hat for contribution-money, on Sundays, he looks every bit as well as the other deacons in their sixty-dollar rigs.

In making coats, it frequently happens that the lining and quilting out of an old coat can be used again to a good advantage. The last coat we made was lined throughout the body with the substantial-quilted lining of a worn-out overcoat.

We always dreaded the making of a vest more than the making of coat or pantaloons. We didn't know which to do first, but were materially aided by the formula given by a woman who seems to know everything.

She wrote thus: In cutting a vest, pin your patterns upon the cloth, folded double, as in cutting pants, taking care to have the nap run the right way. After the fronts are out, cut from the pieces the collar, facings and pocket-welts. Then cut your back linings and pockets.

Before removing the patterns from the fronts, mark carefully with chalk, or a thread, the places of the pockets and the buttons and the buttonholes, remembering that the buttonholes of a vest, when on a person, come on the left side, and the buttons on the right.

Very much of the ease and the success in making a vest depends on the order in which the various parts are put together. This is much more important than in making pantaloons.

First stitch up and press the little gore beneath the pocket. Cut the places for pockets, sew on the welts and insert the pockets, and press. Next, upon the right side baste a strip of strong brown linen under the places for the buttons, and sew them on strongly. Then sew on the lining of the collar to the outside front of the vest. Stitch on the facings down the front and bottom, and press them. Now sew the outside of the collar to the lining of the vest, and baste upon it whatever padding or buckram you wish to insert. Next, fit the lining and the outside neatly together, and sew all round with the facing-stitch. The right, or button side, is now done. Proceed in the same way with the other side, except the buttonholes, which are wrought last.

What remains is to prepare the back; make and baste on the buckle-straps, sew the back and fronts together at the shoulder and under the arms, sew the collar (lining and outside separate) together at the back of the neck, and face the collar down upon the back lining.

If any woman with common skill with her needle will follow these directions, at the same time examining a well-made vest, she will find that what seemed a task, and quite beyond her powers, has become simply successful and satisfactory.

Before I lay away a vest, I always baste down the collar just the shape I want it to stay—a few long stitches will suffice.

Make your boys be careful how they use their good coats. A new broadcloth or dress-coat should be carefully hung up in a closet or folded and laid away in a drawer, and protected from dust by a cloth laid over it. As long as it can be made to retain the shape around the collar and lappets which the tailor gave it, so long will it have a new and stylish appearance. A new overcoat may be damaged more by a muddy ride in an open buggy than by three years of careful wear. Leggings are a great protection to nice pantaloons in muddy weather. Pantaloons should be turned wrong-side out when they are hung up in a closet.

In getting ready to make up winter clothing, use as good material as you can afford, but if, through economy or necessity, or because you have such material on hand, or are making over a large pair of pantaloons into smaller ones, then, by all means, use good, thick linings. Why, the good substantial lining is sometimes the best part of a pair of pantaloons, the warmest.

It is a wise plan to cut out a good pile of garments in one day; you can cut to a better advantage than when you have your material all before you, and know just what you want.

After cutting out, roll up separately with thread, buttons, lining, hooks and eyes, tapes and whatever else will be needed to make them. Mark each roll so you will know just what it is, then when you begin to make up your work will move off with surprising dispatch.

A good many of you acted on my suggestion last fall and made your own winter hats. I heard all about it, and how surprised your aunts and cousins were who saw you at church first, in your new hats, as gay as a flock of larks on the wing. And some of them, the aunts and the cousins, in their old fussy frowny hats, dug each other in the ribs and whispered: "I do declare for it! if there ain't Ephraim's girls rigged out as peart as butterflies in spick span new hats! it's too bad the way Ephraim and Margut do 'low them girls to go in debt!"

Now wasn't that funny? Go in debt! I guess they found out their mistake, and then somebody's girls had admiring looks bestowed upon them.

I made Lily a new hat at that same time, and all the girls gathered about her and said, "that's the prettiest hat you ever had, Diddle. What a charming hat!"

It cost me nothing except for the frame and some fresh, new flowers. I took an old velvet bonnet and used the plumes, and lace, and a braid of mixed satin and velvet, to hide the places that stamped my fingers as not skilled in millinery. I thought I would treat the new hat to a beautiful new red rose. I paid eleven shillings for the flower—not that I admire such stunning roses myself, but to please her; she is young and full of life and loves pretty things. Her taste is not very good yet, but she will outgrow such a lavish admiration of the bright and beautiful things as she acquires a more cultivated taste.

For a half-dollar I bought a small, fine red rose, dainty, looking almost as though dew-drops stood on it, then a half-dozen other tiny ones, just the bare roses and stems, the kind that milliners use often when they are arranging a cluster of flowers. After I came home I made a cluster of roses out of this dewy rose and the half-dozen small ones, and some leaves, and it was so beautiful and rare, and looked so shy and modest, that we, Lily and all of us, thought it was so much prettier than the large one that cost so much more. So, when you make your hats again this fall, remember and have a cluster of little roses. Any good milliner will permit you to cull all over her stock, if you do it kindly and politely, and pay her what she asks for your purchases.

If you were careful of your last winter hats you can use some or all of the velvet again. If the velvet needs freshening up and renovating, you must hold the wrong side over steam, and while damp draw the wrong side across a clean, hot stove-pipe several times. This is the best way known to press velvets, and handle it as little as possible. Be careful when you wear a veil or nubia over your hat not to crush the flowers, or, if you can as well as not, put your flowers on with a view to this.

In this day of cooking-stoves it is very common to hear people say: "We can't have such corn-bread and pone and board-cakes as we used to have baked about the old kitchen fire-places, in Dutch ovens and bake-kettles." Why Granny Greenstreet says we can and she knows, sure!

She says she bakes just as good pone as she did fifty years ago, and this is how she does it, in the same little bake-kettle, too.

She makes a good hot bark fire and lays the oven lid on top of the stove to heat. When she is ready to go to baking she puts a couple of shovelfuls of coals on top of the stove, and sets her bake-kettle on them, just like the old way of baking on the hearth, puts the lid on and lays coals on top of it, the half-forgotten way of forty years ago. Corn-bread baked this way seems moister and better and sweeter than any way we make it now. She bakes bannocks or board-cake on a smooth board, the old way that she and Uncle Greeny liked when they were children, by having a good fire in the stove and opening the front doors—they have a grate inside—lifting the stove hearth away and standing the board pretty close up, they will bake quite as well as they did the old way.

Lily has a girl-correspondent in Massachusetts, a sprightly, energetic little creature, as all those Yankee girls are. Lily's grandfather and the grandfather of the Yankee girl are first cousins. I say: "I don't see how you can make Jenny seem like any relation whatever."

"Why, Pipey!" she replies, almost indignant at my presumption; "I can detect the Potts blood in every sentence she writes; she's real Pottsey and clever! Why, I can smell the blood of the Pottses before I open her letters!"

I told Lily to ask her dear cousin how the New Englanders got up their Thanksgiving dinners; what they had for dinner at her father's on the last Thanksgiving.

We Ohio folks don't have the good old Yankee formula, but we mean to now, since Jenny has told us.

First, is roast turkey, prepared just as nicely as possible; roast goose cooked the same way, only the dressing is made of mashed potatoes seasoned with pepper, salt, butter and onions, if the family like. Have a nice gravy. The chicken-pie is made in a large-sized milk-pan, layers of chicken seasoned with pepper, salt and butter, and the light crust on top, at least half an inch in thickness, cooked in the liquor in which the chicken was boiled. Bake three or four hours, cover with a brown paper if it bakes too fast. Baked beans; everybody knows how that's done. Pumpkin-pies—like we all make them, of good, rich milk, fresh eggs, sugar and finely-stewed pumpkin. Heat the pumpkin scalding hot before you pour it into the crust, no danger then of the crust being soggy. Bake in a hot oven. Mince and apple pies; well, everybody knows how to make them, or ought to know. The apple-pies, to be good, should be eaten the same day they are baked.

And last, either a plum-pudding or a baked Indian pudding.

For the latter boil one quart of milk and turn it on a pint of sifted Indian meal. Stir it in well so as to scald the meal; then mix three tablespoonfuls of wheat flour with a pint of milk by pouring the milk gradually upon the flour, that it may be free from lumps. Turn the two mixtures together and mingle them well. When the whole is just lukewarm, beat three eggs with three tablespoonfuls of sugar, stir them into the pudding, add two spoonfuls of salt, two of cinnamon and two of melted butter. If the pudding is liked very rich, let it bake five or six minutes, then add a half pound of raisins and half a pint of cream, the latter to be absorbed by the raisins.

For oyster patties, stew large, fresh oysters, take the yolk of an egg, boiled hard and grated, a bit of butter and enough oyster liquor to cover them. Let them boil a minute, and set them away to cool. Then make some rich puff paste, and bake in small tin patty-pans. When cool, put them on a platter, and lay two or three oysters on each shell of paste.

Lily has been peeping over my shoulder, and she says it will never do to leave out the plum pudding, especially as she wrote to Jenny for the formula.

I say: "Oh, it occupies so much space, and I guess everybody knows how it is made." But to please her I will put it in.

Break up two dozen of bakers' soft crackers, and pour on these three pints of rich milk. When swelled, add two pounds of stoned raisins, one pound and a half of currants, previously washed and dried, three quarters of a pound of citron, half a spoonful of pounded cloves, allspice, and cinnamon, a little salt, one quart of milk, and fifteen eggs. Baked in a deep earthen pan, or in a milk-pan filled two-thirds full, and set in a brick oven, and allowed to remain until the oven is cold. To be eaten with sweet liquid sauce. The making and baking require a good deal of skill and care. If any is left, it can be cut into slices and warmed, with a bit of butter and the sauce poured over.

Gossips and Sunday visitors are my bugbears. Ugh! Now there's Ruth Crane, she'll gossip faster'n a horse can run. I always dread to see Ruth come, with her work-basket on her arm and her steel-rimmed spectacles on her forehead. She was here yesterday, and it is no wonder that I feel so low-spirited to-day—she always leaves me that way every time we meet. I am almost powerless in her hands, though I try to fight bravely and to keep her off at a distance.

"How awful bad you're lookin' now-days, Pipsey," said she; "w'y you look e'enamost as old as the deacon himself; you look so kind o' leathery and yellor an' peaked, and you're gittin' down right hump-shouldered. I do declare for it, now!"

That was shot number one. Now I had been flattering myself, what with dressing warm, and eating beefsteak, and bathing twice a week, and going out in the fresh air every day, and sleeping in a well-ventilated, large bedroom, that I was really appearing unusually well. I think so yet. But I said: "Yes, I'm growing older every day, and I suppose I am wearing out; but I keep as cheerful as I can, and try to keep my heart young."

"Well, I do 'no' 'bout that; 'pears kind o' out o' place to see chit-rupin', gigglin' old folks," said she, taking out her knitting and settling herself cosily in the wide-armed rocker.

"Well, I don't know but it does," I replied, laughing. I wasn't at all diverted; I only laughed to hide the scorch.

"How do you all get along, anyhow?" she said, through her nose. "You've got a new dress, I see, Pipsy, an' if you'd known what fady stuff it was you'd never bought it. Old Mrs. Patterson has one like it, an' it's faded with the second washing till you wouldn't know what color on earth to call it; it's a kind of a grizzly-gray, grimy, dust color. That old hat Sam Watson wears is 'bout the color of it."

"Well, it'll make good carpet-rags, then; mix it alongside of bright red, and it would make a real pretty stripe," said I, good naturedly, forcing another laugh.

"Lawk! it would spile the looks of a hull web o' carpet for my likin'," said she, sniffing up her sled-runner of a nose until she did look too funny.

At dinner she handed back her cup and laughed in a smart way, saying: "You forgot an' put cream in my coffee; none of us folks over at the Willers uses cream at all; we think it makes coffee taste so calfy." When the biscuit was passed to her, she reached out her hand to take one, drew it back, reached again, and then hesitated, saying: "I'm not over-fond o' biscuit; if you've any old scrap, o' bread I'd ruther have it; don't care if 'twas baked in Methusalar's day, so it's bread. Biscuit always lays on my stummick so."

I rose from the table, went down cellar and brought some up to her. My heart was all a-flutter, and I was out of breath by the time I sat down to the table again.

"Why, now!" said Ruth, "you've the heaves like any pore old critter that plows and harrers all day. My! bet you're a-fallin'. I do r'aly b'leve you look older than the deacon hisself. What hair-dye do you use? Christadore's?" and she essayed to speak low enough that the family might not hear.

"I never used hair-dye of any kind; nothing goes on my hair but water," I said, in reply.

"Now, Pipsey! don't you tell that! Look out! You know why Annynias and Sophia was slain, don't ye?" and she reached over and thrust her bony knuckles into my tenderest side, with a laugh that could have been mistaken for any other kind of a noise.

She knew Elder Nutt had befriended us the time Humbug ran away, and she knew he had stayed all night at our house once since, and she embraced the opportunity of reminding me of him.

"That's bad, the story that's out on the elder," said she, in the afternoon after she had resumed her knitting. I didn't know what she meant, and didn't want to know, and I said, "People cannot live so that flaws will not be found in their characters, or their deportment."

"Yes, that's so; but then there must be something to make the story out of—stories don't grow out'n nothin'; you know."

I dropped the pie-pan that I was washing, and said, "How careless;" but, still, I didn't throw the irrepressible old gal off the subject.

"S'pose you hear the story 'bout the elder?" said she, leaning over and and peering into the pantry at me.

"I've not seen anybody lately, nor heard any gossip at all; I've been kept pretty busy at home, I had a lot of stocking-yarn to double and twist, and the winter's knitting to plan, and the dried fruits to put away; and, really, I've had no time for much else but hard work."

And here I smiled softly to myself, thinking how nicely I had thrown her off the track; but Ruth Crane is a match for the old lad himself.

"They say the elder has a wife living, and that he is trying to get a divorce from her," said she, looking over the rim of her spectacles at me. I finished as though I had touched hot iron. I didn't know what to do, so I dropped the tin pan and a set of pewter spoons, clattering down on the floor at my feet, glad of any pretext to hide the tumult in my heart and the glitter in my eyes. "There's nothin' very attractive about the elder," she continued; "and if that story is true, I'd quicker think his wife was the one wantin' the divorce. I know if he was my man I'd get one if it laid in my power."

"How do you like the new paper in our kitchen?" I said, eager to turn the conversation.

"Well, I can't say that I like it; it's too gloomy. I never liked a yellor color or small flowers. I like lots o' green an' big poppies and wide stripes, 't makes a room look so gay an' heartsome."

Turn whichever way I would that woman would head me. I was utterly miserable. She had something to say about every person, and everything, and she said nothing in a kindly spirit. I couldn't break right out and say "be still! you worry everybody!"

Ruth Crane was a lone woman; in sickness and in death her services were invaluable, and they were most freely given. Her childhood had been chilled by poverty and neglect and lack of friends—circumstances frowned upon her and her spiritual nature grew distorted and dwarfed. Poor soul! I couldn't scold her or turn away from her, though I tried to close my eyes and ears on her faults and shortcomings.

About catarrhs. I've quit using all kinds of catarrh medicine. I am thankful that I found out where I stood before it was too late.

I will learn from another's experience how to shun the rock on which he split all to pieces. I was suffering one time with severe pain in my head, when Brother and Sister Hartman called here to stay all night on their way home from a communion season with the church over at the Willows. As soon as they came and found that I was sick, Brother Hartman said: "I'll make you think I came along to-day like a ministering angel, for I have something in my pocket that'll cure your head in less than half an hour."

He gave me a big pinch of a fine powder and told me to lay it in the palm of my hand and snuff it up my nose suddenly. Oh, it seemed to turn my whole head into a flame that threatened to consume me! If it had been liquid fire it wouldn't have hurt any worse. I opened my mouth, and closed my eyes, and capered like a frantic sheep. When I was able to open my wet, red eyes, there sat Brother Hartman convulsed with laughter. For a few moments I felt as though nothing would ever console me but to see the church withdraw the hand of fellowship from Brother Hartman, that sinful man.

"Pooh! look at me!" said he, and he snuffed freely out of the satanic little box. It never made his eyes water or his nose blink any more than if his head had been made of sheet-iron. "You see," said he, "I use this snuff daily for my catarrh. I couldn't stand it any better at first than you. It is a wonderful medicine, though its properties cannot be appreciated fully, and yet I can't induce any poor sufferer to make use of this remedy. It will burn out the worst case of catarrh in a few months' time."

I said, "the inside of your head is as tender and susceptible, I presume, as the inside of your mouth, or your eyes, almost."

"Oh, no!" he said; "and then the preparation of kian pepper is only meant to act on the catarrh. I've got so I don't mind how much I snuff of it; it don't fire me up like it used to."

This happened years ago, but I had not forgotten it. A few weeks since the brother called here to eat a hearty Baptist dinner with us as he was going home from the Huron Association.

He came into the kitchen first; we were cooking a boiled dinner that day, and I said: "Brother, go into the room with granny and the deacon, out of these kitchen-y smells; I'm afraid it'll give you the headache."

"Oh, Sister Potts! since I saw you last it has pleased the Lord, in His wisdom, to take away from me the sense of smell entirely," said he, in a stuffy, nosy voice, that sounded as though his head was in a poke, and that poke away down in the farthest corner of the cellar.

There was no need of sticking that daring, bold piece of effrontery upon the Lord, and calling it "His wisdom," and I right up and told him the Lord was my friend, and I felt it obligatory upon me to take His part when I heard Him assailed after that fashion, by a weak brother who had dared to meddle with, and ruthlessly handle some of His finest machinery. I told him if a child played with fire, he got burnt, if he played with a razor, he cut himself; he had tampered with something of more importance than either, and the result was with him.

He shook his head doggedly and set his square jaws together, saying: "If I doubted the goodness of my Father in Heaven as you do, Sister Potts, I'd pray for the bowel of the earth to open and swallow me. I believe," and here he tipped back his hat until his yellow forehead shone like a brass knocker, "that the Lord knows just how many hairs is on all our heads, as well as I know how many buttons is on my breeches. I believe He watches us all the time, and when, through pride, our hearts swells big, He gives us a reminder in one way or another, just as I'd nudge my wife in meetin' to bring her to a sense of her duty in the houseen of the Lord. If we are too high-minded, He brings us down a peg, if we set too much store by our worldly possession, He shows us by His own redomitable will that all things come from Him, and to Him alone are we indebted. I was prospered—craps and stock smiled upon me—things was a-yieldin' and a-doublin' themselves abundantly, and I—I say it to my shame—I was like the Egyptians, I was a-worshippin' the goold calf-ah, when, lo, the Lord saw me a-spilen-eh in my prosperity, and He retch'd down His everlasting will-ah, and took from me the sense of smell-ah. Henceforth to me a rose is no more a rose-ah, a pink is no more a pink-ah, a dead sheep-ah is just as good in my pore smitten nostrils-ah."

And weary with much trumpeting the exalted voice of the poor brother sounded as though the symbolic poke in the corner of the cellar had been shaken up or kicked viciously.

Poor Brother Hartman! all revenge had gone out of my sinful heart, and I did feel most profoundly sorry for him.

Last night the deacon and the girls and myself went down to Pottsville to prayer-meeting. I observed that Brother Hartman was there, and all the evening he sat like a glum frog, never taking any part at all. I thought, perhaps, he had somewhat against some of the brethren, his face looked so injured and so sanctimonious.

On the way home I asked the deacon why the brother didn't take up his cross.

"Oh, didn't you know the reason? a sword hangs over his head, suspended by a single hair. The poor fellow lost the sense of smell some time ago and now he is threatened daily the loss of his voice. We will never hear him pour out his rapturous joy any more in the swelling tunes of China, or Mear, or Coronation, never hear his voice in the covenant or the prayer-meeting. It's hard for Brother Hartman, but we'll all have to submit to the ways of Providence, that are sometimes dark and past finding out."

"Providence!" There it was again! Blaming where no blame was due. If the wise brother chose to stuff his head full of cayenne pepper and squills, I don't think it was very gentlemanly to lay the blame on the best Friend we have; but I didn't want to disagree with Deacon

Potts—good man! Well, let others profit by this wayward example, and see that it is not well to take important matters into our own bungling hands, when such momentous results are pending.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

CATHARINE DE MEDICI.

PRINCESS, QUEEN AND QUEEN MOTHER.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

IF any student of modern history were asked to name the two women who were most conspicuous for the evil and crime which they accomplished on the stage of the sixteenth century—that age so remarkable for its great women in palaces and on thrones—I suppose the reply would not be long in coming, and that it would inevitably be Mary Tudor and Catharine de Medici.

The Florentine woman and the English-Spanish one, who never looked upon each other's faces, but who sat on thrones at the same time—the one under the lilies of France, the other under the Lion of England—the difference between whose ages was only three or four birthdays, were alike the shame and curse of the nations they governed; they filled their land with slaughtered victims and flaming holocausts. At the door of the one lies the awful night of St. Bartholomew, at that of the other the fires of Smithfield!

Yet the two crowned women, who will stand forever at the bar of history with that dreadful judgment upon their memories, seem to have been as unlike as possible in temperament and constitution.

The Florentine woman brought to the French capital all the Italian grace and brightness, the winning charm of manner, the keen penetration, the social adroitness, the fine power of adaptation, the delicate intuition which she inherited from her illustrious ancestry, and which were the very opposite of Mary Tudor's fierce passions and narrow, bigoted obstinacy.

Hard and cruel as she was, deceit, subterfuge seems to have been foreign to the nature of the eldest daughter of Henry VIII. In this respect she resembled that old Welsh Owen beyond whom the records of the Tudor family could hardly ascend, and who appears to have been a coarse, brave, honest soldier. He must have had an eloquent tongue with his handsome figure, for he managed to win the heart of the young widowed queen of the greatest of the Lancasters; and so he laid the foundations of the fortunes of his race, though he spoiled his own.

You have already seen something of the character of the eldest daughter of Henry VIII.; something, too, of those unhappy circumstances of her youth, which, no doubt, gave a stronger bias to the worst tendencies of her moral constitution, and exerted a powerful and most unhappy influence on her career during the five years in which she sat on the throne of England.

It is the purpose of my present article to bring before you the woman who wore the French crown with an Italian heart beneath; who, for so many years, as queen and regent and queen dowager, was supreme at the court, and swayed the destinies of France; whose dark, subtle, scheming brain was always at work with plot and intrigue; who wove her webs silent and steady as the fates; a woman with the falsest of hearts and the smoothest of tongues; who was at once fierce and plausible, smooth and revengeful; who nurtured her long wrath under soft words and beaming smiles; who plunged France into the political blunder and the eternal infamy of St. Bartholomew; and who lived long enough to see the failure of all her plans, and to follow all her sons to the grave except that miserable favorite, who fell by the hand of the assassin at last, and with whom the name of Valois perished.

Yet she came to France, that fair Florentine girl, before she had reached her fourteenth birthday.

Did you ever think of her landing in her childish innocence and wondering curiosity in the harbor of Marseilles? You know the French court never believed their haughty, magnificent monarch, Francis I., would bring himself to consent to such a mesalliance as the union of the second of his sons with the daughter of the Medici, the Florentine house, which had laid the foundations of its vast wealth in commercial enterprises. The proud monarch must have thought the bridal a real humiliation to the line of Valois. But Francis had counted the cost. We all know the ruling passion of his life was the humbling of his great rival, Charles V., the cold, hard, greedy Spanish king and German emperor, who was own cousin to Mary Tudor.

Francis had set his heart on gaining possession of some of the rich Italian cities in the strong grip of his rival. To one or two of these the French monarch had as good or a better claim than the Spanish one; but it was of immense importance to the former to gain the pope over to his own side in the great contest. Catharine was the niece of Clement VII.; and in this you have the key to the whole story.

This was why the young Florentine with her fair, girlish face and her dark, bright, wondering eyes, landed one autumn day of 1533 in the sunny harbor of Marseilles, to wed the second son of the royal line of Valois.

What a time they made for her coming, that young daughter of the Medici! Since it was settled that she was to wed the son of their king, it should be done with splendid fêtings and royal honors. Three hundred cannon thundered out their welcomes over the blue waters when she set foot on the shore; the old streets through which the vast processions wound with music and waving of banners, were hung with rare tapestries; the hot-blooded French nature went wild, and fairly bubbled over in its greetings to that young girl, who had come over the blue Mediterranean to be the bride of the second of the princes.

One cannot help looking at her with a profound and sad curiosity as she stands there. Whatever she was afterward, she was so young, and fair, and innocent at that time! She was to have dark days before her, too, at that old palace of the Louvre, where her home was to be.

Jealousies, envies, hatreds were to poison the atmosphere around her, and to fill her young life with bitterness. It was true she was to be an apt pupil in all that was darkest and worst in that old home of the kings.

But, just then, I fancy her heart was full of girlish eagerness and pride and gladness, over all the splendor and welcomes and rejoicings—with a pang of regret, it may be, for the beautiful Florentine home she had left behind forever.

When she remembered it, afterward, it must have seemed to her sometimes, I fancy, that she had paid dearly for all the pomp and pleasure of that day at Marseilles.

The pope, whose power had made his niece's marriage, died in a short time after she came to France, and the young orphan-girl had now no relatives powerful enough to intimidate or influence the royal family of France. The young Valois knew perfectly well the reasons which had induced his father to consent to this marriage. He was not fond of his young Florentine wife, and he was bent on repudiating her and wedding the beautiful daughter of the Guises, Marie of Lorraine, who afterward became, you remember, the wife of James Stuart, and the mother of Mary, Queen of Scotland.

The sudden death of the dauphin made Catharine de Medici's husband heir to the throne of France, and, of course, elevated her own position greatly at the court.

But the foreign princess had no friends to use their power in her behalf, and her fall at that time seemed almost assured. She must have had a miserable life of it, wandering among the stately halls of the old Louvre, and seeing the day drawing closer when she must be hurled from her high place into obscurity and dishonor.

But the young Italian was not of a nature to yield her rights without a struggle. No doubt her position at court, and her unhappiness, had developed precociously her intense ambition and her marvellous capacity for weaving her own plots in the dark. Her situation made her desperate. She resolved to appeal to the pity and chivalry of her father-in-law. The way in which she did it showed her wonderful subtle penetration, and showed, too, that she had already learned to read the characters, the virtues and the weaknesses of those with whom she was brought in contact, and over whom it was for her interest to exercise a soft but powerful influence. The first of the house of Valois was the best of his race. All the rest were a bad brood enough; and Francis I. had many and terrible faults. He was selfish, tyrannical, and occasionally that hot blood of his could flame into savage cruelty. But the haughty, magnificent French king was, all his life, capable of an act of magnanimous generosity. A noble deed dazzled his imagination, and the romantic and chivalrous impulses of his soul would not be appealed to in vain.

His daughter-in-law chose her time and place well. One day the king, walking through his palace halls, was startled by the swift-gliding of a girlish figure before him, which dropped with clasped hands at his feet. It must have been a touching spectacle. It was the wife of Henry of Valois who lay in her youth and loveliness and misery at the feet of the French king. It was precisely the kind of scene and appeal most likely to touch the heart of the chivalrous Francis.

It was a terrible crisis for Catharine de Medici. Her fate hung on the decision of her father-in-law. On that moment, on the way the young wife told her story—it rested whether she should ascend the throne, and wear the lilies of France, or become a repudiated, forsaken wife, like that other Catharine, a little way across the channel—the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella.

Francis was deeply touched by the sight before him, and eagerly inquired its meaning. History has not told us with what passionate, pleading words Catharine de Medici sobbed out the story of her wrongs and misery, and implored that she might be spared from the doom the dauphin was preparing for her.

Francis listened and gazed on the young, lovely girl. The generous, chivalric side of his nature was touched to the quick. He tenderly raised Catharine, and solemnly gave her his word—"the word of a king"—that no harm should be done her; that he would maintain her rights to the throne and crown of her husband. Catharine knew then that her fortunes were secured; Henry of Valois would never dare to dispute the fiat of a father whose will was absolute throughout France. However the dauphin may have chafed against the decree which held him to his Florentine wife, he yielded obedience to it.

Yet, I have sometimes thought if Francis I. could have looked far along the century at that moment, when Catharine de Medici lay in her beauty and misery at his feet, and seen all the sorrow and infamy that lovely, sobbing girl was to bring upon the name and race of Valois; what long misery her dark political courses would entail on the French nation, the imperious monarch, in his swift rage and horror, would have been very likely to draw his sword and plunge it into her heart.

But the king might have felt no deeper horror than Catharine de Medici herself, could she have seen her long future at that moment. She was so young, you know, and the black night of St. Bartholomew lay so far away in those dim years when the century should be in its waning.

It is, of course, quite impossible, within the limits of this article, to trace the career of Catharine during her reign or her long regency.

The lovely Florentine girl reached the highest summit of her ambitions. When her father-in-law died, her husband ascended the throne, and Catharine de Medici wore the crown of France. The children which had been denied to the first years of her marriage, were born to her now in rapid succession. A large household of goodly sons and fair daughters made bright the old Palace of St. Germaine with the faces and voices of childhood.

It was here that Mary Queen of Scots came, the betrothed of the Dauphin, to be educated as the future Queen of France; it was here, too, that Jeanne of Navarre, the niece of Francis I., the mother of Henry IV., the noblest woman of that age, the only one who read, with her clear, penetrating intellect, the character and motives of Catharine de Medici, passed much of her childhood.

Henry II. did not inherit the best qualities of his father. He had none of the dazzling, social gifts, of the captivating graces of person and manner which made Francis I. the most adored of monarchs, and which threw a veil over the great vices of the man. Henry had always been silent, moody, cold—he was worthy to be the father of that bad brood of sons, with whom the race of Valois died out. The husband of Catharine de Medici seems to have been unscrupulous, false, selfish and heartless, while the plan which he laid and communicated in secrecy to the Prince of Orange, when that nobleman was riding with him in the wood of Vincennes, for the extermination of the Huguenots, brands his memory with infamy.

With her keen insight and her marvellous adroitness,

Catharine succeeded in adapting herself to her husband. She was not only the sharer of his throne, the mother of his children, she was the trusted councillor in all those political schemes and plots, for the aggrandizement of the house of Valois, which filled his reign; she was also the bland and indulgent friend of his mistresses.

To a presence of imperial majesty Catharine united a rare grace and fascination of manner. The beautiful Italian captivated all who were brought within the spell of her presence. She had the wit, the keenness, the rare conversational powers of the Medici; but beneath that majesty of bearing, that charm of speech and manner, lay the hard, fierce, revengeful nature, which, once aroused, could long bide its time, but made its deadly spring at last.

Henry II. made a tragic end, at last. The world was by so much the better off, when the lance of Count Montgomery slipped that night of the grand French and Spanish tournament, which Henry gave to close the series of splendid festivities in honor of the marriage of his daughter to the proud and sullen Philip of Spain.

The lance pierced the French king's visor, and entered his brain. He reeled in his saddle before the breathless, horrified multitude, before the splendid crowd of courtiers and the group of Spanish cavaliers; before the royal family—his wife and the princes and princesses, boys and girls still, though the eldest sat with his fair young bride, where the lilies of France and the thistles of Scotland and the arms of England blazed over her.

The monarch was borne out senseless and dying, and a few days later Catharine de Medici was a widow, and the boy, Francis II., and the beautiful girl, Mary of Scotland, with her sixteen birthdays, were king and queen of France.

Mary's French relatives, those Guises, who so often shook the house of Valois to its foundations, came at once into power. They hated and feared Catharine de Medici. They undermined her influence with her son, they affronted her pride and in a thousand ways those six haughty, powerful uncles of the young Scotch queen, made the mother of the boy-king, himself weak in mind and body, feel their insolent authority. Years afterward Mary Stuart was made to pay, in her long, foreign captivity, a terrible reckoning for that brief day of her young pride and splendor, when she wore the lilies and sat on the throne of France.

A very brief day it was for the young queen with her Scotch nativity and her French heart. In two years her husband died suddenly. The Valois sons were not a long-lived race.

Catharine de Medici grasped the reins of power once more, and this time with none to interfere. She could pursue her schemes for the aggrandizement of her house, she could weave her plots and shape her courses in the dark. Nobody could stand in her way. France, with all its interests, religious, political, commercial, with its army and navy, lay at the mercy of the Florentine woman, for she was regent of the kingdom during the long minority of her son, Charles IX.

It was a pleasant Saturday evening that 23d of August 1572. It was nearly forty years since the young daughter of the Medici, with her pleased, girlish face, and the smile in her dark, Italian eyes, first stepped ashore in the sunny harbor of Marseilles.

Her history of all these years is the history of France; in a wide sense, the history of Europe.

The great century had gone stormily on its way, through its wakening springs, and blossoming summers and ripening autumns. Mighty convulsions, civil and religious, had heaved and torn the age, and the woman who stood all this time at the helm of France had taken "Machiavelli a Prince" for her gospel!

Catharine de Medici's schemes and policy were always selfish. There was no breadth, no generosity, no broad grasp of affairs possible to that dark, plotting, Italian nature.

She could not understand the new religious movement which was shaking not only France, but the civilized world to its centre.

It is true the queen-mother, when it suited her plans, made advances to the Huguenots, discussed theology with their leaders and listened to their sermons.

Her early education, her Italian tastes, the whole color of her genius, no doubt, inclined her to the religion of her ancestors, but she was ready to sacrifice everything to her ambitions, her jealousies, her interests.

She loved power; not the shadow, not the pomp and splendor, even, without the reality. For this she plotted, undermined, betrayed, for this she was willing to sell everything; to sacrifice the safety of France, the lives and fortunes of all who stood in her way, and to risk for the glory and aggrandizement of the house of Valois everything human and divine.

With all her graciousness and softness, revenge, hatred, cruelty lay at the bottom of this woman's soul. They flamed up fiercely on occasion.

But it is likely that those who were brought into frequent intercourse with the queen-mother never suspected the worst side of the woman. Her guile was of the subtle, panther-like kind, which only springs when it is sure of its victim.

She had, during his minority, exercised an almost absolute control over her son, Charles IX. He was a strange, gloomy, brooding boy, bursting out occasionally into the wildest paroxysms of passion. He feared his mother, and seems to have had a kind of instinctive knowledge of her real character; and there were times when the proud woman yielded in terror to the wild bursts of her son's wrath. But she was sure to regain her influence over him, and to mould him to her own purposes in the end. Yet there were gleams of a softer, better nature, of noble impulses in the elder of the three living sons of Catharine de Medici.

There seemed a taint of madness in the crowned youth, and his mother understood this, and knew how to appeal to it when the time was ripe.

And on this summer night of 1572, the mother of Charles IX. had made up her mind to leave no stone unturned to rouse into its utmost ecstasy of fear and fury this savage madness in the nature of the young king.

Catharine de Medici must have been driven to desperation before she came to this conclusion. She dreaded the bursts of wild, volcanic rage which slumbered in the soul of her young son.

Her position at this time was one to fill the soul of the queen-mother with the greatest alarm. She saw the power, which was the strongest ambition of her life, about to pass from her grasp.

All her long plottings, her subterfuge, her tacking and veering, her diplomatic coquetries, her inclining to one and then to the other of the great religious parties of the realm seemed now about to end in disaster and defeat to this coveted power of hers.

In vain she had tried to put off the evil day, and given the youngest and loveliest of her daughters, Margaret of Valois, to Henry, the son of the woman she feared and hated, the Protestant queen of Navarre.

The old, gay, holiday-loving city of Paris had gone half wild over this union of Catholic princess and Protestant king. It had celebrated the bridal with all sorts of festivities and rejoicings.

The young bridegroom had come from his home amid the mountains around Béarn with a long train of cavaliers, composed of the flower and pride of his kingdom.

One thinks of that long, gay company clattering over the green country highways in the pleasant summer weather, the young boy-king at the head of the splendid cavalcade on his way to wed his beautiful bride; one thinks of the brave knights and noble gentlemen and gallant soldiers, and across the long centuries, one's heart aches for them, thinking to what dark doom they were going in that gay Paris to which they were bound on their bridal errand.

AM the great Protestant leaders and chieftains of the Huguenots assembled in Paris to witness the nuptials of Valois and Navarre. No true patriot could fail to rejoice over it, for France had been torn and wasted again and again by the dreadful religious wars of the few preceding years.

After such a proof of his good faith as this giving the youngest and loveliest of his beautiful sisters to wife to his Protestant cousin, nobody could doubt that Charles IX. was sincere in the marked favor which he had of late shown the Huguenots.

It is true that Jeanne of Navarre, brought up from her birth with the royal family, and reading their characters with that clear, fine penetration which was one of her marked qualities, had shown the utmost repugnance to this union. In vain the friends who surrounded her, the leaders and military chieftains of the Huguenots, represented to the noblest woman of her country and age the grandeur of the opportunity which was now afforded her to heal the divisions in France, by consenting to this union of her son with the sister of the king.

That inveterate distrust of Catharine de Medici, fostered by long, intimate knowledge of the queen-mother, could not be overcome. In vain she made her graceful overtures and sent her loving messages to Jeanne of Navarre. The latter remembered the time when she had stolen secretly from the French court with her young son, and made her long, swift, breathless flight, scarcely drawing rein until she was safe with her boy among the rugged mountains around Béarn, away from the dreaded influences of the corrupt court of Catharine de Medici.

Remembering that time—remembering, too, the subtle, revengeful nature of the Florentine woman—Jeanne of Navarre always looked up with that brave, calm, noble face of hers, and asked in her clear, steady tones: "Can the queen, who never forgives, forgive me?"

But the pressure of circumstances was at last too strong for the woman. The prayers of her court, the needs of the nation, compelled her to yield.

She left her son, exacting from him a most solemn promise that he would not quit the kingdom until summoned by herself. She came to Paris to make preparations for the marriage. Charles received his relative with transports of affectionate delight.

Everything went smoothly on the surface, until suddenly the Queen of Navarre sickened, and in a few days the only woman whose keen, clear insight had read the soul of Catharine de Medici was in her grave.

There were dark rumors of poison, quickly smothered.

There is no real evidence of their truth. The Queen of Navarre had not been well for some time before her journey to Paris. The suddenness of her death, under the circumstances, necessarily causes a dark suspicion to cling to Catharine de Medici; one which has never been wholly cleared up; but there are no historical proofs that she was concerned in the death of the Protestant queen.

The latter's friends must have fully exonerated the king's mother from any suspicion, for the preparations for the marriage went on as before. The boy-king, with his long cavalcade from his rugged mountains, the Huguenot princes and leaders, with their followers, crowded into Paris. The gray-haired Admiral Coligny, the young Prince Condé, Rochefoucauld, the Count de Montgomery, the touch of whose fatal lance had cost Henry II. his life, all gathered within the walls of the old city to witness the royal marriage. It was consummated with public rejoicings, amid the splendor and pomp of the court.

The young king and the queen-mother received the Huguenots with the most flattering cordiality. The long train of the Prince of Navarre was lodged at the Louvre. No mark of attention, no royal hospitality was forgotten, which could inspire the absolute confidence of the powerful Huguenot body assembled in the city.

Catharine de Medici moved in the midst of the splendid ceremonials a proud and stately figure, with her soft words and her dark, smiling, Florentine eyes, and the false, treacherous, cruel soul under all.

She saw that the Huguenots were gaining daily a stronger influence over her son, while her own seemed as steadily declining. The reins of power were slipping from her hands into those of the staunch, noble old Admiral Coligny.

The young king loaded the Huguenot leader with attentions, listened to his counsels, constantly desired his presence at court, and became daily more estranged from his mother and her policy.

The admiral's whole soul was bent on inducing the king to openly range himself on the side of the Protestants, to pour his armies into the Netherlands and crush the legions of Philip of Spain.

With what fiery eloquence the grand old man pleaded his cause, and shook the soul of Charles IX. as he roused all that was best in that stormy, ill-balanced nature!

Catharine watched and brooded. She saw her son grow colder, her policy thwarted, her opinions neglected at the council board. All that was evil and fierce in that dark, treacherous, cruel soul was aroused. She resolved to make one desperate throw for her lost power.

You know how the shot succeeded which was to have cost Coligny his life. It only wounded him. If any suspicion existed that the queen-mother was concerned in the attempted assassination, it was not strong enough to put the Huguenots on their guard.

The admiral still lived; he would soon recover. The king visited the old nobleman's sick-bed, and had a long private interview with him. The Protestant nobles, the highest princes of the realm, crowded around the couch of their leader, passionate with indignation and grief. In a little while the crime might be traced from the assassin to its instigators. That would be the death-knell of Catharine's influence with the king. The base, fierce soul of the woman turned to bay at last.

The summer stars were shining peacefully over the old city when Catharine de Medici glided through the halls of the Louvre to the chamber of the king.

She had a work to do that night, and she did it well.

She roused his terrors; she worked on his fears; she inflamed, with all the cunning of her base, subtle, cruel soul, the stormy passions of that wild nature.

There was no lie so false or foul that she stuck at it. She actually made the young king believe that the Protestant leaders were a band of traitors, pledged to hurl him from his throne, and take his life, in vengeance for the shot that had wounded Coligny; that their plan was to set the crown of France on the head of the brother whom Charles hated—the handsome, base Henry III.

Had he been older and wiser, the king would have seen the glaring absurdities of this story, but his judgment was immature, and it was his mother who told him. At last he believed her, though it cost hours of that summer midnight to bring him to the point which alone would satisfy the fears and the vengeance of Catharine de Medici, and that was the slaughter of the Huguenot leaders!

Charles went mad at last, and in a paroxysm of wild frenzy, burst out: "Kill all the Huguenots in France—kill them all, that no one be left to reproach me!"

It was past midnight when Catharine went out from the royal chambers of the Louvre. The summer stars were shining in solemn peace over the old, slumbering city, and over the pale face of the queen-mother shone the dark Italian eyes, gleaming with fierce exultation.

She had done her work. She had the order of Charles IX. for the slaughter.

Yether daughter was the five-days' bride of the Huguenot king; his vast train was lodged under the palace-roof, sleeping unarmed and secure; the leaders of his army were her most honored guests.

Think of that! She must have thought of it, too, as she glided on through the old halls of the Louvre that summer midnight.

A little later the bell of St. Germaine L'Auverrois pealed through the darkness. It was the signal for that deed, at whose mention the world still shudders—the signal for the Massacre of St. Bartholomew!

RELIGIOUS READING.

ABIDE IN ME.

BY RICHMOND.

I SHALL not soon forget that Sunday evening. Our minister had called in to sit an hour, and we were talking on a subject in which both felt a deep interest, when my daughter, who was in the next room above, commenced singing, in her low, sweet way, that beautiful hymn, "ABIDE WITH ME," accompanying herself on the parlor organ. Our conversation ceased, and we both leaned back in our chairs, giving up our hearts to the tender and sacred feelings awakened by the hymn and the music. Never had a song of Zion so held and impressed me. Every word seemed to have a new and deeper meaning, as verse after verse came from her lips:

Abide with me; fast falls the even-tide:
The darkness deepens; Lord, with me abide
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, oh, abide with me.

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day;
Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away,
Change and decay in all around I see,
Oh, Thou, who changest not—abide with me.

Thou on my head in early youth didst smile,
And, though rebellious and perverse meanwhile,
Thou hast not left me oft as I left Thee;
On to the close, oh, Lord, abide with me!

I need thy presence every passing hour,
What but Thy grace can foil the tempter's power;
Who like Thyself my guide and stay can be?
Through clouds and sunshine—oh, abide with me!

Hold on Thy cross before my closing eyes:
Shine through the gloom, and point me to the skies;
Heaven's morning breaks, and earth's vain shadows flee,
In life and death, oh, Lord, abide with me!

With the last line voice and music ceased, leaving me in a kind of holy ecstasy—silent and absorbed. The very sphere of Heaven seemed to be around us. I had but one thought, one prayer, and that was repeating and repeating itself like an echo in my soul, "Oh, Lord, abide with me!"

"That, and nothing more," I said, at length, breaking the spell of silence—"Abide with me!"

A faint sigh came from the minister's lips; and then he answered, with a seriousness that surprised me at the moment as much as his words: "We must have more than that."

"More than the abiding presence of our Lord and Saviour?" I exclaimed.

"Yes; He must abide in us!"

I felt the light of a new and higher truth flash into my soul.

"Religious sentiments, as expressed in our beautiful hymns, does not always lead us into practical truth," he added. "There are laws of spiritual life as exact as any laws of natural life. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can we, except we abide in Christ. This is the law of spiritual life. We, as branches, must abide in the vine, and receive our life from the vine. It is not the Lord's mere presence that saves us. Only the Lord's life in us can do that."

He paused and waited some moments for my answer. But my thoughts were too busy—he had set them in a new direction.

"You see the difference?" he said.

"Clearly," I replied.

"Our Lord did not use a mere figure of speech, but a divine symbol; and He dwells upon and repeats it over and over again, so that there may be no doubt of His meaning. As the branch is in the vine, so must we be in Him—organically united, with His life flowing into us, and making us fruitful."

"What a thought!" I said, half in amazement, at the great significance of what was crowding in upon my mind. "Not with, but in the Lord."

"Even so. 'I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one.' To be regenerated is to be born from above; to have a new life take the place of the old, natural, selfish life. We are wild vines by nature, and must be grafted on to the Living Vine, and draw out lives from that. And what is the nature of this new life? We have it in a word—love. Not love of ourselves, but love for one another. 'As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you; continue ye in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in His love. This is my commandment, That ye love one another as I have loved you.'

The minister ceased speaking, and we were both silent for a long time.

"And this is the way of salvation," I said, at length, taking a deep breath as I spoke.

"I know of no other way, and can preach no other in peril of my soul," he answered, with impressive seriousness. "No mere adjoining of a man to the church can possibly save him. Its rites, and ordinances, and sacraments are all spiritual helps, if used aright, but only the life of the Living Vine flowing into his soul and filling him with the life of Heaven, can save him. He must not be a dead branch, but fruitful in good works. If not fruitful—if he abide not in the vine—he is cast forth as a branch and is withered."

"How shall we know that we are in the Living Vine?" I asked.

"He that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit," he replied, using the Lord's own words. "Now, if the life that is in the branch be divine and unselfish, the fruit will be loving deeds. Pride, worldly ambition, devotion to self, envyings, hatreds, cruelty—these do not flow in from the Living Vine; and we may know that if they are in our hearts we are as dead branches, and in danger of being cut off. It is all very plain and simple. No one need be in doubt. The symbol is so apparent in its meaning that a child may understand it."

"And yet," I said, "who of us bears such fruit as our Lord bore when in visible presence among men. 'These things I command you, that ye love one another.' Over and over again, He gives this injunction. His love was ever running over in blessings. But ours is not."

"We are but weak and shrivelled branches; with little of the Lord's life in us," the minister returned. "But if we bear any fruit, small and feeble and flavorless though it be, the divine Husbandman will purge us that we bear more and better fruit. Herein lies our hope. The fruit we must bear is good living; and good living in the world is a life of justice and charity. 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,' must be the rule of our conduct toward all. If this be not the rule of our lives, we may be very sure that we are not in organic union with the Living Vine. No matter how high our place may be in the visible church; no matter how exact we are in honoring all her external requirements, if our love for the neighbor is not strong enough to make us just and merciful toward him, we have in us no ground of hope. Our Lord must not only abide with us, but in us."

Never since that evening, when meditating on spiritual things, has the symbol of the vine and its branches failed to be present in my thoughts; and I see as I never saw before, that my only hope of Heaven lies in such a union with the Vine as will make its life flow into my soul—the life of love. Not the love of self; but a love that seeks, like God, to delight itself in blessing.

HEAVENLY MANSIONS.

OUR spiritual houses, the mansions in our Father's house which we shall afterward inhabit—houses not made with hands, eternal in the heavens—are being built day by day by our prayers, our faith, our loving thoughts, our useful and unselfish deeds.

Kind feelings toward the neighbor, acts of civility and charity, unconnected with the hope of reward, deeds of self-sacrifice, generous emotions, pure affections, the spirit of forgiveness, reverence for God, obedience to law, humility, patience; these build up the heavenly character in the soul and the future heavenly mansions in which we will reside.

THE SACRAMENT.

HOWEVER much Christians may differ in their opinions concerning the meaning and efficacy of the sacrament, the Lord's Supper is, to all men, a visible memorial and witness of the fact that Christ not only gave, but continually gives Himself for the life of the world, and that the Christian life must be sustained by a continuous reception and assimilation of Christ's life.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

BEN BOWEN'S TEXT.

ONCE said to Ben Bowen, a boy of ten, "Ben, can't you wheel this bag of rags to the weaver's for me?"

"No, ma'am," came right out pat.

"Why not, you have nothing to do?"

"Yes, I hev, too," said Ben, eyeing the great wheelbarrow and the rags askance.

"What have you got to do, I would like to know?"

"Grow, for one thing," said Ben, promptly, and he trotted off by the side of his obedient hoop, all unconscious that he had given out his text, and then retired, leaving his hearer to make up a sermon to suit herself.

Here it is. It may be a tangled mass of hit and miss, but I assure you a woman who has just got fifty pounds of carpet-rags ready for the weaver is not in much of a mood for sermon-writing, especially when the text has been given by a boy of ten, in just the way Ben gave it. Nevertheless, I am not Ben's mother, and I did not feel called upon to order Ben to wheel the rags in order to keep the parental rein stiff, so, I decided to look at the matter after this fashion. Here was a boy, just free from a tiresome day at school. He felt like stretching himself. He needed to stretch himself. He was tired all over. You sit on a board all day, and see how you like it. It is not laziness which makes boys so disinclined to labor between the close of school and supper-time. It is purely tiredness. Give him some light job after supper, and be decent in your manner toward him, and he will do it willingly and well. But don't make up your mind that he has nothing on hand except to do your bidding. Don't overtax him. Don't dwarf him in body, for, if you do, you are responsible for a correspondingly dwarfed mind and soul. Think of it!

At babyhood Ben was a sprout. He is a sapling now. At eighteen, if he does well, he will be a tree. His special business thus far has been to grow, and will be for eight years to come. The sapling may blossom and bear fruit, if it wants to, just enough to give us a foretaste of what the flavor will be. We don't expect much of it, however, but growth. We expect too much of our children, and that is why we get so little. It vexes me to hear parents urge a little boy to be a man. If they say a little man, well enough, for that means a boy. I say, be boys while you are boys. A man is no better than a boy, so far as I know. If a house-plant blossoms too fast, we pinch off the tops, buds, blossoms, and all, in order that it may get its growth.

How often we hear it said of a young slip, "It is blossoming itself to death." So is it with some boys. I dislike to see one of your decidedly mature boys, one who uses as big words at ten as his father does at fifty. Such boys seldom grow tall and portly. They look little and old always.

I was a teacher once, and in my school there was a girl of fifteen, who was a living rebuke to me. I never laughed in her presence, only in my sleeves—I did not dare to. She was ten years my junior, by the almanac; but you would have taken her to be at least ten years my senior. Her parents are stout and large; she is little and stunted. She was a smart child. They saw it, and pushed her. The sapling ran to fruit, the fuchsia to flowers. I don't believe in it.

Another word while we are on this subject. Don't tie a clothes-line to two young saplings, and then scold because they cannot lift their tiny branches high enough to keep the clothes from dragging. The clothes-line has no business there, any way. It is hardly safe to fasten it to old trees, it may kill them. Have mercy on the sapling, then. Don't put a man's burden on a boy's back, and find fault because he is not tall enough to lift it free from the ground. Drag it, boy!—I would; it would make it a little easier. In Heaven's name, let us take the shackles off, and let our children grow!

How does it happen that we find great souls in well-developed bodies? God is impartial. He does not dwarf a body, and then dwarf a soul to match it. Let us make the temples fit, and God himself will not despise to dwell therein.

A word more about Ben. He belongs to a family of eight children. His left shoulder is higher than his right. He looks as though he had a weight in his right hand always. Here is the cause: He brings all the water that is used by the family, from a spring a long way off. His big brothers wear shiny boots, and don't bring water. They are above such menial service. Ben has a brother Tom, who is twelve, and his right shoulder is higher than his left. He saws all the wood. The big brothers wear gloves; they never saw wood. Katy, the girl of fourteen, is round-shouldered, very. Well she may be. She has tended the five babies that came after her, and it takes a sight of lifting to get one fat, chubby baby on his feet. The creeping spell is tedious enough to break a grown-up back. What wonder then that five such sieges have curved little Katy's spine. But the two big brothers are pale, languid and miserable. They are clerks. They get no out-door exercise; for, between counter hours they read dime novels. I believe in division of labor, but not after this fashion. Yours, truly,

In behalf of the boys,

Mrs. B. C. RUDN.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

PRAYER AND POTATOES.*

"If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?"
—JAMES II. 15, 16.

AN old lady sat in her old arm-chair,
With wrinkled face and dishevel'd hair,
And pale and hunger-worn features;
For days and for weeks her only fare,
As she sat there in her old arm-chair,
Had been nothing but potatoes.

And now they were gone: of bad or good
Not one was left for the old lady's food,
Of these her stock of potatoes;
And she sigh'd and said, "What shall I do?
Where shall I send, and to whom shall I go
To get some more potatoes?"

And she thought of the deacon over the way,
The deacon so ready to worship and pray,
Whose cellar was full of potatoes;
And she said, "I will send for the deacon to come,
He'll not mind much to give me some
Of such a store of potatoes."

And the deacon came over as fast as he could,
Thinking to do the old lady some good,
But never thought once of potatoes;

He ask'd her directly to tell her chief want,
And she, simple soul, expecting a grant,
Immediately answer'd, "Potatoes."

But the deacon's religion went not that way,
He was more accusom'd to preach and to pray,
Than to give of his hoarded potatoes;
So, not hearing, of course, what the old lady said,
He rose to pray with uncover'd head;
But she only thought of potatoes.

He pray'd for patience, for wisdom and grace,
But when he pray'd, "O Lord give her peace,"
She audibly sigh'd, "Give potatoes;"
And at the end of each prayer that he said,
He heard or he thought that he heard, in its stead,
The same request for potatoes.

The deacon was troubled—knew not what to do;
'Twas embarrassing, very, to have her act so
About "those carnal potatoes!"
So ending his prayer, he started for home;
As the door closed behind him, he heard a deep groan,
"Oh, give to the hungry, potatoes."

And that groan followed him all the way home;
In the midst of the night it haunted his room,
"Oh, give to the hungry, potatoes;"
He could bear it no longer—arose and dress'd,
From his well-fill'd cellar taking in haste
A bag of his best potatoes.

Again he went to the widow's lone hut.
Her sleepless eyes she had not yet shut,
But there she sat in her old arm-chair,
With the same wan features, the same sad air;

* Of this poem—a fragment of a charity sermon, preached in Dorchester, Massachusetts, some twelve or fourteen years ago—John G. Whittier wrote: "It is more valuable than some epics. I am not sure but it is more to the Master's purpose than any learned theological tome which has been published since it was written."

So, entering in, he poured on the floor
A bushel or more from his goodly store
Of the very best potatoes.

The widow's heart leap'd up for joy,
Her face was haggard and wan no more.

"Now," said the deacon, "shall we pray?"
"Yes," said the widow, "now you may;"
And he kneel'd him down on the sanded floor,
Where he had poured his goodly store;
And such a prayer the deacon pray'd
As never before his lips essay'd;
No longer embarrass'd, but free and full,
He pour'd out the voice of a liberal soul,
And the widow responded aloud, "Amen!"
But said no more of potatoes.

And would you who hear this simple tale
Pray for the poor, and praying, "prevail,"
Then preface your prayers with alms and good deeds;
Search out the poor, with their cares and their needs;
Pray for peace, and grace, and heavenly food,
For wisdom and guidance, for these are all good,
But don't forget the potatoes.

OUTGROWN.

BY MRS. JULIA C. R. DORR.

NAY, you wrong her, my friend, she's not fickle; her love she has simply outgrown;
One can read the whole matter, translating her heart by the light of one's own.

Can you bear me to talk with you frankly? There is much that my heart would say,
And you know we were children together, have quarrelled and "made up" in play.

And so, for the sake of old friendship, I venture to tell you the truth,
As plainly, perhaps, and as bluntly, as I might in our earlier youth.

Five summers ago, when you wooed her, you stood on the selfsame plane,
Face to face, heart to heart, never dreaming your souls could be parted again.

She loved you at that time entirely, in the bloom of her life's early May,
And it is not her fault, I repeat it, that she does not love you to day.

Nature never stands still, nor souls either; they ever go up or go down;
And hers has been steadily soaring—but how has it been with your own?

She has struggled, and yearned, and aspired—grown purer and wiser each year,
The stars are not farther above you in yon luminous atmosphere.

For she whom you crowned with fresh roses down yonder,
five summers ago,
Has learned that the first of our duties to God and ourselves is to grow.

Her eyes they are sweeter and calmer, but their vision is clearer as well,
Her voice has a tenderer cadence, but is pure as a silver bell.

Her face has the look worn by those who with God and His angels have talked;
The white robes she wears are less white than the spirits with whom she has walked.

And you? have you aimed at the highest? have you, too, aspired and prayed?
Have you looked upon evil unsullied? have you conquered it undismayed?

Have you, too, grown purer and wiser, as the months and the years have rolled on?
Did you meet her this morning rejoicing in the triumph of victory won?

Nay, hear me! The truth cannot harm you. When today in her presence you stood,
Was the hand that you gave her as white and clean as that of her womanhood?

Go measure yourself by her standard. Look back on the years that have fled;
Then ask, if you need, why she tells you that the love of her girlhood is dead.

She cannot look down to her lover; her love, like her soul, aspires;
He must stand by her side, or above her, who would kindle its holy fires.

Now, farewell! For the sake of old friendship, I have ventured to tell you the truth,
As plainly, perhaps, and as bluntly, as I might in our earlier youth.

SCATTER SEEDS OF KINDNESS.

BY MRS. ELLEN H. GATES,
Author of "Your Mission."

LET us gather up the sunbeams,
Lying all around our path;
Let us keep the wheat and roses,
Casting out the thorns and chaff;
Let us find our sweetest comfort
In the blessings of to-day,
With a patient hand removing
All the briars from the way.

Strange, we never prize the music
Till the sweet-voiced bird has flown!
Strange, that we should slight the violets
Till the lovely flowers are gone!
Strange, that summer skies and sunshine
Never seem one-half so fair,
As when winter's snowy pinions
Shake the white down in the air!

If we knew the baby fingers
Pressed against the window pane
Would be cold and stiff to-morrow—
Never trouble us again—
Would the bright eyes of our darling
Catch the frown upon our brow?
Would the print of rosy fingers
Vex us then as they do now!

Ah! those little ice-cold fingers,
How they point our memories back
To the hasty words and actions
Strawn along our backward track!
How those little hands remind us,
As in snowy grace they lie,
Not to scatter thorns—but roses—
For our reaping by and by!

MANNA.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

TWAS in the night that manna fell,
That fed the hosts of Israel.

Enough for each day's fullest store,
And largest need—enough, no more.

For wilful waste, for prideful show,
God sent not angels' food below.

Still in our nights of deep distress
The manna falls our hearts to bless.

And, famished, as we cry for bread,
With heavenly food our lives are fed.

And each day's need finds each day's store
Enough. Dear Lord, what want we more?

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

TOO HOT!

DID you ever know of any little children too impatient to eat their breakfasts properly? I can bring several to mind; and here we have a picture of one who cannot wait for her tea to cool. She cannot be hungry, for, if she was, she would eat her warm crisp roll first, instead of leaving it lying on her plate. She is round and rosy, and her hair is brushed and tied nicely back from her forehead; and if she were to sit up properly in her chair, and take her elbows off the table, she would really look like a little lady.

But she finds her tea too hot; and, instead of waiting patiently, she pours it out into the saucer, and raising it up with both hands, she draws her mouth up into the funniest shape, while she blows the tea to cool it.

I am sure somebody must be laughing at her. I am, for one, and you are, for another, and you, and you.

But think a minute. Do you never do the same thing, or something quite as bad, yourselves? I know one little girl—a very nice little girl she is, too, in a great many ways—who sometimes uses her fingers instead of her fork; and another who occasionally forgets to say "Please" when she wants anything at table. And I once saw a little boy who gobbled his victuals down—gobbled is the only word I can think of that describes his way of eating, because it means taking great mouthfuls and swallowing them whole—just as though he was afraid he wouldn't get enough, unless he ate faster than other people did. I have known little children to have to be sent away from breakfast, because they came to their places with dirty faces and uncombed hair.

These are all really bad habits—bad, because they disgust everybody who sees them, and because no lady or gentleman ever has such habits. And if children do not learn to be mannerly and polite at table while they are young, they will find the lesson much harder when they get older.

CELESTIAL FIREWORKS.

IT has for some time been known that the throngs of shooting-stars, with which the sky is now and then bespangled, are running a race around the sun, just as our planets do; and it has been conjectured that these meteors without tails and the comets with tails, are, notwithstanding this difference, related to each other, being Scotch cousins, at least; if not cousins-german. There is, however, no reason to suppose that the meteors are developed out of the comets, as Darwin tells us our tailless race is developed out of the long-tailed monkeys.

More lately it has been found that the courses or orbits of the different groups of the shooting-stars correspond in some degree with those of the more distant planets. These family groups have been discovered to be on very familiar terms with the planets; that is, at certain seasons they approach them very closely, just as children go near to their parents to wish them good-morning and good-evening.

Now, astronomers, observing this state of affairs, have set forth a new theory, no less than this: That the comets and meteors are the little children (some of them rather wild ones) of the larger planets, Saturn, Jupiter, Uranus, Neptune. Such little planets as Earth, Venus, Mercury and Mars are not deemed large enough to have any progeny.

It is generally believed that the Sun is our father, or more strictly, our grandfather, the father of our mother Earth. He shot us forth into the universe as red-hot balls of molten matter, such as he is still seen to be disgorging; and after the heat of our youth was over, we cooled down into our present temperate and sober condition.

The larger and more distant planets, though grown up and larger than we are, have not yet arrived at their cool period. They are still somewhat fiery, but not so much so as formerly. Some time ago, no one can say how long, they were almost suns themselves, and shot forth the comets and shooting-stars. They were more fortunate than that other planet which was so full of matter, that, like an orator, it could not contain itself, and exploded into the asteroids. They simply got rid of some of their superfluous gas, and have doubtless ever since felt wonderfully relieved.

This is quite a new light in which to regard our planetary cousins, but it is the only one which explains their intimate connection with the shooting-stars. If it is true, we ought to change the names and call the planets shooting-stars, and the meteors shot-stars. It is a curious circumstance that the meteors were probably shot backward the comets forward.

Thus, while we have sky-rockets in the shape of comets, and Saturn resembles a wheel, the other large planets may be compared to Roman candles. They have discharged various beautiful bodies, all flaming hot; but now, at last, having lost their youthful ardor, are active no longer.

ROBBING.

WHEN Charlie was a little boy, he was one day in the field with the hired man, when he espied a bird's nest on the limb of a tree.

"Oh, what is that?" said Charlie.

The man told him, but Charlie could not be satisfied. He wanted to look into the curious thing. There, in the bottom of the nest, lay a beautiful little bird, not old enough to fly. Charlie had never seen anything like it before. How beautiful it was! How he wanted to carry it home! The man could not pacify him, so he took the nest from the tree, and let Charlie carry it home to his mother.

How happy the little boy was as he carried along the little bird! Was it not all his own? What a prize it was, with its bright feathers and pretty eyes!

When Charlie arrived at the house, he cried: "Mamma, see my baby birdie! Isn't it cunning?"

"Yes, it is pretty," said his mother; "but, how badly its mother must feel."

"Why will she feel bad?" asked Charlie.

"Because you have robbed her of her house, and the only little one she had. How should I feel if some bad man were to come and take away my home and my little boy?"

Charlie saw the point, and began to cry. Soon he ran to the door and called to Peter to carry back the poor bird's house and her baby before she cried for it.

PORCO, OR ITALIAN BLIND-MAN'S BUFF.

SEVERAL persons, male and female, join hands so as to form a circle, and one person, who is blindfolded, is placed in the centre, with a small stick in his or her hand. The players dance round the hoodwinked person, who tries to touch one of them with the wand, and if he succeeds, the ring of people stops. The player then grunts like a pig—hence the name of the game—crows, or imitates some animal, and the person touched must endeavor to imitate the noise as closely as possible, without discovering his or herself. If the party touched is discovered, then the hoodwinked player transfers the bandage and the stick to that player, and takes the vacant place in the ring of persons, who once more resume their dance, until another player is touched.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

A PEEP INTO MONTANA WINDOWS.

BY SUSAN SKYLIGHT.

I HAD been washing nearly all day, when my HOME MAGAZINE came. I sat down immediately to cut the leaves, and look for "Other People's Windows," and see if there wasn't a light in some of them for me, to make me forget my weary, aching limbs; the first thing that attracted my attention was "Pipsey," letting the last window close right down flat on my head, but it didn't hurt very bad, and I verily believe was better for me than a dose of medicine, for I laughed till the tears ran down my cheeks at my new name.

But, for fear you think that rugs are all I know how to make, I will give you my recipe for making biscuit. Put your flour into a pan and hollow it out in the centre, put in a teaspoonful of salt and a quart of buttermilk, then dissolve two level teaspoons of soda in boiling water, and pour in, mixing quickly. Roll out to an inch thickness, and spread lard or fresh butter evenly all over the surface. Roll it up, mix lightly, roll out again and out into biscuits and bake immediately. Our folks call them shingle biscuit. They are equally good made with sweet milk and yeast powders, or cream of tartar and soda.

Taking into account "Pipsey's" fondness for cake, I will tell you how I make it when I have a certain visitor, who is very particular, and likes to have more than one kind.

Take five eggs, one cup of sugar, one pint of sour cream, season with nutmeg, stir all together, and sift in enough flour to make a tolerable stiff batter, then dissolve a teaspoon level full of soda and stir in; now, have your cake-tins ready, and pour into one enough for a cake, then take another tin and put in a layer of batter, and then drop some kind of preserves or fruit into about three places, put on another layer of batter and some more fruit, then cover with batter; now take what is left, stir in a little lemon or vanilla, spread thinly on pie-tins, bake, and spread jelly between them, and you will have three different kinds of cake for tea, without much trouble; besides, the gratitude of the woman who will think you took so much pains for her.

So, you think you are even with me, do you, "Pipsey?" Well, now, I don't hardly believe you are; for, if you haven't got children enough of "graduated sizes" to make your cotton stockings over for, I do not see how you have enough to wear them out on as wash-rags, unless you are very extravagant in that line.

I wore a flannel dress all winter, with sleeves that were made to fit close, and were lined; and when I wanted to wear another dress, with looser or thinner sleeves, I was afraid of taking cold, so I took an old pair of cotton stockings and cut the feet off, and run a hem at the lower end and ripped the one at the upper end, and basted them to the inside of the armhole of my dress; they fit so snug and warm, and I never yet took cold taking off my flannel dress.

Some of the neighbors had a good deal of fun, laughing at my boy John about baking my bread; but, let them laugh, they can't take away the knowledge he has gained of housekeeping. But, in the meantime, we will have a little revenge of our own, by taking a peep through their windows.

Yes, there it is just the same. Mrs. Dewdrop going her endless—and I had well nigh said thankless—round of work. Oh, how often my heart has ached for her, as she went from morning till night, with weary, aching limbs, while in the bar-room sat husband and son, who could so well have lightened her burdens, had they been so disposed. I have known her many a time to ask for wood and water, and then have to get it herself. I tell you, there are more Ezekial Pratts and Brutus Bodkins in this world than you might think for; but, sometimes, when I feel in a different mood, it seems to me that it is all her own fault; it appears to me that it is a duty we owe to ourselves and to our family to teach them early the virtue of self-reliance, and also to teach them to give up their own will sometimes to that of others, not depend on "mother" to think and do everything.

Mrs. Dewdrop has one married daughter, who, even now, after several years of married-life, has to go to "mother" to out and fit her own and her children's clothes. Now, it seems to me it would have been more conducive to the self-respect, comfort and happiness of all concerned if they had been taught to rely on their own judgment in early life. But the end is not here, for "mother" cannot live always—and there is no one else on earth who can take her place. See to it, mothers, that all your daughters are taught all the necessary branches of home education, and more than all else, to exercise their judgment early. Think with what pride they will say in after-life, "My mother taught me to do all these things, and I don't have to depend on strangers to show me how."

I make all my own soap (except that to wash the children), and I will give you my recipe. Take one box of concentrated lye ("Quaker City" is the best), knock off one end and put it into a stove-kettle, with one gallon of water; then weigh four pounds of grease, and put it in another kettle with a gallon of water; let the grease and lye boil till the lye is dissolved, then dip the lye, a pint at a time, into the grease kettle till you get it nearly all in, then mix the contents of both kettles, and add more water, and boil till it looks like honey, then take it off and fill both kettles with cold water, and stir thoroughly; the next morning turn it out on a table and cut in cakes to dry. After it gets dry it will not injure calico any more than soap you get at the stores. Don't put salt in it, or it will injure your hands.

WHAT WE SHOULD EAT.

THOSE who expect to think, should not eat much food which simply produces warmth and fat, such as ham, fat pork, white bread, butter, rice, tapioca and starch. These contain very little phosphatic food, being carbonaceous.

The proper food for laboring men—we mean those who have to exercise muscular strength chiefly—should be that which contains the greatest amount of nitrogen. Among these barley and cheese stand high. The red flesh of the ox or sheep, and bolted bread, are the leading articles. Men who train prize-fighters seem to understand much better than others how to build up physical strength and endurance. When their battle or their race is ended, they lay aside their unbolted bread and fruit, their lean beef and mutton, and fall into their old habits of liquor-drinking and eating of starch-bearing articles, such as rice, fine bread, pudding, with fat meat and butter, and they soon become as fat and lazy as these carbonaceous articles can make them.

RECIPES.

NEAPOLITAN CAKE.—First make your black cake after the following recipe: One cup of butter, two cups of brown sugar, one cup of molasses, one cup of strong coffee, four and a half cups of sifted flour, four eggs, two teaspoonfuls of soda, two of cinnamon, two of cloves and one of mace, one pound of raisins, one pound of currants, and one-fourth pound of citron. More fruit makes the cake handsomer, but that quantity will do. Bake the cake in round pans with straight sides. The loaves should be one and a half inches in thickness after baking. Next make a white cake as follows: One cup of butter, four cups of powdered white sugar, two cups of sweet milk, two cups of corn-starch mixed with flour, four and a half cups of sifted flour, the whites of eight eggs, six teaspoonfuls of baking-powder. Flavor slightly with bitter almonds. Bake in the same pans that were previously used for the black cake, and have the loaves as nearly as possible of the same thickness. After the cake is all cold, each black loaf should be spread with a thick coating of lemon and sugar, made as follows: The white of one egg thoroughly beaten; the grated rind of two and the juice of three lemons, and powdered sugar enough to make a thick frosting; then lay a white loaf upon each black one, and frost as you would any other loaf, being particular to use no other flavoring than lemon in the frosting. The result is elegant loaves, half of black and half of white cake, which are equally tempting both to the eye and the palate.

GUMBO.—A Southern correspondent of Hearth and Home gives this recipe for gumbo: "To make gumbo, take a chicken and fry it brown, using plenty of flour; have a quart of okra cut fine, put a tablespoonful of lard in your soup-pot—which must be lined with porcelain, or the soup will be dark—pour in the cut okra with about a tablespoonful of flour, stir it constantly for five or ten minutes, put in your fried chicken, pour on two gallons of boiling water, salt and pepper to your taste, and after boiling hard for about fifteen minutes, put the pot on the back of the stove and let it simmer at least an hour. Have ready a dish of plain rice (that is seasoned only with salt), put some into each plate before serving the gumbo, and you will have not only a palatable but a very nutritious dish."

She adds two more recipes, which we copy: "Rice is considered here a necessity. In 'my old Kentucky home' it was cooked with milk and sugar, flavored with nutmeg and eaten as dessert. Here we take two quarts of water, a large spoonful of lard, a teaspoonful each of salt and black pepper, and a large coffee-cup of rice picked from all impurities and well washed. Put all in a saucepan together and cover it. Occasionally shake it, but do not stir it. When the water has nearly boiled out take the cover off, put saucepan on the back of the stove until the water completely boils out. Every grain stands to itself, and it is very nice and wholesome with gravy.

"Another Southern dish is clabber and curd. We have clabber for supper, with cream and sugar. I have regular curd drippers—large tin-cups, with a number of holes in the lower part. In the evening I fill as many drippers with clabber as I want cakes of curd for breakfast, and the next morning I have firm curd, or cottage cheese. Eat it with cream and sugar. Another way is to pour boiling water on the clabber. The curd and whey soon separate, but then the whey must be thrown away. When you drip the curd, the whey answers the purpose of cream of tartar in biscuit or corn-bread."

A CEMENT of great adhesiveness is made by mixing six parts of powdered graphite with three parts of slaked lime, eight parts of sulphate of baryta, and seven parts of linseed-oil varnish, stirring the liquid to uniform consistency.

FRUIT.—Fruit should be used as part of a meal—with children and healthy adults, just before breakfast and dinner are the best times. Invalids will find it safer, especially with juicy fruit, to take it about the middle of the meal, other dishes preceding and succeeding it. This refers chiefly to uncooked fruit. When cooked and served hot, fruit may be safely taken at any period of the meal.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

BEAUTIFYING THE COMPLEXION.

ALLETTA would have been a very pretty girl, but for the dark freckles that sprinkled her whole face over. Her arms were as white as snow, but it made her angry to even look in the glass at herself. The whole study of her life became how to rid herself of her freckles. She tried one specific after another, but the only effect seemed to be to turn her once soft skin into parchment. She next tried to cover the freckles up with enamels and powders, and in this she was more successful. But the trouble and expense was so great that she could not "make herself up" more than once a day. So for the remainder of the time she must be invisible. This was particularly troublesome, as Alletta's parents were by no means rich. Her hard-working mother did her own housework, and a great deal of sewing for her pampered daughter besides.

With all Letty's skill, she could not make her painting look exactly like fair flesh and blood. There was an unnatural glisten to the white surface, that told plainly that it was artificial. To disguise this, she always wore the thickest veils that fashion would permit, and in the most suffocating August days never ventured to raise it for a breath of fresh air. She could never enjoy the luxury of a cool laving of her face in water after she was "made up." She even slept with that crust on her skin, under the fancy that it would improve her complexion.

"You will be pale enough to suit you after awhile," said a friend, "if you continue to use white lead as a cosmetic! White in death, or from paralysis."

But Letty would not heed any warnings. She was fully enslaved by her folly. Her skin came at last to look, when just washed, like a cracked east of plaster of Paris. She was about to be married to a young man—whom she had taken great care never to meet except in the evening—when she was stricken down with paralysis, and is now a helpless burden on the hands of her mother.

There have been many similar examples of the effects of these cosmetics, and girls may far better endure the ills of a poor complexion than run such risks in their attempts to beautify it.

HELEN.

ONE CURE FOR FRETFULNESS.

GOOD John Wesley puts the matter of fretting in a strong light. "I dare no more fret," he says, "than I dare curse and swear. To have people at my ears always murmuring and fretting at everything, is like tearing the flesh from my bones. By the grace of God I am discontented at nothing; I see God sitting on His throne and ruling all things."

This was a most happy frame of mind; but how uncommon! How many acquaintances have we who, when things go "contrariwise," do not fret about it? To come a little nearer, how many of us take our grievances with a quiet, uncomplaining spirit?

There is one thing that will greatly help us about overcoming this habit of fretfulness. It is not a help that we are likely to give the credit to that it deserves. Yet it will do its work faithfully if we will only employ it. It is a cheap and easily accessible agent. It is simply more out-door air. No doubt this was a greater help to Wesley than he ever surmised. Had he been shut up in a close study for six days in the week, he would quite likely have grown discontented with many things about him. His five thousand miles of travel yearly enabled him to keep his mind and spirits fresh and cheerful, and so fitted him for labors that to another might seem Herculean.

Luther well understood the benefit of out-door air, when wearied out and depressed, and would rush out anywhere rather than stay in his study and let the mind prey on itself.

Women need this advice more than men, as their work is mostly in-doors. But there are few in moderate health who cannot find some time every day to go out for an hour in the open air, if they will but make the effort. Do your errand yourself, rather than send by another. It will do you good in two ways. Your errand will be better done if you attend to it yourself, and you will have the blessed influence of the out-door air and sunshine to send the purified blood coursing brightly through your veins, giving health and cheer to body and mind. If an invalid, and unable to go out, let the out-door air come in to you, and its effect will be almost as cheering. J. E. M'C.

A NEEDED REFORM.

HOW rarely do we find at home that courteous consideration of speech and manner which prevails in society. A man will speak to his wife in a tone of voice that would be felt as an insult if used elsewhere and to any other woman; and a wife will be as disregarding of right feeling and courtesy toward her husband. Brothers and sisters chafe, and criticize, and find fault with each other in a way that would not be tolerated for a moment if they ventured on such a freedom with the people they meet outside of their homes.

It needs no argument to show that this is wrong. Are the feelings of those we love to be less regarded than the feelings of strangers? Shall we weigh the meaning of our words, and be careful in utterance when among outside people, and fling them about thoughtlessly or ill-naturedly at home, to hurt, and wound, and annoy? Ah! the home peace and home comfort are perpetually broken for lack of consideration in this thing!

Reader, how is it with you? Are you as guarded in speech at home as when in society, lest you should wound by a too freely spoken sentiment? Are you as careful of the feelings and considerate of the comfort of your husband, your wife, your brother or sister, or your dependant, as of the stranger or acquaintance you meet abroad?

Think of these things. It is for want of reflection that so little good feeling and kindly intercourse prevails at home. Begin to think right about this matter. It is the first step toward living right.

AUNT.

THE warm sunshine and the gentle zephyr may melt the glacier which has bid defiance to the howling tempest; so the voice of kindness will touch the heart which no severity could subdue.

FLORAL DEPARTMENT.

In the latitude of Philadelphia, and farther south, it is still possible to take much pleasure in a garden. If the work of September and October has been carefully performed, the garden in November will make a fine appearance, in spite of slight frosts. It will take heavy and continuous frosts to injure the Petunias and Marigolds; while the Chrysanthemums should be now in full bloom. A fine variety of Chrysanthemums are always desirable, as they will not lose their beauty until the snow comes to bury them. We saw a bouquet of these flowers gathered but a few days before Christmas in a latitude a little south of Philadelphia.

There is one feature of a garden at this season of the year which many people overlook entirely; and that is the beautiful display often made by the autumn leaves. It is sometimes far richer than any display of flowers. If the garden is kept in good order, all dead plants and leaves removed, the sight is sometimes dazzling. The different shade-trees all have their peculiar and beautiful autumn hues; and the same is true of shrubbery, while the evergreens, which are usually placed in every garden, (but which should be used sparingly, nevertheless, or else the effect is very heavy), produce a beautiful contrast in color.

If the fall work has been somewhat neglected in the preceding month, much of it can be finished in this; only there is liability of winter setting in and putting a stop to operations.

Dahlias must be taken up before the weather becomes very cold, and the tubers stored in a dry cellar. The tubers should not be separated from the main stalk, and each stalk should be carefully labelled with its name or color.

The tender varieties of roses had best be removed to the cellar, or else bent down and covered with sod. Those half-hardy should be protected with straw. Many monthlies will endure the winters without protection; and will bloom all the better the succeeding year by having their growth cut back by the cold.

It is well to cover beds in which seeds have been sown, with a light litter. If the litter is too heavy, or retains much moisture, it will rot out the plants beneath it. A thin layer of leaves, or a light scattering of coarse manure will serve the purpose excellently.

Bulbs can still be planted this month for spring blooming, and summer bulbs can be removed from the ground before hard frosts, dried and packed away in a dry place where they will not freeze.

Walks and roads can be laid out and made this month with advantage, and trees and shrubbery can be transplanted with quite as good if not a better chance of growing, than in the spring.

Most people like flowers in the house in winter, yet many think they are a great deal of trouble and expense. Yet there is nothing easier to get or to take care of. They need not even be put in pots, if pots are not handy. A wooden box will do just as well. The most successful winter garden I ever had was in a wooden box about two feet long, one foot wide and six inches deep. When I made my last clearing in my garden before I gave it entirely up to the destruction of winter, I transplanted into this box Verbenas, Maurandias, Petunias, Passion-Flower vines, and I know not what else. I planted them just as thick as I could put their roots together without actually touching, so that every part of the box was filled. To make up for this lack of space I gave them liquid manure moderately, kept them well-watered, light, and as cool as a coal stove would allow me. They grew rapidly, and after they had taken a rest from their summer's blooming, they blossomed beautifully and continuously until spring, when, after frosts were gone, I transferred them back to the garden, and they continued their bloom during the summer.

In transplanting a Petunia for winter blooming, it is best, after having selected a handsome specimen, to cut off the branches, and cut the main stalk down pretty well. It will immediately start to make a new growth, which will blossom in due season. It is well, however, to take young seedling plants of Petunias, Maurandias, etc., which have grown from self-sown seeds, as they are not so likely to be injured by transplanting, and they will soon grow to the desired size.

In this same box could be put a variety of bulbs for winter flowering. I know this crowding is entirely contrary to all established rules of floriculture, but I have been so successful in my experiments that I have no hesitation in recommending it to others who have little space, and perhaps still less time to devote to winter gardening.

November is the month in which to secure bright-colored autumn leaves with which to make decorations for the house in winter. Any one with taste and ingenuity can almost furnish a room with these beautiful things. Ferns can be pressed to serve in bouquets, and grasses and mosses can be worked into the choicest ornaments if one only knows how.

The leaves are gathered, and pressed at once with a hot iron, by which means they retain their beauty of color. Then they are attached to fine wire, and formed into various devices. They can be made into frames for pictures, into shields, crosses, wreaths and decorations of all sorts. This need not be done at once. The leaves, after being gathered and pressed, can be laid away until time is found to arrange them.

The American Smilax, a vine that grows wild and in great abundance along the Atlantic coast, and which is remarkable for its brilliancy of autumn coloring, will, of itself, almost decorate a room. Its long sprays will drape windows, doorways, pictures and mantels, and they will retain their form and color for a long time. This branch of winter gardening is really too much neglected. These adornments always give an air of taste and refinement to a dwelling, and they are so simple, and such a pleasure to arrange.

PLUCK THE FLOWERS.—All lovers of flowers must remember that one blossom allowed to mature "or go to seed" injures the plant more than a dozen buds. Cut your flowers, then, all of them, before they begin to fade. Adorn your room with them; put them on your tables; send bouquets to your friends who have no flowers, or exchange favors with those who have. All roses, after they have ceased to bloom, should be cut back, that the strength of the root may go to forming new roots for next year. On bushes not a seed should be allowed to mature.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

I WOULD not give a straw for a man's religion, whose every dog and cat are not the better for it.

A LITTLE girl was once asked the following question: "What is faith?" She replied, "Doing God's will and asking no questions."

NEVER put much confidence in such as put no confidence in others. A man prone to suspect evil is mostly looking in his neighbor for what he sees in himself. As to the pure all things are pure, even so to the impure all things are impure.

A MAN shows of what material he is made, and what nobility of spirit, and God-like control over himself he does not possess, when, for caprice, or in a fit of passion, he abuses the helpless or innocent, because he has the power.

IDLENESS and luxury produce premature decay much faster than many trades that are regarded as the most fatal to longevity. Labor in general, instead of shortening the term of life, increases it. It is the lack of occupation that destroys so many of the wealthy.

EACH animal has its little work to do; even the tiny insect does its little part, and does it faithfully. The ant, toiling so steadily and perseveringly to build its house, to be thoughtlessly trampled on by careless feet, teaches us a lesson we should all do well to profit by.

LOVE and passion are too often confounded. They are quite distinct. Love elevates and refines, passion degrades and depresses; love enlarges the heart, passion narrows the mind. And even in the case of what is called passionate love, there is too much which is of the earth, earthy. Pure affection is a sentiment free from taint of any kind, and is as rare as pure charity.

It is a good thing to believe; it is a good thing to admire. By continually looking upward, our minds will themselves grow upward; and as a man, by indulging in habits of scorn and contempt for others, is sure to descend to the level of what he despises; so the opposite habits of admiration and enthusiastic reverence of excellence impart to ourselves a portion of the qualities we admire.

IN training horses, as in boys,
Find them where you will,
If you beat and pound and bang them,
You will find it all "up hill."

If you lead them kindly onward
When they seek to go astray,
You will find that they will love you,
And work better every day.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

"FIXED" STARS.—The so-called fixed stars are known no longer to be motionless, but to travel over distances so great and at such rapidity that the mind fails in the contemplation of them; and yet the observations of centuries have failed to detect real changes in position other than are extremely small—so minute, indeed, that only about thirty stars have, by astronomical calculation, been shown to have moved more than one second of arc annually, while in others a motion of but a few seconds in a century has been detected.

THE STARS OF HEAVEN.—The number of stars visible to the naked eye in the entire circuit of the heavens has been usually estimated at about 6,000. An ordinary opera-glass will exhibit something like ten times that number. A comparatively small telescope easily shows 200,000; while there are telescopes in existence with which, there is reason to believe, not fewer than 25,000,000 stars are visible. And yet, when all these are seen and numbered, the eye will have visited but a mere speck in the illimitable bounds of space.

SUBSTITUTE FOR CHURCH BELLS.—Dr. Ferdinand Rahles suggests the use of steel bars as a substitute for cast bells. They are, he says, introduced in the United States and Germany with great success. The cost, compared with that of manufactured cast bells, is very trivial. They can be made of any dimensions, weight and power of sound. Every note or harmony can be produced more easily, and the tuning is obtained more precisely than in cast bells. In addition to their being a cheap and effective substitute for church bells, they are also equally applicable to places where large bells are required, such as dockyards, on board of vessels, steamboat piers, railways and manufactories.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

"If you don't want the soot, don't go up the chimney," was the reply of an editor to "respectable" parties, who requested him not to mention the fact that they had been arraigned in the police courts.

SIR WALTER SCOTT's faithful servant, Tom, said to him one day, "They are fine novels of yours; they are invaluable to me. When I come home very tired, and take up one of them, I'm asleep directly."

So WITTY a compliment is rarely met with as that of Sydney Smith's to his friends Mrs. Tighe and Mrs. Cuffe: "Ah, there you are!—the cuff that every one would be glad to wear, and the tie that no one would loose."

JOHN RANDOLPH met a personal enemy in the street one day who refused to give him half the sidewalk, saying he never turned out for a rascal. "I do," returned Randolph, stepping aside and politely raising his hat. "Pass on."

Two men disputing about the pronunciation of the word "either"—one saying it was ee-ther, the other i-ther—agreed to refer the matter to the first person they met, who happened to be an Irishman, and who confounded both by declaring, "it's nayther, for it's ayther."

Why are deaf people like India shawls? Because you can't make them here (hear)!

Why is a joint company not like a watch? Because it does not go on after it is wound up!

What is the cheapest way of procuring a fiddle? Buy some castor-oil and you will get a vial-in (violin)!

Why, when you are going out of town, does a railroad conductor cut a hole in your ticket? To let you pass through!

What animal took most luggage into the ark, and which the least? The elephant who had his trunk; while the fox and the cock had only a brush and a comb between them!

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

HAY FEVER.

A PHYSICIAN, writing to the Scientific American about this troublesome complaint, with which certain persons are afflicted, says that relief may be obtained from the inhalation of the vapor of poppy leaves. He says:

"The tea should be made to boil in an ordinary tea-kettle, and the steam, issuing from the nozzle, breathed deep into the lungs—and this should be continued until relief is obtained. If the poppy-heads cannot be had, half a teaspoonful of laudanum may be added to a pint of water, and the steam from this mixture inhaled. At the same time attention should be given to the general health; only digestive and nutritive food should be eaten, because an attack is much aggravated by overloaded stomach or bowels.

"In conclusion, let us add, for the benefit of those who are subject to yearly attacks, that much good is done by preparing the lungs for the coming hay season. If a teaspoonful of alum be dissolved in a pint of water, and the spray from this mixture be breathed into the lungs for several minutes every day for a month before the expected onset, it will brace up the lungs and make them less susceptible to the irritation of hay-dust."

SLEEP.

THE Ladies' Repository has a few sensible suggestions on the value of sleep, which are well worth considering:

"Tired nature's sweet restorer." Take enough of it—in the fore-part of the night, if possible. "Midnight oil" is a great humbug and health-destroyer. Sleep! It is nature's time to carry on the processes of assimilation—to manufacture food into blood, and blood into healthful tissue. The time for repose is the time for the repair of waste. A man is taller in the morning than he is at nightfall; his brain is clearer, his step more elastic, his nerve steadier, his muscles more energetic. Give children plenty of sleep. Put them to bed early. Shut out the glare of gas, and resist the appeals to "sit up," to go to night parties, night concerts, night Sunday-school exhibitions, night meetings. Send them to bed betimes, and give them sound sleep, sound nerves, sound constitutions. Night-air is bad. Malarias are abroad, and there is no kindly sun to dispel the noxious vapors, and war upon the deadly venoms. Sleep in the upper stories, in the largest rooms of the house, and the best ventilated. Let a child have its sleep out in the morning. Never wake it till it wakes of its own accord. Some young men and young women have to get up at six to go to employments. It will not do for such to sit up till eleven or twelve the night before. Sleep till the eyes open of their own accord. It is hard for a boy or girl to be called to dress and go about business when the tired, sleepy and unrested eyes feel as if they were "full of sticks."

Different persons require different amounts of sleep. Some want six hours, some seven, some nine. General Grant wants nine, and said, at the siege of Vicksburg, he could get but seven, and it almost killed him. John Wesley found that he could do with six, and fixed his hours of rest between ten and four; and, by example, if not by precept, put the whole Methodist preaching fraternity into the same inexorable strait-jacket. John Wesley became thus the author of a fearful waste of life and energy. He killed off whole generations of preachers, who undertook to sleep six hours because this exceptional bundle of animated iron-wires could do with six. The strong require much sleep, the weak and feeble more.

Sleep should be graded by periods of life, and, perhaps, by temperaments; but no one man's experience is a guide for any other. The average has been given as follows: The infant sleeps twenty hours, and wakes four; the old man wakes twenty, and sleeps four; in middle life seven to nine hours sleep are requisite to keep up the balance between waste and supply. Nervous persons find it difficult to sleep. Such should nurse the hours of rest with great care; avoid tea, coffee, and stimulants before retiring; avoid hard, exciting studies of an evening; avoid excitements of all kinds, and court quiet, music, genial conversation, and soothing employments or meditations. Above all, go to sleep when the first fit of drowsiness comes on. Roused out of that, one may lie awake for hours, and roll and toss, and not be able to entice sleep to the uneasy pillow.

DRESS AND FASHION.

AMONG the most desirable materials for fall overdresses are camel's-hair cloth, and the American material that so closely resembles it, without being so expensive. Scotch tweeds, French cashmeres, French flannels and fine cloths in all the light qualities will be worn in dark green, dark blue, maroon, plum and various shades of brown. If the goods selected for an overdress be smooth in its finish, the skirt may be like it, but if it be woven in a wide twill, the skirt should always be of silk, alpaca or something with a fine surface.

Many fine grades of alpaca are offered, having again become favorites among the ladies. They are worn in the reigning tints, but especially in black. The last-mentioned color is made up with flat side-plaiting, and looks delicate and lady-like, beside being very durable. It does not catch dust, and can be cleaned without fear of spoiling.

No fabric can possibly replace black silk, its texture is as beautiful as ever, and little by little it decreases in costliness; the higher grades can now be purchased at the same price which was asked, a short time ago, for inferior goods. Pretty silks in stripes of color and trimmed with plain silk matching one of the stripes.

All the plainer grades of substantial materials such as mousses, serges, merinoes, empress cloths and poplins are improving in quality in consequence of persistent competition among manufacturers. These goods are made up in graded tints and in strongly-contrasting shades upon the same garment. The most prevalent of these contrasts are dark and very light blues, dark and very light greens, and dark purples with pale violets, the light shades being in less request. Platings, bows, sashes, etc., are lined with the light colors, and if the dress is woollen, the light tint may also be woollen, though thin silks are most desirable.

An effort is being made to banish ruffles and flounces, but very few will adopt the close drapery, as it is very trying to the figure.

White corduroy will be worn a great deal for children's garments. It can be washed, and if shaken out and dried without being ironed, will sustain no injury. On this account it is most desirable for the little ones.

Ladies will wear half-loose sacques of velvet, beaver cloth and French broadcloth. They are made with cuffs and collar of silk or velvet.

Among jackets for misses there is one with a pretty double-breasted front and a half-fitting back. One of blue cloth would be appropriately finished with white braid and white pearl buttons.

Lace veils are still worn, although one of the latest novelties consists of a small piece of white net dotted with black chenille.

Grenadine and silk ties are still in vogue, tied in loose sailor knots; some have fringed and tasselled ends.

The crowns of hats and bonnets are wider as well as somewhat lower than they have been for the past year; coronet rims are larger, wider and higher than ever; and they not unfrequently begin higher upon the crown, in order to leave space for a twist of velvet or silk, a wreath of flowers or a bordering composed of feathers.

Black velvet bonnets will be worn almost universally, and the plumes and flowers will correspond to the costume, provided it be a colored one.

Jet and steel make a very elegant combination, and will be much worn with feathers and ribbons.

Lace scarfs will prevail to some extent during the fall months; they are worn long and confined at the waist. Others of a similar style are fastened with a knot, and are held in place by what would be called the fichu tie.

For the newest styles in ladies' and children's garments we refer to E/Butterick & Co.'s report and illustrations in this number.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

THE HOME MAGAZINE FOR 1874.

WE give in this number our Prospectus for the coming year, and ask our subscribers to read it carefully. It will be seen that we have in preparation a large number of unusual attractions. All the readers' old favorites have been re-engaged, and new writers added to our corps.

As a Household Magazine, we mean the Home to stand without a rival. From all quarters this testimony has come already. Never, since the date of its publication, popular as it has always been, has it found so warm and hearty a reception from the people as since we took our "new departure" in January last. It comes, they say, nearer to the common household want in intelligent American homes than any other periodical ever attempted, and is a periodical which no intelligent or well-ordered family can afford to do without.

This is just what we are aiming to make the Home Magazine, and it is gratifying to know that we are successful.

A SUNRISE ON MOUNT LINCOLN.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Philadelphia Inquirer, who accompanies the U. S. Geological Survey in Colorado, gives this glowing description of a Sunrise on Mount Lincoln, which towers up to the height of over fourteen thousand feet:

"The bunks are ranged round the cabin wall in double tiers, and into them rolled twenty-two men, after smoking several hours. The door was closed tight, and the stove set at full blast. Suffocation, we thought, must surely follow; but ere long the wind howled round the cabin, rushing in at every crevice, and we drew our blankets closely round and slept, but not before having given strict injunctions to be aroused at daybreak.

"At the first dawn, wrapping our overcoats closely round us, we commenced climbing up the knoll that alone remained above us, the wind blowing a perfect gale and whistling among the rocks; behind one of these we took refuge on gaining the summit. While awaiting the sun to rise, the eye rested on a scene of cold, massive, rugged grandeur, the peaks looking unusually bare and barren under the gray light of dawn; everything indistinct assumed tremendous proportions, and the mountains seemed to expand in the uncertainty of their outline.

"The golden-fringed clouds soon announced Old Sol's appearance, and a sunrise view of this scenery once seen cannot be forgotten, and if forgotten existence would be a very blank. No pen can depict or pencil portray the parti-colored streaks as the morning light drives away the gloom of night.

"The snow, the very atmosphere, as the sun peers above the horizon, is tinged with all the variations that the colors of the rainbow are susceptible of, and when he has fully risen, the world flooded with his morning light, then is it that the scene attains its most wonderful magnificence. The material here interfered with the cultivation of the æsthetic, and promptings warned us that breakfast must be ready, and reluctantly we repaired to the house.

"The mines were visited with much interest, for excavating the precious metal fourteen thousand feet above the sea bespeaks unusual enterprise and energy on the part of our old fellow-citizen, Captain Breese, of the Washington Grays, who is largely interested in their working, and thinks he has a valuable claim.

"The captain is very proud of his house, which he claims to be located the highest of any in the world, used as a permanent residence. The ore is packed down the mountain on jacks, held in canvas bags hung over them, while they bring back logs of wood on the return. The wagon-road will soon be completed to the very top, when this will no longer be necessary."

SUNDAY OVERWORK.

THE Ladies' Repository, a Methodist family magazine, has the following:

"Sunday was once a day of physical and mental rest. The modern Sunday, especially in the city, is one of fearful labor and excitement. There is class or Sunday-school or love-feast at eight or nine o'clock, preaching at ten or eleven, class at noon, Sunday-school in the afternoon, mission-school or Young Men's Christian Association at three or four, prayer or conference meeting at six, preaching at eight, and often prayer-meeting following the preaching. No wonder men and women are nervous, and the children of such sickly and puny. Gas and excitement are destroying whole generations."

If this be not a greatly overdrawn picture, some of our good people are letting their zeal override their prudence. While Sunday has been wisely and lovingly set apart as a day of rest from common toil, and for spiritual instruction and deeds of charity, its benefits are in danger of being lost as well by excessive devotion to religious exercises as by idle inaction. Restoration of mind and body after the week's labor and care in worldly matters, and opportunity for religious thought and worship and doing good to the neighbor, are the uses for which our Christian Sabbath was appointed; and any observance of the day that hinders or destroys these uses is unwise and hurtful.

MAKE THE BEST OF THINGS.

IF all would do this, the world would be happier for most of us than it is. Some people seem to do everything in their power to make the worst, instead of the best, of what they have. The difference of conditions in those we meet lies, in most cases, just here.

It is one thing to earn money, and another thing to make the best use of it after it is earned. Good wages or bad wages make small difference in the comfort of some homes. The more a man, who has no idea of thrift or economy, earns, the more he spends uselessly. High wages are a hurt rather than a blessing to such a man, for they only increase his opportunities for self-indulgences that confirm bad habits.

Making the best of things is the art of all arts, without which no trade, profession or calling will ever insure success. It is the secret of order and comfort in our homes. The wife who makes the best of everything her husband's wages procure, becomes the help-meet she promise to be; and the husband who makes the best of his opportunities, working faithfully, intelligently and skilfully, and so getting for his family the largest return for his labor, only fulfils the pledges he gave when taking upon himself the responsibilities of a married man.

More than half the grumblings and complainings of certain people would never be heard if they had always made the best of what came to them. The world is not half so bad to us as we are to ourselves. In our want of order, care, industry, economy and skill, lie most of our deprivations and our misfortunes.

A GLORIOUS SUNSET.

EVERY lover of nature has his picture gallery, into which he can go at will for delight and refreshment. Its walls are hung with land scapes of surpassing loveliness, or tender grace, or awful sublimity. From the tiniest flower, perfect as it came from the Creator's hand, to the forest, gorgeous in its autumnal magnificence; from the quiet valley with its gardens and harvest fields, to the broad savannas and sweeps of mountain ranges, looked upon from some loftier peak—all these, in drawing more perfect, and coloring more exquisite, than a Claude or a Turner ever left upon canvas, are crowded on its walls.

Here are sunsets of such grandeur and glory, that the soul its silent and entranced before them, as if looking at some heavenly landscape.

How often do I sit before one of those rare celestial pictures that was hung up in my memory many years ago. There were no mountain ranges on which to set the wonderful creation. It rested on the verge of the illimitable sea, that lay almost as smooth as a floor of glass. Words cannot describe the marvellous beauty and variety of form and color; the slow, weird changes, the new aspects, each more surprising than the last, that held me entranced, until, fading, fading, every cloud was gone at last, and not even the faintest outline of the gorgeous scenery remained on the clear canvases of the evening sky, through which the stars looked down and mirrored themselves in the ocean.

But the picture was transferred to my private gallery in all its richness of coloring, and is mine forever to gaze at when I will. A.

BIOGRAPHY, NATURAL HISTORY AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

LETITIA ELIZABETH LANDON.

L E. L., who, over forty years ago, charmed the literary world with her graceful poetry, was the daughter of Mr. John Landon, who was descended from an old Herefordshire family. In youth he served in the navy, and spent some time on the coast of Africa; he retired from the naval profession, and became partner in a firm of army agents, but was either unfortunate or unstable in his business pursuits, for he experienced great reverse, chiefly, it is said, from his love of speculation. He married a lady named Bishop, of Welsh extraction, and three children comprised their family—the eldest, Letitia Elizabeth, born in 1802, a son two years her junior and another daughter, who died in early childhood.

The subject of this sketch was a bright, intelligent, affectionate and most wayward child. She learned with wonderful quickness everything that she liked, but some things she never could be taught; simply, perhaps, because she would not learn. Her handwriting was a puzzle to all not initiated, by long practice, into reading it. And with all her love of music and painting, she never could or did acquire even the rudiments of those arts. The French language, history, literature, she was early skilled in; and she exercised her mind in composition at such an early age that her little brother and constant playmate stipulated with her, that she should not require him to listen to more than one story, and one poem of her making, in their play hour. She was placed at school at No. 22 Hans Place, with the Misses Rawdon—ladies who succeeded Miss Mitford's teachers in that same establishment—and there it may be said Miss Landon's life was chiefly passed, for after the school came to the charge of the Misses Lance, she returned to them for some years as an inmate.

Mr. Jerdan, the editor of the Literary Gazette, was a neighbor of Mr. Landon's, and some of L. E. L.'s poems were shown to him, for his opinion of their merit. He was both pleased and surprised, for the authoress looked a mere child. He determined to publish her fugitive verses in his periodical. The sweetness of the verse, the elegance of the language and the pensive charm of melancholy and mystery combined, made them popular.

It is due to Miss Landon to say that the enthusiasm of her genius was quite equalled by her untiring industry, and that both were stimulated by the wish to help her father in his altered fortunes, and to aid the education of her beloved brother. A more generous, unselfish being than this young votary of song never lived. Fame was no doubt both sweet and dear, but to lighten the cares and promote the welfare of those she loved was far dearer.

In both conversation and manner she was a merry, gay little creature, full of vivacity, and yet her writings were usually very pensive, indeed gloomy. Their great defect was that, showing all the falseness of the world, and the disappointments of life, she did not unfold the remedy—faith and trust in God.

Amid Miss Landon's great triumphs she had also great trials. Her genius aroused envy, and made her some cruel and crafty enemies, who attacked her with base slander. This caused the breaking off of an engagement which her friends had expected would end in marriage, and, under the influence of wounded feeling, the far worse evil arose of her rather suddenly accepting the offer of Major Maclean, the Governor of Cape Coast Castle.

The descriptions she had heard in childhood from her father's lips of Africa had given her a strong desire to visit those regions, and invested them, doubtless, with the romantic hues of her vivid imagination. Many friends lamented her decision, but it was irrevocable. She sailed away from her native land with her husband on the 5th of July, 1838, for Cape Coast.

It is a strange mystery, that a fate as sad as her most gloomy thoughts had ever woven for the heroines of her imagination awaited her in her new home. Just as her genius seemed to be developing higher aspirations and a nobler purpose, her life came to a sudden and melancholy close, only two months after she landed (15th of October). She was found in her bedroom speechless and dying, with a bottle of prussic acid in her hand.

Many theories have been given, but no satisfactory explanation of this mournful incident. She was accustomed to use a preparation of the poison named for spasms, and the majority of her friends believed her death was caused accidentally from an overdose. Others insist that she was unhappy in her new abode, and that reason had fled. Others hazarded a conjecture that she had offended a native servant who disliked her, and that she was murdered. One thing is certain, silence and gloom spread a veil of darkness over her fate which time has not lifted. She was mourned for with a deep, keen agony of grief. In the full bloom of womanhood, gifted, kind, generous, her fate caused a shock that thrilled through all who had read her early poems, and many of whom were waiting, full of hope, for yet higher efforts of her genius.

I think upon the waste above,
And on the dead below;
I see but human vanity—
I see but human woe.

And cities in their hour of pomp,
The peopled and the proud—
What are they? Mighty sepulchres
To gulf a wretched crowd:

Where wealth and want are both accurst,
Each one the worst to bear;
Where every heart and house are barred
With the same sordid care.

MISS LANDON.

Of all her visions, one alone was realized—a mysterious death and a lonely grave in a distant land.

Read, with knowledge of her mournful death, the following, written ten years before, is a strange provision:—

I know not why I wander forth,
Nor what I wish to see;
For hope, the child of morn and mist,
Has long been veiled from me.

Little reck I for ruined towers—
They may be very fair—
Let poet or let painter rave,
I see but ruin there.

And fairer scenes—the vine-wreathed hill—
A gold and ruby mine—
Grapes, nature's jewels, richly wrought,
Around the autumn's shrine;

The corn-fields' fairy armory,
Where every lance is gold,
And poppies fling upon the wind
Their banner's crimson gold:

The moon—sweet shadow of the sun—
On the lake's tranquil breast—
Too much these gentle scenes contrast
My spirit's own unrest.

And I must be what I have been,
And not what I am now,
Ere these could call a smile, or chase
One shadow from my brow.

I must lay in some nameless sea,
The ghosts of hopes long fled;
Erase dark memory's scroll, and leave
A shining page instead.

I must forget youth's bloom is fled
Ere its own measured hours;
I must forget that summer dies,
Even amid its flowers.

And all around may see me changed,
Beneath a foreign sky;
I may fly scenes, and friends, and foes—
Myself I cannot fly.

In Noctes Ambrosiana, Christopher North says, in answer to Tickler, who had remarked, "I love L. E. L.":

"So do I; and being old gentlemen, we may blamelessly make the public our confidante. There is a passionate purity in all her feelings that endears to me both her human and poetical character. She is a true enthusiast. Her affections overflow the imagery her fancy lavishes on all the subjects of her song, and color it with a rich and tender light which makes even confusion beautiful, gives a glowing charm to even indistinct conception, and when the thoughts themselves are full-formed and substantial, which they often are, brings them prominently out upon the eye of the soul in flashes that startle us into sudden admiration. The originality of her genius, methinks, is conspicuous in the choice of its subjects; they are unborrowed; and in her least successful poems—as wholes—there is no dearth of poetry. Her execution has not the consummate grace and elegance of Felicia Hemans; but she is very young, and becoming every year she lives, more mistress of her art, and has chiefly to learn how to use her treasures, which, profuse as she has been, are in abundant store. And, in good truth, the fair and happy being has a fertile imagination. I love Miss Landon, for in her, genius does the work of duty; the union of the two is 'beautiful exceedingly;' and virtue is its own reward far beyond the highest meed of praise ever bestowed by critic, though round her fair forehead is already wreathed the immortal laurel."

CORALS.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

IT was for a long time disputed whether corals belonged to the animal or vegetable kingdom, and the question was not fairly decided until the beginning of the last century. The ancients supposed them to be flowers of the sea, that, if taken out of their native element, lost their bright coloring, and were transformed into dingy stones. A young French physician, Peyssonnel, observing how they moved their arms and expanded and contracted at will, was the first to discover their real nature, but the truth and value of his discovery were not admitted by the savants until twenty years afterward.

Their birth, their life, their death (if we may so call it), all are deeply interesting. During the hot summer months, when the waters teem with life, the parent animal throws out myriads of tiny, jelly-like spawn, and these for a while move at will, then settle down, as if weary, on some stationary body. Gradually their form changes, becoming more star-like, tentacles surrounding the mouth as leaves the heart of a flower. Each of these ray-like parts then pushes out extensions, and these again become tiny stars that establish their own existence by means of an independent mouth. The little animal adheres to the rock by a close-fitting foot, formed from lime, deposited by itself; and upon this slender foundation rises layer after layer, until a tree with wide-spreading, beautiful branches has sprung up, as it were, miraculously. From the hard stone, buds forth living, sensitive animals, instead of leaves and flowers, but with such bright colors and delicate forms as justified the belief of the ancients.

What we call coral is their dwelling. How they build it we know not, except that they absorb unceasingly the tiny particles of lime contained in all salt water, and deposit them one by one in the interior. In the precious coral, the isis nobilis of science, this substance hardens and thickens until a tree is formed, as large as a man's waist frequently. There is something mysterious and suggestive in the life of this little creature, moving, feeding, producing others, then turned into stone and buried in its own rocky house, while countless generations build new abodes on its grave, and in their turn pass away and are followed by others.

The animal itself can only be seen in its native element. To examine a branch of living coral, it must be taken from the sea and placed in a vessel of salt water without exposure to the air. Nothing but a mass of grayish substance is distinguishable at first, and sometimes it is hours before a sign of life appears. Nor will the coral ever display its form and colors in daylight; you must carry it to a dark place. Then, after waiting and watching until patience is nearly exhausted, you will finally observe its club-shaped extremity wrinkle up into little rings. Then take your magnifying glass, and that will disclose eight star-shaped indentations, brightening every moment in tint, growing and swelling and stretching out into leaf-like arms, edged with delicate fringes, until at last the resemblance to a beautiful flower is complete. Art never produced such brilliant colors. The body and arms seem carved out of transparent crystal, and are surrounded by a red so resplendent as almost to dazzle the beholder. One no sooner unfolds than others and others follow, until the branch is fairly crowded with these living blossoms. Their activity is ceaseless, and the variety of their movements exceedingly beautiful. Now the corolla is a half-opened bell, with white leaflets rising from a deep-red crown, now an urn with classic outlines, then a wheel with eight spokes, and so on through infinite changes.

Touch the vessel ever so lightly that contains these wonders, and the scene changes instantaneously. The arms fold themselves up and draw in toward the centre, their fringes vanish, the red lips close, and the branch assumes its original aspect of dinginess. These strange little animals are very sensitive, and can neither bear heat nor light, nor the slightest touch of a foreign body, and though they close up so quickly that one cannot follow the process, they will not unfold again for hours.

Yet their structure appears simple enough. Each one is seated in the red, leathery substance, out of which his tiny cell is hollowed, and by means of his moveable arms and their cilia, creates a little whirlpool before his mouth, seizing thus the infusoria that serve him as food, together with the particles of lime needed for his house. After taking the first taste of whatever he seizes, he throws out all that is useless, and sends the surplus down into the common receptacle, from whence it is afterward distributed equally through countless channels into all parts of the tree. For the coral polypus is a perfect socialist and communist, and it is only by the common labor of myriads of these tiny creatures that the coral branch is formed which becomes the jewel of commerce. The thick red bark that covers their cells is the bond that holds them together, and through its little openings and net-works passes a nutritious juice of milky whiteness that oozes out when the covering is cut, and is called by the fishermen coral milk. It is propelled onward and upward by microscopic cilia, similar to those in the inner vessels of the human frame, and thus we find the almost unknown body of this stone animal as fearfully and wonderfully made as that of our own.

The coral that furnishes man with costly jewels is found principally in the Mediterranean. It is sought by a strange class of men, mostly Italians, who sail year after year, without compass or telescope, to the precise place where, far down in the deep, lie masses of rock, amid whose crevices are the coveted coral branches. The fishing is done with a large net, and the process is thus described by one who witnessed it:

"This net is fastened by a stout rope to the stern of the vessel. At the end of the rope hangs first an iron cross, consisting of two hollow tubes laid crosswise, through which strong ash-poles are thrust, then to this are fastened a number of old sardine nets, and countless ends and bits of wide-meshed pieces of rope as thick as a finger—the whole apparatus a mass of rags and rotten net-work. When the sea is quiet, these are let down to a depth of sixty or even a hundred fathoms, where they slowly spread and unfold themselves over a vast extent. The sail is hoisted, and the vessel drifts slowly before the wind; or, in a calm, the men are set to work at the oars. The captain's purpose is to wrap as large a number of his fluttering pieces of net-work as he can around the branches of coral below, to tear them by main force from the parent stems, and to wind them up together with the fragments of rock to which they are attached. Sometimes the nets are caught between rocks, and the boat must tack and veer in all directions to try to loosen them; at others the captain makes desperate efforts to creep in between overhanging rocks, into a narrow cleft, for there, in eternal shade and almost inaccessible recesses, they believe they find the largest and most valuable coral branches. Thus they try and drift along, they work and toil and draw up, perhaps, twenty times a day, and each time it is a mere lottery. The nets, when full, are carefully heaved on board, and their precious treasures picked out and sent to Leghorn, Naples or Genoa, where they are speedily worked up into every kind of ornament."

The madrepores, who have been at work for countless generations in the Pacific Ocean, are a kindred race of the true coral. They are not beautiful, nor do they furnish man with jewels, but the work they have done far exceeds in magnitude that accomplished by their more pretentious brethren. It is ever so in nature, the humbler are the more useful, the smaller the more powerful. Would not man do well to ponder this truth, when tempted to complain that his sphere of action is limited, his means for doing good circumscribed? These little coral architects, so insignificant that when drawn out of the water one can hardly perceive them, have erected colossal structures against which the winds and waves vainly beat, and by whose side the pyramids of Egypt would dwindle into dwarfish proportions.

These circular coral reefs seem like enchanted islands. An inland lake is enclosed by a ring of bright green, and its waters being shallow shine brilliantly in the golden floods of light that fall upon it, whilst outside the dark billows of the angry sea approach in long lines of breakers, tossing their foaming white crests against the impregnable barriers. Above is a clear, blue heaven, and all around the dark ocean and the hazy air blend harmoniously into each other. The contrast is beautiful beyond all similar scenes; within, all is peace and soft, mirror-like beauty; without, all is strife and eternal warfare.

Year after year, generation after generation, the small and lowly polypi work at their heaven-appointed task, in quiet and silence, with modest industry and untiring energy; the tempest beats upon their fragile homes, and the mighty waves thunder against them like armies of giants, but the living force, though so small, conquers at last. Their great works form huge barriers in continuation of the coast, or gigantic rings of rock upon which soil is formed, plants spring up, and a habitation is finally formed for man himself. Were their existence not limited by certain local boundaries and fixed conditions of temperature, they would have filled up the basins of the great ocean long ago. For, with the exception of a few rare varieties, corals cannot live unless permanently covered with water, or continually bathed by breakers, nor can they exist below a depth of two hundred feet, partly because the weight of water above them would be fatal to all kind of life, and partly because they require a higher temperature than that which prevails at so great a depth.

Above all, belonging to the animal kingdom, they need oxygen to support their life, and this food is not attainable where the air cannot impart it to the water directly by contact with the surface, or send it, by the agitation of the waves, down to a certain limited depth.

Perhaps nature has given us, no better illustration of patient energy and silent endurance than this of the coral. Even the jewels we wear are eloquent with beautiful teachings, and remind us silently of the ocean-homes from whence they were torn, and the myriads of tiny creatures that through countless ages lived and toiled there with such glorious results.

STAR-FISH.

BY E. CHARDON.

SOME philosopher has said that "nature never leaps, she always steps." This fact is never more evident than when examining the lower forms of animal life, which seem most curiously allied both in habits and appearance to the vegetable kingdom. In inspecting the fossils which remain to us as relics of the Palaeozoic seas, there are to be seen myriads of Crinoidæ, which seem to be a connecting link between the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Of these crinoids but two varieties, so far as naturalists have been able to discover, have continued the living tissue which surrounds it. The arms branch out from the calyx. In fact, the animal is a star-fish fixed to a stem—the fixed star of the ocean world. It has no mouth, and its digestive apparatus is very rudimentary. Its pedicle is slender, angular and jointed. The animal can balance itself in any position, and appears to enjoy a kind of sensibility."

The second species of these zoophytes is the Pentacrinus Europæus, which is found in European waters, and which bears a strong family likeness to the creature just described, only it is much smaller.

It will be seen at a glance what a curious resemblance this living creature bears to a flower. There is the closed and the partially-opened bud and the full-developed flower.

The star-fish proper, or Asterias, are scarcely less wonderful in their forms and modes of life. The different varieties present different forms, but they all agree in the geometrical figures which they present—that of being five-pointed or rayed. Some of these fish are rounded in form, others flattened, yet most of them present triangular shaped rays, though some few varieties have simply five arms of more or less length proceeding from a circular or pentagonal disc.

These star-fish are among the most numerous of the population of the ocean, but are never found in their existence up to the present time. One of these, which is fished up at great depths from the neighborhood of the Antilles, is known as the marine palm. A French naturalist thus describes it: "This curious animal resembles a flower borne upon a stem, the calyx of the flower being the head of the animal. The stem has a calcareous core, which is secreted by fresh water. They are, in fact, the scavengers of the sea, eating voraciously all kinds of dead and decaying flesh.

THE VIOLET ASTERIA.
(Uraster violaceus.)

Though beautiful in form they are not so brilliant in color as the sea-anemones. Yet they present a variety of hues, displaying different though not brilliant shades of yellow, red and violet.

The mouth of the star fish is in the centre of its lower surface. This mouth opens directly into its stomach, which is a large sack extending into each arm. They seize their prey alive and swallow it at a single mouthful. If the victim is too large to pass through the mouth, then the stomach inverts itself and envelops it. According to Professor Rymer Jones they even devour oysters, seizing the oyster by their rays, inverting their stomach upon it until the unhappy mollusk is entirely enfolded. Then from the pores of the stomach there exudes a poisonous bright red globules, surrounded by a defense of spiny cilia. Their vision must be very imperfect, however, as the most careful observers have been unable to discover any lens in them.

The star-fishes propagate their species by eggs, which they produce in vast numbers. The mother carries them in a cavity formed by a curvature of the body and the rays. They pass the period of gestation without taking food, as the mouth is covered. An eminent naturalist thus describes the young star-fish: "The young come out of the egg very unlike fluid which overcomes the oyster, forcing it to open its shell, when it becomes an easy prey.

On the lower surface of the a-teria are numerous finger-like protuberances which serve the creature in the capacity of feet, though its powers of locomotion are very limited.

When an asteria is turned upon its back it pushes out these feet like so many worms, feeling here and there until it touches ground. Then it slowly attaches these feet, and when a sufficient number are fixed, it turns itself over.

The eyes of these creatures are placed at the extremity of the arms on the under surface. They are the parent. They have no rays, are ovoid in shape and are provided with vibratory cilia, which give them the appearance of infusoria. They swim with great activity. At the end of a certain time the rays bud out of the upper part of the body in the shape of four tiny arms, by means of which the little star fish fixes itself to its mother. As yet the members are only temporary; the body gradually flattens itself out and becomes a disc, at first round, upon the surface of which, toward the middle, spring up without any particular order, glo-ular protuberances, which are the rudiments of the suckers; these appear to form six concentric rays. At last the body begins to become pentagonal in form, and more or less like a star; the rays grow out at the angles, and the animal is complete."

The asterias possess, in common with the sea anemones, the property of supplying deficient members. If by any means it is deprived of one or more of its arms, the missing member or members are supplied by a new growth. Still more wonderful, the amputated arm will gradually develop four more arms, a mouth will form at the point of conjunction, and thus an entire new animal is created.

A star-fish found in the Mediterranean—the Luidia ciliaris—when it is attacked destroys itself by throwing off its arms and then breaking its disc in pieces.

MY PALACE IN DREAMLAND.

BY IDA PALMER.

I LIVE in a stately palace,
Beyond this world's confines,
Where it is ever summer,
And the sunlight always shines.

Its walls in gilded splendor
Arise in the radiant light,
That bathes its domes and pillars
In glory strange and bright.

It stands in a wonderful garden,
Where lemons and spices grow;
Where myrtles adorn the pathways,
And beautiful fountains flow.

A STAR-FISH PROJECTING RAYS OR ARMS.

It is not stated whether each of these members go to the formation of a new fish, but no doubt such is the case.

The asterias are no exception to the rule that all animals, terrestrial or marine, are subjected to the annoyance of parasites. These parasitic creatures are usually of a lower order than those they infest; but in the case of the asterias this rule does not hold. In the stomach of the Culeita discoidea is found a parasitic fish called the Oxybates Brandesii, a vertebrate animal, while the star fish belongs to the invertebrata.

SOME people buy things they don't want, because they are great bargains; but what you do not want is dear at any price.

NEVER open the door to a little vice, lest a great one should enter.

The brightest of flowers there blossom
The greenest of trees grow there,
And ever o'er all its beauty
Shineth the sunlight fair.

Far off and faint in the distance,
The chiming bells I hear;
Ever on softest breezes
Floateth their music clear.

The cool, still waters wander
Close to my palace stair;
And for idle floating and dreaming
A boat lies waiting there.

Rest; I can here enjoy it,
No trouble cometh nigh;
Never enters my palace,
The shadow of a sigh.

For it was built in dreamland,
When the world was out of sight,
With all its care and sorrow,
And dreary shadow of night.

"IN THE BEGINNING."

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

FOURTH PAPER.

THE Quaternary Epoch, which follows upon the Tertiary Epoch, brings the history of the creation of the world almost down to our times. This epoch has three chronological divisions: the European Deluge, the Glacial Period, and the Creation of Man, and subsequent Asiatic Deluge. Some geologists make two divisions, calling them the Post-Pliocene Period and the Recent or Pleistocene Period.

It must be understood that there were no strong demarcations between the epochs—no convulsions of nature to tell when one ended and another began. The changes of the earth went on gradually, and it was only when this slow and no doubt imperceptible progress had accomplished an entire revolution, or at least a radical change, in the condition of the earth, that one epoch gave place to another.

The beginning of the Post-Pliocene Period found the same flora and fauna upon the earth that had distinguished the Pliocene Period, and the physical features of the globe were still the same. Gigantic elephants still trod the earth, and the hippopotami and the two-horned rhinoceros lived in the rivers and morasses. There were three species of Bos, one of which was hairy and bore a mane; deer of gigantic size, and other animals, species of which still exist. We find a lion, as large as the largest African lion of the present day, which hunted its prey in the British jungles. The Machairoches, an animal of the feline race, was probably the most ferocious and destructive of the carnivora. There were bears, surpassing in size those of the Rocky Mountains, hyenas, and two species of beaver.

In a cavern in England some six hundred feet in length, have been found a large quantity of fossil bones belonging to all those animals.

The remains of the Mammoth are met with in all portions of the world, from the equator to the frigid zone. The mammoth was from sixteen to eighteen feet in height. Its monstrous tusks were from ten to fifteen feet in length, and were much curved, with a spiral turn outward. Its body was thickly covered with long, shaggy hair, with a heavy mane upon its neck and back.

Fossil ivory was found in Greece at a very early period. Some of the bones of the elephant bear a strong resemblance to those of man, and have often been mistaken for human bones. Thus the Greeks took the patella of a fossil elephant for the knee-bone of Ajax.

Time and time again the world has been startled by the announcement of the finding of the remains of giants; but these remains have always, when examined by scientific men, proved to be those of the mammoth.

In 1663, the naturalist Leibnitz composed out of some remains which were brought to him a strange animal carrying a horn in the middle of its forehead, which he called the fossil unicorn. Investigation, however, proved that these remains belonged to the mammoth, and the horn was one of the creature's tusks thus fantastically located.

But the place where these remains are found most plentifully is on the northern coast of Siberia, though all through Russia they are more or less numerous. We are told by a traveller that an entire island in this locality, which is about a hundred miles in length, "except three or four small rocky mountains, is a mixture of ice and sand; and, as the shores fall, from the heat of the sun thawing them, the tusks and bones of the mammoth are found in great abundance. To use Chooïnoff's own expression, the island is formed of the bones of this extraordinary animal, mixed with the horns and heads of the buffalo, or something like it, and some horns of the rhinoceros."

New Siberia and the Lachen Islands, off the mouth of the river Lena, are for the most part an agglomeration of sand, ice and the teeth and tusks of mammoths. The commerce in fossil ivory from these sources is an extensive and profitable one. Tusks are here found weighing from one hundred and fifty to two hundred pounds.

There is a tradition that these huge creatures lived and burrowed under ground. This tradition is held in Russia and Siberia, and the same legend exists among the Chinese. This can hardly be accounted possible, however.

A Russian traveller gives an account of finding an entire mammoth's head frozen; and a still more extraordinary discovery was made by the Russian naturalist Adams, in 1806. "In 1799, a Tungusian chief, while seeking for mammoth horns on the banks of the Lake Onoul, perceived among the blocks of ice a shapeless mass, not at all resembling the large pieces of floating wood which are commonly found there. The following year he noticed that this mass was more disengaged from the blocks of ice and had two projecting parts, but he was still unable to make out what it could be. Toward the end of the following summer one entire side of the animal and one of his tusks were quite free from the ice. But the succeeding summer of 1802, which was less warm and more windy than common, caused the mammoth to remain buried in the ice, which had scarcely melted at all. At length, toward the end of the fifth year (1803), the ice between the earth and the mammoth having melted faster than the rest, the plane of its support became inclined, and this enormous mass fell by its own weight on a bank of sand."

Two years afterward, Mr. Adams found the huge creature in the same place, but somewhat mutilated, its flesh having been cut and torn away in many places, but its skeleton was intact. The head was covered with a dry skin, one of the ears was furnished with a tuft of hair, and the balls of the eyes were still distinguishable. Its back had a long, flowing mane. Mr. Adams collected all that remained of the huge creature, and sent it to the museum at St. Petersburg, where it is still to be seen.

There is a debate among naturalists how these bones are found in this cold locality in such numbers. One writer says: "The animals seem to have perished suddenly; enveloped in ice at the moment of their death, their bodies have been preserved from Gulf of Mexico. The East Indies is almost the only country where they have not been discovered.

The most remarkable creatures of the Post Plio-decomposition by the continued action of the cold."

Germany abounds with fossil remains of these gigantic elephants. They are found in all parts of Europe, in Canada, Oregon, and as far south as the cene Period were, however, the Glyptodon, the gigantic Megatherium, the Mylodon, and the Megalonyx. These were all edentates, living on insects and the tender leaves of plants.

The Glyptodon belonged to the Armadillo family, and was clothed in a hard, scaly shell, or coat of mail. Specimens of this mammal have been found not less than nine feet in length. The Schistopleuron was similar in appearance and habits to the Glyptodon.

The Megatherium, remains of which are found in Paraguay, was allied to the existing genus of Sloths. It fed on roots, branches and leaves of trees, and burrowed deep in the ground. Its body was twelve or thirteen feet in length, and between five and six feet high. It was an enormous, heavily-built animal, armed with gigantic claws.

The Mylodon was also an edentate, resembling the Sloth.

In the engraving will be seen an ideal landscape of the Quaternary Epoch. On the right hand is a Megatherium, in the foreground a Glyptodon. A Mylodon is gnawing a tree in the centre of the picture, and on the left is a Mastodon.

The mineral deposits of this age are called "preglacial."

This epoch, like the one which precedes it, was characterized by violent changes in the appearance of the earth's surface. Land was suddenly elevated by an upward movement of the terrestrial crust, and thus chains of mountains were found. Again land suddenly or gradually sank below the sea level, perhaps to arise again at some distant period. These phenomena were always necessarily accompanied by inundations; the water disturbed by these unusual motions of the earth's crust, rushing in violent waves mingled with earth, sand and mud, and as it retreated leaving behind it the marks of its fury. Sometimes the rocky strata indicate many successive deposits. These deluges were, no doubt, comparatively frequent and local in their character. Two deluges, however, stand out prominent from the rest, as being more general. The first of these two occurred in the north of Europe, where it was produced by the upheaval of the mountains of Norway. The wave spread from thence and carried its ravages into those regions now known as Sweden, European Russia and the north of Germany, sweeping before it all the loose soil on the surface, and covering the whole of Scandinavia with a mantle of transported soil.

The second European deluge is supposed to have been the result of the upheaval of the Alps. It has filled with debris and transported material the valleys of France, Germany and Italy, over a circumference which has the Alps for its centre.

These two deluges must have interfered seriously with animated nature. No doubt in this wholesale destruction many varieties became extinct. Numerous caves are found filled with the bones of all species of animals, which some geologists hold to have drifted into or sought refuge in the caves and perished during the general inundation.

Closely following these convulsions came a period even yet more destructive of animal and vegetable life. It is known as the glacial period, during which the northern and central parts of Europe which extend from Scandinavia to the Mediterranean and the Danube were visited by sudden and severe cold. The plains of Europe which had recently displayed a tropical vegetation, became covered with ice and snow. Science is yet unable to attribute an adequate cause to this sudden change in the temperature of the globe. Agassiz says of this period: "A vast mantle of ice and snow covered the plains, the valleys and the seas. All the springs were dried up; the rivers ceased to flow. To the movements of a numerous and animated creation succeeded the silence of death." Great numbers of animals perished from cold, and some races were entirely annihilated. Evidences of glacial action are found in all the regions of northern and central Europe. In England erratic blocks (as these stones are called which have wandered from any cause from their original bed,) of granite are found which were derived from the mountains of Norway. These blocks were borne by a glacier across the Baltic and the North Seas. "Boulder" is another term for these erratic blocks. So that wherever huge, smooth-worn stones are found at a distance from their parent bed, it is safe to infer the action of glaciers.

Such extensive glaciers as we have reason to believe were in Europe at that period, could only have existed where the temperature of the air was several degrees below zero. So some idea of the intense cold may be formed. That it was sudden as well as intense is held by Cuvier, who says, speaking of the bodies of the quadrupeds which the ice had seized, and in which they have been preserved, with their hair, flesh and skin, up to the present time: "If they had not been frozen as soon as killed, putrefaction would have decomposed them; and, on the other hand, this eternal frost could not have previously prevailed in the place where they died; for they could not have lived in such a temperature. It was, therefore, at the same instant when these animals perished that the country that they inhabited was rendered glacial. These events must have been sudden, instantaneous and without any gradation."

The glacial period had passed away and given place to a normal temperature when man was created. It is difficult to decide where man first appeared upon the scene. In India there is a tradition that at the head waters of the Indus, on the northern slopes of the Himalayas, humanity first made its appearance. It is certain that in this locality are still in existence evidences of the existence of a very rude race of men. Here are found a vast number of caves bearing traces of having been the dwellings of human beings before they had learned the art of building in its rudest forms.

Geologists are divided in opinion as to the exact period of man's appearance upon the earth. Flint knives have been found in bone beds mixed up with fossil remains of elephants, rhinoceros, bears and other animals which existed prior to man, but no human bones are found. There are various theories as to the presence of these knives. Flint knives, together with human remains, have been found in various places, indicating very great antiquity. In the peat in Ireland great numbers of oval and spear-shaped instruments are found. In the midden heaps along the Scandinavian coast, consisting of cast away shells, mixed with the bones of quadrupeds, birds and fishes, are found flint knives, pieces of pottery and ashes. Mounds are found in America showing a very ancient origin.

The chronological periods of pre-historic man have been designated the Age of Stone, the Age of Bronze and the Age of Iron. It is an interesting study to trace out the slow yet sure progress which aboriginal man made in the arts and sciences. The witnesses of this progress are few yet undeniable. They are graven in the rock and imbedded in the ground. M. Marlot, a French scientist, assigns to the oldest or stone period, an age of from five thousand to seven thousand years, and to the bronze period from three thousand to four thousand, still there is no reliable data for estimating their exact extent.

THE AMERICAN BADGER.

ALL through the northern portion of the United States, from Maine to the Rocky Mountains, lives a curious animal called a badger, about the size of a dog, but looking more like a large mole than a dog. It has also many of the habits of a mole, for it lives in holes in the ground, and when in danger can make its way through sandy soil as fast as a mole. In the winter it never leaves its hole, and as it lives in a cold region, it remains from November till April in a semi-torpid state, the same as a bear. Though it eats little or nothing during the winter, it is still very fat when it comes out of its hole in the spring.

The burrows of the badgers are troublesome to travellers, especially in the winter. When the ground is covered with snow they cannot be seen, and horsemen frequently stumble into them.

The Asiatic deluge, which, according to the tradition of various nations, occurred about five thousand years ago, brings us to the close of the Quaternary Epoch. This deluge, though extensive, was still local in its character. It was the result of the upheaval of the mountains of western Asia, prominent among which is the volcanic cone of Ararat with the vast plateau on which it rests, altogether seventeen thousand three hundred and twenty-three feet above the sea. We have the Jewish record of this Asiatic deluge in the seventh chapter of Genesis. The Vedas, the sacred books of the Hindoos, speak of this deluge; and Confucius speaks of the waters flowing back, "which, being raised to the heavens, washed the feet of the highest mountains, covered the less elevated hills and inundated the plains."

The badger's nose is long and thin, intended especially for burrowing; its ears are short and round, and its tail short. Its head is covered with short, coarse hair, but its body is furnished with soft, fine, silky fur more than four inches in length. It is of a mottled gray above, and whitish on the under surface. Its fur is valuable.

It lives on smaller burrowing animals, such as moles and marmots, which it digs out of their nests in the ground. It also eats vegetables; and, judging from the picture, it seems particularly fond of honey, and not at all frightened by the swarm of bees which are buzzing angrily about the thief which has stolen their property.

The strength of its forefeet and claws is so great that one which had put only its head and shoulders into a hole could not be drawn out by the utmost efforts of two stout young men.

WAYS AND MEANS.

"HOW shall I help to right the things that are going wrong?

And what can I do to hurry the promised time of peace?

The day of work is short, and the night of sleep is long,

And whether to pray or preach, or whether to sing a song,

To sow in my neighbor's field, or to seek the golden fleece,

Or to sit with my hands in my lap and wish that sin would cease.

"I think, sometimes, it were best just to let the Lord alone; I think some people forget He was here before they came; It's a little for His glory and a great deal more for their own; That they peddle their petty schemes, and blate, and babble, and groan;

I sometimes think it were best, and I were less to blame, Should I sit with my hands in my lap, in my face a crimson shame."

Templeton read aloud these stanzas from his daily paper with the supreme enjoyment of a man who finds his sentiments expressed exactly to his satisfaction.

Templeton, by the way, reads only the poetry which is sandwiched between the grave leaders, market reports and current items in his daily budget of news, arguing from the bare fact of its existence there, that it must be quick and vital with the spirit of this nineteenth century; no hidden sphynx riddle skulking on tortured feet, but of clear, open, practical significance to the living, acting, matter-of-fact men and women of to-day.

To be sure, he would candidly admit that, tried by the principles of pure art, there might be very little of the genius of real poesy in these electric sparks thrown off by the thundering iron presses which belch forth songs by the million for every day in the year; but then he as stoutly maintains that no poetry which would not translate into sound, sensible prose has any message or meaning whatever for him.

"Well," said the Professor, breaking into our host's impressive pause, "are we expected to put on the coat your poet holds up to our view?"

"I'm not certain but it might fit some of us if we were humble enough to try it," Templeton returned. "For there's no question that we do meddle a great deal too much with matters quite outside our jurisdiction, vainly presuming if they were under the direction and control of our judgment they would be more wisely ordered and more justly governed."

"It's natural, you know, when we see things going wrong, to feel that we could set them right a little better than anybody else if we could only have the chance," said Jeannette. "It is no doubt a weakness of our human nature; but without this comfortable faith in our sagacity and powers of performance, we should be incapable of accomplishing or attempting any necessary work of reform."

"But

"I think, sometimes, it were best just to let the Lord alone; I think some people forget He was here before they came," quoted Templeton again. "Don't you suppose all these wrongs that we worry and clamor over would get righted all the same, and just as soon, or a little sooner, if we would go quietly about our business? Do you believe any good comes of all this blustering and aimless running to and fro, this rallying and shouting and frantic appeal, this mad hue and cry against evils which we will persist in viewing in our own partial and one-sided way, from our own narrow and obstructed standpoint, and which we are determined to eradicate in our own manner, by our own means, in our own time, according to our own preconceived ideas of right, justice and the eternal fitness of things? Would it not show a more humble, wise, reverent and believing spirit if we would be willing to trust the affairs we were not formed to govern to the care, guidance and correction of the Almighty Power above us?—if, in fact, we would take the excellent advice of Bailey's Muralizing Devil:

'Leave off these airs,

Know your place—speak to God—and say for once,
Go first, Lord!"

"But then we suppose that the Lord works mediately, my honored host," said the Professor, mildly, "and consequently our active co-operation is essential to the accomplishment of His designs. We are the instruments by which He effects His purposes; and while it may be the part of some of us to sit with our hands in our lap, as your poet thinks it is best, there are others who from nature, choice and election are pushed to the extreme of active service, who are no doubt often over zealous and disastrously busy in the performance of good works, but whose very mistakes are, in a way which we are far too near-sighted to perceive, made subservient to the plans of the grand Master. We may, and we do, each act freely of our own will and pleasure, choosing our own parts, and performing them in our own manner; but the controlling wisdom of a power unseen and overruling will adjust all to ends broader and farther reaching than any for which we strive. So, though our own petty designs are frustrated, the universal and eternal plan is always triumphant, and the real, permanent good is secured through our efforts, however contrarily we may have aimed."

"Well, I must say it requires a great stretch of faith to perceive or believe that the efforts of a certain class of peculiarly active people in this world are ministrant to the growth and development of good in any sense or form, since their whole intent and purpose seems to be, and their whole action in effect is, to block the wheels of progress if they may not turn them back," said Sherwood, as sneering and cynical as ever, perhaps a trifle more so, since the Falconer was not there to counter-check his carping with her pert criticisms. "Take now, for instance," he went on, "that very considerable body of religionists who carry themselves as though they were the Lord's vicegerents on earth, specially delegated to do His work, to interpret His word, and to execute His law on offenders; whose system of faith is a sort of Procrustean bedstead, to the measure of which its compelled occupants, by dint of incessant clipping, stretching and cramping, are made to conform, or, refusing so to be converted to mere stocks and stones by the suppression of individual thought and freedom, are driven out with stripes and persecutions, and the damning brand of 'heretic,' 'infidel' and 'unbeliever,' frightening the good folks in their way who dare not, against this official sentence of excommunication, credit the white innocence of their lives, nor trust the pure influence of their example."

"These are they," Templeton subjoined, "who are full of wranglings and disputes, who contend loudly and angrily over some trivial point in the letter of the law, while they do open violence to its blessed spirit; who are piously but perpetually stirring up strife, and setting brother against brother, breeding distempers, ill humors, evil passions and murderous impulses in tempted hearts under sacred names, kindling the fires of hell on the very altars consecrated to the service of God. Truly, one cannot but wonder how the works of such are to be incorporated with use and honor in the general scheme of good, how they are to be made contributive to the universal foundation of brotherly love, whose overflow is to irrigate this sin-stricken world, wash it clean of corruption, vivify, beautify and make it to bud and blossom as the rose. I confess, most excellent man, I do not comprehend the breadth and scope of your philosophy, nor have I the necessary grace and wisdom to discern how it is possible to serve the Lord by following the devil."

The Professor smiled. "Oh, ye of little faith!" he said. "Well, well. But there is no stumbling-block so hard to get over, I grant, as the evils of the professedly good, the sins that are committed, the wrongs that are perpetuated, the persecutions that are devised and visited in the name, for the glory, and under the banner of the all-patient, all-enduring Christ. It may be that the motive lying at the heart of the deeds which confound us is honest and fair, though the spirit of the doer is not informed and in-filled with the pure wisdom, penetrated and impelled by the divine love and power of the Gospel, whose warm light strikes down the long, dark, stormful, death-strewn passage of the centuries with the same serene, clear, hopeful, steady luster of the star which guided the Magi of the East to the cradle of its God-begotten Founder and Revealer. But however that may be, we cannot look back over the history of the Church, written too often with the sword and in blood, without perceiving that even the acts of violence and fiendish cruelty perpetrated in the name of Religion, from the most selfish, malignant and wicked of motives, have been somehow appropriated to good uses, and adjusted to wise ends, if no farther (in our sight) than to bring out against their black background the beautiful examples of Christian faith, the sublime heroisms and the painful martyrdoms cheerfully and uncomplainingly borne for love's sake, dashing the darkness of ignorance and superstition with a starry radiance that will thrill the faint, failing hearts of tempted humanity with courage and hope, saving them from the deadness of doubt and despair, while trials and temptations endure. And even the strifes, dissensions, bickerings and hair-breadth divisions in faith, at this present time are not without their weight and significance in the perfect economies of God, drawing us gradually and insensibly to an appreciation and comprehension of the real nature and essence of harmony and of universal brotherhood, the striving together for a common good, with reverent regard for individual difference of character and method, in reaching the same results."

"Ah, this blessed optimism of yours, my dear Professor, drives you often to very far-fetched and inconsequent conclusions," laughed Templeton.

"Do you think so? And yet my optimism differs from yours only in regarding present conditions as favorable in the highest degree and contributing always to the end desired and designed, while you, with equal faith in the final triumph of good, think the millennium would be sooner reached if things were thus and so—as, for instance, if people would mind their own business—which, indeed, appears 'a consummation devoutly to be wished.' But, the fact is, it is the business of some people to mind the business of other folks. There's no telling into what follies, extravagancies and wickednesses some of us might run if it were not for this beneficent system of espionage with its outlying force of busybodies, overseers and censors supervising our affairs and keeping us in proper bounds. Now there's our good Doctor—bless him, and I wish he were here this moment to speak for himself!"—(Miss Dunbar's eloquent face flushed up as though her heart responded with no uncertain throb to the friendly wish), "he is one of those elect souls ordained and sent forth with the commission to look into the lives of the dwellers about him, to unearth their mouldy mysteries, to probe their ulcerous secrets and lay open their diseased moral and physical organisms to the wholesome influence of air and light. Why, such a man is a terror to the evil community into which he enters, and we miserable wretches who have need to call his professional services in aid may well shrink and shiver when his keen, searching eye cuts like a knife to our guilty consciences, and his close-probing inquiry goes down with firm, merciless point to the heart of our difficulty, for it is certain we shall not escape until he has traced out the subtle connection between effect and cause, and laid his finger on the particular sin for which we are suffering the retributive justice of outraged law. Nor has he any specific which we can swallow in haste, or with impunity return to our transgressions again. Obedience is the uncompromising rule in his school of practice—the unpalatable potion which he relentlessly urges upon all reckless violators of nature's laws."

"It is not for this characteristic that I find fault with the Doctor," Templeton said. "It is his radical, fanatical, mad-dog way of treating things which are sacred to other people, if not to him, that strikes me so disagreeably and forces me, against my will, to take up arms against him."

"True, true," the Professor admitted, "the Doctor is no respecter of names, customs, principalities or powers—not he. Whenever he sees a wrong, be it in high places or in low, he aims at it boldly and does not mind who winces or what mighty potentate he brings to the ground. He is pitiless in his assault upon and exposure of shams of every sort, taking a keen delight, evidently, in stripping off hypocritical dignities and showing us the bald, unlovely realities of things to which we bow in ignorant homage. And yet, for whatever is intrinsically good and true in this world, not one of us, I think, can outdo the Doctor in reverent respect, and with all his rash, offensive and affrighting meddlesomeness, he is singularly delicate about intruding or commenting on any affair of purely personal concern, restricting his interference and his denunciations mainly to matters affecting the public weal.”

“Oh, unquestionably our worthy friend is a power for good,” Templeton allowed, “but there is no denying he is an exceedingly uncomfortable person to have about, with his upsetting and confounding theories, and his audacious prying into all the mysteries of heaven and earth. One would be glad sometimes to take life in an easy, quiet, enjoyable way, without the distraction of attending to the movements of its complex machinery, and without the feeling that something would run wrong if we did not stand perpetually on guard and make incessant clamor over our rights, duties, responsibilities and Heaven knows what Babel of names, about the exact significance of which we do not bother our brains.”

“Ah, there it is!” said Jeannette. “We mouth great words and play, like children at mimic battle, pleased with our loud noise which is stunning enough to bring order out of chaos, if sound and fustian could do it. One does, indeed, weary of all this bluster and confusion of tongues. I dare say you have heard me express the same wish often enough before, but, if we only could have a little less talk, and a little more earnest doing!”

“What an anomaly in nature—a woman wearied of too much talk,” commented Sherwood, maliciously. “Why, inconsiderate lady, how do you suppose the cause of your strong-minded sisters would have flourished without this infernal clatter of tongues pressing it again and again on the tortured ear?”

“Why, as to that,” responded Jean, who, since her association with the Professor, seems to have parted with a little of her aggressiveness, while he possibly has gained in that quality. “As to that, the present lull in the wordy contest regarding woman’s place, power, privilege, duty, and so forth, augurs to my mind a more speedy solution and settlement of that vexed problem than anything which has gone before. Indeed, so full is the air of propitious signs in this hour of charmed silence that I should not be surprised at any moment to hear the proclamation of universal emancipation sounding through the land, or to wake any fine morning and find myself invested with the embarrassing rights of citizenship and powers of the ballot, in my first use of which, like a bird with new-fledged wings, I shall doubtless tumble from my high nest to the ground.”

“Yes, dear,” assented the Professor—whether to the latter clause of his dear’s remarks we could not tell—“but you must remember that it was the ‘wordy contest’ going before which paved the way to the easy triumph you anticipate and will very soon enjoy. There is no victory of any worth without preceding violence. We have to conquer our domain before we may possess it, and it is the loud alarum of drums and braying of trumpets that spurs on our straggling and half-hearted forces until, at last, in the fainter sounds of the closing battle and retreating foe we come into our conquest, so quietly, so easily, that we blush to remember the tumult that we made to gain it. And yet, without question, it was needful and fulfilled an ordained part in our necessary struggle. We come to pleasant places often by unpleasant ways, and though we may fret ourselves later over the beautiful paths by which it seems we might have reached our eminence, it is a great deal more philosophical to consider the uses and advantages of our actual experience in attaining the final happy result.”

“But, for myself,” said Templeton, “I am a man of peace and take no delight in riots, turmoils, agitations, the thunder of drums, clash of bayonets and rattle of musketry. When I do good I don’t like to do it by fighting somebody’s wrong, but rather by giving aid and comfort to some poor over-ridden soul whom your brutal, beastly, tramping armies, in their abrieking, ravaging march of reform, have left bruised and bleeding by the way. I don’t want to spend my strength in combating evil—which is a negative sort of good works—while there are daily and unlimited opportunities for doing simple, pure, peaceful deeds of love.”

“Do them, my man of peace, do them!” exclaimed the Professor, in a glow of enthusiasm. “What is there in the world to hinder? It is your blessed privilege to choose your own work and to perform it in your own way. Every man has his calling. And for these others who love to strive with wrongs—there is room for them, too, and they may go in at the battle with shouts and flying banners, if so pleases them—it is none of your concern. You have your method of work, they have theirs, and which is of greater value, or which serves best the purposes of the Master, we may not say. When we rise to a higher point of vision we may see how all our diverse schemes harmonise and operate together for the highest good, but here, and now, we must satisfy ourselves with believing it, and, faithfully fulfilling our own tasks, leave others unmolested to the choice and fulfilling of theirs.

“And now is it not time that this committee on ways and means resolved into a working committee?”

And as our discussion over the breakfast-table had been unusually prolonged, we rose, on the Professor’s hint.

LIZARDS.

MY former home was in a richly-wooded and well-watered district, which consequently abounded with wild animals of all kinds. I was a very lonely child, and had no young companions as most children have; and, being constantly thrown upon myself, with not always very happy thoughts to bear me company, I found all my happiness and recreation out of doors; wild things were friends to me, and somehow I always felt as if they could sympathize with me better than people did.

I first saw the lizards basking in the sun upon the sloping side of the wooden coping of a little bridge, upon which a lane near my home crossed a small stream; some of them were, I should think, more than six inches long, and beautifully marked; others smaller and darker: at the slightest movement they vanished like lightning. Day after day through that summer I went down to look for the lizards; they were never to be seen except on sunny days, and after rain more frequently than in dry weather. Fights between them were not uncommon, and I have seen them bite each other's tails fiercely; in the early part of the summer mutilated tails and toes are rife amongst them.

All the lizard tribe appear to be gregarious; at least, when you see one you may be pretty certain there are others near. They frequent decayed wood, most probably from finding wood-lice and other insects on which they feed.

I remember finding a full-grown lizard in the crevice of an old gate-post, and made a dash to catch him. I got firm hold of his tail, and tried to pull him back from a hole to which he was making his way, but he was not willing to submit to capture without a struggle. To my unfeigned astonishment and dismay he preferred the loss of his tail to that of his liberty, for he left it all in my hand, while he darted off tailless, and made good his escape.

The lizard tribe, like most other reptiles, hibernate, or remain torpid during the winter; but the water efts or newts show themselves earlier in the year than their land cousins. I should think all lizards would eat worms; water-efts take them voraciously, though very fond of flies and raw meat.

It is curious toward the close of a hot summer day to stand by a pond in which these creatures abound, and hear the incessant snapping noise, like the breaking of small sticks, caused by the rapid closing of their jaws upon the luckless gnats that throng the surface of the water.

One day I caught a land-ef, and wishing to ascertain if it could swim, I ran to a pond, and put it gently in; it swam for a short distance with quite as much agility and apparent ease as its amphibious relatives. I was not aware that there were water-efts in that pond, but the next morning I found my land friend on the bank near the spot where I had placed him the night before, in company, and apparently on friendly terms, with a water-ef, who was much the smaller of the two. A short time after I passed the place, and found the water eft dead, but his companion had disappeared.

The well-known tradition that the snake tribe may be attracted and fascinated by music is probably familiar to most young people. In the Campagna about Rome, where lizards of all kinds are plentiful, beautiful emerald-green ones may be seen displaying their glittering coats in the warm southern sun, and creeping about the moss covered stones, which are all that remain of some once stately temple, or luxurious villa. These green lizards were formerly caught and tamed by the peasantry, and afterward sold as specimens; and I remember hearing it casually observed in conversation, by one who had long been resident at Rome, that the principal means employed in their capture is whistling clearly and softly, which (our informant stated) so fascinated them that they lost their natural timidity, and were easily taken.

Child as I was, I listened eagerly, and determined when summer came to try if my friends at the bridge were equally susceptible. Summer came, and with it appeared the lizards in their old haunts. Whistling in the peculiar monotonous way I had heard, I approached, expecting them to dart away as usual; but no! not even when my shadow lay full upon them did they stir. I had never seen them so closely before. I put my hand amongst them and scared them away, then recommenced whistling as before, and out they all came, slowly at first and cautiously, but gradually growing bolder; and even when I was actually bending over them they held their ground. After this I constantly repeated the experiment, and always with the same result; and I have frequently coaxed them out by whistling, when, owing to a cloudy sky, they had shut themselves up at home.

Seventeen years have come and gone since I paid my last visit to my friends, and since then I have had a large share of trouble, anxiety and suffering; out often, through hours of weakness and loneliness, the memory of those free childish rambles rises fresh as a pleasant dream; and though I may never again be permitted to turn a fresh page in the book I used to love so dearly, the recollection of what I have read there will ever be one of my richest treasures.

Oh! young friends, study Nature wherever and whenever you can; and try to study her in a lowly spirit, if only for the sake of the refreshing memory of her green fields when you are weary and footsore on the world's highway—you may not always have the book before you.—Aunt Judy's Magazine.

HEAVEN is not reached by a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

* * *

We rise by the things that are under our feet:
By what we have mastered of good and gain;
By the pride deposed and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet.

J. G. HOLLAND

THE STORY-TELLER.

OUT OF DARKNESS.

BY M. E. COMSTOCK.

"RIGHT out of the cold, dark earth the crocus springs. From darkness morning shines. Something of beauty and of joy may emerge from the coldness and the darkness of my life."

Thus spoke the orphan Hildreth as she arose from the sad reverie that had, unawares, overtaken her. Hildreth's home was just two rooms. It was very different from the home that had been hers a few years before. After her mother's death and after Rob, her only brother, went away, disappearing suddenly, giving no clue to his whereabouts and leaving debts behind, the clouds had fallen thick about her path. Joyous, manly, well-beloved Rob, regarded as the soul of honor by all who knew him, had never before been known to have a debt in the world. Dissipated habits he had none. What strange snare had overtaken him? He had taken with him everything he possessed; everything he had a claim upon that could be converted into money; and he left no word or clue to the cause of his disappearance. The gray-haired father, who had been infirm for many years, sank under this blow. Hildreth saw the daisies growing on his grave, and went forth alone to battle with poverty and loneliness. Hildreth found enough to do, for she knew well how to work. She had never been accustomed to do anything by halves. She put her character into her work. It had been easy to spend and be spent for her dear ones. She missed her wings now. It seemed to her sometimes that she must sink. It was rarely that she allowed reverie to overtake her. There were griefs in her heart that we will not intrude upon. She dared not look inside, at times. She dared only look above.

"It is eating out my life," she said, "this gloomy sorrow that feeds upon my heart. Bereft of kindred, I will make close friends with nature. Perhaps the universal mother will speak to me, her child."

The snow still lay in patches on the hillsides and in the woods, but green things lay concealed beneath it. Hildreth's well-protected hands guided her trowel successfully, and treasures of the sleeping spring-time emerged beneath her skilful touch. Bright were the red berries and delicate were the tinted mosses and fresh and green the trailing vines with which she returned laden.

"I found them all out there under the snow," she said to Spirry, the big Maltese cat that sprang from the rocking-chair and stretched himself as she came in.

"Can you help me spread these pretty things, Spirry? Oh, Bub, my hands are cold! You have let the fire go out, you sleepy cat! Here is one coal I have raked up and here are more right under the white ashes. How they glow! Come, kindle up and warm me. I am very cold!" and Hildreth knelt and coaxed the embers into a ruddy glow.

"Fire under white ashes and green things under snow," spoke the orphan, and the while she spoke she put the shining evergreen vines in the windows where the sunshine came. She twined them also around pictures of the Saviour and of her mother.

"I'll ask old Aunty Nestor down to tea, it looks so bright!" said Hildreth. She had sat down and thought how happy the green things and the wood-fire looked until she grew afraid to sit and think any longer.

Old Aunty Nestor, as everybody called her, came. It had been many a day since she had been invited out to tea. She had put on her best black dress and her Sunday cap. Her sweet, faded blue eyes had quite a holiday look in them as she came in leaning on her crutch. Hildreth wondered she had never remarked before how much the gentlewoman Madam Nestor looked.

With the help of her crutch she hitched softly along where the vines and mosses were and she touched them gently as she might have stroked a baby.

"Poor little children of the woods," she said. "Your Father kept you close through all the snows and storms and kept your life warm in you!"

Hildreth looked up quick at this and color sped into her cheek. She had never heard aunty speak like this before. But, then, she had never heard her talk at all, except before Thomas's wife; and how could any one speak like this in the presence of Thomas's loud-voiced wife?

"Do you think the Heavenly Father did keep the green things safe and warm through the winter's snows and storms?"

"Certain, child; or how should you have found them safe to-day?"

The dear little lady sat down in the rocking chair before the grated stove and Hildreth sat down on the rug at her feet. Hildreth was afraid Aunty Nestor would not understand, but courage came to her and she spoke again.

"Do you think that, perhaps, then, the Heavenly Father takes care of the tender, little things, the hopes and plans and sympathies and such things in our hearts that get such awful chills every day and curl themselves all up and lie still?"

"Certain, child; every one of them! He keeps them safe and means that they shall blossom by and by."

Hildreth drew closer and Aunty Nestor took a little red woollen stocking out of her pocket and began knitting for one of Thomas's children.

"Like enough now you don't think there's any green things in my life; it looks pretty wintry to you, Hildreth," said the sweet little old lady. "You are young and strong limbed. You take your little basket of lunch and leave your snug, cheery room and go the office and do your day's work every day. You know you are a good accountant, and they praise your books and pay you. Thomas told me what he heard them say in the office. You are independent, and life is all before you. Now I am a lame, old woman, living with a daughter-in-law and six children in a rickety tenement house with five families in it. Now, my dear, you can't see any green thing in my life." There was a little pause, in which the wood-fire crackled, and Spirry purred softly. "I never speak of John, never," and her voice lowered, and a new quality and strength came into it. "But for all that there isn't a day but that I think just how his voice used to sound in the morning when he used to say, 'Good-bye, my darling!' when he went to his day's work, or off on one of his trips. I never say anything about it, but the louder Thomas's wife scolds the deeper sound the low words that he used to say."

Hildreth laid her head in Aunt Nestor's lap.

"Just you keep your pleasant little thoughts, even if the outside life is so cold it won't do to let them show themselves. I know I'm a wintry little old woman. I wonder that you asked me down here to tea. I seem like a little sharp piece of ice to myself sometimes when the house is all disorderly and they talk so very loud. But the pleasant times come back to me—the time when we moved into the new house, and then the time when I had my set of china, and we had everybody come to tea-drinkings, and the pretty wedding we gave Ann. It all comes back. And then there's the hope of going to John some day. It is pleasant to think of the old times, but it is better still to think of the new time that will surely come. It has been promised, my dear."

By and by Hildreth set out the little round table. On it she put slices of bread and thin bits of smoked beef and caraway cakes, and when the cheerful kettle sang she brought out the tea-caddy and made the fragrant tea.

Hildreth was putting a lump of sugar in Aunt Nestor's second cup as they sat and chatted, when somebody knocked smartly at the door. It was the doctor. Nurse Underwood had formerly lived in the room that Hildreth rented now. The doctor had come for Nurse Underwood.

"Come in, doctor," said Aunt Nestor, "I can tell you about Nurse Underwood."

The doctor came in. He was very tired. He looked ready to drop. Hildreth set a chair, and he sat down and began to dry his wet feet before the fire while he talked.

"Yes; I had a hard pull myself. Was able to leave my bed only day before yesterday. But what could I do? I took my first two rides to see patients, wrapped up like a mummy, and flopped down when I got home as though I never should get up again. But what is a man to do? The sick and dying are all around us. Edward Rich died last night. Hobart Hull, did you ask for? He is going to weather it through, but his wife is down with the fever."

Hildreth poured a cup of hot tea, and stood with it in one hand and the sugar-bowl in the other before the doctor.

The doctor took it mechanically, helped himself to sugar, quaffed the beverage, and never looked at Hildreth. The doctor was perplexed and anxious.

"I don't know what to do," he said, rising, "since Nurse Underwood can't be had. The woman will die if she doesn't have the best of care."

"I will go and take care of her," said Hildreth, with her quiet, customary decision.

The doctor fairly looked at Hildreth for the first time.

"Strong nerves?" he asked, and he felt her pulse. "Can you do as you are told?" speaking crisply.

"If I am told clearly," replied the girl.

"My dear," sweetly, anxiously piped up Aunt Nestor's motherly little thin voice, "you work days, you know. You will fall sick yourself if you sit up nights; and, besides, she will want care night and day, too."

"There will be holiday at the office to-morrow. Next day will be Sunday. In that time the doctor can look for some one else."

Hildreth went.

The patient was delirious. She was a beautiful woman. Surroundings bespoke wealth and culture. Some mental trouble had been undermining strength, the doctor said, rendering greater the danger from the epidemic. "A perfect icicle of a woman," the doctor described her, who "with a daughter and a son had lived some years among them, but had made no friends."

Hildreth laid her cool, firm hand on the fevered brow. The muscles of the face slowly relaxed their tension. The doctor wrote something on a slip of paper and handed it to Hildreth.

"Remember what I told you," he said.

He turned back when he had reached the door, looked at his patient, looked at Hildreth.

"You'll do," he said, and was gone.

That night the crisis passed, leaving the patient weak and helpless as an infant. Hildreth ministered unweariedly. Her own soul went out to the sufferer in sweetest compassion and sympathy. She gave more than careful nursing. She gave something of the vitality of her own spirit. Her tones were love tones. Her touch had healing in it, for it was inspired by the tenderness of love.

The cold, proud woman grieved like a child when she found that Hildreth was gone back to her employment, and another had taken her place by the bedside.

"She did not kiss me good-bye; if she did, I was asleep," she said, complainingly. "Send for her to come back," she pleaded with the doctor.

The little strength that had been gained seemed ebbing, and the good doctor was alarmed about his patient, and found a substitute to keep books, and represented to the firm that he "could not find a substitute to keep the breath of life in a dying woman," and the humane gentlemen could do no less than acquiesce and let their best accountant go as nurse again to oblige the well-beloved doctor in a difficult and critical case.

"My good angel, you are come back!" said the sick woman, in a tone no one had heard her use for many years, it was full of love and gladness, and she wept hot tears as Hildreth came and took her hand.

"Mamma is greatly changed," said the daughter to her brother. "She is just the same to me, but she is so tender to that strong, sweet girl that calmed her in her ravings. I never saw her loving to any one before, not even to us, when we were little!"

"Oh, Hildreth," said the sick woman, one day when she awoke and found the maiden sitting beside her, "the sight of your comforting face makes me feel so warm and rested here," and she put her hand to her heart. "The cold, dead weight has been here so long I did not know there could be any other feeling!" and tears streamed from her beautiful eyes.

"Dear, sweet lady," said Hildreth, "there is always fresh life ready to germinate, green things ready to spring forth when the snow is melted away. God keeps them for us in our hearts through all 'the winter of our-discontent.'"

"Ah, but it needs the hand of human love to let the warm life in! My heart has been frozen, Hildreth. A cruel wrong—but I cannot speak of it—I never can. It froze me, Hildreth; except one place in my soul, where the molten lava always flowed and seared me through and through. Oh, Hildreth, I have been in many lands, but nothing did me good, although I tried all means to get back mental health, until you came and loved me like an angel. Your little, soft, sweet prayers and loving tones and touches woke long-forgotten feelings. I can feel my seared and frozen heart put out little, pale blossoms of the spring-time when you are by. Your human hand brings Heaven's light and warmth into the cold and darkness. Stay with me, Hildreth."

When the invalid had nearly regained accustomed strength this request was renewed. "Make your home with me; be as a sister to me. I can never spare you, Hildreth," pleaded the beautiful woman.

Hildreth had left her key and her monthly rose and Spirry, the cat, with Aunt Nestor when she shut up her rooms. Spirry had passed through melancholy experiences with Thomas's children, notwithstanding Aunt Nestor's promises and best precautions. Spirry had become a sadder and a wiser cat. His gladness to see Hildreth on her return knew no bounds. When Aunt Nestor saw Hildreth she rose in great agitation. The dear little canary bird of a woman trembled like an aspen leaf as she leaned on her crutch and tears rained down her face so that she could scarcely speak.

"Oh, it wasn't true!" she said. "The ship wasn't lost! I mean the ship was lost but some lives were saved, and John has come home! John has come home!" and she hid her face on Hildreth's shoulder and Hildreth put her arm around her and supported her. "He had to go to India, they wouldn't let him off and he had to stay so long and his letters were lost on the way; but he has come!"

The white-haired, bronzed, kindly-faced old man soon came in. He was well knit, erect and glad as a boy. It was beautiful to see the love that showed itself in every act for his "bonnie Kathie," as Hildreth overheard him call Aunt Nestor. He seemed to know Hildreth from previous accounts of her.

"We are going to housekeeping," he said, "and my wife and I want you to come and live with us. We have fixed it up right snug. You may have any room you like in the house and do as you like at all times."

The kind old man gallantly took Spirry-cat in one arm and the monthly rose with three buds and two blossoms on it in the other and went down-stairs and kindled Hildreth's fire for her.

"My wife says you have been as good as a daughter to her ever since you came here, and the sight of you, she says, has made her heart feel chirp and blossomy in her trouble ever since you came into the house," said John Nestor. "We would really feel obliged to you if you would come and stay with us. My wife has told you all about us and I've come home forehanded. I have taken the Rivers place, and we're going to live in it as soon as we can get things together."

"The pretty cottage with the piazzas and vines?"

"Yes, the one close by the doctor's place."

"Oh, I'm so glad, for Aunt Nestor!" said Hildreth, rejoicingly.

The maiden sat in her cheerful room and the light shone softly on the pictures of the Saviour and of her mother.

"I only reached out of my own darkness to put away a little, a very little of the trouble in other lives. I could not do much at most, and lo! what has rewarded me! How beautiful are the green things of love and sympathy that hide under the snow of our everyday lives. Oh, to know better how to bring green things to light in wintry lives!"

The rose shed its fragrance on the air. Spirry purred softly. A glad cat he was! The hickory-fire snapped loudly.

There was a tap at the door and the boy who brought Hildreth's mail handed her a magazine and a letter. The superscription was neat, correct, business-like. Hildreth recognized the familiar hand.

"They are getting impatient for my return to the office," she said, mentally. "I intend to be with them to-morrow again."

Hildreth gazed mutely at the concisely-worded note a much longer time than simple perusal required. It was an offer of marriage from the head of the firm that employed her. Hildreth finally dropped it in her lap and sat as motionless as a statue.

"I do not love this man, and, of course, I cannot even think of marrying him," said the orphan. "It is very comfortable to be convinced in my own mind that his convenience, his judgment, rather than his heart, must have dictated this note. He will not suffer," and Hildreth drew writing materials toward her, and courteously, concisely in the manner in which it had been made, declined the offer.

A few days later Hildreth received another letter. It was from an old and valued friend of her family, one who had acted as her father's man of business. This letter informed her of the rise in value of land she had in vain endeavored to make sale of, regarding it hardly worth the taxes she was obliged to pay upon it. The discovery of a lead mine upon it put Hildreth unequivocally in possession of a handsome fortune. For particulars regarding the best means of rendering it available, she was referred to the head of the firm for whom she was employed. That gentleman had, for certain business reasons, been consulted, and was in possession of the facts of the case, himself owning land adjoining. He could aid her decision as regarded a sale of the property, or in taking measures for the working of the mine.

Hildreth's cheek flushed hotly as she read these concluding clauses of the letter.

"My Heavenly Father," she said, devoutly, "I thank Thee that Thou didst not permit me for one instant to entertain that profane and mercenary offer of marriage!"

Hildreth sat long in thought. Then she rose and stood before the picture of her mother.

"A few weeks ago I could not realize that I had a friend in the world. Three homes have been urged upon me within a few days. Two have been offered from true and loving hearts. Which shall I do? Shall I go to the strange, sweet, gifted woman, who so enlists my sympathies, and live with her in her beautiful home as a sister? Shall I go and take rooms with the warm-hearted, loving friends in their pretty nest among the vines, and put fresh, new little pleasures into their lives, as a daughter might—all of us living there close under the good doctor's wing, perhaps helping in his work among the suffering? or shall I make a true home of my own, now, and receive others—a beautiful home, a woman's home all my own and by myself, in some sweet place beloved by Nature, the dear, universal mother?"

Under the influence of the magnetic, sweetly-smiling eyes of the portrait, Hildreth had spoken aloud—a habit lonely people will sometimes fall into—and the questioning, the seeking for light as to her future course had been almost like a prayer.

"There are these three courses inviting me—which shall it be?"

"Neither," spoke a manly voice of one who, finding the door ajar, had entered and stood there unperceived. "Hildreth, darling sis, don't start. Yes, I'm Rob. Don't cry. I'm worthy, through repentance, to be received, or I wouldn't come. I have suffered, Hildreth!" and strong, manly arms enfolded her lovingly, and tears and kisses had their way between reunited brother and sister. The sweetly-smiling eyes of the portrait seemed to light up with new sympathy as they sat late into the night and talked of the years between them, wherein their hitherto undivided lives had taken coloring new and strange.

"It was my enthusiastic admiration for the captain that got me into trouble," Rob went on, when they had chatted long that never-to-be-forgotten night; "and my pride and self-will helped it on. Father tried to keep me from going to the barracks so much. I suppose my knack at private theatricals and such things amused them in their monotony, and their flattery must have turned my head. They praised my music, and my recitations, and my horsemanship, until I got quite made over. But it was my real love for the captain, who flattered me by giving me, so young a man, his confidence, always professing to me that I was the truest, most responsive friend he ever had, that swamped me at last."

"He had strong magnetic power," said Hildreth. "Nearly every one felt it—even those who had no respect for him."

"I wouldn't believe a word against him. I trusted him. He was in a tight fix, and I contracted debts for him, not letting his name even appear; for at that time it was in ill odor. And I gave him my name, too, our good family name, on paper, to be used at his discretion. He said he could pay—he but asked a little time. I believed in him so! Oh," and Rob got up and walked the floor in excitement, "I can hardly believe him now to be the scamp I know he is!" and the devoted, enthusiastic trust of a youthful, chivalric spirit struggled with the sharp truth that had come deeply home to him.

"When I found how the case really stood; when I saw what a tool I had been, I despised myself. I ought to have paid the penalty by staying right there and telling the truth, and working it out. But my pride wouldn't let me, and I was weak enough to want to screen him a little longer. I thought he might come out right and explain everything at last. I thought I could better earn the money elsewhere to discharge the claims, and when you did not answer my full, long letter, giving all the particulars, oh, Hildreth, that was a dark time! But, somehow, I believed through it all you believed in me. I thought father's family pride was up, and he would not let you write."

"It is so strange, so hard that we never received that letter. But, Rob, I did believe in you through it all."

"Bless you for that."

"And so did our father, though he was crushed."

"Oh, my father!" and sobs had their bitter way.

"Oh, what misery I wrought, Hildreth, for us all!"

"You were more sinned against than sinning; but hearts that are bound together should confide fully, always. There is danger always in the darkness of concealment."

"I thought I would write once more, but after everything turned against me so, my pride wouldn't let me. I had earned nearly enough to come home when I fell sick and was taken to the hospital, and it was all taken from me. I was robbed outright, and had to begin all over again. And it was such a drawback that I mended so slowly. And the sting of your not writing was worse than all."

"As your not writing, as we supposed, was the hardest part for us."

Robert's experiences and vicissitudes, the account of his going to the old home and learning of his father's death and Hildreth's removal; his surprise and grief upon learning that his sister's earnings had been used to discharge the claims against him; his full payment of the remaining liabilities, and liberal refunding of Hildreth's noble advance in his name; all these things can be but briefly touched upon here.

Robert made a beautiful home, where Hildreth presided until one whom the brother's heart approved, one worthy of our Hildreth, won her, and then the daughter of the beautiful woman whose whole nature had been quickened and brought back to life through Hildreth's ministry came, and with her mother's inherited grace, beauty and talent, and a true, loving heart, blessed it as Robert's wife.

Aunt Neator and her good husband John were at Hildreth's wedding, and are frequent guests.

Hildreth's life is full of blessing. From remembered dark hours of her loneliness, light has sprung for others wherever her hand could let it in. Her imperishable treasures are the fresh, green, living things of gratitude and almost worshipping affection which she has sought and found under the snows of chilled, repressed human lives. Strong tendrils from hearts that were ready to perish twine around her and her home. She brings them forth in beauty. She strengthens them with love.

INSUBORDINATION;

OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XIV.

TRoubles of a RUNAWAY APPRENTICE.

"WHAT luck, Ike?" was the first salutation I met from my two fellow-runaways.

"None at all," I replied, despondingly.

"This is rather a poor kind of a business, I'm thinking," said Bill, with an effort to seem indifferent. But I could see that he was far from being easy in mind.

"Poor enough," I said, 'as far as I have had anything to do with it. I wish I was safely back in Baltimore again.'

"Well, I can't just say that I do," replied Tom. 'I'm a free man now, and free I'm determined to stay. I'm going to quit the trade; what do you think of that?'

"Going to quit the trade!" I said, in surprise. 'Well, and what then?'

"Why, I mean to go to sea; for there is no chance of getting work here. Every boss shoemaker in the place suspects me of being a runaway apprentice, and won't have anything to do with me."

"But how are you going to get on board of a vessel?" I asked.

"That's easy enough. A schooner sails from here to-morrow for Norfolk; and the captain says he will give me a passage down; and when once there, he says, there will be chances enough to get to sea, either in the United States or merchant service. I want Bill to go, but he's afraid of salt water. Won't you go? I think I can get you a passage down."

"To this I shook my head. I never had much idea of going to sea."

"And what are you going to do, Bill?" I asked.

"Me?" he said, with a slight uneasy emotion. 'Why—why—seeing no chance of getting any work here, for every boss that I've been to see will have nothing to do with me, I have agreed to keep bar in a tavern.'

"Keep bar!" I said, in surprise; for, bad as I was, I had always thought it degrading to mix liquor for every drunken fellow and worthless negro.

"It's a fact," said Bill, rather sadly. 'I never thought I would come to this, but I must do it or starve.'

"When do you begin?" I asked.

"The present bar-keeper has become so worthless, that he is to be sent away this afternoon, and then I shall commence."

"You'd better go with me," said Tom.

"Bill shook his head."

"Suppose we all go back," said I.

"Never!" replied Tom, emphatically; and,

"Never," added Bill, with less heartiness.

"After wandering about for awhile we went down to the wharf on the Potomac, where lay the vessel in which Tom was to sail for Norfolk. The captain, who seemed to have taken a liking to him, wanted us all to stay to dinner. After this was over, we shook hands with Tom, who was to leave in the morning, and Bill and I went back to the city, a little melancholy at parting with an old companion, and at the doubtful prospect before us."

"As we entered the city, near the market house, Bill pointed to a sign before a low, dirty-looking grog-shop, on which were the words: 'LAFAYETTE HOTEL AND TRAVELLER'S RETREAT.'

"That's the place," he said.

"What place?" I asked, for I did not understand him.

"Why, the tavern where I am going."

"Don't call that a tavern, Bill," said I. 'It's nothing but a low, mean, dirty grog-shop.'

"Well, that's the place," he said, 'any how. You know the old copy the master set us at night school—Necessity knows no law.'

"I did not reply, for I felt too bad. In a few moments we were at the door, and I went in with him. The appearance here was even worse than it was outside. The room was small, with a counter and lattice work on one side. A row of decanters occupied one shelf, and below this were three barrels, marked, 'WHISKY,' 'BRANDY,' and 'RUM.' The upper shelves behind the counter were filled with a medley that it would be hard to describe. There were apples, cakes, herrings, onions, and tumblers containing marbles, slate-pencils, thimbles, etc. In the window were several decanters of liquor, with lemons between them, some cakes and some herrings. At the end of the row of shelves hung several strings of onions. This was the tavern! The inmates consisted of a red-faced man behind the counter, who greeted Bill as we entered with a kind word and a smile, two men playing dominoes at a table, a negro drinking at the counter, and a man half drunk lounging upon a bench. The fumes of the place, at first, made me feel sick; but in a little while I could breathe the air more freely. The keeper of the shop drew us some liquor, and after I had taken a glass I began to feel much happier than I had been for several days. Bill took his place as bar-keeper, and drew liquor and mixed punches and slings with a dexterity that seemed to gratify the owner of the place very much, for he looked upon every movement with a peculiar smile. I stayed until nearly night, and then went over again to Georgetown. The old lady seemed glad to see me, and asked why I had not been to dinner. I made some excuse, but did not give the true reason.

"I think I have got you some work," she said. "I went to see an old friend of mine in the trade, and he said he thought he could seat you."

"I was, of course, very much pleased at this intelligence, and in the morning Mrs. Armor went with me to the shop where work had been promised. I was surprised and confused on entering to find myself in the same shop where, but two or three days before, I had falsely stated that I had served my time in Washington.

"This is the young man I was speaking to you about," said my kind old friend, advancing to the counter, behind which stood the boss, busy at the cutting-board.

"I am sorry to tell you, Mrs. Armor," said the man, gravely, "that I can't seat him in my shop, eying me at the same time with a forbidding aspect.

"And why not?" she asked.

"Because he is a runaway apprentice, and a liar to boot!" replied the man, in a half angry tone.

"Mrs. Armor turned upon me a look of doubt and inquiry; and, thus appealed to, I said: 'I am sorry to say, Mrs. Armor, that, when questioned here a few days ago, I said that I had served my time in Washington. But what could I say? If I had confessed that I had left my master, what chance would there have been for work?'

"You understand now, sir, how he is situated, and why he tried to mislead you," said the old woman, turning to the owner of the shop. "He has been very badly treated, and almost forced to leave his master. He must have work or he can't live.

Won't you give him just a little? Without money or friends in a strange place!"

"No, I will not give him a bit of work!" he replied. "Let him go home to his master and behave himself. A boy that will lie about one thing will lie about another. And if you'll take my advice, Mrs. Armor, you'll turn him out of doors and tell him to go about his business."

"Never!" said the old woman, as she turned away, and we left the shop together.

"We walked along in silence until we came to her house, which we entered, and then she said kindly: 'Isaac, you mustn't be discouraged. All the people in Georgetown ain't like that man, if he is an old friend of mine. You must stay here until something turns up in your favor; and that will be right soon, I am sure.'

"I hope so," I said, gloomily. But I felt too bad to say much.

"After supper that night I went over to the city to see Bill. I found him busy behind the counter, mixing liquor for several persons who stood around the bar. He seemed cheerful, and even pleased, with his new employment; for he chatted away as lively as any of the noisy inmates of the tavern. He did not see me when I entered, for the room was pretty full, and as I retired to the back part, near a table where some men were playing cards and others throwing dice, I had a chance to look on without being observed. I soon saw him pour out some brandy in a glass, and, after adding some sugar and water, turn it off himself. I now saw that his face was flushed, and his manner excited.

"Getting tipsy, as I live!" I said, laughing to myself. At that moment his eye rested upon me, and I advanced to the bar.

"What'll you drink, Ike?" was his first salutation.

"Give me some brandy toddy," I said.

"That's the stuff for you. It'll do your heart good, Ike," he said, as he pushed my glass across the counter.

"I drank it off at a single draught, and soon began to feel my spirits rising. Bill was kept busy for the next hour by the constant calls of customers, and I had but little chance to talk with him. I sat near the table most of this time, looking at the keeper of the place and another man, who were playing cards. They had a good deal of money staked, and the tavern-keeper won at almost every game. The man with whom he was playing was a stout countryman, who grew more and more restless and excited every moment. Suddenly he sprang from the table.

"You have cheated me!" he cried, with a bitter oath, clenching his fist.

"You are a liar!" retorted the tavern-keeper, also springing up, and seizing the countryman by the throat. In the next moment a powerful blow from the latter knocked him at full length upon the floor.

"He was soon upon his feet again, his face inflamed, and his eyes flashing fire. With a dreadful oath, he hurled a chair, which he had seized, in rising, at the head of his antagonist, who, in turn, fell to the floor. Without giving him an opportunity to rise, the tavern-keeper kicked him in the face and stomach three or four times, causing the blood to gush from his mouth and nose. Then dragging him to the door, he dashed him into the street, swearing that if he come in again he would murder him. The man did not attempt to re-enter, and I felt greatly relieved. While the scuffle was going on, I had gone inside of the bar. Already, Bill seemed to have a degree of relish for such scenes.

"He's a whole team, isn't he?" he said, alluding to the keeper of the house. I felt no inclination to reply, and so remained silent. In a few minutes I went away, resolving never again to enter the place. Still more troubled in mind, I hastened along the lonesome way back to Georgetown. In the course of the next few weeks I got some work, and nearly all of the money I earned I gave to my kind old friend. Every now and then my desire to see Bill would return, and then I would go over to the city and spend an evening at the 'Lafayette Hotel.' Bill had learned to play cards, and dominoes, and to handle the dice-box. He would always insist upon my playing, and I ~~soon~~ grew fond of the pastime. Some little stake was always necessary to keep up the interest of the game, and this created a desire to be winner, and at last for the profits of successful playing. But I could rarely get ahead of Bill, who would win and pocket my money with as much pleasure as if I had been a stranger or his enemy. This continued until, one night, in returning from the city, I was caught in a heavy thunder-shower. From that night, for two or three months, I was unable to do anything at all. I had a long spell of sickness, and suffered much. But never once, during that time, did Mrs. Armor treat me with coldness. She continued to act like a mother. When I was able to go about, I could get no work. My clothes were nearly all worn out, and I did not want to be a burden any longer upon my old friend. As I said before, she gave me money enough to pay my passage as far as Fredericksburg. I did not see Bill before I started. To tell the truth, I was afraid that he would persuade me to take a game, and win my passage-money."

When Isaac had finished his story, which was listened to with much interest, Mr. Illerton remarked that runaway apprentices generally had a pretty hard time of it.

"Indeed they have, sir," returned Isaac.

"And I hope you will be happier when you go back," said Anne.

"I hope I shall, Miss Anne," replied the boy. "If I don't, I suppose it will be my own fault."

"I think it will, Isaac," she said. "For I am sure Mr. and Mrs. Hardamer will be very kind to you if you will only try to please them."

"Yes, that they will, Isaac, I can assure you," added Mrs. Anderson.

"How glad I shall be to get home once more!" said the boy, warming with the idea.

When the steamboat drew up to Potomac-Creek, Mr. Illerton handed Isaac a ticket for his passage back to Washington, and also slipped a bank-note into his hand, with an injunction not to forget his old friend in Georgetown. The tears stood in the eyes of the boy as he shook hands with Anne and Genevieve. But the parting was hurried and brief, and he was soon left alone, to linger for hours in the cabin of the steamboat before he was again on his way back. On his arrival in Washington, he went over to Georgetown to see Mrs. Armor.

"Why, bless my heart, Isaac, what has brought you back so soon?" exclaimed the old woman, in surprise, as he entered her humble abode.

"I am going home," was Isaac's brief answer.

"Perhaps it's the best thing you can do," said Mrs. Armor, her face brightening up. "I have often thought so, but I couldn't find the heart to urge it upon you. But what has made you change your mind?"

Isaac related the interview which had taken place on board of the steamboat, and ended by saying: "Here is the note which Mr. Illerton gave me. You see it is for fifty dollars. Get it changed and let me have as much as will carry me to Baltimore. The rest you will keep as part pay for what you have done for me."

The old woman was poor, and the charge Isaac had been to her, she had felt a good deal; still she did not want to take the boy's money, much as she stood in need of it.

"I don't think I can take it, Isaac," she said. "You want clothes very badly, and had better get yourself some."

"I won't have a dollar more than will carry me to Baltimore!" replied Isaac, emphatically. "So you will have to keep it."

The old woman did not reply. "A good deed is never lost," were the words which came into her thoughts; and she looked upon Isaac with a new feeling of regard, and with something of regret at the separation soon to take place.

CHAPTER XV.

GETTING HOME AGAIN.

"WHY, how do you do, Mr. Wilkins?" said Mr. Hardamer, who had opened his front door in answer to a rap, a few evenings after Genevieve had left with her husband for a new home in Virginia. "Come, walk in. It's a long time since I've seen you in my house. It does one good to meet his old friend, now and then, when he has time for a social chat. But my old friends have grown pretty scarce of late." The closing sentence was uttered in a lower, and somewhat desponding tone.

"But adversity tries the stuff our friends are made of," replied the individual addressed; "and it is almost worth the pain to have all false ones driven from around us."

"True, sir, true!" said Mr. Hardamer. "But, come, walk into the back room."

The appearance of Mr. Wilkins, after a suspension of his visits for a whole year, surprised both Geneva and Gertrude. The former received him with an easy, cheerful, unembarrassed manner, that made him at home with her; the latter, suddenly conceiving the idea that her old beau was on a wife-hunting expedition, and feeling a willingness to accept him in despair of making a better match, affected numerous smiling airs and attractive graces, and accorded to him a wordy welcome.

The conversation during the evening was, of course, general, and, after spending an agreeable hour or two, Mr. Wilkins went away, singularly pleased with his visit, and very much inclined to call again in a very short time. He had dropped in half out of curiosity to see what kind of a figure the high-minded young ladies cut under the new order of things, and partly for the want of some way in which to pass the evening.

"Mr. Wilkins has improved very much since he was here before, don't you think he has?" said Gertrude to her sister, after they had retired to their chamber.

"I don't know but that he has improved some," replied Geneva. "But it is some time since he was here and, perhaps, we see a little differently."

"He's as different as can be!" said Gertrude, in a positive tone; "and I give you fair notice that I'm going to set my cap for him. He's my old beau, any how! And so I shall expect that you'll not go to pushing yourself in between us."

"You needn't be afraid of that," replied Geneva, in a quiet tone. "But, really, Gertrude, I would wait a little, if I were you, to see whether he had any serious intentions. If he should have none, and you should allow your feelings to become too much interested, it will only cause you trouble."

"Oh, fiddlestick! What do you suppose he came here for?" said Gertrude, in a tone slightly irritated. "He's my old beau, and has come, of course, to renew the acquaintance. Didn't you see how peculiarly he smiled whenever he spoke to me. I believe he always did love me; and if it hadn't been that I had chances above him in view we would have been married and settled down long ago. Heigh ho! Well," ran on the matrimony-struck young lady, "I never thought it would have come to this; but the crooked stick has to be taken sometimes. Any how, I expect he is beginning to do pretty well in business, and I'll make a bargain with him, beforehand, that as soon as he is well enough off he is to quit the business and go to storekeeping. And then I can hold my head up with any of them. But I'll never keep company with Anne Earnest, or, rather, that Illerton's wife, see if I do. I despise her and her husband, too!"

Geneva did not reply, and her sister went on.

"He's an elegant-looking man, that's certain. Illerton looks like a fool alongside of him; and I don't believe, any how, that he's half as rich as he's made out to be. I wonder if he will come again to-morrow night," she continued, glancing at herself in the glass. "I hope he won't be ashamed to be seen coming into this screwed-up kind of a place. I am mad at pa every time I think about this dirty alley!"

"But he can't help it, you know, Gertrude," interposed her sister.

"What's the reason he can't, I'd like to know?" replied Gertrude, warming at this implied rebuke. "Couldn't he get as good a house and at as cheap a rent in an open street a little way up town? Be sure he could! And he crept in here on purpose to mortify us! I know him!"

"Well, any how, I wouldn't talk so," said Geneva, soothingly.

"What's the reason you wouldn't, ha?" replied Gertrude, evidently getting angry. "Oh, I forgot! you've begun to play pious. I'd go and join the church, if I was you. You'd make an acceptable member, no doubt!"

To this sneer, Geneva, though strongly tempted, made no reply. She felt a good deal irritated, as well as pained, but, happily, she controlled herself, and remained silent.

On the second evening after his visit Mr. Wilkins called again. From assiduous attention to business, he had obtained a good run of custom. And this was rapidly increasing. His stand was among the best in the city, and his customers men who paid promptly, and were willing to pay a good price for a good article. Since his first visit Mr. Hardamer had mentioned these things in his family, and Gertrude was more inflamed than ever with a desire to secure so valuable a prize, notwithstanding he was a shoe-maker. On this evening, in anticipation of a visit, she had dressed herself with extra care, and arrayed her face with extra smiles. But it so happened that Mr. Wilkins's eye would wander naturally from the silk dress of Gertrude to the plain calico one of Geneva—from her head, dressed off with a wreath of flowers, to that of her sister, upon which the dark hair was plainly parted; from the face set off with artificial smiles, to the one where an expression of meek thought ever rested. Geneva's countenance appeared to him much changed. Its aspect, though calm, indicated the existence of painful thoughts, and interested him exceedingly. He felt different when looking upon or conversing with Gertrude, and was annoyed by her manner toward him.

"It's a delightful evening, Mr. Wilkins," said the latter, during a slight pause, allowing her face to expand into what she conceived to be a most fascinating smile.

"Yes, it is very pleasant," he replied, deliberately, the recollection forcing itself upon him more strongly at every word that without it was foggy, and the air filled with a penetrating mist. "It is a little foggy, but, still, it is mild and pleasant."

Gertrude saw that she had made a blunder, but still she had gained what she wanted, the particular attention of the young man, and therefore cared little for it.

"Have you been to any parties lately?" she said, now that she had his ear.

"Not very lately," he replied. "Let me see. Yes; I was at one week before last."

"Ah, indeed! Where was it?" she asked, with animation.

"At Mr. Berlin's," replied Wilkins.

"Indeed! Have they begun to give parties? Why, the girls are mere children yet," said Gertrude, affecting surprise.

"Caroline is quite a womanly sort of a body, and entertained the company with ease. She is getting to be a favorite with the young men," remarked Mr. Wilkins.

This did not exactly please Gertrude, and she replied, "I never saw much of her that was interesting. Indeed, I have always looked upon her as forward beyond her years."

Mr. Wilkins was less pleased with this remark than any he had heard, either on the present or preceding evening, and he turned with a feeling of relief toward Genevra, who made some observation intended to divert the conversation from the censorious turn it had taken. Directing his remarks toward her, he elicited replies and observations that caused her to rise every moment more and more in his estimation. This, of course, did not escape the lynx-eyed observation of Gertrude, and her jealous and indignant feelings were kindled into an active flame. After he had gone Gertrude went up to her chamber, for she could not feel at ease in the company of her father and mother, or Genevra, since the latter had so suddenly changed, and sat with them usually, during the evenings, but little.

It was near ten o'clock, and while Mr. and Mrs. Hardamer, with their daughter, were engaged in some pleasing conversation, that a low and hesitating knock was heard at the front door. On opening it, Mr. Hardamer saw a pale-looking and poorly-dressed lad, who seemed disposed to shrink out of the circle of light made by the candle he held in his hand.

"Well, sir, what do you want?" said Mr. Hardamer, not recognizing at the moment his old apprentice.

"Don't you know me?" said Isaac, in a hesitating voice—for it was he.

"Ike! Is it possible!" exclaimed Mr. Hardamer, holding the light close to the face of the boy. "Well, what do you want?" he added, in a sterner tone.

"I have a letter for you from Genevieve," said Isaac.

"From Genevieve! Then come in, and let me have it," replied the old man, in a kinder tone.

Isaac entered, and was ushered, in a moment, into the room where sat Mrs. Hardamer and Genevra.

"Bless me, Isaac, is that you?" said Mrs. Hardamer.

"Yes, ma'am, it's me, I believe," said the boy, sadly.

"Come, take a seat," said Mr. Hardamer, "and let's have the letter you say you've got."

Isaac drew a letter from his pocket, the seal of which Mr. Hardamer broke, and then read aloud. It ran thus:

"MY DEAR FATHER:—I have met with Isaac, and have persuaded him to go home. He will hand you this. From what he has told me he has suffered a good deal since he went away, and is anxious to get back again. Speak kindly to him. I have pledged myself for his reception—and for the sake of your absent child, do not let him be punished in any way. I am sure he will be both industrious and obedient, and try all he can to please you. Thomas, he tells me, has gone to sea, and William is keeping bar in a grog-shop in Washington, and is turning out badly. Give to mother and sisters my affectionate regards and believe me ever your obedient child,
"GENEVIEVE."

After finishing the letter old Mr. Hardamer went up to Isaac, and extending his hand, said, "Welcome home again, my boy! You have brought a good recommendation."

The unexpected manner of his old master broke down the feelings of the boy still more, and in spite of all his efforts to restrain himself, he burst into tears.

"I will try and please you," said he, with an effort, as he regained some command over himself. "I confess that I acted wrong when I went away. But I have suffered enough for it. I am willing to make up all the time I have lost."

"If you come back in that spirit, Isaac," replied Mr. Hardamer, a good deal moved, "we shall, I am, sure, get along well enough. We have both, no doubt, been a little to blame for the past. But," he said, in a more lively tone, "'let has beens be has beens,' and for the future let us all try to do better, and to be better."

After Isaac had related where he had been, and what he had done while away, Mrs. Hardamer handed him a light and directed him in his way to the garret, where Jimmy slept, and whose bed he was now to share. It was after eleven o'clock when Isaac entered the garret. The noise of opening the door awoke the little boy, who, raising up, looked with surprise upon the apparition of his old fellow-apprentice.

"Well, Jimmy, you see I'm back again," said Isaac, setting down the candle with an air of confidence and satisfaction, for he began already to feel about one hundred per cent. better than he had felt for some months.

"I'm glad of it," replied Jimmy, as soon as his eyes were fairly open, and he comprehended the meaning of Isaac's unexpected presence; "for you'll like things now a great deal better than you used to."

"Well, I'm glad, too, Jimmy. And, so things are different from what they used to be?"

"Oh, yes, indeed are they," said the little boy, earnestly. "Why, I haven't been scolded nor beat for a long time. When Mr. Hardamer tells me to do anything, he doesn't speak so loud and cross as he used to, nor threaten to give me the stirrup. And Mrs. Hardamer is different, too. I get a great many more good things to eat than we used to—and she takes care of my clothes, and gets me new ones, too. I'm glad you've come back, for I know you'll like it better than you did. But I hope you won't plague any of them, like you used to."

"No, indeed, Jimmy, that I will not," replied Isaac, warmly. "But, hasn't the old man got no other boy but you?"

"No, I'm the only one yet," said Jimmy.

"The shop's been moved since I went away. Where is it now?" asked Isaac.

"We're down in South street. Mr. Hardamer got a cheap little shop down there, and so he moved away from Market street."

"Have you much work, now?" asked Isaac, continuing his interrogations.

"Yes, we've got as much as we can do."

"How many jours have you?"

"We've got six," replied Jimmy; "and Mr. Hardamer was just saying yesterday that he would have to seat another."

"Well, I'll save him that trouble," said Isaac, with an air and tone of satisfaction. "But how are the girls, Jimmy? The old man and woman are certainly very much changed, and I should think, from what I saw of Genevra this evening, that she is a little altered."

"She's been different for a week or so," replied Jimmy. "And I hope it will last. But Gertrude is pretty ugly yet. The others are about the same. But, you know they never used to trouble us much. Genevieve's husband has come and taken her away. And she was so glad to go; and all the family, except Gertrude, seemed so pleased with him, that I am sure he must have changed, too. I was very sorry when she went away, for she has been very good to me. And Anne, she has married Mr. Illerton," continued the boy, his whole manner changing to a lively exhibition of delight. "Everybody loves her. And she didn't forget me, neither. I went to see her after she was married, and she told me that she was going away for a little while, but would come back to live, and that if I would be a good boy she would always be glad to see me. And I know she will. If it was for nothing else, I would behave myself just to please her."

"And so would I, Jimmy," replied Isaac, with warmth. "It was she that persuaded me to come home, or else I wouldn't have been here now."

"She persuaded you! Why, where did you see her?" asked the little boy, in surprise.

Isaac referred to the meeting on board of the steamboat—and the two boys continued to talk over the past for an hour before they fell off to sleep.

CHAPTER XVI.

SHOWING A PREFERENCE.

WHEN Genevra went to her room on the night of Mr. Wilkins's second visit, she was surprised to find Gertrude still sitting up, with a countenance indicating great perturbation of mind.

"I thought you were in bed and asleep long ago," she said.

"Did you, indeed!" responded Gertrude, with a sneer.

To this Genevra did not reply, and her sister broke out passionately: "You're a mean, sneaking snake in the grass, so you are!"

"Really, I don't know what you mean, Gertrude!" she replied, pained exceedingly at this unexpected outbreak, and no little irritated at the sudden and unaccountable charge.

"Oh, no, of course not!" responded Gertrude. "Hypocrites are always very innocent! But I can see through all your tricks as clear as daylight. Didn't I tell you night before last that Mr. Wilkins came here to see me, and yet you tried to draw him off all you could? Do you suppose I couldn't see through you, ha?" and Gertrude walked about the small bed-chamber enveloped in a perfect atmosphere of angry excitement.

Here was a new difficulty for Genevra, whose good resolutions were of a very recent date. She was conscious of feeling gratified with the attentions paid her by Mr. Wilkins, and of being pleased with his conversation, and this rendered her position still more embarrassing. For some moments, owing to a powerful struggle in her mind, she remained silent. At length she said slowly, while a slight shade of sadness was in the tone of her voice: "Indéed, Gertrude, you bring a wrong charge against me. I made not the slightest effort to divert Mr. Wilkins's attention from you."

"It's a lie!" responded Gertrude, in a positive, angry tone, while her face burned and her eyes flashed.

Genevra felt for a moment a wild indignation; but, almost involuntarily, she turned her thoughts upward, and in the silence of a troubled heart uttered this prayer: "Deliver me from evil."

Instantly she felt a consciousness that in silence was her only hope for self-control; and sealing the words within her lips that were fast rising upon her tongue, she quickly disrobed, got into bed and turned her face to the wall.

Gertrude's anger had reached its culminating point, up to which it had suddenly ascended, and now it began slowly to decline. She, too, prepared for rest, and in a few minutes put out the light and got into the same bed with her sister. Still she was so much excited, and kept indulging her angry feelings against her sister so constantly, that she felt no inclination to sleep. Nor could Genevra, although she lay perfectly quiet, find oblivion for her troubled thoughts in refreshing slumber. It was probably an hour after Gertrude had lain down, and while she was still kept awake by the agitation of her feelings, that her sister, who she had supposed fast asleep, suddenly sobbed out, though vainly endeavoring to control herself. Genevra's thoughts had been busy with many painful reminiscences; and these, with the disturbance produced by her sister's unkind remarks, had kept her awake. Gradually she fell into a state of nervous, half-dreamy wretchedness. In vain did she try to force from her thoughts the ideas and images that distressed her. They constantly recurred, upon every effort to banish them, in new forms and with added pain. In the end, she lost the control of her feelings and sobbed aloud. For more than a minute this continued, before she could restrain the passionate outbreak. Gertrude was startled for a moment, and something like a shade of regret for what she had said passed through her mind. But evil thoughts quickly displaced the momentary good impression, and she hardened her heart against her sister, and experienced an emotion of pleasure at having given her pain. But Geneva soon regained her self-control. The sudden ebullition subsided, and a peaceful calm fell upon her spirit. In a few minutes more her senses were locked in quiet and refreshing sleep. The same sweet slumber did not visit the eyelids of Gertrude. Many frightful dreams started her from her pillow; and more than once, when thus suddenly awakened, did she shrink, trembling with a strange supernatural fear, close to the side of her sister. When the morning dawned she blessed the light that relieved her from the terrors of an imagination that gave form to the evil thoughts and feelings which she delighted to cherish.

A few days afterward, Gertrude was invited to spend the evening out, and it so happened that Mr. Wilkins dropped in after night, and found Geneva alone. He was more pleased at this than he was even willing to acknowledge to himself. And, notwithstanding the sad rating which Gertrude had given her, Geneva felt a secret delight, which she in vain endeavored to banish.

The conversation that passed between them during the evening was mainly of a general character; but almost involuntarily did each examine the words and tone of the other, as if in search of some meaning concealed beneath the uttered sentiments. The visit closed by an invitation from Mr. Wilkins to attend with him a concert to be given on the succeeding evening. Geneva, of course, accepted the invitation. But now a new source of trouble and difficulty presented itself. Such a marked preference for her company would, doubtless, so exasperate Gertrude as to cause most unpleasant consequences. While still seated, after Mr. Wilkins had gone away, turning and turning the difficulty over in her mind, without seeing any way of escape, her sister came home.

"Has anybody been here?" she asked, fixing her eyes upon Geneva.

For a moment the perplexed girl hesitated, and then replied: "Yes, Mr. Wilkins has been here."

"He has?" said Gertrude, in a tone indicating surprise, disappointment and rising anger against her sister.

"Yes," was the brief reply of Geneva, who felt a little irritated at the manner and assumption of her sister, as well as troubled at the aspect of things.

"You sent him word, I suppose, that I was out," said Gertrude, making the charge with a manner that indicated her belief in the truth of what she alleged.

"Why, Gertrude?" responded Geneva, suddenly rising to her feet.

"You needn't put on that hypocritical face, young lady. I know you!" said Gertrude, with a sneer. "You're just the one for such a mean, low-lived trick. But never mind, I'll be even with you!"

And, so saying, Gertrude took up a light and hurried off to her chamber. Mrs. Hardamer's attention had been attracted by the loud and angry tone of Gertrude's voice, and she was just on the eve of coming down to see what was the matter, when that young lady hurried past her chamber door. A feeling of uneasiness still prompted her to descend. She found Geneva with her head buried in her arms, which were resting on the table before her.

"Geneva, what is the matter, child?" she asked, in a voice of concern.

Geneva lifted her head, and her mother perceived that the tears were fast flowing from her eyes.

"Tell me, my child, what is the matter?" she repeated, more anxiously.

As soon as Geneva could so far control her feelings as to speak, she said: "Gertrude has been talking very unkindly to me; and it seems as if I could not bear it."

"What was it about?" asked Mrs. Hardamer.

Geneva hesitated a moment or two, and then said: "I would rather not say, mother, just now; but indeed I am not to blame, for I have not done what she charges against me."

"Then, Geneva," replied her mother, "if you have done nothing, it will all come right at last. But do not, let me beg of you, engage in any quarrel or dispute with Gertrude. No good, but much harm, can come from it. I would rather see you suffer wrong in silence, than have any jarring with your sister. I cannot tell you, my child, how greatly your recent effort to do right has affected your father and myself. Do not disappoint us in the hope we daily cherish, that you will never again give way to wrong desires and passions."

"I will try and not disappoint you," replied Geneva, the tears starting afresh. "But I find it so hard to keep down my feelings, when anything happens to irritate me. I am sometimes afraid that all my efforts will be of no use. And to think of being as I have been—oh, mother! I wouldn't for all the world act and think and feel as I once did!" and she looked eagerly into her mother's eyes, with an expression that asked, as plainly as words, for some direction, or some power of self-control.

Mrs. Hardamer, in her efforts to act from higher motives than such as had governed her for so many years, encountered as painful difficulties as those against which Geneva had to struggle. And she, too, had felt the insufficiency of human effort. But, in the sincere desire for a change of character, a desire created out of the very painfulness of her former state, a new light had dawned upon her. From an almost paralyzing sense of human weakness, had sprung a confiding trust in that Being who is Goodness itself and Wisdom itself. And she had, many times, when sorely tempted, lifted almost involuntarily her heart, and breathed an inward prayer for help. Nor had she failed to remark that, after this silent invocation for aid, the evil that was struggling within her had less power, and soon retired, leaving her mind in a state of great tranquillity. Her first thought, when Geneva ceased speaking, was to direct her to the same source for that power which she did not herself possess, and she said: "I have already learned, my dear child, that our own efforts to shun evil will soon prove insufficient to protect us in temptation. We must look to Him who is the source of all good; and, if we do so, then we shall be able to conquer. In no other way, I am sure, can we successfully fight against our constant propensity to give way to anger or selfishness."

And, as Mrs. Hardamer endeavored to point out the right way to her child, her own mind was enlightened, and she saw more clearly the truth she was endeavoring to impart. In this she realized what thousands have experienced, but few observed, viz., that so soon as we make the effort, from motives of regard to others, to give to them right and timely instruction, our own minds become enlightened.

When Geneva went up to her chamber her sister had already retired. No word was uttered by either, and in a short time she sunk away into a peaceful slumber. On the next day her greatest trouble was the anticipated effect the knowledge of her invitation to attend the concert with Mr. Wilkins that evening would have upon Gertrude. One thing she resolved, and that was to seal her lips in silence, no matter what her sister might say to her. After turning over the matter in her mind, she determined to ask her mother's advice, and, accordingly, stated her difficulty. Mrs. Hardamer thought a few moments, and then said: "I will manage this for you, Geneva. Let me inform Gertrude first of your invitation, and perhaps I can prevent her ill-temper from breaking forth."

Geneva was, of course, very glad of this interference, and felt a good deal relieved in mind. Gertrude was bitter in her language against her when Mrs. Hardamer told her that she was going to a concert that night with Mr. Wilkins. But there was something in her mother's tone and manner that soon checked a further expression of angry feelings.

"And remember," said Mrs. Hardamer, in closing, "that you must not use any improper language to Geneva. You have accused her falsely, and there you must rest. Neither your father nor myself can any longer suffer you to quarrel as you have done. We are both positive in this and will be obeyed."

The way in which this was uttered carried with it, to the mind of Gertrude, a conviction that she must yield at least a degree of external obedience; but it in no way modified the feelings of resentment which she bore toward her sister. These she still cherished with added rancor.

Happily relieved from an unpleasant collision with her sister, Geneva dressed herself, and, when Mr. Wilkins came for her, was ready to go with him. Gertrude did not show herself when he called. She was in her chamber chewing the cud of bitter and evil fancies.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE CO-PARTNERSHIP.

IT was probably a month from the time in which the incidents of the last chapter occurred that Mr. Wilkins dropped into the shop of old Mr. Hardamer. After a conversation of some ten or fifteen minutes on the ordinary topics of the day, the former said: "I've been thinking for the last week or so of making a proposition to you."

"Well, what is it?" said Mr. Hardamer.

"I don't know what you will think of it," replied the other, "but it strikes me if we were to unite our shops it would be better for both of us."

"Why, as to that," said Mr. Hardamer, "I don't know what to say. I have never thought of anything of the kind; but, as you have, suppose you state some of the advantages."

"Well, they are just these, as I think," replied Mr. Wilkins. "My shop is larger and a better stand than yours. Your custom is not half what it would be, if you were where I am, and mine is hardly enough to justify my expenses. If we join, your custom will, I am sure, double, and mine cannot fall off; so that it must be advantageous to both of us. I could then do all the out-doors' work, which would be a relief to you, of course. And the business would not then suffer while I was away from the shop."

"That all seems to look very well," said Mr. Hardamer, "and, at first sight, it seems to me that such an arrangement would be advantageous to both of us. Still, I should like to turn it over in my mind for a few days."

"That, of course, you ought to do," said Mr. Wilkins.

"By Saturday I will give you an answer, one way or the other," said Mr. Hardamer, "and, in the meantime, do you look at the subject in every possible light."

On Saturday, Mr. Wilkins called in again, when Mr. Hardamer said: "Well, I have thought a good deal of your proposition since you were here, and the more I think about it, the better I like it. My own affairs are assuming a brighter aspect, and I know your business to be good. And let me say to you, Mr. Wilkins, that there is no man in the business with whom I would have any connection, except yourself."

"I thank you, warmly, for your good opinion," replied Mr. Wilkins. "I have, also, thought much of the subject since I mentioned it to you, and see no reason for not entering, as soon as each one of us can suitably arrange his own business, into the co-partnership. And this matter in a fair way of settlement, I might as well say to you that, if you have no objections, I should be pleased to form with you a closer alliance. I like your daughter Geneva."

"And if she likes you, why there's an end of the matter," said Hardamer, with a broad smile of satisfaction, which he could not conceal.

That evening Mr. Wilkins called in to see Geneva, as he was now in the habit of doing almost every evening, and Mr. and Mrs. Hardamer left them, as usual, alone. Gertrude was ensconced in her chamber, in no amiable mood, a place of refuge from the presence of Mr. Wilkins, which she did not fail to seek whenever that gentleman was announced.

"I've got a letter here from Genevieve," said Mr. Hardamer to his wife, after they were alone, drawing from his pocket the welcome epistle.

"Indeed!" ejaculated Mrs. Hardamer, with pleased surprise, "then read it, for I am very anxious to hear from her."

Mr. Hardamer put on his spectacles, and after unfolding the letter, read:

"MY DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER.—Four pleasant weeks have hurried by, like so many days; and now I must lay aside everything and write to you, for I know that you are very anxious to hear from your child. Four weeks! It does not seem possible that it is so long since I left you. But happy days pass swiftly. I have found Mr. Anderson's mother everything that my heart could desire. She loves him with great tenderness, and has received me as if I were her own child. Mr. Anderson has two sisters, one of them married and away from home; the other single and with us. She is a good girl, and seems to delight in anything that pleases either her brother or myself. I never saw a family where there was such harmony and good feeling between all the members. Mr. Anderson, who, although he has no diploma, has a license from some medical college, intends practising medicine in this county, and has given notice to that effect. He seems to be very much liked here; although he was formerly, as you know too well, very wild and inconsiderate. Already he has had several calls, and the neighbors say that he will do well.

"Mr. Illerton's father lives close by us, and Anne spent a whole month with them. She has just gone home. They were all delighted with her. She promised me that she would call and see you; I hope she will, frequently, for I know you will like her very much; and she will be of so much use to Geneva, who, I sincerely hope, is still trying to do right. Speak to her affectionately from me, and tell her that only by perseverance in the good way she has entered, can she possibly find happiness."

"Heaven bless her!" said the old man, wiping his eyes, as he finished reading the letter from which the above is an extract. "She's no happier than she deserves to be."

After a brief pause, to collect her thoughts and feelings, Mrs. Hardamer said: "I have too, a little pleasant news. Mr. Wilkins has offered himself to Geneva."

"I'm a little ahead of you there," replied Mr. Hardamer, smiling. "He has made proposals to me for her hand; and, besides that, we have agreed to go into business together."

"Why, when did all that happen?" exclaimed Mrs. Hardamer, in surprise and pleasure.

"It all happened to-day. And a good day's business I should call it," said Mr. Hardamer, a little proudly.

Sometime within a month from that evening, a small wedding party assembled at Mr. Hardamer's. Among those present, and as pleased as any, were Isaac Wilson and little Jimmy. Both were neatly dressed, and both wore cheerful countenances. From the quiet, happy face of this newly-wedded child the old man's eyes often turned to those of his only two apprentices, and an occasional sad thought would cross his mind, as memory called up the forms of two others who might have been there and as cheerful, too, if he had extended to them that care and watchful regard which a master should always have over his apprentices. But he banished such thoughts as quickly as possible. Gertrude forced herself, from pride and maidenly shame, to appear pleased. She kissed the cheek of her sister, after the ceremony was performed; but the act was not from love. It was only for the eyes of others. In her heart she cherished feelings toward Geneva so nearly allied to hate, that, if they could have been separated from all associated affections and presented to her in their true character, she would have been startled at their hideous deformity. Ever and anon, as her eye would rest upon the happy face of her sister and then glance from it to the manly countenance of her husband, would she feel fresh pangs of jealous indignation. But Geneva was too much absorbed in her own delight to see that any one present was disturbed. She was even deceived by her sister's manner toward her, and fondly thought that she, too, had seen her error and had resolved to cultivate kinder and gentler sympathies. But we turn away from the pleasant scene, in which was but one troubled heart, and that one troubled because evil thoughts and desires were cherished.

The new and brighter aspect which affairs had now assumed had the effect to encourage Mrs. Hardamer. She, too, like her husband, could not help glancing back, and, in noting the changes of a year, she found the words again recurring to her thoughts, "Sweet are the uses of adversity." The troubles and disappointments which she had experienced had been wonderfully effective in tearing the scales from her eyes. And now, that there seemed to have come the dawn of a better day, her resolutions to perform all known duties were strengthened, because, in the new light which had broken upon her mind, she saw clearly that only in the way of duty could there be true happiness. Never, until recently, since her children were babes, had she found as much pleasure as pain in their company. Her own, as well as their unhappy tempers, had created a condition of things the very opposite of domestic tranquility. But the example of Genevieve had done a great deal toward correcting much that was wrong in the disposition of her three younger sisters.

The gradual process of change which had been going on in Mrs. Hardamer's own mind also had its good effect. And, since Genevra had tried to put away some of her evils, there had been a different sphere pervading her whole family—a sphere which none but Gertrude could resist—and her resistance was becoming every day more feeble, because she found it a vain resistance. And, with this wonderful change, both Mr. and Mrs. Hardamer saw that a condition of worldly prosperity was also opening before them. But, trouble had done its legitimate office. They no longer looked to riches and to the privileges of wealth as the true sources of happiness. A state of freedom from evil affections, bringing eternal peace, they saw to be the only state truly desirable. With this, riches would prove a blessing—without it, a curse.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONCLUSION.

THE double co-partnership formed by Mr. Wilkins none of the parties had cause to regret. His wife still persevered in her efforts to act from higher motives than the mere selfish ones that had ruled her so long. The business had increased since he and Mr. Hardamer joined their shops, even more than either of them had anticipated. Work came in upon them with a rapidity and steadiness that made it necessary, in a few months, to nearly double their force. In the present was cheerfulness and contentment, and in prospect a high degree of prosperity.

Leaving now the different members of this family to act out in their legitimate spheres, their several duties, we will briefly sketch an incident or two in the lives of some other characters introduced in the course of the story, and then assign the whole to the reader.

It was probably about twelve months from the time of Genevra's marriage that a man of dissipated appearance, though perfectly sober, applied at the shop of Messrs. Hardamer & Wilkins for work. The trade was brisk, and hands in demand, and so the journeyman was promptly seated. He gave his name as Wilson. There was little in his appearance that was prepossessing, for he was miserably clad, and his countenance indicated the free indulgence of sensual passions. Still, he did not seem to be a bold transgressor; for he rarely joined in the conversation of the shop; and he certainly showed a disposition to reform at least one bad habit, for he resolutely refused to touch any kind of intoxicating drink. Gradually his looks improved, and after he had obtained new clothes he presented the appearance of a respectable man. Still, he went out but little, and always seemed to be thinking about something that troubled him.

"Come, Wilson, let's have a plate of oysters and some brandy punch," said one of the journeymen to him on a Saturday evening. "It does one good, now and then, to indulge a little."

"No, I would rather not," said Wilson.

"Oh, nonsense, come along! I believe you're actually afraid to drink," urged the other, with a slight expression of ridicule. "If the truth was known, it would be found, I expect, that you are an old bruiser at the bottle, and are afraid to touch it for fear of getting drunk."

"I expect it would," replied Wilson, gravely, while a shade of sadness flitted over his countenance.

"Then you won't go with me?" said his fellow-journeyman.

"No, indeed, that I will not!" responded Wilson, positively. "A burnt child, they say, dreads the fire."

"Well, you can do as you like," said the other; "but, thank fortune, I am man enough to drink when I please, and leave off when I please."

Wilson did not reply, and the other went out, leaving him alone with Isaac.

"Well, I'm glad you didn't go," said Isaac, warmly, after the tempting and ridiculing journeyman had gone out. "I have never felt like touching any kind of liquor since I saw my old fellow-apprentice, Bill Grimes, turn to mixing it for niggers and dirty blackguards in Washington."

"Were you ever at Washington, Isaac?" asked Wilson, with evident interest.

"Yes, I was there once, and I don't care if I never see the place again."

"Why so?"

"Because, if I must tell you, I was once fool enough to run away from my master, and foot it all the way to Washington. And a sorry enough time I had of it. Nobody would give me any work, and I believe I should have died if it hadn't been for one of the best old women in the world, over in Georgetown, who took me in and acted toward me just like a mother."

"You were fortunate in that part of your adventure, certainly," remarked Wilson, shading his eyes with his hand, and looking Isaac in the face. "What was the kind old woman's name?"

"Her name was Mrs. Armor," replied Isaac.

"Mrs. Armor," repeated the journeyman, in a mechanical and abstracted tone. Then seeming to rouse himself, he said, "And so she was kind to you?"

"Indeed she was. She took me into her house and kept me while I was sick and had nothing to do; and, though she was very poor herself, never seemed to begrudge me anything. And when I couldn't get any work in Georgetown, she gave me money enough to take me to Fredricksburg, where there was a seat of work vacant."

The journeyman still sat shading his eyes with his hand, but did not reply, and Isaac continued, "One reason why she was so good to me, I believe, was because she had a son who had left his master and gone off, she didn't know where; for she said she hadn't heard from him in a good many years. How she seemed to love that son! Not a day passed that she didn't speak of him, and wonder where he was, and what he was doing. She said she never would die in peace until she had seen him; but sometimes she would talk about his being dead, and then the tears used to roll down her cheeks in great drops."

A sound, as of a sob, checked Isaac in his narration, and he looked up inquiringly into the journeyman's face; but the shadow from his hand concealed its expression, and defied the keen glance of the boy. But, somehow or other, he did not feel inclined to say more, and no further questions being asked, he remained silent.

On the next morning Wilson applied to Mr. Hardamer to be paid off, and left the shop with about thirty dollars in his pocket and a new suit of clothes on his back.

Late in the afternoon of the same day he descended from a stage that drove up to Gadsby's Hotel, in Washington, and stepping off at a quick pace up the avenue, was soon passing over toward Georgetown. The sun was just setting as he reached the elevated ground by the President's house, which gave him a full view of the Heights of Georgetown, and, heaving a sigh, he hurried on with a quickened pace.

Not long after he stood before a small and poor looking house, at the upper end of the town, and with a flushed face and agitated frame, knocked at the door. It was opened by an old woman, who looked at him inquiringly.

"Does Mrs. Armor live here?" he asked.

"Yea, sir, that is my name," she replied. "Will you walk in?"

He entered, and Mrs. Armor closed the door.

"And, so you don't know me, mother?" he said, while his voice trembled and his whole frame shook.

"John! my son! Oh, is it you?" exclaimed Mrs. Armor, suddenly, lifting her eyes and hands, and then throwing her arms around his neck.

"Yes, mother, it is your erring son, at last returned," he said, giving way to tears.

"Heaven be praised!" ejaculated the mother, looking upward, as she withdrew her arms from the neck of her son, and clasped her hands together.

It was a little over ten years from the time the incidents mentioned in the last chapter occurred, that four men were seated at a table in a drinking house in the vilest part of New Orleans playing cards. They appeared to be strangers. One of them was a sailor, and almost every word he uttered was coupled with some disgusting expletive or shocking oath. The other three seemed to be boatmen, and it was evident that they were men of bad hearts. All four were more than half drunk, and yet exhibited a keen desire to win from each other. The sailor lost frequently, and at every failure of his luck he swore more and more bitterly. At last he threw down a five-dollar bill, his last money. In a few minutes it passed over to the pile of cash along side of the man who sat next to him.

"If you can beat me, or cheat me, I can whip you!" cried the sailor, as his last bill vanished, and he sprung from the table, and thrust his clenched fist into the face of the man who had won from him.

Quick as thought, a knife glanced in the dim light of the shop, and in the next moment the blood gushed from the side of the sailor. He fell with a groan to the floor. The individual who had stabbed him coolly replaced his knife, and looked on with a drunken and indifferent stare, while others attempted to stop the flow of blood.

"Who is he? Does any one know?" was asked by many voices.

"Ask him his name," cried another, "while he is able to speak."

"Who are you? What is your name?" was shouted in the ear of the wounded man.

"Thomas Peters," he replied, in a feeble tone.

"Tom Peters!" ejaculated the individual who had committed the rash and murderous deed, pressing forward, and bending over to catch a glimpse of the face of the man. A single glance sufficed. In the next moment he glided from the house, and hurried to the residence of a physician.

On the arrival of that individual at the scene of blood, he proceeded to examine into the condition of the wounded man, and soon ascertained that the stab he had received was not mortal. No effort was made to arrest the individual who had committed the act, for all in that den of evil felt a sympathy for any one who had become amenable to law. The physician, after dressing the wound and giving the necessary directions, hurried away, for he hardly felt that his life was safe a moment among the wretches that crowded the room.

After he was gone, the man who had stabbed Peters—the reader's old acquaintance Tom—gave directions to have him removed to a chamber, and provided for at his expense. During the whole night he sat by the bedside of the man whose life he had attempted, sometimes listening to his feeble breathing, sometimes fixing his eyes long and sadly upon the pale face of the insensible sleeper, and sometimes resting his head upon his hand, for an hour at a time, in sad and painful thought.

Toward daylight, Peters became sensible for the first time since the affray, and looked about him wildly.

"What's the matter? Where am I?" he said, with an imprecation, attempting to rise. But he sunk back upon his pillow, exhausted by the effort.

"You made a narrow escape, Tom Peters. But you are safe now," said the individual who had been watching beside him through the night.

"Who are you, ha, that calls me Tom Peters?" replied the wounded man, turning a quick and searching glance upon his companion.

"Don't you know me, Tom?" said that person, rising to his feet, and placing himself so that the light of the dim lamp would fall upon his countenance.

"I think I know your voice. But that is not the face, surely, of Bill Grimes!" responded Peters, in surprise.

"It may be very much changed from what it was, Tom, but still it is the face of Bill Grimes, your old fellow apprentice, and none other."

"Then we are both a little the worse for wear, I'm thinking. But who was it that stabbed me, ha?" And Peters launched a volley of curses at the head of the murdering villain, as he called him, who had attempted his life.

"I stabbed you, Tom," said the other. "But you roused the devil in me by insinuating that I cheated you. I didn't know it was you, or I'd have cut my hand off before I harmed a hair of your head. But the doctor says you are not dangerous, and I hope you'll soon be out."

"Well, here's my hand, Bill," said Peters, stretching out his arm with a feeble effort. "A sailor never bears malice, and is always true to an old friend."

The other took the proffered hand and grasped it warmly.

After the recovery of Peters, neither he nor Grimes made any attempt to lead a better life, but attached themselves to each other in a kind of evil fraternity, and followed the devices of their own hearts. The end, when it came, was sad enough for both. One died in a drunken fit, of cold and exposure, in a northern city whither he had drifted; and the other, after a year passed in prison for some crime, lost his life in a quarrel. They dropped out of life, no one caring for them, or remembering them, except with pity, contempt or execration.

HID IN A ROSE.

BY CLIO STANLEY.

WE were poor, but not miserably so. Only, we were obliged to do something to live well—worldly well, I should have said; but the doing never hurt or disgraced us, and we managed to live in a pleasant, dainty sort of a way, and neither of us ever thought of finding fault with our circumstances.

We had been a large family once—that was when the old house was new, and all the walks about it were paved with the gold of the sunshine. Now the roof was overgrown with moss, the paint was faded to a dingy kind of no-color, the boards were parting in small, unnoticed places, and the trees had grown so tall under the ministry of sun and rain, and had taken to themselves so many branches, that the sunlight could hardly find a way through.

Alice and Daisy were twins, and twelve years younger than I; two brothers and a little sister, with blue eyes and sunny hair, into which the splendor of the summer heavens had fallen, had been between us, and had died years and years before. Lily was our little sister still, and would wake some day with the sweet child-smile on her pure face! And Dane and David, the little rosy-cheeked, black-eyed boys, who had chased each other over the hills, and filled the air with merry shouts, they, too, would awake, young and gay as they were twenty years ago!

Twenty summers the wild flowers had blossomed, and the snows of twenty winters had fallen on their little graves, and the dark braids of my hair were already interspersed with silver threads.

It was the birthday of Alice and Daisy, and therefore a holiday; but, as the afternoon wore away, Alice and I took out some work of our own, while Daisy, curled up in the big rocking-chair, with a volume of poems in her hand—Goethe or Uhland, I don't remember which, but some old German whom Daisy admired and quoted to us whenever we gave her an opportunity.

Alice was embroidering a tiny velvet sacque, that was to adorn her own slender figure—and a very marvel it was in my eyes; while I—well, I am not ashamed to own that I was mending the dainty white stockings that just fitted Daisy's pretty feet. You would have loved to look at them; you could imagine so easily the little feet hidden away under the delicate embroidery! Snowy and plump they were, and you would scarcely hear a footfall if she danced from one end of the house to the other.

The afternoon faded into twilight, followed by a quiet evening, until, I think, all at once we all three began to long for a little excitement.

I rolled the stockings up into a little ball and tossed them into Daisy's lap, and for once she, of her own accord, closed the tiny, precious volume, tossing it over to me with a smile which showed that she understood my mood.

By the time I had put the book away in the old-fashioned book-case, standing in the corner, Alice had her work neatly folded and the fire stirred to a cheerful blaze.

"What are we to do?" asked Daisy, saucily, turning her blue eyes toward me, as if I had been unconsciously the disturber of the peace.

"Yes, we were quiet enough," echoed Alice, the color flashing in and out of her fair cheeks; "and why couldn't you have let us alone, Yune?"

I was baptised Yurette, but the sisters always called me Yune.

"Oh, well," I rejoined, "if you are both so sorry to be disturbed, I will go away and amuse myself."

But, before I could take a step, there was Alice holding one hand and Daisy the other, and both of them laughing and talking in a breath.

"Now, Yune, you know we were not in earnest, just as well as we know that you have some new pleasure in store for us. Do tell us, quick!"

I hadn't, really, up to that moment, any definite idea about how we were to amuse ourselves, but I began to stir up my ideas in a sort of eager fashion, while they watched me. Our resources were small, and I almost feared we had exhausted them.

There was a garret full of strange relics, but it was too cold to rummage there; and there was a curious Indian box of bits of scented wood, oddly joined together, filled, no doubt, with relics that would serve for many a wonderful story; but then we had long had a tacit agreement among ourselves, that the Indian box should be opened only on a Christmas night. And, at last, I had thought of the right thing; there was the wonderful quilt, folded away in the cedar chest. It was made of beautiful silk blossoms, cut of the loveliest colors, sewed on a pure-white ground. In the very centre was a crimson rose, and under this and every other flower, mamma had told us, there was hidden a tiny note written by the friend who had contributed the flower.

It had been our Aunt Margaret's bridal bed-quilt; but she had never used it afterward, because she would not have its splendor spoiled. When she died, eleven years after her marriage, she left the quilt to Daisy—no fingers but hers were to lift the wonderful flower-leaves, or discover the little treasures of Thought and Affection hidden now for nearly half a century!

As soon as I thought of that, I put away their detaining hands, and ran up-stairs for it. The cedar chest stood in the corner of my room, and raising the lid, I took out the bulky package, carefully tied up in linen, and went back with it. I remember, to this day, as I crossed the hall, how the moonlight shone in through the small panes of the window, making squares of silver on the floor. Over this shining path I walked with my precious burden.

Alice was holding open the door for me as I descended the stairs, and both of them cried out with delight when they saw what I carried.

We pushed back the chairs and table, and spreading it out over the gay floor-cloth, we gathered around it.

The fireshine fell over us with a sweet illumination, met half-way by the paler light from the wax candles; and, no doubt, an artist would have made a bright picture of our eager faces—Alice and Daisy, so fair and beautiful, and even my dark, plain face, more pleasant than usual, with the light of expectation upon it.

"Lift the lily first," said Alice, softly.

And Daisy parted the snowy leaves and pulled out a little pink note, folded cornerwise, and smelling of rose-leaves.

There was a little verse written in pale ink, which Daisy read aloud:

"Flowers to the fair—to you these flowers I bring,
And strive to greet you with an earlier spring;
Flowers, sweet and gay and delicate like you—
Emblems of innocence and beauty, too."

"Oh, look at that sunflower, Daisy! Do open that next."

And the yellow disk was pulled apart, and on a bit of blue paper appeared these quaint lines:

"With expectation beating high,
Myself I now desire to spy;
And straight I in a glass surveyed
An antique lady, much decayed,
Whose languid eye and pallid cheek
The conquering power of time bespeak."

But, though deprived of youthful bloom,
Free was my face from peevish gloom.
A cap, though not of modern grace,
Hid my gray hairs and decked my face;
Whoe'er had seen me, must have said,
There goes one cheerful, pleased old maid."

"Oh, Yune! I believe you tucked that in yourself," cried Daisy. "Doesn't it sound just like her, Allie?"

"Indeed, no!" I hastened to say. "I have not meddled with a single flower."

Carefully Daisy's pink-and-white fingers wandered among the flowers—daisies and buttercups and blue-bells—and, curious enough and sad enough were some little effusions, when we remembered that the hands that fashioned the flowers were long ago folded under the real blossoms of spring-time.

"Now, for the great rose!" said Alice, laughing.

But, as Daisy put one little finger under the reddest leaf there came a sudden loud knock at the hall door.

I opened it, but could see nothing for a white gust of snow that swept by me, extinguishing the candle I carried.

"Does Margaret Thane live here?" a strange voice demanded.

"No," said I.

And then I felt two light hands laid upon my shoulders, and turned around to see Daisy standing there, her young face shining with a shy eagerness.

"What is it, Yune?" she said, softly.

"I was directed here," the stranger said again, hesitating a little. "I am looking for Margaret Thane."

"She died years ago," I replied, quickly.

"But that is my name, too," said Daisy, looking at me reproachfully. "Won't you come in?"

And the little hand was reached past me out into the darkness of the wintry night, and before I could collect my scattered wits the young stranger was inside the door, shaking the snow from his coat.

A frank, brave face met my gaze when the cap and mufflers were thrown aside. Brown, curling hair, browner eyes, shaded by dark lashes, and a merry, laughing mouth. The red lips, parting, introduced our strange visitor, by name John Oldbury.

"I am young John," he said, when, the first excitement over, we had settled to sober talk, "and I am sent by old John to translate a letter supposed to be in the possession of Margaret Thane."

"We have been reading old letters all the evening," said Daisy, her blue eyes dancing merrily, "but we haven't found any that required a translation."

"Hush, Daisy!"

I said it softly, as I noticed the admiring gaze of the stranger lingering on her bright face.

But she had deftly unrolled the gay quilt and spread it out at his very feet.

"It is under that red rose," he said, slowly, while I listened in astonishment. "A great many years ago, my uncle, John Oldbury, was in love with your aunt, Margaret Giles; but before he had told her of the one strong passion of his life, she married your father's brother, David Thane. Her friends gave her a flower quilt, and his sister Martha, who was her chosen friend, gave the red rose. Her note was written and hid under its red leaves, but he took it out, and left instead one of his own. He died the other day, and commanded me to find her and read her the note, if she had never read it; but if she was dead and had a namesake, I was to read it to her."

"And I am her namesake! Isn't it funny? We were just going to look for the secret hid under the rose when your knock startled us so," said Daisy, with a laugh and a blush.

"Suppose I keep the note until we are better acquainted?" he said, gayly.

And Daisy, blushing still more brightly, consented.

The days seemed winged things all that winter. John Oldbury put up at the village hotel, and found his way to our quiet house almost every day. Twice a week, Alice and Daisy sped through the smooth, snowy lanes in his pretty sleigh, and their merry voices rang out in musical laughter, treble and glad, when he bade them good-night under the old brown porch.

I dreamed of the ending of the story, and so, perhaps, have you.

It was early in the new year, a night bright with moon and stars, when John Oldbury brought Daisy in from an evening ramble. Daisy was restless and excited.

"John is going home to-morrow," she whispered, leaning over my shoulder.

But he caught the whisper, though he was busy talking to Alice.

"Yes," he said, "my holiday is ended. "But I have never read your letter yet, Miss Daisy."

"Read it now," said Alice, mindful of our Daisy's red cheeks.

"It isn't mine," cried Daisy. "It belongs to a dead Margaret."

"But there is a living Daisy to interpret it," he answered, joyously; and sitting down by Daisy's side, he pulled the yellow, time-worn paper from his pocket.

This is how it ran:

"HONORED MISS MARGARET—As your days of rejoicing begin, my days of hope are ended! Last evening, looking forth from my window, I saw you walking with your sweetheart by the river side, and my soul was sadly troubled. Would to God we might have had such friendly chat—such lover's talk together! For now, when I must say farewell, my heart is overflowing with honest love for you—a love that is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

"JOHN OLDBURY."

"It is an old-fashioned love-letter, Daisy, and I would have made it shorter, if no sweeter."

"What would you have said?" asked Alice.

"I would have said just what I say now. Daisy, I love you. Will you be my dear wife?" And, turning round, he had taken Daisy in his arms, and was kissing her glowing cheeks.

And this was the stranger who had come to us through the snow a short three months before!

I was on my feet, ready for a stern reprimand; but Daisy lifted her blue eyes to mine, brimful of the love she could no longer conceal, and said: "I love him, Yune!"

What could I say then?

That was four years ago to-night. Daisy Oldbury is here again by the freight with a little brown-eyed Yune asleep on her knees; and between us we read a letter from Alice, who has crossed the wide waters with her heart's beloved.

The gray is thicker in my hair now, and the wrinkles are beginning to deepen on my face.

But baby Yune kisses away every heart-ache, and I never regret the finding of the dear love-secret that blossomed so merrily under the rose!

MISS CARRIE'S MISCARRY.

BY ANNIE L. J.

"DON'T you think Miss Carrie's plans have miscarried?" I asked the "guidman" as we sat at breakfast under the shade of a cherry-tree.

We always eat out of doors in summer time, and enjoy the morning air and song of birds more than any one can imagine who has not tried the experiment.

"I haven't heard a word about it," my husband replied, with his non-committal air. He never does "hear a word," though he always knows everything.

"Well, dear," I began, "that ancient spinster—"

"Come, now, mother, don't," he interrupted, in a reproachful tone. And he always says "mother" to me when he wants to make me feel old.

I began again: "That ancient spinster, who is, I am sure, thirty-six years of age, has been doing her prettiest to win the attentions of one of the students."

"And why not?" asked the guidman.

"Why not?" I echoed. "Yet it is a great pity so much energy should be wasted."

Miss Carrie Coulter was our next-door neighbor, and from the door of Hillside we could see the white walls gleaming through the trees of Willow Place. White it was, inside and out, clean and shining from the ceiling to the cellar, from the market baskets, that were well known without any labels, to the dog "Jip," who had his weekly bath, and ~~stays~~ afterward by the fire.

Mrs. Jemima Coulter was a majestic type of woman—large of frame, stately of demeanor, and every word large and emphatic, a dictionary in itself. I have nothing to do with the sons, for I am married, reader; and although they are all handsome fellows, and one of them once called me "a piece of parlor furniture," I shall not retaliate. It is only of Miss Carrie that I need to write, for she is indeed quite enough for one poor pen to describe and afterward survive.

We were at school together; and although at that time she had a table and chair to herself, as one the teacher honored for her age, while I sat on the benches with Libbie De Winter and the rest, yet now that I am married and have eight children to call me mother, she patronizes me, and speaks of the time she attended school as if it were only yesterday, always adding: "When I was a little girl."

Tall, stately, like her mother, with a little mincing air that had grown with her years, large of features, of the Queen Elizabeth type, and sonorous of voice, she was a character few could pass without noticing.

We are not very well supplied with clergymen in these country villages of Canada, the big lights are all reserved to enlighten the city darkness; and we who, being poor, are surely the "little ones," are left to the tender mercy of the students who are preparing for the ministry at McGill College University.

And such a variety! I have no time to divide and subdivide them, but their efforts at imitation in oratory, their weak repetitions of the same small exhortation over and over again, had a pitiful as well as a ludicrous appearance; but when they put on airs, and talked farming, with such a knowledge of it as the youngest child present might possess, evidently to suit the capacity of their hearers, I could not endure any more, and remained rigidly at home, where, having such good authority as Emerson, I

"Laughed at the love and the pride of man,
At the sophist schools and the learned clan;
For what are they all in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?"

It had so happened this summer that a very handsome agreeable student of about twenty-five had been sent to spend the vacation, and after he had engaged board with Libbie De Winter's grandma—which we all called the "Waters' home"—the young girls of the village were delighted to find him a pleasant companion. He could talk law with Lawyer Tyall, and farming with old Hugh Wideacre, who loved a hearer better than a speaker; he was always ready to fetch a pillow for poor sick Mrs. Langly, or to wheel her baby's carriage, and even went so far as to hoe potatoes for old Mrs. De Winter, when that ambitious old lady, who had long passed her three score and ten, went about her self-imposed task. But the crowning piece of gossip came when he first rowed in the same boat with Carrie Coulter; and the laughing hoydens of eighteen, who never expect they will be old, were amused at the sight of the spinster, smitten for the first time by the little archer at the mature age of thirty-six.

At all times and seasons the "Rosebud," which was the name of Mrs. Coulter's jaunty little boat, was at the minister's disposal; and Miss Carrie, with a coquettish linen suit and pink ribbons, went floating down stream to Mrs. De Winter's, asking as the boat made for shore "if MacAlwyn was wishing a sail this evening;" and with an air of condescension inviting Libbie De Winter to take an oar. And the trio enjoyed those quiet sails over the rippling waters, sometimes reaching a bed of white water-lilies that were idly waiting for loving, admiring hands to gather them in their glorious, tranquil beauty. And Carrie, who had never read "Little Women," yet vaguely dreamed, as Laurie and Amy had done, of rowing in the same boat for life.

Pretty, demure Libbie De Winter never talked much at these times; she rowed splendidly, and joined with a sweet, pathetic voice the quaint hymns they sang, while the student made melody with his exquisite voice, and Carrie was unusually earnest whenever he sang his favorite Sunday-school hymn, which rang out its refrain for earth or Heaven—"Nearer to Thee."

So the summer passed away quietly and pleasantly, and when the September days came, and the students' holidays ended, Miss Carrie had not realized her dream.

"One last sail Mr. MacAlwyn." She held out a white ungloved hand and smiled, sympathetic but glad on hearing that Libbie was prevented by a headache from joining them. (Oh, Libbie, you little hypocrite, with your woman's excuses already.)

The "Rosebud" glided softly on out into the open bay, the old pathless road they knew so well.

Thus an hour passed, with only here and there a snatch at conversation, until turning homeward Miss Carrie remarked: "How very quiet you are this evening, Mr. MacAlwyn!" and then added with a sigh, "but no wonder, for to-morrow you leave us."

"Yes," he replied, with a pleasant smile; "but it is not for long. I shall return, if God spares me, to spend the happy New Year with you; and if I may dare to hope—"

The student's eyes were afar off, watching the glowing sunset, or he would have seen the eager yet repressed look in his listener's face. He blushed a little and appeared embarrassed.

"You may hope," she said, as softly as her stately tones could speak, "you may hope for anything I can give."

His cheek flushed deeper, and he hurried over the next sentence.

"You have been a pleasant companion to my little Libbie, and I hope you will continue her friend while I am away. We are to be married at Christmas."

His proud tone! his "little Libbie!" Carrie Coulter had a dazed look when she responded to his bland "good night," as they parted at the shore. The one dream of her dull womanhood had passed away forever.

"And how do you know all this?" queried the guidman, as I told him the story in fewer words that morning.

"I know," I replied, "because the student told Libbie, and Libbie sometimes makes me her confidante, which accounts for my knowing so much about Miss Carrie's miscarry."

IN A SALOON.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I DON'T know how you feel about it," said a gentleman, speaking to his neighbor, "but I am troubled at this multiplication of saloons. They are coming up to our very doors—intruding themselves into our best neighborhoods. That property over the way has just been sold for twenty-five thousand dollars, and is to be fitted up in the most attractive style as a drinking-saloon. It will be the fashionable place, and draw into its dangerous precincts many of our most promising young men. Neither your sons nor mine will be as safe as they are to-day."

"When it is opened?"

"Yes, that is what I mean."

The name of the first speaker was Cleaves, that of his neighbor Alburts. They were engaged in business, and were living in good style in a fashionable part of the city. Both had sons just approaching manhood.

The countenance of Mr. Alburts grew troubled.

"The public indifference to this thing is marvellous," continued Mr. Cleaves. "Just think of it! We have in our city over five thousand places where liquor is sold under the sanction of the law! And there is not a man in this community who does not know that nine-tenths of the pauperism, crime and suffering with which we are cursed springs from their existence."

"I am more afraid of private saloons than these," said Mr. Alburts.

"Private saloons?" returned the neighbor, manifesting a little surprise. "These must be something new. I have not heard of them."

"It is in these private saloons that the appetite is usually first formed," said Mr. Alburts. "There are a great many of them, and they are working a vast amount of harm."

"You mean what are called sample-rooms?"

"No; their keepers do not hang out any signs. They are not open to the public. Only a select few can gain access to any one of them."

"You astonish me," said Mr. Cleaves. "Are you sure about this?"

"Very sure. They have the choicest of liquors, and are usually fitted up in the most elegant manner. Refined and cultivated people of both sexes—chiefly young men and women from eighteen to twenty-five or thirty years of age—are always to be met there. It is the æsthetic and luxurious side of drinking—fascinating and dangerous beyond anything to be found in the most attractive public saloons of our city."

"Are they licensed?"

"No. Our commonwealth gets no revenue from these saloons, many of which dispense liquor in a single night to the value of several hundred dollars. They used to be open only in the evenings, but now many of them are to be found open all the afternoon. I saw your son Edwin coming away from one of these private saloons only yesterday."

"My son Edwin!" exclaimed Mr. Cleaves, with a marked change of countenance.

"Yes. I spoke to him as he was leaving the house. He was in company with an elegantly-dressed young lady, who had also been visiting this saloon. Her color was too high, and her eyes too moist and bright. She had been taking more champagne than was good for her. I know her father and mother very well. It made me feel sorry."

"You astound me more and more. Who was she?"

Mr. Alburdis shook his head. "It would not be right for me to mention names."

"Where is this saloon?"

"I would rather not say. I might get myself into trouble."

"If they are selling liquor without a license," said Mr. Cleaves, "the danger of trouble would be with them, not you."

"I do not mean legal trouble."

"What kind?"

"Social. The people who are engaged in this thing are people of standing and great social influence. Some of them are among my most intimate and valued friends."

"There is some catch in all this. You are playing on my credulity."

"Would to Heaven it were all a mere fiction!" answered Mr. Alburdis, with great seriousness of manner. "But it is not so. These are the places we have most to dread. Here it is that our sons learn first to drink—here they acquire the appetite that leads them captive at last. I am not half so much in fear of a public drinking-house as I am of a private saloon. You may guard your sons against the former, but not against the latter. An open enemy is always less to be dreaded than a secret foe."

A mutual friend coming by at the moment interrupted their conversation.

"I would like to talk with you again about this," said Mr. Cleaves, as they parted.

It so happened that the two gentlemen did not meet again for several weeks. Then it was at a social entertainment given by a wealthy citizen, who stood high in the community as a man of great public spirit and enlarged Christian benevolence. His personal character was held as above reproach. The company assembled in his elegant rooms was made up largely of young people.

As Mr. Alburdis, who had two sons present—one eighteen and the other twenty—was passing to the supper-room, he encountered Mr. Cleaves, who said, in an under-tone: "Just the man I've been wanting to see! Haven't forgotten that talk—you remember?"

"Oh, yes!"

The crowd pressed them asunder. Ten minutes later they found themselves side by side again. They were in a large dining-room, in the centre of which was a table covered with the choicest wines and every delicacy the season afforded. Around this table a portion of the company, mostly young men and women, had gathered, and laughing voices mingled with the sound of popping corks and the bell-like tinkle of glasses. Freely as water the wine was flowing. Fair maidens smiled sweetly on their young attendants as they received from their hands the foaming champagne. Gray-haired men drank with youths not out of their teens, and mothers with grown-up sons took wine with the fathers of grown-up daughters. It was a "free and easy" in good society—enjoyable in the highest degree, countenanced and encouraged by the "best people" in the city.

There was no restraint upon any. The boy of eighteen filled and refilled his glass as freely and as unquestioned as the man of fifty. The tender young girl, just blushing into womanhood, challenged her companion again and again, and drank with him until both were merry.

All this was passing when Mr. Cleaves and Mr. Alburdis found themselves side by side, each in the act of discussing the good things provided by their liberal host, and each with the flavor of a glass of fine old sherry on his lips.

"Things are getting lively," remarked Mr. Cleaves, with a smile. He liked terrapin and oysters, and he liked especially a good glass of wine. He was enjoying himself.

"They generally do," answered Mr. Alburdis.

"On these occasions?"

"Yes. Good wine and good-eating are apt to make things lively—a little too lively sometimes."

Mr. Cleaves gave a shrug, and slightly lifted his brows.

Just then a voice was heard pitched to a higher key, followed by a merry peal of laughter from a group of girls. Mr. Cleaves changed countenance. He recognized the voice of his son, and looked toward that part of the room from which the sound came. He did not feel pleased at what he saw. A young lady was holding a glass of wine to his son's lips, and the young man was pretending to refuse it.

"I'm for local option," he heard him say, in a loud tone of voice and with mock seriousness. Then came another shout of laughter.

"Don't believe it," cried the fair temptress. "Saw you with a glass of champagne in your hand not three minutes ago. Come, drink it!"

"If I must, I must," answered the young man, with pretended reluctance; and taking the glass, he drank the wine with an evident relish.

A woman past middle life was standing a little way off looking at the gay group. Mr. Alburdis knew her, and was pained by the expression of her face. It was anxious. She was bending forward unconsciously, and her eyes were wistful and troubled.

"Poor mothers!" sighed Mr. Alburdis, speaking to himself. "They are not always happy on these occasions."

Turning to make some further remark to Mr. Cleaves he found the spot vacant where he had been standing. A little while afterward he was by the side of Mrs. Cleaves. It was into her troubled face that he had looked a few minutes before. He did not find it easy to draw her into conversation. She replied to his remarks briefly, and in an absent kind of way. Every few moments he saw her eyes wander off to some other part of the room, as if in search of somebody. The plate of refreshments she held in her hand was scarcely touched.

"Will you have a glass of wine?" asked Mr. Albutis.

"No, I thank you. No," she replied, with an instinct of rejection in her manner, and a change of countenance that indicated some unhappy associations in her mind.

The loud voice of her son again filled the room, and Mr. Albutis saw lines of pain and humiliation cut themselves into her face. Considerately, he turned from her. As he did so he met another lady who had a son present. She was the wife of a successful banker—a highly-educated and accomplished woman, and a leader in society. He had been more than once at her house on similar occasions. Her eldest son, a young man who had been carefully trained at home, and educated at one of our best colleges, had recently been admitted to the bar. He was beginning life with unusual promise of success. His mother was justly proud of him.

But Mr. Albutis had only passed a few words with this lady, when he discovered that something was wrong with her also, and that her eyes, the moment she had answered to some remark, would go off, half by stealth, as if she did not wish her pre-absorption of interest to be noticed, to another part of the room. Following the direction of her eyes, Mr. Albutis soon discovered what all this meant. Her son was near the lower end of the table, busy with the wine, not attending on any of the young ladies and sipping with them, but in a cluster of young men, drinking champagne with an unseemly relish and abandon that indicated appetite more than sociability.

"Too much wine here," said Mr. Albutis.

The lady turned to him quickly, her face flushing.

"I agree with you," she answered, manifesting an unexpected degree of feeling.

"Is all this right?" he asked.

"No; it is all wrong," replied the lady. She spoke in an undertone, as if not wishing others to hear what she said.

"I have seen the same at your house."

"You will never see it again," was answered; "never, never! I did not understand what I was doing." Then, after a moment's pause, and in a voice dropped to a sad, undertone, "The son of a dear friend came to my last entertainment sober, and went home to his mother drunk. I use plain, hard, homely words. A veil fell from my eyes when I saw that almost heartbroken friend next day, and looked into her desolate face."

"More dangerous to our sons than public drinking-places," said Mr. Albutis.

"A thousand times more dangerous, in my estimation. When my son leaves me in the morning to go to his office, I feel no concern for him because of the drinking-saloons that crowd nearly all the blocks of your city, but I have learned to dread a fashionable party. Not that he shows any special fondness for wine, but I know the danger. Hundreds of our most promising young men drift every year away from safe moorings; and what is to save him more than the rest? I find myself asking with a shiver of pain."

They were too closely surrounded for further conversation on this theme, as they were admonished by the fact that some of their nearest neighbors were beginning to assume a listening attitude.

For over an hour the tide set toward the supper-room. The crush was great in the beginning, but that portion of the company which cared least for eating and drinking soon came back to the parlors, and left those more interested in the pleasures of appetite than in social intercourse to indulge themselves at will. Most of these were young men and women; a few were past middle-life—gray-haired tipplers and gourmards, whose capacity for eating and drinking was marvellous.

Mr. Albutis and Mr. Cleaves had both returned to the parlors. It was near twelve o'clock when they found themselves standing together in a bay-window.

"Our friends are having a great time up-stairs," remarked the former.

"One would think so by the noise they make," answered Mr. Cleaves. "Just listen to that!"

A loud discourse of voices came ringing down the wide staircase and along the halls.

"I don't call that respectable," said Mr. Albutis, knitting his brow.

"Nor I. I wonder how men and women who claim to be gentlemen and ladies can act in so disgraceful a manner. It is an insult to their host. It is turning his elegant mansion into a hall of revelry."

"Wine and strong drink are great levellers," was replied; "and they always level down—never up. Education, culture, taste, morality, religion, are agencies that continually level upward, but drink and sensual indulgences level the other way. Their action is always unseemly, and their bearing always downward. Make a man half drunk, and you excite his lower nature. It matters little to what class he belongs, his latent coarseness and brutality will reveal themselves."

"It is mortifying to think of it," said Mr. Cleaves; "and humiliating to know that our own sons take part in these orgies."

"There is an evil sader than all this," remarked Mr. Albutis. "The temporary forgetfulness of propriety, the brief exposure of hidden coarseness, are little things compared to the deeper effects that are produced. The down level of the external life is of small moment compared to the down level of instinct and feeling that must surely follow such degradation of conduct as we have to-night—as we so often have in these fashionable gatherings."

A sudden movement at one of the parlor-doors, and the startled question, "What's the matter?" made by a lady near them, brought the two gentlemen from their retreat in the bay-window. As they came forward they heard some one say, in a repressed voice, "Don't make a fool of yourself, Harry."

Then followed a slight scuffle, and then a stern ejaculation, as of some one who had the right to speak with authority. The crowd that pressed to the door was too great for them to get near.

"What is it? What's the trouble?" they asked.

"Oh, nothing," replied a gentleman; "nothing of any consequence. Harry Bowen has been taking too much champagne, and lost his head. But his father has settled him. I wonder at any one inviting him now; he always loses his head."

Down from the supper-room came louder and more confused the sounds of revelry—voices of men and women pitched to a high key, bursts of merriment and snatches of song.

"Come," said Mr. Albutis to his companion, "let us look around;" and the two men left the parlors and went again to the supper-room.

"What's going on here?" asked one of them, pausing at the door of a small ante-room, into which some of the guests were looking curiously. A young man was sitting on the end of a sofa, or rather crouching down into it, with his chin on his breast. He had been tempted to take more wine than he could bear—tempted under repeated challenges to drink from fair young lips.

A glance told the sad story to Mr. Cleaves, and it told him more. He looked upon his own son. His ejaculation of surprise and grief touched the group that had gathered about the entrance of the room, and with an instinct of pity and respect they moved away and shut the door upon father and son. Mr. Albutis did not see his friend again that night.

It was after two o'clock before the last of the revellers went home. The condition of most of these was no better than the condition of those who are last to draw themselves away from the public-houses in the small hours of morning. There is no difference in the effect of deep potations, whether taken in a gentleman's supper-room or in a public drinking-saloon. The question of respectability is another thing, which each will settle for himself, though in the abstract it is difficult to associate respectability with tippling, no matter where it is done.

A few weeks later, Mr. Albutis and Mr. Cleaves were standing at the corner of a street where their ways to business parted, talking earnestly, when a gentleman well known to both came up. He was rich, and had just built for himself a costly residence. It was to be thrown open to his friends on the following night, and the invitations were out. The company was to be very large, and rumor, helped by sundry hints from caterer and wine-merchant, gave many intimations touching the lavish style in which the evening's entertainment was to be served. The wine and liquor bill, it was said, would exceed two thousand dollars.

"You will be at my house-warming to-morrow night?" said the gentleman, in a pleasant, familiar way, addressing Mr. Albutis and Mr. Cleaves, who were old and intimate friends.

The latter, in whose mind the humiliation and sorrow he had experienced but a little while before were still poignant, answered quickly, and in an almost offensive manner: "No, sir. I've done going to drinking-saloons."

"I don't understand you," said the gentleman, his face slightly coloring and his eyes flashing a little.

"You will pardon my free speech, but I can't help it," returned Mr. Cleaves. "The great curse of our city is its drinking-saloons."

"I am aware of that. But I don't propose going into that business. What are you driving after?"

"Is the temptation to young men less where the best of liquors are served in elegant supper-rooms, for nothing, than it is in bars and saloons where every glass has to be paid for?"

There came into the gentleman's face a slight expression of surprise.

"Less," continued Mr. Cleaves, "when surrounded by beauty and fashion? Less when eminent bankers and merchants and men in the learned and sacred professions entice them by word and example to drink?"

The slight expression of surprise which had come into the gentleman's countenance gave place to one of doubt and perplexity. The sharply-put questions had awakened in his mind some troubling convictions.

"Is a gentleman's dining-room, where he dispenses wines and liquors to his guests, practically less a drinking-saloon than the 'Shades' over at the next corner? We had better look this thing squarely in the face—better call things by their right names. It doesn't alter the quality of a lie to call it a fib, or a bit of romance, or any other fancy name; and so it doesn't make your house nor mine less a drinking-saloon for the time being if we dispense liquor to our guests. The free dispensation is only an incident in the case. The hard, bad, demoralising fact lies back of it all. Forgive this plain speaking. I do not mean you more than others—more than myself; for I am far from blameless in this thing. But I shall be blameless hereafter."

"Good-morning, sir," said the gentleman, turning off with the air of one who had taken offence.

"He will never forgive you for that," remarked Mr. Albutis.

"Maybe not, but I think better of him. If I had taken a moment for reflection, I might have spoken with less freedom. But what is said is said, and cannot be recalled. It will not be wholly lost on him, you may be sure. Ah! if he only had the courage to act on convictions that I saw revealed in his face, he would recall his orders to the wine-merchant, and say to the elegant company that will gather at his house to-morrow night—a company made up of our most prominent and influential citizens and their families—'Ladies and gentlemen, fellow-citizens and friends, I cannot turn my house into a drinking-saloon to entice and hurt your sons and daughters. But I give you a hearty welcome, and set before you the best of God's good gifts that I can find in the market.'"

Mr. Albutis shook his head: "He will never do that. He hasn't the moral courage."

"I'm afraid not. But if he had, what a splendid example he would set! All true men would honor him. It would be a public benefaction beyond estimate."

The grand house-warming came off. Anticipation was not at fault. It was the costliest and most lavish entertainment of the season. Wine was as free as water. But it was noticed by some that the host was not altogether at ease in his mind. He did not invite any one to drink with him, and was not seen to taste wine during the evening.

A few days afterward, meeting with Mr. Cleaves, he extended his hand in a friendly way, saying as he did so, while a grave, faint smile played for a moment about his lips and then faded off: "I have made up my mind to go out of the business."

"What business asked Mr. Cleaves, not understanding him.

"The business of saloon-keeping."

"Oh!"

"Thank you for knocking the scales from my eyes. But for this I should not have seen the half of what passed in my house last week. There were sad and disgraceful things that have troubled my peace ever since."

"Could it be otherwise? Ah! sir, if we put the cup of confusion to the lips of our young men and maidens, what good can we expect to come of it? Do we gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? As is the sowing, so shall be the reaping. If we tempt our young men with wine, and encourage them to drink both by word and example—if we crowd our tables with choicest liquors and invite them to take of it freely—is it any cause of surprise that so many of them become intemperate? Will your son or mine be the exception? Does station in life give any sure barrier to the encroachments of appetite? These are questions that should be laid to heart.”

“The evil looms up before me with a magnitude never seen before,” returned the other. “What is to be done?”

“Remedies that are of much account are radical,” was replied. “The home drinking-saloons must be closed, and this can only be done by public sentiment. We need a few independent men and women of high social position who are brave enough to lead off by the exclusion of all intoxicating drinks from their entertainments. You lost a grand opportunity last week.”

The gentleman was silent. Then, with a deeply-drawn sigh, he answered: “I see it; but I was not brave enough.”

Ah, this lack of courage to do right! This slavery to social custom! Who will rise above them, and take the post of honor?—To-Day.

HOME-LIFE AND CHARACTER.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSESSWAY POTTS.

No. XII.

I THINK it was the author of Tom Brown at Rugby who said “you can never get a man's best out of him without praise.” We believe that it is downright dishonesty to withhold praise where it is due. How freely do we mete out blame, whether it is merited or not, but how cautious we are in doling out the precious words of praise. Praise is sunshine to a child, and there is no child that does not need it. It is the high reward of one's struggles to do right. Many a shy, sensitive child dies, we believe, of hunger for kind commendation, it feels as though it had nothing to live for. Common justice should influence the parent to give generous praise when a child deserves it. Of course there is a difference in the constitution of children; some cannot bear so much praise as others and some need a great deal; let the praise for good be mixed in with the admonitions for bad behavior in a way that the latter be very kindly administered. We have always found this a successful plan. To let your children see that you trust them and believe in their principles is one of the greatest incentives to good behavior that can be. There is no greater pain to reach the heart of a child than for a parent to say, incredulously: “Now, are you telling me the truth? If I were only sure that what you say is so!”

I remember of my mother speaking to me that way once, and with what blind agony I ran to my bed and hid my face among the pillows and sobbed with a grief that was uncontrollable. I felt as though I had nothing to make me truthful and honest, when she would look in my face scrutinizingly and say that.

The saddest words and the fullest of rebuke that I ever heard come up to me yet, all through the long lapse of shadowed years, with the same memory of their old bitterness clinging to them. One time my father sent me two miles away from home on horseback to see an old, sick woman, one of his long-ago schoolmates. I liked to go on such errands for the sake of the ride over the wild hills.

Not even Grace Greenwood in her most untamed days liked a gallop over country roads any better than I did. And the horse I rode enjoyed it as well as I. She liked the waving of her magnificent mane in the wind and was as proud of it as any lady of her flowing hair. She would fire up as if her paces were set to exhilarating music, and as though her mane was a banner floating in the free air. When I came to the green lane that left the main road and led to the sick woman's cottage, I was assailed by temptation. The tempter would take no denial; he was wily—he said: “Here you, Pipsey Potts, are in your seventeenth year and you have never yet been out of the county in which you were born. You ought to feel ashamed of it, you'll never know anything except what you read in books. This beautiful October day should not pass by like common days—think how you would enjoy your ride lengthened out into three or four miles more, and that would take you over the line and out of your own county; you'd be quite a traveller then—the adjoining county is level, and stretches out like a beautiful undulating prairie; it would do you good as long as you lived, it would be like a new picture hung on your memory's wall. You can call and see Felicia on your return, and the deacon will most assuredly be delighted with the way you have spent the afternoon.”

I yielded, weakly, the oily-tongued tempter knew the weak places in my nature and he had appealed to them.

The ride was most glorious, it was like a vista that led into a new world—and the new world was beautiful beyond my conception—it was like unto no place I had ever beheld. The very woodlands seemed breezier and balmy, and the airs had a hint of balsamic sweetness that our home-breezes didn't have. Enjoyable! it was the most delightful afternoon I ever lived. It savored a little of stolen sweetness, mayhap. Just after I crossed the line I came to a little, old, picturesque stone church, the walls blotched with patches of moss and lichens, and the roof green and mouldering, and the stone chimney entwined about with tangling ivies that hung in festoons down over the old eaves under which the birds had built and brought forth brood after brood in the by-gone summers. Near by was an old graveyard, with gray, leaning stones and sunken graves and a tumble-down stone fence about it.

I hitched the horse and rested there, and wandered about like old Mortality, spelling out the rude epitaphs, deciphering old dates and scratching the lichens off the faces of the tombstones.

Everything in sight was so new to me and so like an ideal picture. Not far away was a little box of a log cottage nestling close up at the base of a green knoll, and from the foot of the knoll uprose, like outreaching arms, the most luxuriant sweet-briar rose that I ever saw, and it gathered, in one great embrace, nearly the whole of that dear little home-nest. I never beheld anything so perfectly beautiful in the realms of nature, that is, when she is left to her own wild, wilful ways.

And this was the picture framed and hung up on that long-ago October day—the picture that cost me so dearly and brought my head, lowly bowed in shame and remorse, to lie that night upon a pillow of thorns.

I tarried there perhaps two hours, not beholding a living face, alone, and yet not alone, for my world was densely peopled, and most dearly did I love the immense population that thronged its streets and parks and wide halls and lofty corridors. No, I was never alone, then.

My heart was so full when I started homeward that I didn't want to call at that crooning bedside. I had no desire to; it was late, and I said I'll go another time.

When I reached home, my father said very graciously, "Well, how is Felicia?"

I always called him "papa" when I wanted to conciliate him, and I replied, "Oh, papa, I hope you won't care, but—I was so tempted with the fine day, that, don't you think I rode clear on past her home and went away, a-w-a-y out of the county, and I had such a glorious visit; and then when I came back I felt as if I didn't want to stop. I hope you won't care. I'll go another time. Oh, papa, you know I always did so want to go over the county-line, and I did to-day, and it was so very beautiful that—"

He didn't let me finish my story. I knew by his brightening eyes that a storm was coming, and held my breath in suspense. I didn't think he'd whip me—he hadn't for nearly a year; but I'd far rather he had resorted to a whip, or a strap, than the words that came like a blighting frost.

"You have deceived me most shamefully," he said, in a loud voice, and raising his hand with a gesture that meant a great deal. "You disobeyed me, Pipsissaway! I will never trust you again! I can never feel any confidence in you!—never!" and he went out of the house.

I screamed out in my sorrow; I wrung my hands; his words were branded on my soul as with a hot iron. My stepmother essayed to comfort me by saying, "He's tired; you mustn't mind what he says. Come and have a cup of hot tea, I have it waiting ready for you."

I replied: "You know he never speaks idly—he means all he says. Oh, dear! oh, dear! I do wish I hadn't gone there!"

I couldn't quit crying, and wanted no supper, and went to bed prostrated with this new sorrow. It was a grief that I couldn't control—the words meant so much, too.

Away in the night I heard my mother coaxing him to go to me and take back the stinging rebuke, but he said, "I want she should feel it."

And, though he always did trust me afterward, and reposed the utmost confidence in me, thereby proving that he really did not mean what he said in anger. I did feel the power of those scathing words for many long years; and it is this and like painful remembrances that makes me write in the spirit of love when I charge parents to deal kindly and tenderly and trustfully with their little ones, to blame them cautiously, to withhold not warm words of praise, to guard against injustice, and to make due allowance for the motives that may prompt children to act hastily and thoughtlessly, but not in malice.

Judicious praise is to children what the sunshine is to the ripening fruit. Don't discourage them; don't ascribe motives for inexplicable conduct, on which you may put your own construction. Oh, there is a wonderful incentive to good in trustful eyes and kind words and a beaming smile—an influence born of these that will lift a child right up into a purer and a sunnier and a healthier atmosphere.

A lady wishes to know how to choose good black silk for dresses; and another lady, who knows, says, "Pull out a thread of the filling, and see if it is strong. If it stands the test, then rub one corner of the silk in the hands as though washing it. If, on holding it up to the light and looking through it you see no traces of the rubbing, be sure the silk is good. The warp and filling should not differ much in size, or it will not wear well. If you choose a figured silk, let the figure be small and well woven in, else it will soon present a frayed appearance, and you will have to pick off the little tags of silk that will dot the breadths. Rep silk wears about as long and as well as any other kind. It does not wrinkle easily, and looks quite as well after being dyed as it did before."

In making up a silk dress never mind all the elaborate fixings of the style of to-day; if you do, you will be running after the latest styles all the time, with your thumb on your finger and your harlequin silk dress on your arm. Let it be made nice and plain, and then, to prevent yourself from looking like a dowdy, or old-fashioned, have some of the modern fa-de-rales made separate from the dress to wear with it.

It will soon be the time in the year that churches make donation-parties for their pastors. We want to make one about the middle of December for Brother Jenkins and his family. I have not taken part, publicly, in any donation party for some time. What I give I smuggle through the post-office, or lay on the door-sill, and mystify the recipients, not letting them know who sent the gift. A gift is ten times as good to both parties if presented this way. I never quite believe all the pretty things said to the public ear in the way of thanks for generous donations. I'll warrant, if you were a fly, and heard what the pastor and his wife said, in a chuckling way, after they had retired at night, you'd hear something like this: "Oh, Mary, if I had as many feet as I have toes, I might perhaps sometime wear out all my beautiful embroidered slippers. Did you ever!—did you!—hee-hee-hee!"

"And my cheap jewelry! Hi-hi-hi! Oh, I could measure it by the quart! The poor souls! How much better to have given the worth in money, or muslin, or something that could be worn or eaten—something to feed you and keep you warm and help you to make sermons!"

I knew a gawky boy of seventeen, the son of a very poor minister, to be made his happiest one donation-day, by receiving an old silver watch, badly out of repair. It was given with the best of intentions, and was supposed that the boy would carry the dumb thing for the sake of sporting the dangling chain; but, no! he, a preacher's son, would carry no dead time-piece, and the silversmith's bills for tinkering that old frying-pan of a watch grew to be a positive nuisance and annoyance. Every few days a little bill, "For repairing son's watch," would be presented to the poverty-stricken pastor. His salary did not admit of the keeping of such an expensive luxury.

Another minister's son was the joyful recipient of an old worn-out five-shooter. It was the "dead body" fastened to the whole family; they were all afraid of it. Result, the smart boy, who knew all about being careful with it, and who pooh'd at the idea of his hurting anybody, fired it off prematurely one day, and at night when he counted his fingers he was minus three.

At this season of the year, very frequently, there are busy days in which you almost wish you had another pair of hands to work with; you grudge the time it takes to cook dinner. Well, if you manage it right you can almost save that time by having things prepared the evening before for a cold dinner, and yet it won't be much of a cold dinner either. No doubt you have as good a plan as mine, but I will suggest a few items for the new wife and housekeeper who is not yet fairly initiated.

Now that the weather is cool, when you make mashed potatoes it won't take much longer to prepare a kettleful at one time. Salt them just right, put in a lump of butter, and a good deal more cream than though they were to be eaten at one meal. Make them quite moist. When you dish them, put them on several plates, about as much on each plate as the family will use at one meal. Smooth them all nicely, the same as for the table, and all you don't want for the present meal set away in a cool place, covered over with a newspaper or a light cloth. Then the next day, the busy one, take a tableknife and slip one of the plates of potatoes off on a pie-pan, and set it in the oven at least half an hour or more. There you will have good hot potatoes for dinner. Cook a quantity of pork or beef on the same plan, all ready for the table, and set away one mess on a plate ready to warm. It will heat too fast in the oven with the potatoes, and will damage the plate. Try my plan—set the plate of meat under the stove on the zinc, with a little tin pan turned over it, that will draw the heat and warm it up as good as new. I make a nice gravy, by the quantity, that's easy warmed over; so is a mince-pie, if you have it; if not, you have apple-pie, and it is better cold. Of course you have good finely-shred cabbage pickled in sweetened vinegar on hand all the time; that is a good relish; then you have baked apples, or ought to have, and a pudding of rice, or corn-starch, or bread-crusts.

So you have nothing to do that busy day but to make hot coffee. If you have fried mush left in slices from breakfast, it can be warmed in the oven and made as good as new, or cold fried eggs can be warmed over, or new ones boiled in a trice.

For supper, have bread and butter, and cold boiled meat, and pickles, and cookies, and hot tea.

I hope, though, for the good of the women's nerves, that these busy days don't come very often; they are real women-killers. If you are sewing, or quilting, or making carpet, or cone and shell frames, don't work immoderately; run out in the fresh air every hour for five minutes at a time, and you'll work with a great deal less wear and tear, and you'll not feel jaded and over-tasked and out of humor.

But if you have a big day's work before you, and want to save all the time you possibly can, cook up your dinner the day before, after the plan I used to find so satisfactory.

The first year I wrote "Other People's Windows," you who were subscribers to the magazine at that time may remember that the series closed perhaps two or three numbers before the end of the year. I have wanted to tell you of it, hoping some suggestion may come to you that will do you or yours good. Ida was taken sick that year, in the latter part of August, with a low nervous fever in connection with lung disease. She had been gradually going down for several weeks. At the end of the first week the family physician despaired of her recovery; it was a complication of diseases, and she was a slight, frail little creature, inheriting consumption on her mother's side. About the time she became so weak, her hearing partially left her, and the sight of any face outside of her own family troubled and excited her. She lay thus for weeks, sometimes sinking away; she could not bear the stimulant of wine or brandy, and in those sinking spells I always made an outward application of the latter.

She remembers nothing of those wearisome weeks now. A lounge on castors stood near her bed, and to rest her we lifted her frequently from one to the other. To humor her, we allowed her to see no faces outside of the family, except the physician's. He said it was probable that her death would be very sudden. I couldn't let death come upon her like a thief in the night, even though the doctor said it were better so, for fear of the shock. I wanted she should know that she stood on the confines of eternity, and that without a moment's warning, any instant, she might have to go that journey alone.

With her hearing so affected, it was hard to converse with her, and I only talked what was necessary for her good.

One day while I was feeding her, and she was feeling stronger from the exhilarating effects of her little cup of tea, and I thought abler to bear the shock of the dreadful intelligence, I said: "You've been very sick, Sissy; sometimes we thought you wouldn't get well; you seem better to day, but you are not out of danger yet. I don't know how I could bear to lose you;" and the tears came in spite of my efforts to appear strong.

It was new to her. I saw her eyes open wider and her red lips part, and she stared at the wall as though she saw the past behind her and the new life only before her. Her little hand, light as a leaf, slid over my face caressingly, pityingly.

I said calmly: "Death is nothing to be dreaded by the child of God; it comes without terrors to one whose treasures are laid up in Heaven. It is like going a journey into a far country—going off alone; but, Sissy, it is not being separated forever from those you love; the time soon passes, and family reunions soon assemble there. You are not going among strangers, as you would be if you went on any other journey; your little mother is waiting there, and your dear schoolmates, and One who loves you better than all of those whose love was born of earth. Here there is no perfect joy; there, all joys are perfect—there are no tears, or sorrows, or pain, or separation. I often think we dread death with that same drawing back and shuddering that we dread so many things in this world, which, when faced manfully, we find invested with none of the terrors we so much feared. It may be that you'll get well again; but don't desire it, don't expect it; leave all in the hands of One who does all things well, and be patient and cheerful, and look up in perfect faith, and be willing to meet whatever comes. You must think what I shall do with your little earthly possessions if you leave them, and see how calm you can be, and how trustful, while we watch and wait."

Her pure little face was as serene and sweet as a pictured face; there were wet eye-lashes only. That was all the sign I saw indicative of any perturbation of spirit. Oh, I felt so relieved and so cheerful after I had talked with her! I felt twenty years younger, and so much stronger and braver and readier to meet whatever came. Every day, then, we conversed together of the journey—we called it—that poor little sissy expected to go alone. She grew enthusiastic over it, and dwelt long and earnestly upon the glories of the new life.

All arrangements were made—we waited the messenger, Death. The physician was very sad, he was becoming more and more attached to his cheerful little patient. One symptom was good—her beef-broth and her cup of tea both tasted just right. I fed her often, both day and night.

The doctor said this vital fire must be kept up. We had to be very cautious about her taking cold; therein lay the most fatal danger. We could only ventilate the large bed-room from the tops of the windows; and, even then, if a draught of air touched her bed, we had to devise a way of turning it into another direction.

We made ourselves as cheerful as possible. Lily and I would bathe our eyes to take away the traces of tears, and then go to her bedside and tell her something funny to make her laugh. It chanced very opportunely just then that Emily Huntington Miller, of the "Little Corporal"—that sweet poetess and charming story-writer for little children—sent us a cute little book called "Tommy's Week." It is an exquisite account of one week in Tommy's life. Every day we gave sissy two doses of that, and the result was two good hearty laughs, that extended to the very tips of her dead-white fingers. This we did while the physician had no hopes of her recovery. It seems like a dream, now, but that sick-room was a happy place for us three.

One day, when her words were the wildest delirium, and when she sank away, and we had no hope, I stole off to the dining-room, and leaning my head down on my arm, cried bitterly. I thought of the loneliness of the life left me without her. A medical work lay on the stand, I took it up and turned mechanically to the subject of consumption. I glanced it over, and saw nothing new in it. My attention was fixed, however, on a few sentences, in which he strenuously urged abundance of fresh air to those afflicted with lung disease.

I jumped up, startled, saying: "In our efforts to keep her from taking cold, we may be keeping from her the pure, fresh air of heaven—it may be full of healing for that poor little emaciated frame, who knows!"

I went right to her room, saying, gleefully: "Oh, sissy, how would you like to be rolled up like a mummy, all safely, and propped in the rocking-chair and taken out on the back porch? Could you stand it?"

She raised her thin, shadowy hands, saying: "Oh, nothing in this world would please me more! I forget how things are out-doors! I would be so glad!"

We filled the chair with warm pillows, wrapped her all up in a soft comfort, lifted her carefully, and took her out in that cool mid-October day.

She sat in the chair, tilted back, out on the porch among the drifting leaves, the gladdest little creature you ever saw. Only her head was out of the bundle. At first we made her breathe through her nose instead of taking the air directly into her lungs. From that hour she began to improve slowly. We learned from that experience what to do next. Either in the rocker, or on the lounge, she was taken into every room down-stairs. One day the lounge would stand in one room, and perhaps the next day in another, moving her whenever she grew tired or needed amusing. I often took it out into the kitchen and left it there all night, and let her lie and look at the cheerful blaze, and watch me prepare her food, which was done two or three times during the night. Before I would begin to cook breakfast for the boarders—we had six men to do for—I would wheel her into the sitting-room, and while they were eating I would prepare her food. I cannot see now how I ever stood it to be sissy's nurse day and night, with no help only Lily, to wash dishes, iron, sweep and to make beds, but I endured it bravely. I never left her room at night, except twice, during all those weeks. My philosophy is, that the panacea for sorrow is occupation. If your heart is full of a great grief, give your hands employment—give your thoughts something to dwell upon—work, work.

No man or woman ever died of a broken-heart if there was a busy life. Believing this, I retained our boarders. Had they not been here, our household labors would have stopped; the wheels would have clogged; our sorrow, with which we fought hand-to-hand, would have been the victorious foe we would have succumbed, conquered.

As it was, we came out with our colors flying, and we were brave and strong and full of gratitude.

The doctor told me to use my own judgment in her case, that she was so delicate, her temperament so peculiar, that I would know better what to do than he would.

Well, as soon as she could sit up an hour, she rode a little distance every day in a carriage, thoroughly wrapped up, but with her little face turned out to the fresh, crisp air of the cool October. Rubie would drive to some pretty wild place in the woods and gather gay leaves for her to press and dry. Sometimes they would come home, and the carriage would look like a blase, so heaped up with boughs full of red and yellow leaves.

She was a happy convalescent; beautiful bouquets, the gifts of sympathising friends, filled our rooms; our own house-plants in that chill October burst into the second and most magnificent blooming; everything conspired to make joyous her welcome back to life.

She used to say so touchingly: "I don't see how you can all love me so!"

A new dress, that we had always felt too poor to afford her, lay at the foot of her lounge, and a dainty pair of slippers, too small then for her swollen feet, and a new wrapper, and a box of all kinds of candies, and everything that we thought would please her. She never saw any medicine bottles standing around; everything gloomy or suggestive of sickness or sadness was banished from her sight; we made all as gay and cheerful and pretty as possible.

A beautiful symbol came to us that first day she was out on the back porch. I often think of it. While she sat there a dove flew softly down, making no noise save the gentle whirring of its wings, and came in upon the porch and alighted on a cord that was stretched above our heads, on which we hung our handkerchiefs to dry. It sat there in reach of our hands, and looked down upon us. I was afraid Ida would be startled at the singularity of the occurrence, and I said with a laugh, meant to disarm all fears: "Why, there is one of George's pet pigeons!"

The dove's pretty soft eyes watched us as though tenderly. I was standing behind Sissy's chair brushing her long light hair, and the dove looked on as if it was a connoisseur in beautiful hair. It sat perhaps two or three minutes, and when a hand was reached up to catch it, it fluttered and flew down into the yard at our feet and began picking crumbs like a domesticated bird. After we had put Ida in bed, I looked out, and there was the beautiful sad-eyed dove stepping about daintily in the yard, picking here and there with perfect content. With tears I thought of the messenger doves of thousands of years ago, and my heart was comforted by this mute symbol, and I said: "Perhaps our little dove will not plume her wings, nor leave us, either."

Old as granny is, she learned something new yesterday. She said: "Now, Pipsey, when I read a recipe, and it tells how much cream of tartar to use, and how much soda, and then says 'milk,' I don't know whether it means sweet milk or sour—how am I to know?"

I said, "well, I don't know much about chemistry, but I know that generally where soda is used it is to neutralize some acid and to form carbonic acid gas, which, rising through the dough, as the cake bakes, gives it lightness. If you use sweet milk, cream of tartar must be mixed with the flour to make an acid for the soda to effervesce with, if you use buttermilk or sour milk, cream of tartar is unnecessary."

Granny made some biscuit; she stirred the ingredients with a wooden spoon till they were mixed as well as possible, and then she handled the mass with the ends of her fingers, hardly mixing it at all, and hustling it off into a hot oven as soon as possible.

Her biscuit did smell deliciously, and we could hardly wait till tea was ready. But that's our luck! no quiet tea alone at Deacon Pottes that time!

"Whoa-h! whoa-h! There!" came in a regular old familiar bray of a voice, and who should be halting at the gate in a top carriage, but that chipper old bonnie-doon of mine, Elder Nutt. Ah-ha! he was coming to talk over "old times;" he was accompanied by one of his members, "a pillow in the church," as the elder calls him, Deacon Valentine Fisher. So, by the time the beast was watered and stabled and the two brethering had washed and brushed off the "dust of travel," and gone through the formula of combing their heads, or, as the poet says, "the place where the hair ought to grow," why by that time the good granny biscuits were quite cold. I hurried and put on my slate-colored allipack and fixed up a little. After tea I went into the sitting-room to entertain the brethering until after father had milked the cows.

Brother Fisher had gone out to take a smoke and only the elder sat there alone. I hesitated modestly—he rose respectfully, on my entrance, and looking very much embarrassed, tried to say something, when, unfortunately, his upper false teeth fell right down in front and filled his mouth. Gorillas!! they are handsome in comparison to the way he looked! I turned aside to fix the window-curtain. Now if I had been young and attractive, I could have accounted for his embarrassment, but before an old gal like me, whose gifts and graces died or faded with the summers of long ago, it was nonsense to think of the like.

"Take a seat here, Miss Pipesey," said he, placing a chair near his own.

"Thank you," said I, taking the chair and standing it a few feet further away.

"You mustn't mind it, or feel too much flattered when I tell you that I have been admiring an old picture of yours in your album for as much as 'leven minutes," and he looked into my face, and snorted out a laugh that loosened his teeth again.

I began to think he was outgrowing his teeth. He shoved them back with a sound that was like shutting down the lid of a box. His good eye was on the side next to me, and I looked up and said: "Oh, I'm not flattered at all." I wanted to turn the subject and I said: "Have you a good state of feeling on religious subjects down in your church at Goose Creek?"

"Reasonable," he replied, and then he added, slowly: "Sister, you know that I am a poor, lonely pilgrim; I wander up an' down this earth, in the language of the Psalmist, 'like a roaring lion—li-on, crying for peace—peace—when there is no peace!' When I looked on that pictur' o' your'n, I thought time was when you had been harnsome, I was reminded years ago an' you was a ago an' I was a buoyant bo, and broken; misfortun' has rid up agin a projectin' sta astrous consequences," and turned round, facing me, a cheek under his eye, drew dd ribly-mutilated orb. "As I grim similarly sitewated to (who slewed his brother. Cain's mark was on his forrid, while mine's in my face. He could cover his with a hat worn economically, mine stares at people boldly, it is like murder, it 'will out."

I said, softly, wishing to assuage the troubled waters: "It is little matter about the beauty of these perishable bodies of ours, if our souls are true and beautiful, we should prefer that to a handsome face."

"That was what I was trying to say to you, Sister Pipesey," said the elder, rising and setting his chair nearer mine; "beauty's only on the outside—it's only skin deep, as the old sayin' is. This is what I meant when I said I wanted to talk over old times with you. I wanted to ask you, in plain English, whether or no I was repulsive in your sight, and I wanted to tell you that I thought me an' you was congenial sperrits. I felt it in my bones the first time I ever laid my eyes on your face, an' in that perillous hour in which I saved you, when you was thrown like an autumn leaf in the muok at the side o' that corduroy road. Then something whispered in my ear, in thunder tones of duleet melody, that Miss P. Potts was a kindred sperrit-ah. My attractions is all gone—so are thine-ah; the joys of my youth lay behint me—so do your'n-ah; we have both had our ups an' downs in this vale of tears-ah—praise be to the Lord—but with grace in sufficient quantity we shall be able to outride the storms that assail our feeble bark-ah, and we will be landed on the other side-ah of the Jordan of death-ah."

Poor Elder Nutt! he had closed his eye, and thrown his head back, and was as truly inspired as he ever was when in the presence of his congregation at Goose Creek. He was panting and sopping a red silk handkerchief on his expanse of forehead and had just reached over the arm of the chair and taken my hand in his when the door opened suddenly, and Deacon Valentine Fisher came in, redolent of tobacco smoke.

We were all embarrassed, and the more we hem'ed and essayed to say something, the more we couldn't. It was the first time I was ever nonplussed. Brother Fisher sat down on the lounge with his heavy wool hat chucked down solemnly on his head. I don't know how much further he would have put it on, only that two of his ears were in the way.

Brother Nutt tried to talk as though he was only resuming the thread of conversation that we had dropped.

"Yes," he said, "your granny is a remarkable woman, she has always lived a Baptist and I think she will die a Baptist; she's true blue, she was colored in the wool."

Brother Nutt had worked in a factory, and the correct expression clung to him still.

"Yes," he continued, "she is a remarkable woman." He paused, tried to think of a new idea—he ran his fingers through his beard in a thoughtful way, and then, as though struck by a new thought, asked: "Can your grandmother swim? Mine could."

THE LIFE OF HEAVEN IN THE SOUL.

THE Lord has so constituted us, that all our happiness comes from the exercise of our affections. We all know that we are happiest when our hearts are filled with love, and this happiness comes from the Lord. It is His blessing that flows in while we exercise the affection. And He can communicate it to us in no other way. We are not passive in the reception of good from the Lord. We must voluntarily exercise the faculties He has given us, and in this exercise we find the good. Now all persons hope to attain eternal life, and the perfect happiness of Heaven. But this can only be done by exercising those affections of mutual love which constitute the happiness of Heaven. You will never find any other Heaven than that which consists in love to the Lord and the neighbor. No highest angel finds any other happiness than this, or ever will. All the knowledge, and all the wealth, and all the power in the universe, cannot make you happy, by their mere possession. It is only as they become vitalized by love and used as its instruments that they are blessings. As it is only when the pipes of an organ vibrate that we can get music from them, so it is only when our affections act that we can get harmony and happiness from them. If we had all the choicest instruments of music in the world, we could not get a single note from them unless they were played upon; so we can get no heavenly harmony from the soul, that organ of divine workmanship, and of myriads of pipes, unless we play upon it. There is no more music in the best instrument than in the poorest, until it is played upon. To use another illustration, the affections are to the whole man, what the vital forms of seeds are to plants. The seed can only become a tree and bear fruit, by growing. Our affections would spring up and blossom and fill the whole mind, and house and church with fragrance and beauty, and would bear the most precious fruits of heavenly happiness, if we would only exercise them, and let them grow. The life of Heaven would flow into us, and through us, and enriching and blessing others. As we communicate to others, the divine life flows in, brings with it divine blessings, and reveals to us the presence and nature of the Lord.

This life which brings us happiness, does not come in a volume like the current of a mighty river. It is broken into all forms and adapted to our state. The infinite ocean of life exists in the Lord; He gives it to man, as He gives water to the earth. He moulds it into shining rain-drops; into the invisible particles of dew. He breaks it as He breaks the ocean of light, into rays of varying hue. The Lord gives the light to every material object, and as it falls upon it, He breaks it up, giving to each such portions as it can receive, and the power to reflect to others the green and gold and crimson, according to its nature. So He breaks the "bread of Heaven" to man, giving him large or small portions, in high or low forms, according to his ability to receive.

And according to our reception, we know Him. We know the leaf is green, because we receive that form of light from it. So our knowledge of the Lord will be determined by the color of the truth we receive from Him, and the color and form of the truth will be determined by the state of our affections. As we go the Word, the Lord breaks His truth to us, according to the state of our love for Him. If we have none we shall not see Him—Our eyes will be holden. If there is a little love for Him, we shall have, at least, the feeling of His presence, though our conception of Him may be obscured by evils and falsities. It is of the greatest importance for us to know that our eyes are opened by the affections. Truth is light, but love opens the eyes for its reception. Light is, indeed, necessary to sight. But there is not light enough in the sun to make a man see, from whose eyes the soul has been excluded, by severing the optic nerve; so there is not truth enough in earth or Heaven, or in its divine source, the Lord, to give a man one true conception of His divine character, in whose heart there is no love for Him. Love is the vital force which gives us the power of consciousness. As the Lord breaks it to us, we see Him. And He breaks it to us as fast and as fully, and in the highest forms we can receive it; and our power of reception depends upon the fulness and heartiness with which we communicate to others what the Lord gives to us.

Then let us commune and reason, and walk according to what we know. Let us constrain the Lord, saying "Abide with us." Let our lives as well as our lips say it. And as He sits at meat with us, He will take the bread which we have provided, the affections which we offer to Him, and He will bless them, and through them break to us a larger measure of life. He will give them back to us filled with His own love, and according to the form and degree of our reception, He will reveal Himself to us.

FADING LEAVES.

NATURE is sent to teach us by her autumnal parables; and every fading leaf on every tree, with its bud of future growth hid behind it, becomes a solemn text, warning us to "secure while the leaf is yet green, the germ that shall live when the frost of death has destroyed both fruit and flower." As surely as the leaf fades so surely shall we fade. We imagine that our fading is not near. We put far off the evil day; and therefore we are not duly impressed with the thought. But fourscore years are soon cut off and flee away; and how uncertain is our reaching that lonely verge of life, where the flowery meadows and the golden corn-fields slope gradually down into the bare and stony beach that fringes the eternal sea. The coast of death to most is an abrupt precipice; we are cut off in the midst of our days. A thousand unforeseen foes, fatal to life, line our paths on either side, and we have to run the gauntlet daily between them. We began to die the moment we began to live. Our very life itself is nothing else but a succession of dying; and every day and every hour, in the changes within and without which we experience, wears away every part of it.

Should we not imitate, therefore, the example of the leaf, in which the process of preparation for the future keeps pace with the process of decay? Should we not seek to make daily, life-long preparation for the final, the inevitable consummation of our daily, life-long death? Should we not so number our days that we may apply our hearts to heavenly wisdom?—the wisdom of knowing, and loving, and serving Him who alone can redeem our poor-perishing life from vanity, and change it into the glory and blessedness of a life hid with Christ in God. Apart from Him, the industry of a lifetime is but elaborate trifling, "the costly embroidery of a shroud." United to Him, our labor is not in vain in the Lord, our works shall endure and follow us. Every leaf on the tree of humanity must fade; but if we are grafted by a living faith in Him whose name is the "Vine," His own gracious promise becomes a living truth to us: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."—Bible Teaching in Nature, by Rev. Hugh MacMillan.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

OVERTAXING THE CHILDREN.

WHEN taking a lunch one day in a quiet restaurant in the city, my attention was attracted toward a mother and daughter seated at the little table near me. The young lady had several books in her lap, and was evidently a school-girl. Her shoulders were stooped, her eyes had the appearance of being overstrained, and her whole face wore an expression of weariness and listlessness most painful to see in one so young. Their whole conversation was on the various studies she was pursuing, varied by frequent maternal anxieties respecting her health, which was evidently seriously affected. The young girl seemed peevish and restless when cautioned about overdoing. Some crowning ambition seemed to take possession of her mind—perhaps in connection with an approaching examination—and she would not listen to counsel. Her whole appearance was that of a restless, overtaxed brain-worker.

And it is pitiable to reflect how many teachers of youth we have who encourage just this sort of thing. Brilliant scholars at any sacrifice. A showy examination if the best scholar is struck down with brain fever to pay for it, or if the powers are so paralyzed that half imbecility is the result for the remainder of their lives. It is a fact for parents to see to. They are the patrons, whose voice should be heard in the matter.

When a body of physicians in a large city sign a remonstrance, as was done a few years ago, against a course of training that required five hours close application at school and three at home, it is time for us to move in the matter. A sick child should not be allowed a book except as a pastime. Never send your child to school in the morning with a headache. Send a written excuse, so his standing may be kept good, as it will be with every reasonable teacher, when kept at home by illness. Your child can never grow up but once. He can be educated all along through life.

ELEANOR.

THE THREE CALLS.

FLUTTERING, fluttering, fluttering,
Scarlet, yellow, and brown,
Far from the highest tree-top
Cometh a leaflet down.

Shivering, shivering, shivering,
Sparkling, pure and white,
Cometh a starry snowflake
Down from the realms of light.

Cooling, cooling, cooling,
Cometh a baby small,
Into the arms of mother,
Answering love's sweet call.

ALICE HAMILTON.

"KISS ME, MAMMA, DO KISS ME, I CAN'T GO TO SLEEP."

THE child was so sensitive, so like that little shrinking plant that curls at a breath, and shuts its heart from the light."

The only beauties she possessed were an exceedingly transparent skin and the most mournful, large blue eyes.

I had been trained by a very stern, strict, conscientious mother, but I was a hardy plant, rebounding after every shock; misfortune could not daunt, though discipline tamed me. I fancied, alas! that I must go through the same routine with this delicate creature; so one day when she had displeased me exceedingly, by repeating an offence, I was determined to punish her severely. I was very serious all day, and, upon sending her to her little couch, I said: "Now, my daughter, to punish you, and show you how very, very naughty you have been, I shall not kiss you to-night."

She stood looking at me, astonishment personified, with her great mournful eyes wide open—I suppose she had forgotten her misconduct till then—and I left her with big tears dropping down her cheeks, and her little red lips quivering.

Presently I was sent for. "Oh, mamma, you will kiss me, I can't go to sleep if you don't!" she sobbed, every tone of her voice trembling, and she held out her little hands.

Now came the struggle between love and what I falsely termed duty. My heart said, give her the kiss of peace; my stern nature urged me to persist in my correction, that I might impress the fault upon her mind. That was the way I had been trained till I was a most submissive child, and I remembered how often I had thanked my mother since for her straightforward course.

I knelt by the bedside. "Mother can't kiss you, Ellen," I whispered, though every word choked me. Her hand touched mine; it was very hot, but I attributed it to her excitement. She turned her little grieving face to the wall; I blamed myself as the fragile form shook with half-suppressed sobs, and saying, "Mother hopes little Ellen will learn to mind her after this," left the room for the night.

It might have been about twelve when I was awakened by my nurse; apprehensive, I ran eagerly to the child's chamber; I had had a fearful dream.

Ellen did not know me; she was sitting up, crimsoned from the forehead to the throat, her eyes so bright that I almost drew back aghast at her glances.

From that night a raging fever drank up her life—and what think you was the incessant plaint poured into my anguished heart?—"Oh, kiss me, mother—do kiss me, I can't go to sleep! You'll kiss your little Ellen, mother, won't you? I can't go to sleep. I won't be naughty if you'll only kiss me! Oh, kiss me, dear mamma, I can't go to sleep!"

Holy little angel! she did go to sleep one gray morning, and she never woke again—never. Her hand was locked in mine, and all my veins grew icy with its gradual chill. Faintly the light faded out in the beautiful eyes, whiter and whiter grew the tremulous lips; she never knew me, but with her last breath she whispered: "I will be good, mother, if only you'll kiss me."

Kiss her! God knows how passionate but unavailing were my kisses upon her cheek and lip after that fatal night. God knows how wild were my prayers that she might know, if but only once, that I kissed her. God knows how I would have yielded up my very life, could I have asked forgiveness of that sweet child.

Well, grief is all unavailing now! She lies in her little tomb; there is a marble urn at her head, and a rose-bush at her feet; there grow sweet summer flowers; there waves the gentle grass; there birds sing their matins and vespers; there the blue sky smiles down to-day; and there lies buried the freshness of my heart.

Parents, you should have heard the pathos in the voice of that stricken mother, as she said: "There are plants that spring into greater vigor if the heavy pressure of a footstep crush them; but, oh! there are others that even the pearls of the light dew bend to the earth."

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

A REMARKABLE DUEL.

A GENTLEMAN, travelling in the south of Africa, was one day descending a mountain. Slowly and cautiously he trod; for not only was the mountain very steep, but every now and then some gliding creature appeared and vanished again among the roots and herbage. It might be a lizard bright and quick as a flash, or it might be one of the poisonous serpents with which that country abounds, and to tread on which was almost certain death. Now he held on to a branch while gaining safe footing below; now he leaped on to a projecting ledge of rock; now clung to a root; yet everywhere stopping to observe what was beneath, and around him, and gathering treasures as he went. Heavily laden was he besides, with a musket slung over his shoulder, a butterfly-net in his hand, and a knapsack and cases, and numberless things that go to make up the trappings of a naturalist, hung about his waist. Hands and eyes were alike busy where nature also had been busy, lavishing on every inch of space some strange and wondrous thing worth studying or preserving. Exquisite heaths or other plants must be stowed away in his tin box, then a splendid insect was entrapped, or a bird was brought down.

Thus engaged, the traveller was a long time clambering down the mountain, unmindful, also, of whither his rambles were leading him; when, chancing to look below, he found he was descending into a moist, boggy spot, which he knew would be the very place for the poisonous snakes he was so anxious to avoid, and to escape which would now require his utmost vigilance. Suddenly his attention was attracted by a large bird standing on a flat, sandy part of the bog, and whose actions were unaccountably strange, its movements being as rapid and eccentric as if it were going through gymnastic exercises out there in the savage desert. Quick jumps and steps with its long legs, then a succession of bends and bows, did this strange bird make; then a whirl and a sudden leap back, or a turn in the air. Wings and feet were equally active; yet, with the exception of these singular antics, it remained always on the same mound of sand upon which, at that distance, the man could distinguish no other object likely to occasion such evolutions. The bird was not a turkey, though about the size of one; nor a stalk, nor a crane, nor a vulture, though in some respects slightly resembling each of these. Could it have been picking up insects amidst those strange and rapid motions? The traveller's curiosity was keenly excited. Descending with as much speed as possible, and approaching quietly, so as to observe without disturbing the proceedings, he now saw that the bird had a very singular crest formed of long feathers, like quill pens at the back of his head; sometimes lying close, and sometimes raised and sticking straight out, as pens do when lawyers' clerks put them behind their ears. Then, by this peculiar crest, the gentleman knew that it was a bird of which he had often heard, but which he had never before seen. "The secretary-bird!" he said to himself, smiling with satisfaction at this good opportunity for observing its habits. And now it was easy to perceive that this remarkable bird was fighting a duel with one of the deadly serpents of that climate, and a fierce and terrible duel it was, equal skill, vigilance and activity being displayed on both sides. The serpent, with its jaws extended, and its poisonous fangs ready for the fatal bite, reared its terrible head, swollen with rage and venom, darting out its forked tongue and glaring with its fiery eyes, while for a moment the bird stood at bay. Then, with one of its large, strong wings spread out before its breast, exactly like a shield, it with its other wing dealt a blow at the raised head of the foe, which struck it to the ground. Quick as lightning was the blow, and quick as lightning the dash which the snake again made at its assailant, though only to expend its venom on the feathers of the wing spread out to shield the breast. Watching its opportunity, the bird, with another sudden movement, again sprang upon the foe, this time to give it a kick and prick and wound it with its talons; then, seizing it with his bill, he tossed it into the air. For a few minutes the reptile lay stunned and powerless, while its assailant stalked warily around, anticipating its slightest movement; for the cunning of the serpent and the swiftness of its gliding motions, rendered it an equal match for its larger and more powerful antagonist. Finding its advantage, the bird now cautiously approached, and again with its wing swept the snake off the ground and tossed it into the air. More bruised and feeble after each fall, the deadly snake at length grew wearied and disabled; till the bird, now feeling itself secure from a stroke of the poison fangs, leaped upon its neck and held it to the ground, while with one blow of his falcon-like bill he split open its skull, and ended this extraordinary duel by gobbling his enemy up.

Such duels are common between the serpent-bird of South Africa and of some other parts where both venomous snakes and secretary-birds are found.

From the swiftness with which the snake-eater runs and hops, having long, stout legs, it is called the "mesenger-bird;" but among the Dutch settlers at the Cape it is known as slangen vreter, the serpent-eater, because it is so useful in destroying the dangerous snakes and other reptiles of the hot countries which it inhabits.

The farmers at the Cape sometimes keep a secretary-bird and tame it, letting it live in the farmyard among the poultry, whose protector from snakes and other reptiles it then becomes. If the serpent-eater be allowed to get hungry, it will not object to a young chicken or two itself; otherwise it will defend them, and wage war only with their common enemies, snakes, rats, lizards, and such thieves.

So valuable are the secretary-birds to the inhabitants of those countries that a punishment is imposed for destroying them; and the people of some of the West Indian islands, where also are poisonous serpents, try to breed them there, on account of their value as snake-eaters.

My young readers will, perhaps, be surprised and sorry to hear that the traveller who watched that combat between the bird and the poisonous snake shot the courageous victor. But, at the time of his travels, very little was known about the secretary-bird, and he, being a naturalist, wished to examine it; so that we are indebted to him for knowing some remarkable peculiarities which he then discovered in it. One was, that at the point of each wing, just whence the stroke would proceed, is a hard knob or point of bone, like a spur, growing there as if on purpose for an instrument of attack and defence, and different from what is found in the wings of any other bird. Its feet, also, are formed to enable it to stand firmly on the loose, soft soil which it frequents; and its legs are peculiarly adapted for the rapid hops and long steps necessary to escape the equally swift motions of the snakes. In fact, the "snake-eater," or secretary-bird, seems formed for the especial purpose of destroying those dangerous serpents; and the pluck and intelligence it displays in attacking them are marvellous, rendering it fully a match for a reptile whose cunning and subtlety are proverbial. The first approach is invariably with one wing extended in front to parry off the stroke of the serpent's fangs, which are as invariably prepared to meet it. Often a long time is occupied in dodging and watching the wary snake before a single blow with the spur-pointed wing can be safely aimed; and this was, no doubt, what the traveller witnessed in descending the mountain. The wings, long and powerful, are used not only for attack and defence, but also in place of hands, or rather, perhaps, as a shovel, when, with a peculiar sweep, the snake is tossed on them to fall bruised and disabled. Should the wearied snake attempt to give up the battle and crawl away, the bird anticipates its escape, and with a swift hop is in front again, with his wing defiantly spread to cut off retreat. Though one bite of the poisonous fangs would speedily end his existence, yet, as food, those venomous snakes are not injurious to him. This is one of those wise and wonderful provisions of the Almighty which we find wherever we turn to study His works; and but for this safety in feeding on them, how could such dangerous creatures ever be kept under? They would soon increase to a degree fatal to all other animals.

Another peculiarity in the secretary-bird is its enormous appetite. A perfect cormorant is it! That naturalist who shot the snake-eater on purpose to learn and to tell to others all he could respecting it, found in its crop a sufficient proof that it was a reptile-killer indeed! You will scarcely believe the number of creatures it must have eaten that same day; for half of them had not begun to be digested, and all were sufficiently sound for him easily to distinguish them. Three snakes as long as his arm, besides the large one just killed, eleven lizards and eleven little young tortoises, besides numberless large insects, such as locusts, grasshoppers, beetles, etc., which were only as so many sugarplums to the serpent-eater!

So, now, you can understand the use and importance of this wonderful bird in hot countries, where, if all the insects and reptiles which are hatched should live without molestation, there would be no room for any other animals; and certainly not for human beings.

Keep company with persons rather above than beneath yourself; for gold in the same pocket with silver loseth both its color and weight.

HOW GAS IS MADE.

IT is very easy to make gas, but it costs much trouble to purify it, that it may burn well and give off no noxious odors. Below is a sort of gas catechism, which conveys a good deal of important "light" on this subject:

"How do they make gas?"

"First, they put about two bushels of bituminous coal in a long air-tight retort. This retort is heated red-hot, when the gas bursts out of it, as you see it burst out of soft coal when on the parlor-fire. The gas passes off through pipes. A ton of coal will make ten thousand cubic feet of gas. The gas, as it leaves the coal, is very impure."

"How do they purify it?"

"First, while hot, it is run off into another building; then it is forced through long, perpendicular pipes, surrounded with cold water. This cools the gas, when a good deal of tar condenses from it and runs down to the bottom of the perpendicular boiler, half full of wood laid crosswise. Then ten thousand streams of cold water are spouted through the boiler. Through the mist and rain, and between the wet sticks of wood the gas passes, coming out washed and cleansed. The ammonia condenses, joins the water and falls to the bottom."

"What next?"

"Well, next, the gas is purified. It is passed through vats of lime and oxide of iron, which takes out the carbonic acid and ammonia."

"What next?"

"The gas is now pure. It passes through the big station-meter, then through the main and pipes, till it reaches the gas-jets in your room. Then it burns, while you all scold because it does not burn better."

PARLOR MAGIC.

THE PENETRATIVE SIXPENCE.—You profess that you will make a sixpence pass through the table. To perform this feat you must have a handkerchief, in one corner of which is sewed a sixpence, or a counter the exact size of one. Take it out of your pocket, and ask one of the company to lend you a sixpence, which you must seem to carefully wrap up in the middle of the handkerchief, but instead of which, you keep it in the palm of your hand, and in its stead, wrap up the corner, in which the other sixpence or counter is sewn, in the midst of the handkerchief, and bid the person from whom you borrowed the sixpence feel that it is there. You then lay it under a hat upon the table, take a glass in the hand in which you have concealed the sixpence, and hold it under the table. Give three knocks upon the table, crying "Presto! come quickly!" Then drop the sixpence into the glass; bring the glass from under the table, and exhibit the sixpence to the spectators. You lastly take the handkerchief from under the hat and shake it, taking care to hold it by the corner in which the counter or sixpence was sewn.

THE VANISHING SIXPENCE.—Having previously stuck a small piece of white wax on the nail of your middle finger, lay a sixpence on the palm of your hand, and, addressing the company, state that it shall vanish at the word of command. "Many persons," you observe, "perform this feat by letting the sixpence fall into their sleeve; but to convince you that I shall not have recourse to any such mean deception, I will turn up my cuffs." You then close your hand, and bringing the waxed nail in contact with the sixpence, it will firmly adhere to it. You then blow your hand, and cry "Begone!" and suddenly opening it, and exhibiting the palm you show that the sixpence has vanished. If you borrow the sixpence of any of the company, take care to rub off the wax before you restore it to the owner.

THE MULTIPLYING COIN.—Let a tumbler be half-filled with water; put a sixpence in it; and holding a plate over the top, turn the glass upside down. The sixpence will fall down on the plate and appear to be a shilling; while at the same time a sixpence will seem to be swimming in the water. If a shilling is put in the glass, it will have the appearance of a half-crown and a shilling; and if a half-crown were put in, it would seem to be a crown piece and a half-crown.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

AUNT PATIENCE MEETS PIPSISIWAY POTTS AT THE STATE FAIR.

SAYS I to my son John: "We must go the State Fair. I don't s'pose it'll be much, compared to what sich things used to be, but a body must be public-spirited, and then you can take along your flying machine, and who knows but the governor, or some other one-legged man, will bespeak one."

So my son John and I started. He was most afeard to carry his model for fear somebody might steal the idea afore he'd got the patent on it; but I says, "Nobody could understand it, unless you explained it, and you mind keep a close mouth." So my son John and I went to Mansfield. When we got there it rained big guns, and I was so afraid the paper wings of the model would git wet, that I told John he should jist take a cold chicken out of my basket and stay at the station-house, while I went to Cousin Jim Long's and stayed all night. Cousin Jim keeps a tavern, that's what we used ter call it. Now they scold me and say: "You must say hotel, aunt." But I jest say I don't see the sense o' changin' names when the thing is all the same. Well, they call their hotel the St. Peter's, but that didn't scare me one bit. So I spread my blue cotton umberil, and took my basket with my new cap and my home-knit socks and my luncheon in it and I started up to the St. Peter's. It was a good half a mile, and I felt pretty well tuckered out afore I got to it.

Well, I du declare, when I got there, it was jist like a hive o' bees swarmin', or a swarm o' greenheads round the cattle-yard. So many men was a runnin' round here and there, and bells was ringin', and waiters was a jumpin', and you'd a thought the house was afire, there was sich a scramble.

I panted up the stairs to the sittin'-room, and there was a number of ladies, lookin' for all the world like hens that hed jist got in out of a shower; their skirts feel so kind o' meek like, and I see one of 'em, kind o' sly, tryin' to pull a New York Tribune out of her placket. But, laws, it was so wet, it all fell to pieces, and that is jist the pint why she wanted to git shut on't. I heard her say: "If I live till ter-morrer, Jeremiah shall git me a reg'lar bustle. I was that shamed when I felt my skirts begin to flat down, that I could a hid my head in an ash heap. If he don't, I'll file a bill for deforce on the ground of extreme cruelty."

I looked at her over my spectacles in a sort o' rebukin' way, an' says I: "Does your Jeremiah ever git drunk?" "Not he," says she.

"Wall, then," says I, "you must hev the heart of an ostrich if you could think o' sich a wicked thing, jist for the want of what makes you look more like a camel than a human."

She looked at me kind o' strange, an', says she to one of her mates: "Did you ever hear tell of the man that got rich a-mindin' his own business?"

I didn't appear to take any notice of her imperdence, and jist then one of the waiters came along, and so, says I: "Will you tell Cousin Jim, with my compliments, that his Aunt Patience is here, and she wants a room?"

You see they all call me Aunt Patience, from oldest to youngest.

By and by he came back and a real scrumpshus clerk with him, and he says: "Mr. Long is very sorry, but he hasn't a spare room in this house, nor a spare corner nuther. But you can git lodged in a private house, and he'll send a boy round to carry your basket."

"Give him my thanks, an' tell him I'm proper sorry," says I, "but I make no doubt it's jist so."

Wall, I waited awhile, and them wimen looked kinder respectful after that. I tell you it's a great thing to be well connected. Wall, I waited, but as no boy came, and I see 'em dodgin' round with sarrers, a carryin' drink; iced tea and sich, I suppose, I concluded I'd best not wait. So I tuck up my basket, an' went out, sayin' to myself: "What a blessed thing it is to be able to paddle my own canoe, Aunt Patience." The water was a-pourin' down the gutters, and I e'n a'most tumbled into the ditch two or three times, but I had good, strong shoes, and so I didn't mind if I dhd set my foot in a puddle. And then, you see, my skirts was short, so had no fear of gittin' drabbled. I didn't git the name rightly, so I had to make inquiry of everybody I met, but, bless you, what is your tongue for if you don't ask questions with it when you want to know things. So, at last, I found the place. I rung the bell, and a nice little gal came to the door, and I said to her: "My cousin, Mr. Long, of the St. Peter's, he sent me to stay with you, 'cause his house was so full. He was dreadful sorry, but I thought I might as well come 'round here as to hev him turn his reg'lar custom away on my account."

The young lady took me in, jist as perlit as possible.

"Will you hev a cup of tea?" says she.

"No matter, unless it's perfectly handy," says I; "don't let me make you any trouble."

"Oh, yes," says she, "I will order it while you lay off your things."

So I laid off my things and washed my face and put on my cap, and when I came inter the dining-room, she came bringin' along a big book. Thinks I, she wants my autergraf, an' she shall hev it, an' if I can think of any kind o' pretty verse, I'll write it down.

"Your name, please," says she, lookin' up and smiling sweet like. "And it will be two dollars for tea and lodgin' and breakfast."

I was kind o' 'stonished like, but she looked so as though she was really givin' me a great present, that I jist writ my name and handed out the two dollars, jist what I got for my last churnin' of butter. But as I hadn't spent so much a pleasurin' nigh upon twenty years, I thought I wouldn't try to beat her down.

And then, poor things, I see how it was. They needed new paper for the parlor, and a new carpet and sich, so I thought it was jist kind of a charity for them.

The tea wasn't no great shakes, I can tell you. It was cold Bohea, I allers drink green to home, and the bread was that dry that it a'most stopped up my nose, and the butter looked like what we used ter call bleached cotton, when I was a gal, and the sas was mighty sour, but the gal looked so sweet and benevolent like, that I felt all the time that she was obligin' me, and not I her.

By and by we went up-stairs to bed. The front room was spread all over the floor with mattresses and blankets which I see as the door was open, and I begun to open my eyes as I went along through the hall. I knew my face is pretty expressive, but I r'ally did not think I hed spoken out, when the girl she speaks up very cheerful like, an' she says, as she opened the door into a good-sized room: "You see our regular beds are all full, but we can make it real nice an' comfortable on the floor." I should a felt it a real hardship to bring my old bones down to that hard bed ef she hadn't spoke up so sweet like, and I said to myself, how pleasant words du make hard things easy. But it all turned out jist right, for there was some ladies from the south-eastern part of the State, and they'd heard of me when I used to write reg'lar for the Cultivator, and so next mornin' I went with them, and one of 'em says to me: "I'm on one of the committees, and I can take you in with me and it sha'n't cost you a cent."

I was proper glad of that, and I told her I'd git some real old-fashioned caraway cookies, and if she liked 'em made with sorghum molasses, she should have a real feast when she got hungry.

We went round to see things arly, before the committees had all got there. Jist as I was a-lookin' around to see if I could find anybody I knew, who should I see in the vegetable department, a-lookin' at the bread an' cakes, but my old friend and fellow-writer Pipsissway Potts. But didn't she look natural, though! Jist the same lilac-colored calash that she had on when I see her twenty years ago, and her alapacky that she had sich a time gittin' made a year ago last winter. Why, I knew it in a minit.*

I wanted to see ef she'd know me, so I said: "Good mornin', ma'am. You seem to be a judgin' the bread."

"Yes," says she, "and I'm proper troubled. You see this loaf looks kind o' white-livered, and it's dreadful light, but I do kind o' like to see bread have some color to it. Yet I don't want to hurt anybody's feelin's."

"Well," says I, "if color's what you want, I'm sure that other loaf will satisfy you, for it looks as though it might have been made in South Carliny, and hadn't got much amalgamated."

She looked up kind o' surprised like, and then she sprung at me, an', says she: "If this ain't Aunt Patience. There is so much more on you than there was twenty year ago, that I shouldn't 'a' known you but for that word 'amalgamation.'"

"Wall," says I, "there ain't any too much of you, any

* We have a letter from "Pipsy," under date of September 15th, in which she says: "I had a good time at our State Fair, only fourteen miles distant. Was one of a committee on bread and butter one day, and on pictures the next." So it's all true about her meeting with "Aunt Patience."—Ede. Home Mag.

way. You look as though you hadn't been r'ally well for a long time. I wonder if your conscience is quite clear about that blessed Deacon Skyles?"

"Hush," said she, castin' a side glance toward a pile of pumpkins and cabbages.

I looked that way, and there was the deacon himself. He had on a stove-pipe hat that he sat on the crown of his head so far that it crowded down his ears till they set out so that he had a wonderful likeness to the gorilla, I do declare. He wore a kind of an old velveteen coat, and an old butternut-colored jacket, and a pair of army trousers, palish blue, you know, and rolled up to the top of his big brogans. He was a leanin' kind o' pensive like, half huggin' a tremendous big squash, and at the same time a chawin' terbaccer dreadful fast, so that the juice ran down on both sides of his chin, which was shaved, and it actually run onto his shirt bussum.

As he looked up kind a-implorin' like to Pipsey, I could not help pityin' on him. Says I to her: "Pipsey, that man is onhappily married, and I fear his affections ain't entirely weaned from your charms. His wife don't smart him up one bit."

I thought she was a little tender over it, but maybe it was her cattarrh, for she took out a big silk bandana handkerchief and blowed her nose, and then she took out her snuff-box and took a pinch of powdered blood-root. Says she: "I can't be too thankful to that blessed friend that sent me the receipt for makin' this. It's been a world of comfort to me in my trials."

But I wouldn't be put off so. Says I: "Can you look on a feller critter, reduced to sich a state of despair, and not feel that a single woman is really in danger of doin' great harm? Now that man's blighted affections must be a source of trouble to your conscience. My advice is for you to marry, the first opportunity. Why ther's my nephew, Bijah Long. It r'ally seems providential. He's single, you know, has a good farm, six Devon cows, and every one of 'em's got a premium calf; and he'd be a good perrvider, and he's sure to be on the fair grounds."

Pipsey got dreadful red in the face. I could see she wasn't so much inclined to say no as she was to Deacon Skyles. So I jest turned the conversation, for by this time the other committee women had come, and a man with a book. I s'pose they thought the women wouldn't know how to make such important entries.

"Wall," says I, "what are you goin' to do about a premium on bread? If my granddarter Jerushy couldn't make better than this, I'd shet her up in a dark closet."

Says Pipsey: "But we must be charitable to the poor woman who tried so hard to get this loaf baked," a patten' the dark one. "I dare say her baby cried, and she had to let it stand in the oven a mite too long. But you know a little scorch on the crust is good for dispepsy, and I am going to put on a card, and write on it, 'Commended.'"

And, as true as you live, she did do it. Wall, it didn't cost much trouble, and I dare say it made the poor woman comfortable, for, ten to one, she haint heard her husband say that since the blessed honeymoon went down.

I didn't say anything more; but when I looked round to see Deacon Skyles, he was half lyin' on the cabbages, and his right arm flung kind o' tenderly over the squash. It was affectin'. But I spied Bijah not fur off, and went for him, for I was determined that such a woman as Pipsey, who knows how to do so many kinds o' work, hadn't orto be left to waste her sweetnin' on the desert air, as the poet says.

Jest as I was goin' for Bijah, who should come along but the president of the society, and with him the governor. I do declare, Pipsey was so astonished that she gave her calash a sudden flirt, and it fell right off, and down tumbled her hair. The deceivin' thing stood there convicted, for her head wasn't no more bald than mine; and, more than that, her hair was that long it would have covered her all over, like that woman they tell about that Peepin' Tom looked at through an auger-hole. But she scrambled it up, and put on her calash, and the governor he smiled like; and then he was introduced, and he said so many kind things that I quite took to him. His ways to the farmer folks is affectionate.

So when he turned round to me, and asked if he had really the pleasure of seein' Aunt Patience, I made my best courtesy, and said: "Yes, sir, that's my name, and I'm jest as proud ter say so as though it was Eugenia, or any highfalutin' name. And sence we're speaking of highfalutin' things," says I, "perhaps you'd like to see the moddle of my son's flyin' machine. I du think Providence is a helpin' with wonderful inventions all them that has stood on the right side, and it would be an appropriate tribute to heroes if somebody could get up a real nice flyin' machine that would carry 'em about easier a sight than walkin'."

Says the governor: "What a beautiful thought!" And I took him right aroun' to where I see my son John, and he showed him just the plan of it—shaped like a duck, only hollow in the back for seats, and the wings are like a great condor's, that can be filled with gas—and anybody knows that gas is the main thing to take one up in the world. I didn't say this to the governor, for fear he might take it as kind of personal, you know.

Wall, this interruption perverted me from introducin' Bijah, but I've got my heart set on it, and mean ter bring it about yet. It's a burnin' shame that sich a woman as Pipsey should live single, when so many poor forlorn widowers with families and bachelors with cows are wantin' good, profitable housekeepers.

If my son John should perfect his flyin' machine, I shouldn't be surprised if we want to France this fall.

AUNT PATIENCE.

CALICO FOLKS.

SOME people, like some prints, run up and down. Give them their own way, and they will accomplish something. But try to turn them this way or that, and they fall short. They do not work up to advantage. They are not as useful as those who can adapt themselves to the wishes and wants of others. If you wish to make them useful in a sewing society or a caucus, you have to turn down your pattern, scrimp and piece, in order to make anything of them, and then you have nothing pretty or showy when done. There will be sure to be a gore running the wrong way, or something to spoil the effect. There always will be leaders in every movement. There ought to be; there must be. And it is no easy matter to know how to get the best service out of a calico man that figures up and down, and scant pattern at that. Some people are like damaged prints. If you try to make anything of them, they just drop to pieces. You can't count on them. Some people wear well, wash well, and make themselves useful in some shape as long as there is a shred of them left. They are beautiful, and look like new up to the very last. You tell me they are our healthy, cheery people, and that it is no virtue in them that they are fast colors, but rather an extra touch on the part of Providence. Sometimes this is so. More times, however, it is a virtue to be healthy and cheery in these days of excesses. To be temperate in all things means health and good cheer. These cheery people adapt themselves to the changes in society and manners as easily as a bright calico full skirt adapts itself to gores, overskirt, shirt waist, and then works up for the children, and finally turns up in a bed-quilt, because it is so pretty. Take some old ladies, for instance. When they find the kitchen work growing too heavy, how gently they will slip into a silk wrapper, and entertain the company in the parlor. By and by, wishing for more quiet, they retire to the family sitting-room and trot the baby. Next, take to knitting in the corner. Then sit by the window in the old easy chair, and read the Bible, and keep track of their spectacles. Finally, they take quietly to their beds, and drop into a sweet slumber, and smile that it has all ended so peacefully, while true mourners bow their heads and call them "blessed."

Such an end comes only to those who are true all through, like a piece of gingham, with both sides alike. If such people happen to be turned inside out, and their motives exposed, there is no disgrace attending it. They have no reason to quake at exposure. But how we do rub at the outside of the cup.

My father once had a large old tenant house. One fall he let it to a family of foreigners, just landed. On going over there one morning, just after a drizzling rain storm, he found the house full of smoke, and three thick women, with short skirts, jackets and stiff caps, tearing strips of cloth and pasting them over the cracks, to keep the smoke back. He saw at once that the house was on fire. They said something about "drei tag," which, upon examination, he interpreted to mean that the fire had been smouldering among the old-fashioned hard wood beams for three days. Many a man who to-day is guarding his mouth so closely in order that there may be no smell of smoke, treasures a consuming fire that will burn to the surface in time, in spite of all his pasting, and the favoring elements even. While my father stood talking, a little flame darted up through the roof, a strong wind arose, and, in what seemed no time, the old tenant house was in ashes. It went all the faster for having been so thoroughly scorched inside, before the breaking out.

Apply the lesson, it is plain enough. There is a perceptible smell of smoke in almost every man's mouth now-a-days. What a spontaneous combustion must be going on inside. And what a conflagration we may expect if smoke is any sign of fire. MRS. B. C. RUDZ.

"NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP."

IT is said of the late John Quincy Adams that he never went to bed without repeating this little prayer, the first taught him by the mother whose memory was so dear to him to the last.

There are two little poems, descriptive of a child saying this prayer, that are among the tenderest in our language, and we give them both. The first is from Putnam's Magazine (now merged into Scribner's Monthly):

Golden head, so lowly bending,
Little feet so white and bare,
Dewy eyes, half-shut, half-opened,
Lisping out her evening prayer.

Well she knows when she is saying,
"Now I lay me down to sleep,"
'Tis to God that she is praying,
Praying Him her soul to keep.

Half-asleep, and murmuring faintly,
"If I should die before I wake,"
Tiny fingers clasped so saintly—
"I pray the Lord my soul to take."

Oh, the rapture, sweet, unbroken,
Of the soul who wrote that prayer!
Children's myriad voices floating
Up to Heaven, record it there.

If, of all that has been written,
I could choose what might be mine,
It should be that child's petition,
Rising to the throne divine.

Where the other originally appeared we do not know. It is called "The Unfinished Prayer," and is equally tender and beautiful:

"Now I lay,"—repeat it, darling—
"Lay me," lisped the tiny lips
Of my daughter, kneeling, bending
O'er her folded finger-tips.

"Down to sleep,"—"To sleep," she murmured,
And the curly head bent low;
"I pray the Lord"—I gently added,
"You can say it all, I know."

"Pray the Lord—" The sound came faintly,
Fainter still—"My soul to keep;"
Then the tired head fairly nodded,
And the child was fast asleep.

But the dewy eyes half opened
When I clasped her to my breast,
And the dear voice softly whispered,
"Mamma, God knows all the rest."

A LETTER.

DEAR "HOME."—I have been lately looking over some of the writings of that gifted woman "Pipsey Potts," and their occasional strange pathos gives me a touch of sadness. Not so much for the misunderstood, longing child in them, as for the poor, blinded, tolling mother, who allows herself to sell her birthright, the highest and most glorious privilege of maternity, that of being the trusted friend and helper of her children—the one to whom they would always come, feeling that she would understand them and sympathize with them in everything as no one else could—for the barren privilege of working for their material comforts alone.

Parents may make the lives of their children very happy, though they have not the means to satisfy their intellectual or æsthetic cravings. My parents were early settlers in the far West and they toiled early and late in making a home, and every child had his or her appointed labor. I have no recollection of the time when I commenced to "tend" baby, set table, wash dishes and dust.

But I thank God that my parents, though poor, loved beauty as well as neatness. My mother rarely ever went to "big meeting" (almost her only indulgence) without bringing me home a few seeds or a slip of some flower she thought I would like, or a new pattern for a patch-work quilt.

I don't know whether it was policy or necessity that made her always say she had no time for such things; but I know that she gave them to me, and said it was "girls' work" to take care of such things; and caring for them filled my life as nothing else did. I had the front of our cabin covered with morning glories, and no roses that ever bloomed were more beautiful than my red and white roses, and the hollyhocks, and the pinks and ragged robins, and marigolds, and Johnny-jump-ups and the bouncing Bettys! Oh, I doubt if Vick himself sees more beauty in all his flowers than I did in mine; and if they could have spoken, what secrets they could have told, for they alone knew my dreams of a home filled with love, things of beauty and books!

Our library was the Bible, some school books and a few religious tracts, to which my father added a volume of sermons, or something similar, as he could, and borrowed and read "out loud," an occasional newspaper, or book of travel or adventure. Books were a want of my life, which has never yet been wholly satisfied, for though I, too, made old bachelors' pants, and washed their shirts, and taught district schools, yet, before that time, misfortune and death had found their way into our home, and even my feeble efforts were needed to keep the wolf from the door, and to save the little home we all loved so well. And then, while I was still young, I went to help make another home, and the old wants and aspirations had to be put in the background while the new cares were met.

But every life has its compensations; and though our posts may be filled with ghosts of dreams that never took forms, and hopes that were never fulfilled, yet our Father will gather them all up, and, if they were pure and true, we will receive double in that day for all we have seemed to lose while here.

Oh, I am gladder and gladder every year of my life that I have no more power to choose than I have. And to-day, if the power to choose all for myself were offered to me, I should prefer to lay my hand in that of the All-wise, and say: "Father, I do not know; choose for me, and lead me."

2. Carol, sweetly carol,
As when the angel throng,
O'er the vales of Judah,
Awoke the Heavenly song.
Carol, sweetly carol,
Good-will, and peace, and love,
Glory in the highest,
To God who reigns above.—CHORUS.

3. Carol, sweetly carol,
The happy Christmas time;
Hark! the bells are pealing
Their merry, merry chime.
Carol, sweetly carol,
Ye shining ones above,
Sing in lucid numbers,
Oh, sing redeeming love.—CHORUS.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

NO JEWELLED BEAUTY IS MY LOVE.

BY GERALD MASSEY.

NO jewelled beauty is my love,
Yet in her earnest face
There's such a world of tenderness,
She needs no other grace.
Her smiles and voice around my life
In light and music twine,
And dear, oh, very dear to me,
Is this sweet love of mine.

Oh, joy! to know there's one fond heart
Beats ever true to me;
It sets mine leaping like a lyre,
In sweetest melody:
My soul upsprings, a Deity!
To hear her voice divine,
And dear, oh, very dear to me,
Is this sweet love of mine.

If ever I have sigh'd for wealth,
'Twas all for her I throw;
And if I win Fame's victor-wreath,
I'll twine it on her brow.
There may be forms more beautiful,
And souls of sunnier shine,
But none, oh, none so dear to me
As this sweet love of mine.

CUPID'S ARROW.

BY ELIZA COOK.

YOUNG Cupid went storming to Vulcan on day,
And besought him to look at his arrow.
" 'Tis useless," he cried; "you must mend it, I say!
'Tisn't fit to let fly at a sparrow.
There's something that's wrong in the shaft or the dart,
For it flutters, quite false to my aim;
'Tis an age since it fairly went home to the heart,
And the world really jests at my name.

"I have straighten'd, I've bent, I've tried all, I declare;
I've perfumed it with sweetest of sighs;
'Tis feathered with ringlets my mother might wear,
And the barb gleams with light from young eyes;
But it falls without touching—I'll break it, I vow,
For there's Hymen beginning to pout;
He's complaining his torch burns so dull and so low
That Zephyr might puff it right out."

Little Cupid went on with his pitiful tale,
Till Vulcan the weapon restored.
"There, take it, young sir; try it now—if it fail
I will ask neither fee nor reward."
The urpin shot out, and rare havoc he made;
The wounded and dead were untold;
But no wonder the rogue had such slaughtering trade,
For the arrow was laden with gold.

"INTO THY HANDS."

BY MRS. JULIA C. E. DORR.

INTO Thy hands, O Father! Now at last,
Wearied with struggling and with long unrest,
Vext by remembrances of conflicts past,
And by a host of present cares oppress,

I come to Thee and cry, Thy will be done!
Take Thou the burden I have borne too long;
Into Thy hands, O mighty, loving One,
My weakness gives its all, for Thou art strong!

For life—for death. I cannot see the way;
I blindly wander on to meet the night;
The path grows steeper, and the dying day
Soon with its shadows will shut out the light.

Hold Thou my hand, O Father! I am tired
As a young child that wearies of the road;
And the far heights, toward which I once aspired,
Have lost the glory with which erst they glowed.

Take Thou my life, and mould it to Thy will;
Into Thy hands commit I all my way;
Fain would I lift each cup that Thou dost fill,
Nor from its brim my pale lips ever stay.

Take Thou my life. I lay it at Thy feet;
And in my death my sure support be thou;
So shall I sink to slumber calm and sweet
And wake at morn before Thy face to bow.

SLEEP.

BY J. G. HOLLAND.

MY God, I thank thee for the bath of sleep.
That wraps in balm my weary heart and brain,
And drowns within its waters still and deep
My sorrow and my pain.

I thank Thee for my dreams, which loose the bond
That binds my spirit to its daily load,
And give it angel wings to fly beyond
Its slumber-bound abode.

I thank Thee for these glimpses of the clime
That lies beyond the boundaries of sense,
Where I shall wash away the stains of time
In floods of recompense—

Where, when this body sleeps to wake no more,
My soul shall rise to everlasting dreams,
And find unreal all I saw before,
And real all that seems.

HARVEST SONG.

BY REV. C. DAY NOBLE.

THE old earth offers her fatness still,
The sky its showers and shine;
Rock and river their life distil,
To sweeten the corn and wine.

The seed we scattered with hopeful hand
Has ripened to tenfold more;
And far and wide through a smiling land
We gather the golden store.

Nature has honored her ancient word,
Heaven its blessing supplied;
Over the land let songs be heard,
And labor be glorified.

Gather the circle and heap the board,
Safe are we from war or dearth;
Into our confident hearts are poured
Thanks and peace and kindly mirth.

MAKE straight the path before thy feet,
And walk within it firm and fleet,
And thou shalt see, in vision sweet
And constant as the love supreme,
With closer gaze and brighter beam,
The peaceful Heaven that fills thy dream.

THE REFORMER.

THE DRESS QUESTION.

BY JANE O. DE FOREST.

NUMEROUS articles are yearly written upon this subject, but most of them seem to do but little good, as they are usually either wholesale denunciations of women for following fashions and spending money extravagantly, or go to the other extreme, and propose some half-masculine attire, the adoption of which few women will seriously consider for a moment. That there is great and pressing need of a reform in the dress of a majority of women, cannot be doubted, but it is chiefly because so few know or heed the teachings of physiology.

In regard to great extravagances in dress, concerning which so many anathemas have been uttered, it is safe to affirm that by far the larger portion of the women who spend more for dress than they can afford, do so to please their fathers, husbands, brothers and other masculine friends.

It is generally claimed that women dress extravagantly to rival each other, rather than for the eyes of men; but this idea is evidently no more reliable than many others which all are accustomed to hear advanced.

The writer is acquainted with intelligent, reliable and well-dressed ladies, who declare that their dress is far too plain and inexpensive to suit their husbands. That there are women who are wholly given up to extremes of fashion and reckless expenditure in dress, because of their own vanity, cannot be doubted; but where one such woman is found, ten of "these extravagantly-dressed creatures," who exceed "Solomon in all his glory," are thus "decked out" to please the fancy or gratify the pride of some man. Gentlemen of real or pretended wealth usually delight in displaying grand and richly-furnished mansions, fine horses and carriages, and the costly attire of wives and daughters.

To be counted the sole owners of so much elegance is sufficient compensation to many men who spend their days in dingy offices and counting-rooms.

Instead of being the confidants and helpmeets of their husbands, most richly-dressed wives are mere "lay figures," who are expected to add to the general display. Scores of women who dress far beyond their real pecuniary ability have always been kept in utter ignorance in regard to the business of their husbands. They are not wilfully extravagant, and would gladly live within their means were they permitted to know the exact family income. The time-honored notion—not yet exploded in this enlightened century—that women are an inferior order of beings, quite unfit to be trusted with weighty affairs of finance, but should be treated as grown-up children and parlor ornaments, is the foundation of their extravagance in dress.

Coming now to the most important part of the dress question—namely, its effect upon the health—it may be remarked that women are faulty in this respect because of false notions of beauty, an ignorance of physiology, and sheer laziness. They imagine that a slender waist is beautiful, no matter how disproportioned to the rest of the figure; consequently, from early youth till past middle life, they compress their chests. Many of them know but little or nothing of the delicate mechanism of their own bodies, and hence do not realize that they are sapping the very foundations of health by wearing their clothing too tight and improperly suspended. Again, there are other women who do know the truth, but, to quote Miss Ophelia, are too "shiftless" to make the necessary alterations, were they to relieve the hips from the oppressive and absolutely killing weight of clothing which is there suspended, or have to prepare the extra under and outer garments needed during our increasingly cold winters. This branch of the "dress question" has, at the present time, urgent claims for the attention of American women, and if by a few plain and earnest words I can induce the readers of our truly excellent "HOME MAGAZINE" to think earnestly and act promptly in regard to any defects which they are still permitting in their clothing, my reward will indeed be "exceeding great."

Do not place me among the "panta-lunatics;" I am not, and never have been, an admirer of the so-called "Reform Dress." It may, no doubt, be worn to an advantage while performing labor about the house, and women who have already broken their health by an indulgence in all the follies of dress, may do well to wear it while engaged in household duties, but the sight of a woman "in pants" parading the streets is quite as ludicrous as the spectacle of a woman with an enormous hump on her back, wiping up the filth of the streets with her long skirts; though, as far as modesty and cleanliness is concerned, the first certainly carries off the palm. A prominent Ohio clergyman recently said in a sermon that any woman who would sweep the streets with her dresses was vulgar. It is a hard saying, but isn't it more than half true?

There is no necessity of following either of these extreme modes of dress. Because you are too sensible, and modest, and cleanly to wear the enormous bustles now in vogue, and to use your dresses for street-sweeping, it does not follow that you must therefore make a guy of yourself à la Dr. Mary Walker. A lady may be dressed becomingly, and at the same time healthfully, if she chooses.

Physicians state that within the last few years six new diseases have been introduced among women. This statement is not at all surprising, when we recollect that during the last dozen or fifteen years the wearing of corsets has been revived, and is now almost universal among women. "But I don't lace myself," is the indignant ejaculation from each corseted reader. Perhaps not, though every woman who does, always denies it. Granting that you do not buy a twenty-inch WOMAN-KILLER, and call in assistance to squeeze yourself into it, is it not probable that you would be troubled to expand your lungs to their fullest capacity? Granting that you really are among the number who positively do wear their corsets loose, are you not aware that they weaken the muscles of the chest, press down upon the vital organs of the abdomen, while they furnish no suitable support for your skirts? Several years ago a corset was in market which had shoulder-straps, also a skirt-supporter at the hips, but these advantages evidently did not make it popular, as the slender "GLOVE-FITTING" corsets are the prevailing styles in our stores. Home-made shoulder-straps, or ladies' suspenders, or patent skirt-supporters, are worn by some, but, without doubt, the under-garment fitted like a dress lining, with large buttons for attaching the skirts is preferable to anything else.

One of the most beneficial of modern fashions has been the skeleton hoop-skirt. Before its introduction, five or six skirts were often worn, usually suspended at the hips alone, but with its advent, there was no farther necessity for more than two, an upper and an under one, thus removing a great weight, as well as saving much hard laundry work. At one time they reached an inconvenient and often immodest size, but since then have decreased to a sensible, convenient form. The short walking dress introduced several years ago, was an immense relief to dress-burdened women, and it not seem possible that any would be so foolish as to return to their former bondage. That they were occasionally worn too short to look becoming, is no reason why long skirts should again be dragging the streets.

With the return of this most odious fashion, hoop skirts have lost favor, and are seldom worn by fashionable young ladies, hence an additional weight of skirts is again necessary, and there is nothing to prevent the hampering of the limbs by the long limp drapery, thus making locomotion at once difficult and ungainly.

At no recent date have the fashions been more thoroughly combined to render women uncomfortable and ridiculous. The present style of dressing the hair, though not injurious to the health, is most absurd and unbecoming. Six years ago the little "waterfalls" were worn very high, making many an otherwise handsome woman look almost idiotic. Those "top-knots" soon "came down," however, and after a year or two of sensible hairdressing, the immense chignons, injuring hair and head by their weight and soiling collars, dresses and ribbons because of their length, ruled the day. Then again a slight respite, ladies wearing the hair coiled at the back of the head in braids or twists, the only really becoming way of dressing the hair. Just now, the fashion followers are again indulging in "high" hairdressing. Imagine the head of the Venus di Medici crowned with a "top-knot!" Bandeaux across the head and the shell combs are becoming accessories to most ladies, provided the hair is arranged at the back of the head, just high enough to escape a moderate ruff, and all women who prefer the rulings of good taste to those of fickle fashion, will permit the feathered tribe to monopolize the cultivation of "top-knots."

A lady wearing a white muslin underwaist of ample size, with a hoop-skirt snugly buttoned thereon and with the skirts of all street-dresses short enough to clear the ground, will not find it necessary to save her health by going into bloomers. The becoming basque waists, which are now so extensively worn, also tend to increase the weight of clothing about the hips, as the dress skirts are usually worn separate. Where the material is very light, the support given by the underwaist and hoop-skirt will be sufficient, but in most cases, the skirt-band should be fastened to the inner seams of the basque, or better still, for a winter dress have a waist-lining made and sew on the skirt in the old style, then with basque worn over that, both lightness and warmth will be secured.

Not only are women injuring their health and shortening their lives by wearing tight clothing and suspending it improperly, but also by dressing too thinly in cold weather. While it is true that there is yearly improvement among women in this respect, it is none the less certain that the majority of them are deserving of grave censure. I have had ample opportunity to learn how careless mothers are about dressing their daughters warmly. Many a poor, shivering girl have I seen in the school-room during our cold winters. These girls were not from poverty-stricken families; they had their rings and lockets and other little articles of adornment. All these things had been remembered, but the warm flannels had been forgotten.

Very many girls are sent to school during the entire winter with cotton hose and cloth gaiters and the remainder of their clothing of corresponding warmth, and, to add to their discomfort, circulation was seriously impeded by the cruel corsets. Such an undermining of the constitutions of American girls is outrageous, and, if the mothers cannot be induced to change this mode of dress, let the fathers exercise some of their boasted authority, and see to it that no money is furnished for finery till their daughters are dressed as warmly and as loosely as their sons.

Every woman and girl should be provided with flannel drawers and wrappers, over which should be worn similar garments of heavy muslin or cotton flannel. The underwaist for winter being made of cotton flannel with long sleeves, completes the comfort, partly furnished by the finely-woven wrapper. Besides this, all women and girls who are frequently out of doors, or are obliged to go into cold rooms, should wear jaunty house saques, then with warm stockings and nice leather shoes, their in-door costumes will be complete.

In their out-door wrappings women are greatly deficient. Contrast the thickness of a man's overcoat, worn as it is over many other warm garments, with a woman's cloak, usually without wadding or lining. Is it strange that women are given to chattering teeth and "the shivers," when they are exposed to the keen wintry air? What wonder that consumption claims so many victims every year, and that women dread the health-giving blasts of winter.

Self-supporting women, who are obliged to go out in all kinds of weather, are often quite as careless about procuring warm clothing as the woman of wealth who is never forced to leave her fireside.

The wages of women are generally much lower than those of men; and in most cases this is very unjust, but sometimes employers are correct in claiming, that from ill-health and consequent irregularity of attendance, women do not work as long or as well as men. They can at once obviate this difficulty by wearing loose, properly suspended and warm clothing. In nine cases out of ten we shall hear nothing further concerning their invalidism.

The goat-skin and morocco shoes which ladies wear, though warm and thick enough for the house, are by no means a sufficient protection on a very cold or wet day without, yet many young ladies are very persistent in declining to wear any kind of overshoes, for fear their feet will "look large." These damsels, trudging along in tight, water-soaked shoes, need not for a moment suppose that any man stops to admire the smallness of their feet. If observed at all by the street loungers, they would doubtless be surprised to hear themselves ridiculed as "simpletons," for walking out in such weather without their rubbers.

"I can't help laughing when I see how much clothing you wear," said a young woman, who was shivering about in a calico dress without any winter undergarments, to another young woman who "dressed as warmly as a man." But if she had also been obliged to take a twenty-seven miles sleigh ride on one of the coldest mornings of last winter, her laughing without doubt would have changed to tears, because of her sufferings, while the sensible woman in an abundance of warm garments scarcely felt the cold.

Women of moderate means often excuse themselves from providing suitable clothing for the winter by saying that they cannot afford it; yet far greater sums are spent for mere show than would be required to furnish a whole family with complete winter outfits. Let no mother plead poverty as a reason for allowing her daughters to go thinly clad, while she loads them with ruffles and overskirts, ribbons and locketts and earrings, etc., etc. The boys will be furnished with plain, warm, substantial clothing, but the poor shivering girls must expect to be warmed by the elaborateness of their toilets. There are hundreds of thoughtless, foolish mothers all over the land, and it is quite time for people to wake up on this subject.

Inquiring one day at a "ladies' furnishing store" for a skirt-supporter recently, advertised in the town by a travelling agent, the polite merchant informed me that he never kept anything of the kind.

"Why not?" I asked.

"Because they would not be saleable; most women would prefer an extra bow of ribbon."

Do not understand me as declaring against all articles of adornment; it is the duty of every woman to dress as becomingly as possible; but I do protest most earnestly against sacrificing health and comfort by spending money for trinkets and furbelows, which should be used for the purchase of warm and substantial clothing. After these are provided, "decorate" yourselves as much as you please, provided you keep within the limits of good taste.

Women of America! mothers, sisters, wives and daughters, shall we not have such a speedy and thorough dress reform as will restore our health and strength, prolong our lives, and add immensely to our usefulness? Throw aside those "bracing" corsets; nature provides for that purpose plenty of muscles, which only need to regain their strength. Relieve the weakened, suffering back and hips from their burdens, and stop sweeping the streets with long dresses. Defy old Boreas with plenty of flannel, and prove yourselves women of sense and intelligence, worthy of an existence in this century of progress.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

BREAD.

WE went to the late Ohio State Fair with both eyes wide open, bound to investigate the bread question. We always wanted to make good bread; we desired to excel in it. What to us was music, or poetry, or pretty things, if the bread, the work of our hands, was dark, or sour, or heavy?

We felt about right this morning at breakfast when the professor took the second slice, a broad, beautiful, white slice, clear across the loaf, and, looking down at it affectionately, said: "Miss Rice, you do make such delicious bread! You are really accomplished!"

We settled back into our linen collar, and smiled benignly on the appreciative professor.

Well, we waded through years of turmoil and trial before we reached this delectable height. We tried and tried to make good bread; it was tolerable bread; our family said it was good; but we knew they were partial, our ambition was not satisfied, it was not the best of bread. Sometimes we would give up in despair, and say the making of good bread belonged only to chemists.

None of the bread at the State Fair was just what we had hoped to find, and we were leaving disappointed, when a little lady rushed in with two loaves of excellent quality, baked a pale hazel-nut-brown, soft, white, sweet, and so spongy that you could press them flat and they would puff out again to their usual size. We obtained her recipe, but that was nothing very new, all good bakers use about the same formula.

She used the best of dry yeast. After it was soaked soft, she stirred up a thick batter of flour and warm water, and putting in the soaked yeast set it in a warm place to rise. She arranged so that it would be light about bedtime. An hour or two before this, she boiled potatoes cut in slices with the skins on, pressed them through a colander, and when cool enough not to scald, poured it into the hollow in the centre of the pan of flour, and then put in the light yeast and mixed the two thoroughly.

In the morning she made up her bread, and took the dough out on the bread-board and kneaded it until it was smooth, say twenty minutes or half an hour. By that time the mass will be so thoroughly kneaded that no flour will be required to prevent it sticking to the bread-board.

When it rises she does not knead it back, the way we usually do, but moulds it out into loaves, with just as little handling as possible.

So I found out two or three new things; one was to boil the potatoes with the skins on, because the best part of them lies next the skin; then the very thorough kneading, and the light handling while moulding into shape.

Now if any troubled housewife reads this, and it teaches her something new, if it lets one ray of light in upon her perplexed mind, I will be very glad; meanwhile, I will whisper to her that which I wouldn't care to let the professor or any of my admiring friends know. I don't make my own dry yeast. I say to an excellent old Dutch lady who excels in all work that her dear old hands take hold of: "If you will keep me in good yeast all the time, I will send you ARTHUR'S MAGAZINE as long as you live." And she does it; and with a clear conscience, and no worry at all, I make the bread that wins devouring praise.

ROSABELLA.

OUR NEIGHBORS' BED-CLOTHES.

I MEAN the warm quilts, and soft blankets, and puffy comfortables that lie heaped up in your own closets; the ones you made, and the ones your mother made. They belong to your neighbors, to the poor widow whose broken windows are mended with boards, and whose little ones creep close together these chilly nights and chatter for want of just one of those blankets that you have been fighting over all the past summer. Fighting the moth, I mean. They belong to her and her children, and to the family of the crippled soldier, and to that brood of motherless ones whose perplexed father knows not which way to turn. The poor man who works on the railroad, or in the mines, or the factory, or the coal bank, he, too, has a right to the contents of your hoarded clothes-press. You cannot kneel in prayer and lift up your face to the All-seeing eye while that fat closet stands there puffing with fulness. Cedar shavings, and snuff, and camphor, and tobacco, and scalding water have all been brought into requisition in your battles with the moths. Didn't you take the hint when they began their depredations, and see that you had more than the Lord thought was your own? Couldn't you understand the gentle reminder?

I really believe we are working in the service of the devil when we so pitilessly stand guard over such treasures—when our beds are made trebly comfortable, we have no right to the heaps that lie upon our closet shelves. We are selfish if we let our poor neighbors or their little ones suffer. Our hearts hold none of the spirit of Christian love if we do this selfish act. If we cannot love our neighbor as much as ourselves, we can go a good many steps in that direction, and we will be the gainers thereby.

ROSELLA.

COOKIES.

IF you want to make sugar cookies that will be just as good in one month's time as they are at first, try this well-tested recipe:

Take two eggs, one cup of butter, two cups of white sugar, half a teaspoonful of thick, sour cream, season with cinnamon, roll thin and bake immediately. These can be kept for weeks in a stone jar in a cool place. R.

FLORAL DEPARTMENT.

IN northern latitudes little or nothing can be done out of doors in the floral department during the month of December. The frost king holds everything bound in icy fetters, and woe to the tender plant which has been left unprotected until this month! Half-hardy plants should, in November, have been protected by a light screen of evergreen boughs, and tender ones, like many species of roses, have been laid down and covered with soda. If the cold weather has not really set in it may not be too late to attend to these things now.

Young evergreens will stand the winter better if branches of cedar or other evergreen boughs are tied in among their branches to partially protect them from the cold. After a snow storm the evergreens must be shaken of the loose snow which lodges in their branches. As beautiful as it looks it must not be allowed to remain, as it will greatly injure the trees.

All trellises and garden seats and wooden boxes or garden ornaments of any sort must be removed from the garden and placed under cover. If they are well oiled with petroleum they will endure much longer.

Plants placed in pits, frames and cellars must not be allowed to get too damp. It is not the intention to promote growth in these places—only to preserve life.

In warmer localities it is possible to do much in the garden even during the winter months. The ground may be spaded and the beds laid out and arranged. Rubbish can be gathered up, walks and drives planned, and the general character of the garden thoroughly studied preparatory to the active work of the spring. In fact, winter is the time to do all the head work of the flower garden; to make selections of trees, plants and seeds for planting, and for deciding the general arrangement of the whole.

In the house there is plenty to do this month. Heat, water and air are the essentials of plant life. Care must be taken that the temperature is not too warm during the day, nor allowed to get too cold at night. The daily temperature should be about 60° or 65°, while at night it should not be more than 15° less than this.

Plants must be watered as often as they need it—no oftener. Few plants will thrive if their roots are kept perpetually in mud. The leaves should be frequently carefully washed to free them from dust which will hinder their growth and injure their vigor.

Plants need air as well as human beings. The windows should be frequently opened when the temperature is not freezing.

The plants must be daily looked over to prevent their becoming infected by insects. If a plant is infected by the green fly, it must be put under a box or barrel and smoked. If the red spider makes its appearance, as it is very apt to do if the air is dry and warm, the plant must be showered daily. Frequent wetting and a moist atmosphere is the best remedy for these pests.

We have received from Briggs & Brother, of Rochester, New York, their Illustrated and Descriptive Catalogue for July, 1873. This pamphlet contains a list of bulbs for fall planting, besides much valuable horticultural matter. Many of the articles, based upon the practical experience of years, are of especial interest, particularly to those who cultivate house plants.

We have also received the fourth number of Vick's Floral Guide for 1873. It contains a full list of seeds suitable for fall planting; also a complete catalogue of fall bulbs, with accurate directions for their management. Vick has always been our favorite among florists on account of his promptness and generosity, and the reliability of his seeds.

CARE OF HOUSE PLANTS.

ALADY in Kansas gives her plan of caring for house plants, as follows: "I live in a frame house, and last winter kept fifty pots of different kinds of geraniums, roses, fuchsias and remountant pinks, all of which received the same kind of treatment, and in the spring my plants were more healthy and the leaves a dark green color. Many came to me for slips in preference to the green-houses. Every two weeks all winter I would take a handful of tobacco stems and steep them by pouring boiling water over them until it looked like strong tea, then when the tea cooled enough to bear the hand, I poured it over the plants. Sometimes the leaves would wilt for a few moments and then straighten out and have that bright, fresh look they have in summer after a shower. Then I would weaken the tea a little more and wet the ground in the pots, and I have no red spider nor green fly."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

WRONG always punishes, sooner or later, the wrongdoer. There is no escape.

STRONG passions work wonders when there is stronger reason to curb them.

MENTAL pleasures, unlike those of the body, never cloy, and are increased by repetition.

NOTHING elevates us so much as the presence of a spirit similar, yet superior to our own.

EMPLOYMENT is to man what oil is to machinery; it makes the wheels of existence run smoothly.

HAPPINESS is a perfume that one cannot shed over another without a few drops falling on himself.

LUCK whines. Labor whistles. Luck slips down in indigence. Labor strides upward to independence.

Be cheerful, but not light; familiar, rather than intimate; and intimate with a very few and on good grounds.

How many think to atone for the evil they have done by the good they intend to do, and are only virtuous in the prospective.

THE first step to misery is to nourish in ourselves an affection for evil things, and the height of misfortune is to be able to indulge such affections.

If a man would keep both integrity and independence free from temptation, let him keep out of debt. Dr. Franklin says, "It is hard for an empty bag to stand upright."

THE chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in cultivating an undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones are to be had on long leases.

ECONOMY is the parent of integrity, of liberty and of ease, and the beautiful sister of temperance, of cheerfulness and health. Profuseness is a cruel and crafty demon, that gradually involves her followers in dependence and debt.

"I HOLD it to be a fact," says Pascal, "that if all persons knew what they said of each other, there would not be four friends in the world. This is manifest from the disputes to which indiscreet reports from one to another give rise."

If there be a class of human beings on earth who may properly be denominated low, it is that class who spend without earning, who consume without producing, who dissipate on the earnings of their fathers or relatives, without being anything in and of themselves.

EXCELLENCE is never granted to man but as the reward of labor. It argues indeed no small strength of mind to persevere in habits of industry without the pleasure of perceiving those advances, which, like the hand of a clock, whilst they make hourly approaches to their point, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation.

MONEY.

MONEY borrowed is a foe
Veiled in kindly seeming;
Money wasted is a friend
Lost beyond redeeming;

Hoarded, it is like a guest
Won with anxious seeking,
Giving nothing for his board
Save the care of keeping;

Spent in good, it leaves a joy
Twice its worth behind it;
And who thus hath lost it here,
Shall hereafter find it.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

WHEN Daniel Webster was advised not to enter the legal profession because it was already crowded, he replied "There is room at the top."

A MINISTER asked a tipsy fellow leaning up against a fence, where he expected to go to when he died. "If I can't get along any better than I do now," he replied, "I sha'n't go anywhere."

A GOOD sort of man was recently asked to subscribe for a chandelier for the church. "Now," said he, "what's the use of a chandelier? After you get it, you can't get any one to play on it."

SOME one tells a story of a steamboat passenger watching the revolving light of a lighthouse on the coast, and exclaiming: "Jupiter! the wind blows that light out as fast as the man can strike it!"

"DON'T you think swearing is evil?" "Yes," was replied, "it is very evil, but it belongs to my business." "What is that?" "Liquor-selling. A man can't sell liquor without swearing. It is part of the business."

A GOOD lady who, on the death of her first husband married his brother, has a portrait of the former hanging in her dining-room. One day a visitor, remarking the painting, asked, "Is that a member of your family?" "Oh! that's my poor brother-in-law," was the ingenuous reply.

THACKERAY said that the drollest thing that he ever heard while in this country, and the most characteristically American, was the remark of a New Yorker: "Oh, I have no objection to England, Mr. Thackeray. The only thing I should be afraid of would be to go out at night there, lest I should step off."

"CAN'T you manage to give my son one of the prizes at the exhibition?" asked a mother of a teacher. "No, madam," was the reply; "your son will stand no chance; he obstinately persists in idleness." "Oh, but then," exclaimed the fond mamma, "if that's so, you can give him a prize for perseverance!"

DR. NEALE, when in Vienna, asked the waiter if there were any Baptists in the city, and he was referred to the "head cook." This reminds us of the fur trader, out West, who, after buying skins of the woman, in the absence of her husband, asked if there were any Presbyterians about there. "I guess not," was the reply; my husband never shot any."

A GENTLEMAN in the habit of occasionally using intoxicating drinks, took up an able temperance address, and sat in his family to peruse it. He read it through without saying a word, when he exclaimed, "This man is a fool." He then read it through again, and when again he had finished it, a second time he exclaimed, "This man is a fool or I am." A third time he read it with still greater care, and as he finished the last sentence, exclaimed, "I am the fool;" and never tasted a drop of ardent spirits afterward.

CONUNDRUMS.

WHAT fish is most valued by a loving wife? Her-ring.

WHEN is a black dog not a black dog? When he's a grey-hound.

WHY is a dog's tail a great novelty? Because no one ever saw it before.

WHAT does man love more than life,
Hate more than death or mortal strife;
That which contented men desire,
Which poor men have, and rich require?
The miser spends, the spendthrift saves,
And all men carry to their graves?

Nothing.

THE OBSERVER.

THE WILD WARDS OF THE NATION.

THE new Indian policy adopted by General Grant, seems to be working admirably. The first step in reform, and one which no other president had ventured upon, was to put the whole "Indian Fund" appropriated by Congress, amounting to some seven millions of dollars annually, entirely outside of politics. This fund was formerly the most convenient and safest of the political funds of each administration. Without even direct corruption, its influence bought up thousands of supporters in every frontier State. The Indian agents and their friends grew rich on their spoils from this appropriation, while the Indians themselves felt that they were wronged and swindled continually. There could be no firm peace or confidence among these wild tribes while this state of things went on.

As an instance of the corruption and swindling that were rife in these agencies, it is only necessary to refer to a single agency, that of the "White Earth" Indian Reservation among the Chippewas of Minnesota. Here the agent received a salary of fifteen hundred dollars a year, and yet this office was sought for as the second best in the State, the profits being reckoned at twenty thousand dollars per annum! Government and Indians were alike cheated.

What was true of this agency was true of all the rest. The Indian had no one to care for him, no one to see that justice was done. Year after year he was wronged and cheated by Government officials, and all his evil passions kept active.

How to reform the old bad system was one of the difficult problems the president undertook to solve. In a fortunate moment, the Quakers suggested to him that, as the civil and military power had so signally failed in settling the Indian question, that it might be well to let them try to adjust the matter. This brought to the mind of the president the happy thought that, as this branch of administration was essentially a moral one, it would be wise to unite the voluntary philanthropic and religious agencies of the country with the government in the treatment of the matter. With a stroke of his pen, as it were, General Grant put "outside of politics" the whole Indian fund. He recommended and procured the appointment of a committee of well-known and philanthropic citizens to oversee and approve of all contracts and expenditures of money in the Indian Department. These citizens also inspected the agencies, and had various interviews with the Indian leaders. But this was not all. Each prominent religious body or association was allowed to recommend a candidate for the various agencies, and then was expected to oversee the agent's conduct afterward. One agency had a Presbyterian agent, another a Methodist, another an Episcopalian, and so on. In the case of one agency where the employee was suspected of bad practices, the religious society, hearing of it, procured his examination, and, finally, his expulsion before the Government could take it up formally.

Mr. Charles L. Brace, the active philanthropist, has recently made a visit to the "White Earth Agency," referred to above, and his account of what he saw is of the most gratifying character. We copy from his letter in the Christian Union:

"In this Reservation of White Earth the head is of the Congregational body, the teachers are employed by the American Missionary Association, and the clergyman—an Indian—is supported by the Episcopalians.

"Through this union of the Government and the religious societies, the highest character, religious devotion and philanthropy are brought into the Indian administration. Many watchful eyes are on every agent. Each employee is placed in his position, not on account of his politics, but from his supposed fitness. A true and wise humanity pervades the whole management. We do not believe that, from top to bottom of this department, there is any corruption which could be known; and we are sure that there is in many branches the highest spirit of humanity, and the most practical and wise method of reform.

"In this agency, for instance, the first object of Major

Smith was to root out the pauper spirit from among the Indians. They were taught that they must earn what they received, and that they should never have from him, if he could help it, gifts of money. Houses were built for them, and they were induced to try these in preference to wigwams. Seed was given, and tools loaned to prepare the ground and plant crops. Cattle were supplied them, and they were taught how to milk and take care of them. A steam saw-mill was put up, and worked by Indian labor. The children were instructed in the school; the youth learned agriculture in the school garden, and others trades in the 'Industrial Home,' while the whole people were gathered in the chapel for religious instruction in pure Chippewa, by a native Indian educated for the purpose.

"Nothing can exceed the wise and practical character of the instruction given. Mrs. Smith, the wife of the chief commissioner, goes right into one cabin and shows the squaws how to make soap. In another, she teaches them to weave the reeds of the swamps into mats. In another, she brings the willow-branches to start basket-making. Here she weeds a garden bed; there she reads the Testament to the dying one; there she labors with some wild and graceful daughter of the forest, to induce her to put on the ugly garments of civilization, here she tries to rescue the ungoverned girl from some seducer and lead her to Christian marriage; and thus this 'object-teaching' goes on with this and other devoted members of the agency.

"As one somewhat of an expert in such matters, I was struck with the wise, practical spirit of the whole work. It was not a matter of sentiment or temporary enthusiasm; but a thoughtful, steady, well-considered effort to raise up the degraded, and reform the vagrant and idle. Every member of the agency seemed animated by a pure spirit of humanity, or inspired by religious devotion.

"After being among them, one felt as if for a time in a purer and higher atmosphere.

"I was struck with the freedom from intemperance among the Indians. 'How do you prevent drunkenness?' I asked.

"'I once asked an old chief how I should do that,' said Mr. Smith, and he answered, 'Give the young men something to do.' I tried it. I interested them in some cattle, in crops, or some steady occupation, and they stopped drinking. Besides, we follow up a liquor-seller very sharp. It's a five hundred dollar fine, you know, and we've already driven several out of Oak Lake and Detroit, and some we have ruined. I will never spare a fellow who tempts these Indians.'

"There are now one hundred and fifty houses inhabited by Indians on this Reserve, and several hundred acres under cultivation by them. I saw several at work building new houses. The saw-mill turns out several million feet of lumber each year—all the work of Indians. A considerable number of cattle are owned by them.

"The improvement in the habits, morals and appearance of this portion of the tribe, all say, is something marvellous since the new reform began.

"Similar results are to be seen at other agencies among the Chippewas, Winnebagoes, Pah Utes and various wild tribes."

THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF PROTESTANTISM.

THE organic unity of Protestantism is impossible. Only on the basis of Christian charity and toleration can it unite and become an irresistible power in the work of evangelization. It is based on the religious freedom of the individual, and the right of private judgment. It does not work by communal force, but from freedom and enlightened reason. It is on this account that it has, in the natural course of things, become broken up and divided into various sects and denominations, each holding to some peculiar interpretations of doctrinal scripture, or some peculiar form of worship. In the first ardors of conflicting opinions, its different elements were driven apart, and there has been much bitterness and antagonism. But these antagonisms are fast dying out, and all the sects are drawing nearer and nearer together, and holding out to each other the right hand of fellowship. In New York, recently, we had the gratifying spectacle of a communion service at a Presbyterian Church, in which a Dean of the Church of England, a Baptist and a Lutheran minister, officiated at the ceremonial. We are less surprised at this Christian fellowship than at the narrowness and bigotry which could have made the old exclusiveness possible.

A writer, speaking of Protestantism and Romanism, draws this clear and admirably-expressed difference:

"It (Protestantism) cannot accomplish such grand visible results as the Roman Church, because it lacks the centralization and directness of aim and effort which belong to a corporation animated by one purpose and moved by one will. It cannot create a dogmatic or ecclesiastical unity, because it is not a unit, and it tends to the diverse instead of the one. It seems, to the mere spectator, a bundle of antagonisms, an epitome of chaos. But the strength of Protestantism is its weakness. Its glory is in the wealth and completeness, the purity and nobility, of the individual characters it develops and sanctifies. It is a religion of persons. Its divisions and agitations and endless controversies appeal to the reason and conscience of individuals, and tend to educate them to a dignity and self-respect and poise of mind found nowhere else. One reason why it is next to impossible to have an all-embracing Protestant ecclesiasticism is, that the whole genius of the religion tends to create a feeling of independence and personal responsibility and personal loyalty to convictions, which is at war with the fundamental idea and necessities of such an ecclesiasticism. Its men refuse to be merely members. It is impossible to build a cathedral out of statues. The Protestant saints refuse to stand and be adored. The stones of its temples are living, and show their life by walking away."

The church of the "individual" is the grand church of the future. Individual purity, intelligence and Christian activity, when aggregated, will give a sweetness and strength to Christian influence that will make its power irresistible. All the signs of the times indicate the coming of this better Christianity, when every man who calls himself by the name of Christ shall be wise, and pure, and humble, a fitting temple for the living God.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

THE Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, held in New York in the early part of October, was a very pleasant reunion of Protestant Christians, at which brethren of a common faith, who had too long held themselves apart from each other on questions of church order or technical differences in doctrine, clasped hands in fraternal good-will. The doctrinal platform of the Alliance was narrow—so narrow that many good Christian people could not stand upon it—but the spirit of the meeting was, in the main, all that could be desired. Ingrained sectarianism asserted itself but little in the many able essays that were read, and the discussions that followed; and all those who look to the unity of the Church in the spirit of charity, no matter how wide the external or dogmatic differences may be, have been cheered and encouraged.

No resolutions were passed, nor was anything said or done that favored an organic union of Protestant churches. We had hoped to see some movement or declaration that looked to a recasting of certain doctrinal statements regarded as orthodox, in order to bring them nearer to the common belief than they now are; so that the written creeds, confessions of faith and dogmas of the so-called evangelical churches, might wholly command the rational faith of the people. God has given to every man a rational principle, and freedom for its exercise—and this is what makes him a man. And it is because the Church so often asks him to subordinate his reason to dogmas that he cannot understand, that he is so frequently driven into skepticism and infidelity. One of the enemies to the Church against which the Alliance felt called upon to array its forces, was modern infidelity. It can more easily disarm than conquer this enemy. A true doctrinal system must appeal to a man's reason, and then he will believe because he cannot help it. Blind faith in what counsels and synods may decree as doctrine, is no faith at all; and unless the creeds and doctrines of the churches are in harmony with reason and an enlightened understanding of Scripture, the leading and progressive minds of the age will not, because they cannot, accept them.

Many incidents attendant on this conference are noticeable and encouraging. It was good to see bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church breaking bread with their Presbyterian and Baptist brethren in the Holy Communion, thus setting an example of Christian unity worthy of the name they bear. There was more in this to weaken infidelity than all the arguments and denunciations of the best polemic writers in Christendom.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Arthur Bonnicastle. An American Novel. By J. G. Holland, Author of "Kathrina," etc. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. Dr. Holland's novel, which has been published monthly in Scribner's Magazine during the present year, is now issued in book form. It is a pleasant and a thought-provoking story, but it hardly possesses the life and animation which should characterize a work of fiction. It is like a finely-finished essay or philosophical discourse, worthy of its talented author, and demonstrates quite as plainly as did the author's previous effort in the same branch of literature, that novel writing is not what Dr. Holland excels in. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Old Fort Duquesne; or, Captain Jack, the Scout. An Historical Novel, with Copious Notes. By Charles McKnight. Pittsburgh: People's Monthly Publishing Co. The true American novelist should feel no lack of material with which to construct romances. The history of our country presents a rich mine, as yet scarcely developed, of incident and adventure, which should preclude all need of copying or borrowing from foreign sources. We are glad when we see an attempt to work this mine, especially if it be successfully done. "Old Fort Duquesne" revives the history pertaining to the present site of Pittsburgh, and gives a graphic account of Braddock's defeat. It is an ably written story, and will familiarize its readers as no bare page of history would ever have done, with the stirring events of those times. The story is founded faithfully on fact, and the leading characters are historical ones.

Crooked Places. A Story of Struggles and Hopes. By Edward Garret, author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead. Our readers who have been following this excellent story through the pages of the HOME MAGAZINE, can now obtain it in a form suited to make it a permanent addition to the library. We need not speak of the merits of the story. Its author stands among the first of England's best—not her most sensational—novelists. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Peter Stuyvesant, The Last Dutch Governor of New Amsterdam. By John S. C. Abbott. New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. This is the fourth volume of the series of "American Pioneers and Patriots," published by Messrs. Dodd & Mead. It gives the early history of New York from the time of the first discovery of the Hudson River until it was no longer a Dutch possession. The book should be in every family library.

John Godsoe's Legacy. By Elijah Kellogg. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The Struggle for Existence. A Romance. After the German of Robert Byr. By Auber Forestier. Philadelphia: H. N. McKinney & Co.

Against the Stream. The Story of a Heroic Age in England. By the Author of "The Schonberg-Cotta Family." New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Hester Morley's Promise. By Heba Stretton, Author of "The Doctor's Dilemma," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead. For sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

A Wonderful Woman. A Novel. By May Agnes Fleming, Author of "A Terrible Secret," etc. New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. For sale in Philadelphia by Porter & Coates.

We find, besides the books noticed singly, quite a large representation of light literature upon our table this month. The first book whose name we have given above is a fair specimen of the best class of German literature, excellently translated. The author of "The Schonberg-Cotta Family," and other books of a like character, furnishes the reader in "Against the Stream" with one of her characteristic romances, in which well-known historical personages are incidentally described. "Hester Morley's Promise" is an average English story, and "A Wonderful Woman" an average American one; and both will probably prove satisfactory to the professional novel reader.

At Our Best. By Sumner Ellis. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is a collection of finished and thoughtful essays, which cannot fail to please the cultivated reader. They are suggestive in style, and with certain touches of humor. The one entitled "The Home" is especially excellent and deserving of attention, touching as it does subjects of the deepest importance to every one.

The Character of St. Paul. By J. S. Howson, D.D. New York: Dodd & Mead. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. This volume contains five sermons or lectures on peculiar traits in the character of St. Paul. It shows careful and comprehensive study of the Scriptures, and an especial understanding and appreciation of the great apostle of the Gentiles.

The Turning of the Tide; or, Radcliffe Rich and his Patients. By Elijah Kellogg. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. These two volumes represent the juvenile literature of the month. The first is the fifth volume of "The Pleasant Cove" Series, and the second belongs to "The Whispering Pine" Series. Both are handsomely illustrated.

Golden Sunbeams. By D. F. Hodges and J. H. Tenney. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is a collection of new music for the Sabbath-school, the social meeting and the home circle. While many of the old favorites have been preserved in this book, many of the hymns are new, having been written expressly for it. It will be found well adapted for the purposes for which it is intended.

NEW MUSIC.

We have received from the publisher, F. W. Helmick, Cincinnati, Ohio, "The Champion Schottisch," for the piano, composed by Charlie Baker. This is one of the prettiest pieces ever published, and no collection of dance music is complete without it. Price 30 cents.

We have also received from the enterprising music publishers, W. H. Boner & Co., 1102 Chestnut St., the following gems of vocal and instrumental music, viz.: "Sing, Sweet Bird," words by S. M. Thornton and music by Wilhelm Ganz, and as sung by that charming young vocalist Susan Galton Kelleher. Also "Tears," a ballad, with words by Tennyson and music by S. D. S., who is also the author of "Prisoner and Swallow," a very pleasing rondinella, and "Ave Verum," all of which we can cheerfully recommend to our music-loving readers. We also have "The Pretty Shepherdess," by Jungmann, and "Watkin's Glen Caprice," by B. Frank Walters, both instrumental. The former is the eleventh of the set of Peerless Harmonies for the piano, which have been noticed in our magazine, such as "Blue Bells of Scotland," etc. As to the latter gem by Walters, his "Sounds from the Ringing Rocks," will recommend his last production, "Watkin's Glen."

DRESS AND FASHION.

AMONG the most sensible and desirable changes that may be noted is a gradual return to round skirts for walking-dresses. The foolish and, for a street costume, the disgusting trailing skirt, will soon, we trust, be a thing of the past, and the new trim French skirt, round, short and narrow, be seen everywhere. The new skirts are "round," inasmuch as they appear to be of the same length all around, instead of trailing slightly behind; short, because they escape the ground; and narrow, because their greatest width is from three yards to three and a quarter. The usual number of narrow gores is used for these skirts, and they are made to cling flatly in front and on the sides by tapes attached to the second side seams, and tied behind the person, or else by wearing them over the new sloping bustles.

The reign of crinoline is over. A fashion authority says: "There was no great display of it at the watering-places; and the nearer you can come to the Pre-Raphaelite styles now adopted by Rosetti's sisters, by the wife of Morris, the poet, and Holman Hunt, the artist's 'better half,' the more charming you are thought to look, and the better you do look. The Byzantine slowness is the order of the day. The kilt-plaited skirts—we mean those that are entirely covered with the kilt-plaiting, running up and down—favor this fashion greatly, and the coming down and flattening of the upstart bustle also adds to the height and apparent slowness. The eye, it would seem, has wearied, at last, of all these distortions of the human shape, and has gone into the adoption of a Josephine style, such as recalls that empress and the days when the consulate struggled to be Grecian and Roman. Look at the statues we have been so long pleased to ignore, and tell us whether we are not capable of better things than we have seen for years. Let the beautiful American figure assert itself, and away with the hoop and the bustle!"

Plainness of style will be the rule during the coming season. The leading dressmakers say this change may not be marked at present, but will come gradually, and the height of the season will show far more simple dressing than is now seen. This will be specially true of street-dresses, such as the short suits of woollen fabrics that are worn in the morning, afternoon and, indeed, for general day wear, church, shopping, etc.

New features are seen in wool and silk suits. The silk skirts of such suits are sometimes trimmed with silk flounces bound and headed by bands of the camel's-hair used for the overdress; on some silk skirts there are so many camel's-hair bands that it is difficult to tell which is the dress and which the trimming. Redingotes are as long and flat as possible in front, with basque backs, or else a shaped flat trimming that extends the whole length of the back. Many stylish polonaises have the back cut in Marguerite shape with the side body seam beginning in the shoulder instead of in the armhole. Bands of the new silver-marten fur (which is said to be coon-skin) are used for trimming redingotes of diagonal cloths, and a gay fancy is an Indian border like that on India shawls for edging camel's-hair polonaises.

Notwithstanding the introduction of novelties for trimming, the prevailing taste is for long, plain redingotes, without ornament other than necessary buttons, pockets, cuffs and collar, and which depend for their beauty upon their perfection of fit, their adaptability and good material. Some of these have the round revers collar of velvet or silk, while others are buttoned close to the throat, and finished with a standing silk collar, either made flaring or else in the English shape with turned-over points.

The leading woollens for overdresses this season are heavy, with generally rough surfaces; and in the methods of their weaving all these substantial fabrics resemble the prevailing styles of gentlemen's goods. Some of the ribbed materials look like ribbed beaver cloths, while others are similar to cassimeres; there are also armure coatings, and wide and narrow diagonals that pass under the name of serges. The real camel's-hair cloth is scarcely handsomer than the all-wool Imperial camel's-hair serge, and costs five times as much. The Imperial serges, and serges de Paris, are handsome materials, and the diagonal cloths are inexpensive, though stylish and very durable.

Never was there a season when pretty dress goods were so cheap. Velours, empress cloths, de bêtes, merinoes, cashmeres, all-wool satines and serges, French mohairs, substantial alpacas, and many other varieties of really good fabrics are sold at about half what was asked for them two years ago, and are shown in very fine qualities. A serge called the "Duchesse" is very soft and fine, and costs but sixty-two and a-half cents a yard. White drap d'état, Thibet, tamise and other substantial and ever-popular goods are proportionately inexpensive.

The time has arrived when flannel has become one of the leading materials for house wear and for children's garments. It is excellent for either purpose, both on account of its warmth and its durability. Serges and camel's-hair goods are now so successfully imitated in flannel, that almost any one but an expert in fabrics would be deceived. There are serge flannels, sacking flannels, and opera, plain and plaid flannels; indeed, while examining this line of goods, one seems to be in a wilderness of fleecy folds which charm the eye with their soft texture and richly-varied hues. The predominant color is blue, and it is found in a multitude of shades, from the palest tint to the darkest navy-blue. Gray-mixed, drab, slate, plum and other cloth colors are also to be had in serge flannels, as well as in the plainer kinds. Serge flannel shows a diagonal twill like the goods from which it derives its name, and makes very handsome redingotes, wrappers, blouses and jackets. It comes in single and double widths, the former being twenty-six inches wide and costing from forty to eighty cents a yard, while the latter is fifty inches wide and comes as high as one dollar and sixty cents a yard. Cloth flannel, which is a heavy diagonal serge-like goods closely resembling camel's-hair cloth, is fifty-four inches wide and costs from one dollar and seventy-five cents to three dollars and fifty cents; this cloth comes chiefly in the blue shades, and makes elegant redingotes, wrappers and overgarments. Regular wrapper flannel is fifty inches wide, displaying grounds of various colors striped with contrasting shades, and costs one dollar and fifty cents.

Any of the above-mentioned materials, trimmed to suit the taste of the wearer, would be very elegant as well as comfortable if made up by pattern No. 2775,* price fifty cents, or by No. 2715,* price fifty cents. A handsome redingote pattern, by which to cut a blue cloth flannel overgarment, is No. 2751,* price thirty-five cents; this pattern is double-breasted and fits closely, while No. 2821,* price thirty cents, is in the loose front style preferred by many ladies, and is equally as desirable as the first. Like the expensive woollen goods now so fashionable, flannel needs no decorations to give it a stylish air, and for ordinary wear is at once pretty, comfortable and serviceable. The above-mentioned cloth and serge flannels are especially adapted to children's wear, and make very jaunty sailor suits for both boys and girls.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

WITH this number we close our subscription year; and we are sure that every intelligent reader will say that, for 1873, the HOME MAGAZINE has far exceeded in interest and attractiveness any of the preceding volumes. For what it will be in the coming year, we refer to our new Prospectus. In addition to the rich and varied programme there set forth, we have the pleasure of announcing another Serial Story for 1874. It will be from the pen of that rarely gifted American novelist, Mrs. JULIA C. R. DORR, whose "Sibyl Huntington," "Expiation" and "Farmingdale," have delighted so many thousands. We congratulate the readers of the HOME MAGAZINE on this accession to our corps of talented writers. Mrs. Dorr is now at work on her new story, the title of which we hope to announce in our next number.

OUR JANUARY NUMBER

Will be one of rare interest. It will contain the opening chapters of Mr. Arthur's new story; and the initial article of the series "My Girls and I," which is going to be very fresh, lively and good. Mrs. Duffey's "Women of All Nations," a series of finely illustrated papers, written in her clear, sensible and attractive style, will also be commenced. "Pipsey" will be there, of course; and Miss Townsend will give us one of her eloquently-written historic portraits. Mrs. Julia C. R. Dorr, the charming story writer, whose graceful pen is now at work on a serial for the "HOME," will contribute a short story for our January number. "Talks with Mothers" will be commenced; also the promised book on "Flower Culture," from the pen of a lady who has made it her study for years.

Besides all these, the number will be crowded with stories, poems, biographical, scientific, historical, social and literary articles in great variety. The "Home Circle," "Housekeepers' Department," and department of "Dress and Fashion," will be full, sensible, attractive and in every way adapted to the social life, culture and needs of American homes.

As said last month, we mean the "HOME" to stand without a rival as a Household Magazine. Never, since the date of its publication, popular as it has always been, has it found so warm and hearty a reception from the people as since we took our "new departure" in January last. It comes, they say, nearer to the common household want in intelligent American homes than any other periodical ever attempted, and is one which no intelligent or well-ordered family can afford to do without. This is just what we are aiming to make the HOME MAGAZINE, and it is gratifying to know that we are successful.

"AFTERMATH."

THIS is the somewhat singular title of Mr. Longfellow's last volume of poetry. Its meaning is found in the little poem with which the book closes. The farmer's "aftermath" is the second hay harvest he gathers in the same year; and to this the poet would have us believe his latest volume bears comparison.

"When the summer fields are mown,
When the birds are fledged and flown,
And the dry leaves strew the path;
With the falling of the snow,
With the cawing of the crow,
Once again the fields we mow
And gather in the aftermath.

"Not the sweet new grass with flowers
Is this harvesting of ours;
Not the upland clover bloom;
But the rowen mixed with weeds,
Tangled tufts from marsh and meads,
Where the poppy drops its seeds
In the silence and the gloom."

"These," says the Christian Union in its notice of the new book, "are eloquent and tender words; but the exquisite melody of them, and all the old-time art and grace in the sentiment which they render, are the sufficient refutation, if any were needed, of the argument which they are shapen to enforce. No; our illustrious poet has indeed reached the autumn of his life's year, but it is an autumn laden and most bountiful with golden fruit. And in this autumnal harvesting, in spite of the poet's asseveration, we discover, not —'the rowen mixed with weeds,

Tangled tufts from marsh and meads,'

but all the sweetness and bloom of the summer which has gone.

"The larger part of this volume is made up of the eight concluding stories in 'The Tales of a Wayside Inn.' It is just ten years since the publication of these tales began, and it is safe to say that nearly all cultivated people who read English have grown familiar with their beauty and sadness and mirth; and it will be like the decisive and formal closing of some epoch in human life to have the series brought to an end. How many hundreds of thousands of readers, in all lands shined upon by the sun of good letters, have during these ten years formed a personal intimacy with the little group of tale-tellers in that cosy inn by the wayside. It seems to us that we should know at a glance, anywhere in the world, and greet as old friends, 'the theologian,' 'the Spanish Jew,' 'the student,' 'the Sicilian,' 'the poet,' 'the musician,' and 'the landlord.' In the pang of their separation we ourselves feel a sort of trouble, and we enter with quick sympathy into the gentle melancholy of the lines which dismiss these friendly strangers—no mere airy forms—upon their sundered paths:

'Uprose the sun; and every guest,
Uprisen, was soon equipped and dressed
For journeying home and cityward;
The old stage-coach was at the door,
With horses harnessed, long before
The sunshine reached the withered sward
Beneath the oaks, whose branches hoar
Murmured: "Farewell forevermore."

"Farewell," the portly landlord cried;
"Farewell," the parting guests replied,
But little thought that nevermore
Their feet would pass that threshold o'er;
That nevermore together there
Would they assemble, free from care,
To hear the oak's mysterious roar,
And breathe the wholesome country air.

'Where are they now? What lands and skies
Paint pictures in their friendly eyes?
What hope deludes, what promise cheers,
What pleasant voices fill their ears?
Two are beyond the salt sea waves,
And three already in their graves.
Perchance the living still may look Into the pages of this book,
And see the days of long ago
Floating and fleeting to and fro,
As in the well-remembered brook
They saw the inverted landscape gleam,
And their own faces, like a dream,
Look up upon them from below.'

A subscriber writes: "I wish to add my testimony to the many in regard to your greatly improved magazine this year. I thought it most excellent before. It is incomparable now."

Referring to our fine steel engravings, a lady says: "They are beautiful, and elicit universal admiration. 'The Angel of Peace' and 'Christian Graces' are particularly attractive, having such rare delicacy and purity of expression. The faces in the last named are studies of which one could scarcely weary; while 'The Wreath of Immortelles' touches a responsive chord in every heart on which Heaven has written, 'Motherless.'"

CONSTANCY.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFY.

"I SLEPT not from eve until morning,
I moistened my pillow with tears;
And in those long hours till the dawning
Was crowded the sorrow of years.
They tell me my lover is faithless,
No longer he mentions my name;
That I must forget him; yet, nathless,
I love him! I love him the same!

"To love and forget may be human,
And it may be a man's part to play;
But, oh, I were less than a woman
If I were to love but a day!
I lived in the thought of him only;
I waited and watched till he came;
Though now I'm forsaken and lonely,
I love him! I love him the same!

"Is the form of his charmer more slender?
And has she an angelic face?
Are her tones more delightful, more tender?—
In her motion a wonderful grace?
Oh, tell if she has brighter hair, or Soft eyes that more loving can be?
Though she may be younger and fairer,
I know that she loves not like me!

"Oh, nitter and cruel this parting!
Oh, bitter and sad as the grave!
I crush back the tears that are starting,
And try to be patient and brave.
Why stand I here watching and waiting,
And why do I murmur his name?
Why love I when I should be hating?
Oh, I must still love him the same!"

She turned from the casement in sorrow,
Her eyelashes heavy with tears;
Her life on that morn seemed to borrow
The grief and the burden of years.
Then a voice through the stillness was ringing,
And fast-rushing footsteps came:
With her arms round her lover clinging,
She sobbed: "He still loves me the same!"

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

—The author of "Stepping Heavenward" is Mrs. E. Prentiss. The volume is published by A. D. F. Randolph & Co., New York; and the price is $1.75. It can be ordered through any bookseller, or direct from the publishers, who will send it by mail on receipt of the price.

—MR. ARTHUR.—DEAR SIR: I think the writing of your last work, 'Cast Adrift,' must have been to you as a crown of thorns. I have only read the chapters given in your much-prized magazine; but they, especially the ones entitled 'Foul Play,' have lain heavy on my heart ever since. It would seem that such creatures as you write of in those awful cellars must be past all hope, till God Himself shall deal with them; but the little children born in the streets—from whose numbers, I suppose, these awful ranks are filled—if we could but save them. There are, of course, many societies already organized with this hope—their work, perhaps, limited by lack of funds. And I thought if you would mention, among your 'Answers to Correspondents,' the name and address of one such; it might serve to direct others of your far-away readers who, as well as myself, feel like asking, 'What wilt Thou have me to do?' though it may be but little."

Answer.—There are several institutions in this city where homeless little ones are taken in and provided for, and where they receive Christian culture as well as the kindest personal care. One of these, to which we would refer our correspondent, or any one else who is moved as she is to help the cast-off, neglected and suffering little ones, is called "The Union School and Children's Home," and is located at the S. E. corner of Twelfth and Fitzwater Streets. A letter addressed to Mrs. J. C. Pechin, vice-president of the "Home," at her residence, 243 S. Thirteenth Street, or at the "Home," corner Twelfth and Fitzwater Streets, will receive prompt attention, and elicit all the information about this institution that may be desired. It has been doing a great and good work for nearly twenty-five years, and has saved thousands of children from a life of misery and crime.
